nor the claims of friendship, could procure his return, or even a change of residence. In justice to the natives of Tómos, it must not be forgotten, that they treated the poet with every mark of respect, and exerted themselves to alleviate the severities of his situation. After languishing among them for seven years, grief and disappointment destroyed his constitution, and he died in the fifty-ninth year of his age, and seventeenth of the Christian era. The Works of Ovidius are, Métamorphoseon, Lib. xv.; Fástorum, Lib. xii.; Tristium, Lib. v.; Héroïdes; Amorum, Lib. iii.; Artis Amatorie, totidem; Remediorum Amoris, Lib. i.; Epistolarum e Pónto, Lib. iv.; Ibis; Haliéuticon; De medicamine faciei, carmen; and Médeá, a tragedy. Of the last, only a few fragments remain. The former two are both imperfect, and six books of the Fásti are lost. All the rest have been transmitted, without mutilation, to modern times. The great work of Ovidius is the Metamorphoses. That he intended to rest his reputation as a poet on this poem, is manifest, from the lines with which it concludes. But he was compelled to leave his native country, and to take up his residence in an inhospitable climate, among a rude and unlettered people, before he had given it his last polish. Of its defects he was so conscious, that, before he went into exile, he destroyed his own copy, and had a friend not been in possession of another, that admirable production had been for ever lost. It is then but just to consider it as an unfinished work, and candour requires, that it be examined with the lenity due to a posthumous publication. To connect the marvellous occurrences and adventures from the creation of the world to his own time, seems almost impossible; yet this difficult task he performed, without the appearance of art, in numbers highly melodious, and in language highly poetical. The fertile genius of Ovidius was requisite to form into a regular design, histories so various and insulated. Yet each follows in the series with almost the rigid exactness of mathematical demonstration. In an instance or two, when no imagination could connect fables which he had resolved not to omit, the poem assumes a dramatic form, and the interlocutors narrate them. The felicity of invention, variety of imagery, exuberance of fancy, and adaptation of language, which the Metamorphoses display, cannot fail to command admiration. The diction and ideas are never at variance. He is equally master of the familiar, the sportive, the tender, the grand, the awful, and the sublime. A noble idea is sometimes weakened by prolixity, and instances of false taste too often occur. His metaphors, although not all new, are, in general, well chosen, and happily introduced. His descriptions are not only lively, but enchanting. The scene is so distinctly placed before the reader, that he is a witness of every action. The moral remarks are not very numerous, but they are both excellent and appropriate. He was a master of the passions, and it is to be regretted, that his tragedy has not been handed down to posterity. Seneca must have had a very high opinion of the genius of Ovidius, from the strong language which he uses, Ille poetarum ingeniosissimus (N. Q. iii. 27). Ovidius composed with great ra-he excluded, except of the Pāpirii (Gel. i. 16).—2. A centurion, despatched by Mūclānus, to assassinate L. Piso (Tac. Hist. iv. 49).

C. Pāpirius (Māso), C. Pāpirii, m. enjoyed the consulship, in 233 B. C. From the consular calendar, it may be stated, that he was the first who triumphed on the Alban mount. On the surrender of the Fālisci, he acted honourably to that people, against whom the Romans seemed inclined to exercise severity (Val. Max. iii. 6).

C. Pāpirius Cārbo, C. Pāpirii Cārbōnis, m. elected praetor, in 171 B. C. He obtained Sardinia and the foreign jurisdiction (Liv. xlv. 17 seq.).—2. A consul, in 122 B. C. To a certain degree of turbulence, if not of sedition, Pāpirius must plead guilty, since, from his frequently lamenting in his harangues, the death of Tib. Sēmprōnius Grāchus, it cannot be doubted, that his design was to promote discontent, or excite commotion, among the people. The laws which he proposed, when a tribune of the commons, had somewhat of a similar tendency. On these grounds L. Crāssus brought him to trial, and, from the writings of Cicero, he appears to have preferred a voluntary death. His powers as a speaker, and his mental attainments, would have commanded respect, had they been united with true patriotism and a peaceful disposition (Liv. Ep. 59. Tac. Or. 34).

C. Pāpirius Crāssus, C. Pāpirii Crāssi, m. a tribune of the soldiers, with consular power, in 383 B. C. (Liv. vi. 18).

C. Pāpirius Māso, C. Pāpirii Māsōnis, m. son of Calus, a Roman pontiff, who died in 215 B. C. According to some authors, he was one of the three commissioners for settling colonies at Crēmōna and Plācēntia, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 25).

C. Pāpirius Tūrdus, C. Pāpirii Tūrdi, m. a tribune of the commons, in 180 B. C., who uttered severe reflections against A. Mānilius Vūlso q. r. (Liv. xli. 6).

Cn. Pāpirius Cārbo, Cn. Pāpirii Cārbōnis, m. consul, with C. Caecilius Mētellus, in 115 B. C., and was defeated by the Cimbrī and Teutōnes (Liv. Ep. 63). Eutrōpius does not mention this circumstance (iv. 15), but it is found in Velleius Pātērcūlus (ii. 12).—2. Commanded one of the four armies with which L. Cōrnēlius Cinna and C. Mārius besieged Rome, in 89 B. C., and, two years after, he obtained the consulship, with L. Cōrnēlius Cinna. Both consuls were solicitous to make war on L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, to whom the senate had sent a deputation to treat of peace. In his second consulship, with the same colleague, the latter died, and Pāpirius remained sole consul. His patriotism cannot be commended, since he opposed the terms offered by L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, although the senate had approved them; conceiving it would be of more advantage to him and his party, that the civil war should be continued than terminated. Pāpirius required from all the towns and colonies, in Italy, hostages, on purpose to bind them against L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, a measure to which the senate opposed a successful resistance. Failure in this attempt did not prevent him from making preparations for war against L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, who routed and cut off his army at Clūsum, Chiusi, Fāvēntia and Fidēntia, in 84 B. C. Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus made him prisoner, in Sicily, and he died, says Livius, weeping like a woman (Ep. 79–89). In his third consulship, he had C. Mārius for his colleague, although under twenty years of age. He is probably the person mentioned by Florus, as having been successful against the Lucani, in the Social war (iii. 18). Adj. Cārbōnānus, a. um.

L. Pāpirius, L. Pāpirii, m. a military tribune, with consular power, in 351 B. C., who, with Sp. Pāpirius, fought a battle, with success, at Vellitae, but did not lay siege to the town, because it did not appear to be their duty to destroy the colony. He is probably the person again mentioned as elected to the same office, in 367 B. C. (Liv. vi. 22–38).—2. A Roman praetor, who passed a law, in 332 B. C., conferring on the Aecraui the right of citizenship, but without the power of voting (Liv. vii. 17).—3. A usurer, whose cruelty and criminality induced the Romans to pass a law, in 325 B. C., prohibiting the imprisonment of debtors (Liv. viii. 28). See C. Pūblius.

L. Pāpirius Crāssus, L. Pāpirii Crāssi, m. elected consul, in 436 B. C. (Liv. iv. 21).—2. Held the consulship, in 430 B. C., and passed a law, very acceptable to the people, respecting the valuation of fines (Liv. iv. 50).—3. A Roman, whom, during his praetorship, in 339 B. C., T. Mānilius Tōrquātus nominated dictator, to carry on war against the Antiatēs; but performed nothing worthy of being mentioned. In his second consulship, 329 B. C., he gained an easy victory over the Priveriātes. The dictator, L. Pāpirius Cūrsor, appointed him master of the horse, in 324 B. C., and gave him the command of the city (Liv. viii. 12–36).

L. Pāpirius Cūrsor, L. Pāpirii Cūrsōris, m. was appointed a military tribune with consular power in 386 B. C., and three years after, re-elected to the same office. He held the censorship with C. Jūlius, on whose death in 391 B. C. rather than resign the office, he substituted M. Cōrnēlius Maluginēsis as his colleague. During that lustrum, the city was taken, and no censor afterwards followed his example; but, on the death of his colleague, abdicated the office (Liv. vi. 5–ix. 34).—2. A distinguished Roman, who, after being master of the horse to L. Pāpirius Crāssus, was named dictator by L. Pōrtus Cāmbōlus in 324 B. C. to carry on the war against the Sānnites, when he appointed Q. Fābius Māximus Rūdiānus master of the horse. Pāpirius was reckoned the first general of that period, and Fābius was in high estimation for martial bravery. As they entered Sānnium under doubtful auspices, the dictator returned to Rome to take the omens anew, ordering the master of the horse neither to change his position, nor charge the enemy in his absence; but the latter, having discovered that the Sānnites might be attacked with advantage, disregarding the order of his commander, led on his troops to battle, gained a complete victory, and left twenty thousand of them dead on the field. He burned all the arms of the killed and the prisoners, either in fulfilment of a vow, or, according to Fābius, to prevent the dictator from having any share in the renown. Soon after the victory, the dicta-for returned in great wrath to the camp, burning with a desire of revenge, both because the master of the horse had fought in opposition to his orders, and had sent his letter announcing his success directly to the senate, not to his superior officer. To secure himself against the violence of the enraged commander, Fabius entreated the protection of the soldiers, which they readily promised, and faithfully fulfilled, when the dictator ordered him to be stript, and the rods and axes to be in readiness. In vain did the officers of the army supplicate for the safety of Fabius, their expostulation only increased the dictator's anger. On this, he fled to Rome, where neither the entreaties of the father of Fabius, nor the authority of the senate, nor an appeal to the people, had the slightest influence on the dictator. The plebeian tribunes seemed doubtful how to act. On the side of Fabius were the affection of the army, the majesty of the senate, and the favour of the people; on the other side, were urged the invincible authority of the Roman government, the discipline of the army, the edict of the dictator, always observed as the order of a god, and the authority of T. Manlius, surnamed Torquatus, who preferred public advantage to paternal affection. Both father and son then declining further contest fell down on their knees, deprecating the wrath of the dictator, who considered their intercession a sufficient confirmation of dictatorial authority and military discipline, pardoned Fabius, but prohibited him from acting in any case as a magistrate. Having named L. Papirius Crassus master of the horse, the dictator returned to the camp, where, by attention to the sick and wounded, he regained the favour of the army, which he had forfeited by this severity of procedure, compelled the Samnites to sue for peace, which he granted on hard conditions, and continued the dictatorship until the next consuls were elected. This brave officer was five times elected consul, and twice nominated dictator. Success attended him in every expedition, he took Luceria in Apulia, where he recovered a hundred horsemen given as hostages at Caudium, and obtained immense booty. The Saticani had revolted after the ignominy at Caudium, but Papirius soon reduced them to subjection, punishing capitally the instigators of the rebellion, and returned in triumph to Rome. Few Romans in bravery, military skill, and the duties of a commander, surpassed Papirius, who, to great vigour both of body and mind, added remarkable swiftness of foot, hence the surname of himself and family Cursor. Either from robustness of frame, or from much practice, he was capable of receiving a very great quantity of food and wine, which rendered him almost a stranger to fatigue. Than under him, military service was never severer, and he supported authority of command to its utmost extent, both among Romans and allies. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, with whom he lived in enmity, appointed him dictator in 310 B. C., to carry on war against the Samnites, whom he soon subdued, and returned in triumph to Rome. The shields of the Samnites adorned with gold, were distributed through the silver-shops to ornament the forum during the procession, hence originated the custom of the ediles decorating that part of the town in grand processions (Liv. viii. 12 seq.). — Adj. Papirianus, a. usn. Papiriāna avaritia, became a proverbial expression, from the strictness of his discipline, and his severity against the master of the horse (Liv. x. 3). — 3. A son of the former, a man of great celebrity, both on account of his father's merits and his own. During his consulship in 295 B. C., he took Düronia, a town of the Samnites, by storm. The person who had the charge of the chickens deceived him, pretending that the omen was favourable, when the reverse was the truth, on which account Papirius placed him in the first line, where he fell. A signal victory crowned his engagement with the Samnites, whose camp he took, having killed upwards of thirty thousand, and made nearly four thousand prisoners. In place of vowing a temple, he promised, during the battle, to Jupiter Victor, a libation of wine and honey, which was acceptable to the god, and the consequence fortunate. Extraordinary splendour distinguished his triumph, and the spoils gratified the military pride of the Romans, who compared them, in respect of beauty and magnificence, to those taken by his father. The immense quantity of brass and silver carried in the procession, Papirius lodged in the treasury, allowing no part of either to the soldiers. With the spoils won from the Samnites by his military skill, and the bravery of his troops, he adorned a temple to Quirinus, which his father, when dictator, had vowed. The quantity of these must have been very great, since the embellishment of the temple exhausted but a small part of them, the remainder was distributed among the allies and colonists, to ornament their temples and public places. Next year he was appointed praetor, and nothing further of his history has been transmitted (Liv. x. 9–47).

L. Papirius Maseo, L. Papirii Maseonis, m. elected praetor in 179 B. C., and obtained the jurisdiction of the city (Liv. xli. 14 seq.).

L. Papirius Mugillanus, L. Papirii Mugillani, m. elected consul with L. Sempronius Atratinus in 444 B. C. In the beginning of that year, military tribunes with consular power were elected. Livius, from want of good authority, writes hesitatingly with respect to the magistrates at this time. These consuls were next year appointed censors, probably to compensate for the short time they had held the consulship, and they had the honour of being the first who held that office. Papirius was afterwards consul, a military tribune with consular power, and interrèx (Liv. iv. 7–43). — 2. L. Papirius Mugillanus, v. Cursor, for so is his name written by different authors, was consul in 325 B. C. (Liv. viii. 23).

M. Papirius, M. Papirii, m. one of the aged and noble Romans who devoted themselves for their country, as the Gauls approached the city in 349 B. C. Provoked at the indignity of a Gaul, who stroked his beard, which at that time was universally worn long, he struck the savage on the head. This act of violence was the signal for universal massacre. Papirius, and all the rest were instantly put to death on their seats (Liv. v. 41). Valerius Maximus calls him

C. Attilius (liv. 2).—2. One of the five commissioners appointed to accomplish a reconciliation between debtors and creditors, in 351 B. C. They were called Mēnsūrī, bankers (Liv. vii. 21).

M. Pāpirius Atrātīnus, M. Pāpirius Atrātīni, m. elected consul in 410 B. C. with C. Nautilus Rūtulus (Liv. iv. 52).

M. Pāpirius Crāssus, M. Pāpirius Crāssi, m. elected consul in 441 B. C. with C. Fūrius Pācillus (Liv. iv. 12).—2. Nominated dictator in 392 B. C., from its having been reported, that the Gauls were preparing for war. After levying troops with great despatch, intelligence was received, that the Gauls were in a state of perfect tranquillity (Liv. viii. 17).

M. Pāpirius Mūgillānus, M. Pāpirius Mūgillāni, m. elected a military tribune first in 417 B. C., and afterwards in 415 B. C. (Liv. iv. 43, 47).

Sp. Pāpirius, Sp. Pāpiri, m. elected a military tribune with consular power, in 381 B. C. (Liv. vi. 22). See L. Pāpirius.—2. Another of the same name, elected to the same office, in 379 B. C. (Liv. vi. 27).—3. The brother's son of L. Pāpirius Cūrsor, the consul, who informed his uncle respecting a doubt about the auspices before the battle at Aquilōna, in 295 B. C. For his bravery in that engagement, he was rewarded with a bracelet and crown of gold (Liv. x. 40, 44).

Pāpius Mūtulus, Pāpi Mūtuli, m. one of the proscribed, who went privately to the back door of the house of his wife Bāstia, but she refused to admit him, because a price had been set on his head, on which he killed himself, and beswearing the door of her house with his own blood, in 83 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 69).

M. Pāpius Mūtulus, M. Pāpi Mūtuli, m. held the office of consul with Q. Pōppeus Sābinus during part of the year 9. Adj. Pāpius, a, um. Pāpia Pōppea lēx, a law which imposed penalties on celibacy, in order to encourage marriage. These consuls were both bachelors, which rendered the law more acceptable, because, on their part, it was disinterested. It does not appear to have had the effect intended, or, that marriage was thereby brought into fashion (Tac. Ann. ii. 32: liv. 25).

Pāprēmīs, is, f. a town of Egypt. Inh. Pāprēmītāni, orum, m. Adj. Pāprēmītānus, a, um (Herod. ii. 59 seq.).

Pārāchēlōis, idis, f. a town of Greece, on Achēlōus, the Aspropotamo (Liv. xxxix. 26).

Pārētāce, arum, e. Pārētācēni, orum, m. a people in the south of Mēdia (Plin. i. 710). Pārētācēnē, es, f. the country of the Pārētācēni (Plin. i. 717). Pārētāca, a, f. the chief city of that district. Adj. Pārētācēnus, a, um. Pārētācēna rēgio, the same with Pārētācēnē.

Pārētōnium, i, n. Al-Barcton, a maritime town of Egypt, or rather of Mārmārica, directly south of the eastern extremity of Crēta, Candia. Adj. Pārētōnulus, a, um, of Al-Barcton, Egyptian. Pārētōnūlittus (Sil. Ital. iii. 225). Pārētōnīa urbs (Luc. Phar. x. 9).

Pārāpāmīsus, v. Pārōpāmīsus, i, m. Hindoo-ka (i. e. the stony girdle), a mountain on which Bactra stood, says Cūrtius, unquestionably a mistake, although it may have stood near its foot (Curt. vii. 4). Inh. Pārāpāmīsāda, arum, m. (Curt. vii. 3 seq.).

Pārāpāmēni, orum, m. a people who lived at the foot of Mount Caucasus, and were conquered by Alexander the Great in 308 B. C. (Just. xii. 5).

Pārāxmālcha, orum, n. a town near the Euphrātes, which some write Bārāxmālcha (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 2).

Pārce, arum, f. (a partu), the Fates; Clōthō, Lūchēsis and Atrōpos. Cēsēllius Vindēx makes their names Nōna, Dēcīma, and Mōrta (Gel. iii. 16). They were said to be the daughters of Nox (Night) alone; of Jūpiter and Thēmis; of Erēbus; and, according to Lycophrōn, and of the Sea and Zēus the master of the gods. The ancients were not only divided with respect to the parentage of the Destinies, but also with regard to their residence. Some place them in the Infernal Regions, others, in Heaven, and Ovidius describes them as inhabiting a place in which the fates of men were engraved in iron and brass, in such a manner, that neither the thunder of Jūpiter, nor the destruction of the universe could efface them. They were worshipped with great solemnity both in Italy and Greece. Respecting their form and dress, nothing certain can be obtained from the writers of antiquity. The descriptions of both are nearly as numerous as the authors who mention these fabulous divinities. They were represented as spinning the thread of human life. The first held the distaff, the second spun the thread, which the third cut, as is neatly expressed in the following verse:

Clōtho colum retinet, Lūchēsis net, et Atrōpos occidit.

Their worship and sacrifices were the same with those of the Furies (Paus. ii. 11). The three divisions of time, Past, Present, and Future, suggested the number and offices of the Fates. With the first life originates, is continued by the second, and terminated by the third.

Pārion, ōnis, f. a town in Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, built by Pārīus, a son of Iāson (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Pārīs, idis, m. a son of Priāmus king of Trōja, and Hēcūba. His father ordered him to be put to death at his birth, in consequence of his mother having, during her pregnancy, dreamed that she was delivered of a fire-brand which reduced the city to ashes; and the augurs interpreted the dream to portend that the child, then unborn, would occasion the destruction of Troy. The persons appointed to this cruel office, contented themselves with exposing Pārīs on mount Ida, the highest range of which was anciently called Gārgārus, Kasdaghy, or, Kasdaghy, where he was brought up by the shepherds. On account of his extraordinary strength and courage in defending the flocks from ravenous beasts, and repelling the attacks of robbers, he was called Alexander, i. e. the strong man. Here he passed the early part of his life, and, whilst engaged in tending his flock, gave judgment in the appeal of the three goddesses, Venus, Jūno, and Minērvā, who contended for the golden apple, hence Ovidius calls him Ideus iudex. See Pileus. Each endeavoured to bribe him to her interest. Jūno promised him a kingdom, Minērvā, military glory, and Venus, the most beautiful woman in the world for his wife. Upon the mind of the noble shepherd, the promise of Venus made the deepest impression, and he adjudged the golden apple to her. The decision of Páris, by slighting the beauty of the other two goddesses, provoked their wrath against the empire and his nation, was the cause of the Trojan war, and all the train of evils and calamities to which that memorable siege gave birth. His father, at a future period, received him at his court, and treated him as his son. After spending some time in his native city among the Trojan princes, he set out for the court of Ménélaus, king of Spárta, Mistra, with a view to carry off his wife Héléna, the most beautiful woman in the world, as the reward of the judgment which he had pronounced in favour of Venus. The young Trojan met with a most welcome reception at the Spartan court; but he abused the laws of hospitality, by prevailing on the queen to elope with him. Though demanded back by all the princes who had sworn to protect her, and threatened with the vengeance of the combined forces of Greece, he resolutely persisted in refusing their request. His father is said, on account of Ajax carrying off his sister Hésione, to have encouraged him in his obstinacy and guilt. In consequence of this denial, the Greeks immediately commenced hostilities, which ended in the total destruction of the city and kingdom of Troy. Páris discovered, according to Homer, little warlike courage or personal prowess during the war, and Horace represents him as effeminate and cowardly, and, in contempt, calls him pastor (Od. i. 15. 1). The time and manner of his death are uncertain.—2. A player, put to death by the emperor Néro (Suet. Ner. 54).—3. A player, with whom Dómítia Longina, wife of the emperor Dómítianus, fell desperately in love, and for which she was divorced, but afterwards taken back, because the emperor could not bear the separation (Suet. Dom. 3).

Párisil, orum, m. the inhabitants of Lútétia, from whom it was afterwards called Párisil, now Paris, the capital of France (Cæs. B. G. vi. 8). See Lútétia.

Párium, i, n. Campanar, a city of Mýsia, at the southwest extremity of Própóntis, the Sea of Marmora. Its vicinity appears to have been dangerous, on account of hidden rocks, to which Valérius Fláccus refers (il. 622).

Párius, i, m. a son of Iáson, who built Párium, q. v. (Ann. Mar. xxii. 8).

Pármæ, se, f. Parma, a town in the north of Italy, on a river of the same name, at which a colony of two thousand Latins was planted in 185 B. C., and each received eight acres of land (Liv. xxxix. 55). The modern city is large, divided by the river into two parts, and is about three miles in circumference. It is the capital of the duchy to which it gives name, about sixty miles in length, and thirty in breadth, generally fertile, and used to be famous for cheese, called, from the district, Parmesan. Inh. Pármæses, um, v. Pármæni, orum, m. (Cic. Phil. xiv. 3).

Párménion, onis, m. a distinguished general of Philippos, king of Mácédónia, and afterwards under his son, who condemned him to death on suspicion of treason. The murder of his friends forms a prominent feature in the character of Alexander the Great (Just. ix. 5 seq.).—2. An ambassador of Géatius, king of the Illyrii, who, with Móræus, was appointed to receive the oath, hostages, and money of Përseus, king of Mácédónia, and thence to proceed to Rhódus, to attempt to persuade the inhabitants to join them against the Romans, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 23).

Párnâsus, i, m. Liakura (Hobhouse), Liakura (Clarke), and Lakoura (Walpole), a very high mountain of Phócis, an inland district of Græcia, Greece, the favourite residence of Apóllo and the muses. It is said, that Liakura was anciently called Lárnâsus, from Lárnâx, the boat of Deucállion, which rested there after the universal deluge. These celebrated rocks called Phadriâdes, rise almost perpendicularly above the Castalian spring, and are at a great distance from the summit of the mountain, which cannot be seen from Castri, and has an undulatory ridge with a number of points, none of which is distinguished by superior altitude. Above these rocks, Naupléia, and Hýampéa, is a small lake in a plain, the water of which probably yields a constant supply to the Castalian fountain. The superfluous water descends to the bottom of a valley through a narrow rocky glen, where it joins the river Pleistis. This spring flows in a copious stream, forming several cascades, and water-cresses cover its sides. The ancients thought that this mountain had two tops, which they called Cýrrha and Nisa; but Héródôtus calls them Tithôréa and Hýampéa, over which criminals, or persons who had incurred the displeasure of Apóllo, used to be thrown, as from the Tarpeian rock at Rome. Of these peaks the one was sacred to Apóllo, and the other to Bâcchus, Mons Phœbo Btomiôque vâcer (Luc. Phar. v. 74). Dêlphi, Castri, stood in a circular hollow of this mountain, about a mile from the bottom. The present town consists of a small number of mud houses, but Dêlphi appears, from ancient authors, to have been two miles in circumference. The observations of a late traveller, however, render this measurement doubtful; since there are only two small spots of level ground on which houses could have been built, and these could not contain a town of that size. About 200 paces above Castri, is a cave which is said to have a pit fifty cubits deep. This the natives consider as the cavern from which the priestess of Apóllo received the divine exhalations. The site must have been chosen for its security; as its situation renders it a place of great strength. Of the old city a few ruins are still visible. From Dêlphi, Castri, to the summit of Párnâsus, Liakura, the ancients reckoned sixty stadia, about seven miles; a measurement which modern observation has not proved, in consequence of the altitude of the mountain not being ascertained. To assert that Párnâsus, Liakura, has not two tops, because a late traveller, who viewed this mountain in different directions, observed only one, might be deemed inconsiderate; although it is no improbable conjecture, that the immense cleft in the vicinity of Castri, which rends the mountain from the top nearly to the base, and down which the Castalian rill drops, may have suggested the first idea of two summits. To the east of Castri, situated beneath a precipice of one hundred feet in height, is a large square shallow basin, the water of which is cool and pleasant to the taste. There is no doubt that this basin is filled with the pure Castalian water (Cástalia, v. Cástalius fons); but whether the spring itself rises up there, or whether it is conducted to it from some place farther up the mountain, is not precisely determined. Bivertex Parnæus (Stat. Th. i. 628). Parnæsis, Idos, f. Parnasian, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Parnæsis laurus (Ov. Met. xi. 165). Adj. Parnæsius, v. Parnæscus, a, um. Parnæsia templa, the temples of Phœbus and Bæcehus (Ov. Met. v. 278). Parnæsta rupes, the mountain Parnæsus (Virg. B. vi. 29).

Parnes, ētis, m. Nozea, or, Nozia, a mountain of Attica, which Hobhouse says has different names in different places; the south-west range is called Casha-couni, and the northern heights Ozea. Stâtus has mentioned its fertility in vines, Parnesque benignus vitibus (Th. xii. 620).

Parnon, ōis, m. a mountain in Peloponnesus, which contains the boundary between the districts of the Lacedemonians and Argives (Paus. ii. 38).

Pārōpāmīade, arum, m. See Pārōpāmīades.

Pārōra, es, f. a district, probably of no great extent, and bordering on Mæcedonia, subject to the Thracians (Liv. xxxix. 27 seq.). It must not be confounded with a town of this name in Arcadia, and another in Epirus. Inh. Pārōrei, orum, m. (Steph.).

Pāros, i, f. Paros, an island nearly in the centre of the Cyclades, ten miles long and eight broad. The soil is fertile and well cultivated. On account of its excellent wines, it was dedicated to Bæcehus. The marble of Pāros was long in high estimation, from being very white, hence Nicea Pāros (Virg. Æn. iii. 126); Marmorea Pāros (Virg. Cir. 476). The quarries were wrought under ground by means of lamp-light, as coal pits are in Britain; hence called Lychnites. In this island, a chronological table of the most remarkable events in the Athenian history for 300 years, was cut in marble, 163 B. C. It begins with the reign of Cecrops, the founder of the Athenian monarchy. This valuable monument of antiquity was, in 1667, presented to the University of Oxford, by the earl of Arundel, from whom it is now called the Arundelian marble. A late traveller maintains, that this marble was not found in Pāros, but in the island Céos, Zia. Inh. Pārī, orum, m. Adj. Pārīus, et, Pārīarus, a, um. Pārīus lapis, Pārīum marmor, &c., Parian, i, e. the purest white, marble.

Pārhiæes, is, m. a freedman of Vönones, who showed his ingratitude and perfidy, by betraying Mēhērdates, the son of his benefactor, and delivering him up to his enemy, Gōtārzes (Tac. Ann. xii. 14).

Pārhiāia, es, f. a town of Arcadia, so called from Pārhiāsus, one of the sons of Lŷcāon, by whom it was built. Inh. Pārhiāsi, orum (Sing. Pārhiāsus, i), m. were amongst the most ancient inhabitants of Greece. Pārhiāsīs, Idis, f. of Pārhiāia, or Arcadia, applied to nouns feminine. Pārhiāsides stalla, Cāllistō, daughter of Lŷcāon, and her son Arcas (Ov. Fast. iv. 577). Adj.

Pārhiāsus, a, um, of Pārhiāsus, of Arcadia, Arcadian. Pārhiāia dea, Cārmēnta, the mother of Evānder, to whom the Romans paid divine honours after her death (Ov. Fast. i. 618). Pārhiāsus mos, the Arcadian manner (Virg. Æn. viii. 344). Pārhiāsia penna, the wings of Mērcūrius, from his being born and worshipped in Arcadia (Luc. Phar. ix. 660).

Pārhiāsus, i, m. a native of Ephesus, a painter of great celebrity, who first gave symmetry to a picture, delineated the features of the countenance, the beauty of the hair, and general expression, with elegance and taste. In the opinion of artists themselves, he excelled in the accompaniments or scenery, and in giving them relief, so that they seemed to stand out from the canvass, which Plinius calls summa sublimitas picturæ. He competed with Zēuxis and others for the palm of victory in his own art. Zēuxis produced a picture, in which grapes were drawn so naturally, that the birds attempted to eat them, upon which, elated with that proof of his success, he desired Pārhiāsus to draw aside, what he supposed to be a linen curtain, and show his picture. Pārhiāsus replied, that what he had mistaken for a curtain, was the work of his pencil. Zēuxis immediately acknowledged his inferiority, and yielded the palm to his rival, adding, "I only deceived birds; but you have deceived me, a painter" (Plin. v. 201 seq.).

Pārstrŷmōnia, es, f. a district, subject to the Thracians (Liv. xlii. 51). Some include it in Thræcia, and, from the name, infer, that it was upon the river Strŷmon.

Pārthāon, v. Pōrthāon, ōis, m. son of Agēnor and Epicāstē. He married Eurŷtē, daughter of Hippodāmas, by whom he had Genēus, Agolus, Alcāthōus, Mēlus, Lŷcōpeus, and a daughter, Stērōpē, who, by Achēlōus, became the mother of the Sŷrēnes. Nātus Pārthāonē, Genēus (Ov. Met. ix. 12). Arca Pārthāonē, Ētōlla (Stat. Th. ii. 726). Pārthāonides, es, m. a patronymic of Mēlēager, grandson of Pārthāon (Val. Flacc. iii. 705). Adj. Pārthāonius, a, um. Pārthāōnia dōmus (Ov. Met. viii. 541).

Pārthēnia, arum, m. the children born by the wives of the Lacedemonians, during the absence of their husbands in the war at Mēssēnē. After it had been carried on for ten years, the Lacedemonians dreaded the destruction of their state from the want of children, and, having bound themselves by oath, not to return till they had taken Mēssēnē, sent home some of the young men, who had joined the army after the commencement of the war, and had not taken that oath, that the women might have children by them. The offspring of this illicit connexion were called Pārthēnia and Spirŷia, as a reflection on the chastity of their mothers. The Spartans, after a war of twenty years, took Mēssēnē by stratagem, and, on returning home, treated the Pārthēniae with contempt, who joined the slaves for the destruction of their countrymen. The timely discovery of the plot prevented its execution, and, being compelled to quit the Lacedemonian territory, they sailed to Italy, under Phālānthus q. v. (Just. iii. 4).

Pārthēniē, es, f. the nurse of Cŷnthia q. v. (Prop. iv. 7. 74).

Pārthēnium, i, n. a town of Arcadia

(Plin. i. 420).—2. There was also a mountain of this name in Arcadia, now Roani, the pass is called Partheni, from the old name. Tortoises, which make excellent lyres, are found here, but from being held sacred to Pān, the ancients themselves neither touched them, nor allowed strangers to touch them.—3. A town of Mysia (Plin. i. 611).

Parthēnium, i, n. promontorium, Eski-forum, a promontory on the west side of Taurica Chersonesus, the Crimea (Plin. i. 238).

Parthēnium Mārē, a part of the Mediterranean Sea, on the coast of Syria, to which Ammianus Marcellinus gives this name (xiv. 8). Others call it Isidus Sinus.

Parthēnius, i, m. a Trojan killed by Rāpō (Virg. En. x. 748).—2. A son of Cýdnus, from whom, according to Stēphānus, Anchīlā was afterwards called Parthēnia.—3. An engraver mentioned by Juvēnalis (Sat. xii. 44).—4. A Greek poet, whose writings appear to have been chiefly of the amatory kind. The emperor Tiberius, in his attempts at writing Greek verse, copied the manners of Parthēnius, Euphōrion, and Rhīānus (Suet. Tib. 70).—5. Lord of the bed-chamber to the Roman emperor Dōmītiānus, against whom he entered into a conspiracy, and let in Stēphānus, who murdered him. To this unjustifiable act, Parthēnius may have been induced from a wish to accelerate the promotion of Nēva, who next assumed the purple. The praetorian guards compelled that emperor to give up the murderer of his predecessor, and necessity obliged him, at last, to submit, and they took a horrid delight in mangling and tormenting Parthēnius (Eutrop. viii. 1. Suet. Dom. 16). Martiālis frequently mentions him as a poet (iv. 45 seq.). Adj. Parthēniānus, a, um. Parthēniāna fuga (Mart. ix. 50).

Parthēnius, i, m. a mountain of Arcadia, on which were found the best tortoises, but held sacred to Pān (Paus. viii. 54).—Adj. Parthēnius, a, um, of Parthēnius, Arcadian. Parthēniū sāltū, the forests on Parthēnius (Virg. B. x. 57). Parthēnium nēmus, an Arcadian grove (Ov. Met. ix. 188). Parthēnius pōrtus, a harbour built by the Phōcēans, on the Gulf of Policastro (Plin. i. 335).—2. The Partia, a rapid river of Paphlagonia, which, running northward, falls into Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea (Plin. i. 650). According to Valērius Flācius, Dīāna had a particular attachment to this stream, by which he probably meant, that the natives inhabiting its banks chiefly worshipped that goddess (v. 104).—3. A branch of the Alphēus, on the right bank of that river.

Parthēnōpeus, i, m. son of Mēlēāger and Atālānta (Hylg. 99). There are other accounts of his parentage. He was of uncommon beauty and bravery. To the former his name has been referred (of virgin countenance). He was by birth an Arcadian, and signalized himself, though very young, in the Theban war. He was one of the seven commanders in the army of Pōlōnices during that siege, and fell by the hand of Drýas q. v. (Virg. En. vi. 480. Stat. Th. iv. 248 seq.). His name occurs frequently in the writings of Martiālis.

Parthēnōpē, es, f. one of the Sīrēnes q. v., from whom Nēāpōlis, Naples, was called Parthēnōpē, in consequence of her having been buried there (Plin. i. 327. Sil. Ital. xii. 34). Adj. Parthēnōpēus, a, um, of Naples. Parthēnōpēia mēnia, the walls of Naples (Ov. Met. xiv. 101).

Parthēnōpōlis, is, f. a town of Thracia, taken by M. Licinius Lūcūllus, in 69 B. C. (Eutrop. vi. 10. Plin. i. 441). The site of this town is unknown.—2. A town in Bithynia (Plin. i. 628).

Parthia, es, v. Parthis, idis, et, Parthiāna, es, f. Chorasan, was, at first, a very small country, bounded on the W. by Mēdia, and Mārē Cāspium, v. Hyrēanum, the Caspian Sea; on the S. by Pērsia; on the E. by Bāctria; and on the N. by Hyrcānia. During the reign of the Arsācīdæ, it became a very large and powerful empire. At one period, the Parthian dominions extended from Syria to Mons Imāus, Himalaya, and from the territories of the Chorāsmīi, and Māsāgētæ, to the Indian Ocean. Civis Parthia, a native of Parthia (Mart. x. 76). Parthia magna tēlūs (Manil. iv. 801). Inh. Parthi, orum (Sing. Parthus, i), m. the Parthians, were originally Scythian exiles, according to Jūstinus (xii. 1), others think the term Parthi originally denoted horsemen. Their language was a mixture of the Scythian and Median, their dress, at first, Scythian, afterwards Median, but they retained the Scythian armour. Slaves could not be set at liberty. They made no use of gold or silver, unless in their armour. They were a very brave and powerful people, who fought chiefly on horseback, and when they pretended to fly, discharged their arrows with a dexterity which did prodigious execution among the enemy, hence Parthus fidens fugā versisque capillis, the Parthian trusting in flight, and in arrows shot backwards (Virg. G. iii. 31). Parthorum astūta tela remisit fugā, the weapons discharged backwards in the cunning, or pretended flight, of the Parthians (Prop. iii. 9. 54). Parthus animōsus versis equis, the Parthian furious, having turned horse, &c., in pretended flight (Hor. Od. i. 19. 11). This practice, also common among the Persians, greatly intimidated the Roman soldiers, and to it frequent allusions are made by their poets. They defeated and killed M. Licinius Crāssus, and, at a later period, obliged M. Antōnius to leave the country in great distress. At the time the Parthians made peace with Augustus, they restored two standards which they had taken from M. Licinius Crāssus and M. Antōnius (Liv. Ep. 139). They were subdued by Trajan, and finally deprived of their country and dominion by the Persians, a nation who had been subject to them for 475 years. Adj. Parthus, et, Parthicus, a, um. Partha tēlūs, Parthia (Prop. iv. 3. 67). Parthica lūxuria (Claud. xviii. 342).

Parthini, orum, m. a people of Illyricum, a district on the east coast, and towards the top of Adria, the Gulf of Venice. Their capital, Parthus, was not far distant from Dyrrāchium, Durazzo (Ces. B. C. iii. 41 seq.).

Parthos, i, f. a town of Africa, taken by Scipio the elder (Ap. Bel. Pun. 21).

Parýmæ, arum, m. a people who lived at the foot of mount Caucāsus, and were conquered by Alexander the Great, in 308 B. C. (Just. xii. 5). They are mentioned by no other author but Jūstinus.

Pāsāgādā, v. Pāsāgārda, ae. f. a city of Persia, founded by Cyrus on the ground where he gained a victory over Astyages. The district had the same name. Inh. Pāsāgādās, arum, m. were esteemed the noblest of the Persians, and from them descended the kings of that country (Herod. i. 125).

Pasas, ae. m. a Thessalian, who, with Amisus of Megalopolis, and Pētilāus, formed a deputation to the horsemen in a state of insubordination, in consequence of Philippus having been nominated king by a party, after the death of Alexander the Great (Curt. x. 8).

Pāsiphāē, es, f. daughter of Sol and Pērsēs, was the wife of Minos, king of Crēta, Candia, and sister of Eētes, king of Cōlehis, and of Circe. The unnatural crime ascribed to Pāsiphāē by the writers of antiquity, and the monster, the Minotaur, the result of her crime, have rendered her character most infamous. It appears, on minute inquiry into her history, that this is most probably a fiction, resulting from the name of her paramour Taurus, and her husband. Though much guilt still remains, her crime is of a less shocking nature, and although she violated the laws of marriage, she did not outrage those of nature. See Minotaurus. Nēro exhibited, in his spectacles at Rome, a scene of the same detestable kind. To this Mārtiālis alludes (Spec. 5). Adj. Pāsiphāētus, a, um. Pāsiphāēta (fīlia), Phædra, daughter of Minos and Pāsiphāē, whom Thēsēus married, after the death of Hippolytē (Ov. Met. xv. 500).

Pāsithēa, ae. f. one of the virgin Graces, whom Jūno promised to Sōmnus, on condition that he lulled Jūpiter fast asleep (Hom. Il. xiv. 269. Catul. lxi. 43).

Pāsītigris, idis, m. the Jerake, a river of Sūsiāna, which joins Euleus; v. Chōaspes, the Karoon, and their united streams fall into the Tigris (Curt. v. 3). Part of the Euphrātes, after it is joined by the Tigris, sometimes was called Pāsītigris, now Shut-ul Arab.

Pāsāro, v. Pāsārōn, ōnis, f. Dremichoux, a town of Molōssis, of which the inhabitants were inveterate enemies of the Romans, through the advice of Antinōus and Hērōdōtus, chief men of the place; but on their being killed, Pāsārō surrendered, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 26).

Pāsīēnus, i, m. an oratory who said of Cālīgōla, that there never was a better slave, or a more detestable master (Tac. Ann. vi. 20).

C. Pāsīēnus Rūfus, C. Pāsīēni Rūf, m. held the consulship at Rome, 4 B. C. C. Cālvisius Sābinus was his colleague. He was a man of considerable merit, and gained triumphal honours in Africa (Vel. Pat. li. 116).

Pātāra, ae. f. v. Pātāra, orum, n. Patēra, a city of Lycia, a maritime district in the S. of Asia Minor, Natolia, at the mouth of the Xānthus, where Apōllo resided, and gave his oracles, six months every year. It was founded, according to Strābo, by Pātārus, from whom the name is derived, and appears from him to have been the capital of the country. Pōmpōnilius Mēla says, the temple of Apōllo resembled that of Dēlphī, Castri, in riches and oracular celebrity. From this city he is called Pātāreūs Apōllo (Hor. Od. iii. 4. 64). Pātāreūs, idis, f. of Pātāra, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine, Inh. Pātāreūs, ium, v. Pātārūi, orum, m. Adj. Pātāreūs, a, um.

Pātāvium, i, n. Padua, a city in the north of Italy, built, according to Virgilius, by Antēnor, after the destruction of Troy (Æn. i. 247). It is situated in a fine plain on the Brenta, and surrounded with walls, strengthened by ramparts, and other works. It is of an oval form, about seven miles in circumference, and was a city of very considerable eminence, but for many years has been greatly on the decline. The streets are neither wide, well paved, nor clean. The university of Padua is the most celebrated of Italy, although of late years it has sunk in reputation very considerably. Līvius, the Roman historian, was a native of this city. Inh. Pātāvini, orum, m. Pātāvinitas, ātis, f. a provincial style, with which Pōllio charged Līvius (Quint. i. 5. 56). Adj. Pātāvinus, a, um. Pātāvinus ager, the territory of the Pātāvini. Pātāvinæ triticeæ. This cloth was so thick, that Mārtiālis says it could be cut with a saw, i.e. too thick for scissors, such as were used by the ancients (xiv. 143). Pātāvinæ fontes (Plin. iv. 800).

Pāter Pātārus, Pātris Pātāri, m. one of the fētiāles q. v., chosen to conclude a treaty, and to take a solemn oath, in name of the Roman people. Not only did the Pāter Pātārus come under the obligation in the most solemn manner, that his countrymen would faithfully observe the conditions entered into, but imprecating the vengeance of the gods on the first violators of the agreement (Liv. i. 24).

Pātērus, i, m. a covetous man, on whom Mārtiālis writes an epigram (xii. 53). The readings here are various.

Pāthālia, ae. f. et, Pātāla, orum, n. Tattānagar, a town in the delta of Indus, the Sind, whence it is called Pātālēnē (Curt. ix. 8).

Pātræ, arum, f. Patra by the Greeks, Balia Badra and Badradschik by the Turks, Patrasso by the Italians, and Patras by the English and French, a town of Achāia. It was anciently called Arōs, from its cultivation, and was erected by Eomēlus of Achāia. Afterwards Pātērus, son of Prēgēnes, surrounded it with walls, hence it was called Arōs Pātēnsis, and Pātræ. The modern town stands on a gentle eminence, within one mile of the sea, and three of Pānchēhūchum, Mount Boidia. The streets are narrow and dirty, the houses built of earth dried in the sun, of which the eaves project so far as almost to meet, which excludes, in a very considerable degree, both air and light. It is the most commercial town in Greece, and the population amounts to about eight thousand. Of all the towns in the Morcia, Patras is the most unhealthy, except Corinth. Two miles from Patras is a famous cypress tree, twenty-three feet in circumference. Inh. Pātēnses, ium, m. excelled, in ancient times, as slingers, surpassing the Bālēares, not only in throwing to a greater distance, but with surer aim, and with more powerful effect (Liv. xxvii. 29).

Pātērōbas, ae. m. a neighbour of Mārtiālis, who appears to have been a freedman of the emperor (ii. 32).

Pātērōbius, i, m. a slave, to whom the emperor Nēro granted his freedom, and whom Gālba put to death. The head of the latter, arms for three successive years (Vel. Pat. ii. 34).

Pānāretus, i. m. a drunkard, on whom Mārtiālis writes an epigram (vi. 89).

Panaagōras, ae. m. son of Sāgillus, a king of Scythia, whom his father sent with a great body of cavalry to the assistance of the Amazons (Just. ii. 4).

Pānchāia, ae. f. a district of Arābia, or, according to some writers, a name of Arābia, and, according to others, the imaginary island Euēmērus, on the eastern coast of Arābia. Virgilius calls it pinguis, probably from the resinous nature of the frankincense-tree, which grows only in sandy soils (G. ii. 139).

Pānchāia (dabit thūriferos) rāmos (Claud. vii. 211). Adj. Pānchaeus, Pānchāicus, et. Pānchāius, a. um. Pānchai ignes, fires of frankincense (Virg. G. iv. 379). Pānchai odōres (Lucret. ii. 417). Pānchāica thūra, frankincense of Pānchāia (Virg. Cu. 86). Pānchāia tellūs, the country of Pānchāia (Ov. Met. x. 309).

Pānchāria, ae. f. a Roman station in Africa. Adj. Pānchārianus, a. um. Pānchāriāna stālio (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Pānchātes, is. m. the name of an Asturian horse, one of those which ran in the chariot-race, for the prize given by Scipio Africānus at the end of the Spanish war, in 208 B. C. (Sil. Ital. xvi. 348).

Pānda, ae. m. a river in the country of the Siraei, a people of Asia, between the Black Sea, and the Caspian Sea (Tac. Ann. xii. 16).

Pāndārius, i. m. father of Mērōps, the Milesian. He had three daughters, Mērōpē, Clōthēra, and Aēdon. Later writers changed his name to Pāndion, his daughter's, Aēdon, to Prōcnē, her husband's, Zēthus, to Tērēus, and their son's to Itys (Hom. Od. xix. 518—523).

Pāndārus, i. m. a Trojan, the son of Lŷcāon, and brother of Eurŷtion. At the instigation of Minērvā, he interrupted a proposal to terminate the contest between Trojans and Greeks by single combat, by throwing a dart among the Greeks (Virg. Aen. v. 496).—2. The son of Alcānor and Iera, e. Hiera, born on Mount Ida, was the brother of Bitias, and a man both of prodigious size and strength. Virgilius has described the appearance and bravery of these brothers, with a liveliness and elegance, which possess the imagination of the reader, and present the formidable warriors full to view. Turnus killed Bitias by a well-aimed missile weapon, on which Pāndārus rushed furiously forward, and, after displaying astonishing strength and bravery, fell by the hand of the same hero, who cleft his head in two down to the neck by a single stroke (Aen. ix. 672 seq.).

Pāndātāria, e. Pāndātēria, ae. f. Vento-Tieno, or, Santa Maria, an island off the coast of Cāmpānia, Campagna, in Italy (Tac. Ann. i. 53).

Pāndātes, is. m. the keeper of the treasury of Artāxēxes, king of Pērsia, who was a particular friend of Datāmes, and informed him of all that passed at court respecting him. In consequence of a letter received from Pāndātes, Datāmes, consulting his own safety, revolted from the king, not, however, before he had appointed Māndrōcles, a native of Māgnēsia, over the royal army, of which that monarch had given him the command (Cor. Nep. Dat. 5).

Pāndion, ōnis. m. king of Athēna, Athens, was the father of Prōcnē, Phlōmēla, and Erētheus. The unhappy fate of his daughters overwhelmed him with grief, and occasioned his death. A splendid monument to his memory was erected at Athēna Minērvā (Paus. i. 41). Adj. Pāndionius, a. um. Pāndioniae volucres, swallows, from Prōcnē being transformed into a swallow (Stat. Th. viii. 616). Pāndioniae pūlla, the daughters of Pāndion, i. e. Prōcnē and Phlōmēla (Virg. Cu. 250). Pāndionia Orithŷia, Orithŷia, daughter of Erētheus, and grand-daughter of Pāndion (Prop. i. 20. 31).

Pāndocus, i. m. a man in the Trojan war, wounded by Ajax Tēlamōnius, at the time he rescued Ulysses (Hom. Il. xi. 490 seq.).

Pāndōra, ae. f. the first woman according to Hēsiodus, made by Vulcānus at the command of Jūpiter. To Minērvā she was indebted for wisdom, to Vēnus for beauty, to Apōllo for music, and to Mērcūrius for eloquence. Provoked at the conduct of Prōmētheus, Jūpiter sent her to Epimētheus, with a shut box containing all the diseases and calamities incident to man. On the lid being thoughtlessly removed, the contents of the box spread over the earth, and have been the causes of innumerable evils (Paus. i. 24).—2. A daughter of Erētheus, king of Athens.

Pāndōsia, ae. f. Aidonati, a city in Epirus, Lower Albania. Alexander, king of Epirus, was ordered by the oracle of Jūpiter at Dōidōna, to beware of Pāndōsia, which he understood to be this city; but there was another of the same name in Lūcānia, according to Livius, according to others in Brūtius ager, the site of which is doubtful; near it Alexander was killed, in 325 B. C. The latter surrendered voluntarily to the Romans, in 206 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 38).

Pāndrōsos, i. f. a daughter of Cēcrops, king of Athens. To her and her two sisters, Hērē and Aglauros, Minērvā entrusted Erichthōnius shut up in a basket, with instructions not to open it, or pry into her secrets. Both Pāndrōsos and Hērē obeyed this order with scrupulous exactness, but Aglauros disregarded the mandate of the goddess, opened the basket, and discovered the child (Ov. Met. ii. 559 seq.).

Pānēmus, i. m. a son of Thēspius, in the army of Etēocles, whose life Hippōmēdon spared, killing his twin-brother, to whom he bore so strong a resemblance that their parents could not distinguish them (Stat. Th. ix. 293).

Pāngēus, i. m. Plur. Pāngēa, orum, a. Castagna, or, Negrohoss, a mountain of Thrācia, Romania, in which were gold mines anciently. Adj. Pāngēus, a. um. Pāngēa arx, a promontory of Thrācia (Val. Flacc. i. 575).

Pānūlus, i. m. a man to whom Mārtiālis addresses a number of epigrams.

Pānnōnia, ae. f. a country of Europe, bounded on the south by Illyricum, on the west by Noricum, on the north by Germānia, Germany, and on the east by the country of the Iazyges. Hungary coincides partly with Pānnōnia. Pānnōnis, idis. f. of Pānnōnia, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Pānnōnis ura (Luc. Phar. vi. 220). Inha Pān-nōnū, orum (Sing. Pānōnūs, i), m. were conquered by Augustus, at the same time with the Iapydes and Dalmatæ, in 37 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 131). Adj. Pānōnīcus, a, um, Pānōnīcum bellum (Mart. viii. 15). Pānōnīca Alpēs, Alpi Giulī (Tac. Hist. ii. 98).

Pānōmpheus, i, m. an epithet of Jūpiter, from being ὁ πανὸν ἰσχυρὸν αἶνος, which the Scholiast on Hōmērus explains by stating, that Jūpiter hears the voices of all, or is worshipped by the voice of all. Potter understands it to denote that Jūpiter gave to all the other gods and to men the gift of prophecy (Ov. Met. xi. 198).

Pānōpē, es, v. Pānōpēa, æ, f. a daughter of Nēreus and Dōris. She and her hundred sisters received Iōō, with her son Mēlicēta, when she had thrown herself and him into the sea, and thus preserved both from injury (Ov. Fast. vi. 499).

Pānōpē, es, f. a town of Phōcis, an inland district of Græcia; Græce (Ov. Met. iii. 19).

Pānōpēs, is, m. a Sicilian youth, who attended on Acētes, king of that country. He was one of the unsuccessful competitors for the prize in the foot-race (Virg. Æn. v. 300).

Pānōpēus, ēs, m. one of the hunters of the Caledonian boar (Ov. Met. viii. 312).—2. An inhabitant of Tāgētus, Pentadaktulos, killed in entering Thēbis, Thebes, during the siege of that city (Stat. Th. x. 491).

Pānōpōlis. See Pērinthus.

Pānōrmus, i, f. (Greek authors make it m.), v. Pānōrmum, i, n. Palermo, an ancient town of Sicily, said to have been originally founded by the Phœnicians, probably on account of the excellence of its harbour, from which it had its name (παρ ἡμεῶν), which rendered it extremely useful for the convenience of trade. Greek authors inform us, that a colony of their countrymen afterwards settled there, and if the derivation above given be accurate, the name must be referred to them, not to the Phœnicians. When the Carthaginians had become powerful as a state, Pānōrmus fell into their hands, from whom the superior valour of the Romans afterwards wrested it, in 250 B. C., and the steady fidelity which it uniformly manifested to the latter nation, must have rendered it a valuable acquisition. It is the capital of Sicily, four miles in circumference, and a place of great trade. The streets are broad, the houses large, and many of the public buildings magnificent. It stands at the bottom of a gulf of the same name, and the country adjoining is both pleasant and fertile. To this Silius Italicus refers, Fœcunda Pānōrmus (xiv. 261). Inh. Pānōrmītiūs, orum, m. (Sal. Frag.). Adj. Pānōrmītiānus, a, um.—2. A town in the territory of the Sāmii, but on the coast of the Ephēsiā (Liv. xxxvii. 10).—3. Tekieh, a promontory of Achāia (Paus. vii. 22).

Pānsa, s, m. the governor of a province, who had been guilty of rapacity and extortion. Nothing further of his history is known (Juv. Sat. viii. 95).

Pāntagāthus, i, m. a young man, beloved by his master, who died in early life. Mārtialis writes the epitaph of Pāntagāthus, and, from some expressions, it seems not improbable that he was the poet's servant (vi. 52).

Pāntāgia, s, v. Pāntāgies, æ, m. the Forcari, a small river of Sicily, southeast of Lēontini, Lentini (Virg. Æn. iii. 689).

Pāntālēon, ōntis, m. an Ætolian of high rank, who resolutely continued with Eumēnes, when attacked by the assassins employed by Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia, to take away his life, in 174 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 15).

Pāntauchus, i, m. a nobleman, whom Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia, gave as a hostage to the Roman ambassadors, Q. Mārcius Philippos, and A. Atilius Serrānus, at the interview which he had with them in 173 B. C. The same monarch sent him, at a future period, to ratify a treaty with Gēntius, king of Illyricum. The esteem and confidence of his sovereign, did not prevent Pāntauchus joining Hippias and Milo, in making a voluntary surrender of Bērēa to the Roman consul, after the fatal engagement in which Pērsēs lost his kingdom (Liv. xlii. 39 seq.).

Pānthēon, i, n. Santa Maria Rotondo, a celebrated temple at Rome, built by Agrippa, son-in-law of Augustus, during the reign of that emperor, and dedicated to all the gods, hence the name (Ann. Mar. xvi. 10).

Pānthōus, i, m. a Trojan, of whose history little is known. He was the father of Euphōrbus, who is hence called Pānthōides. Pŷthāgōras, who was among the Greeks, the founder of the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, affirmed that he was Euphōrbus in the time of the Trojan war, and that he recollected many circumstances which occurred when his soul inhabited the body of that prince. See Pŷthāgōras.

Pānthus, i, m. son of Othrys, the priest of Apōllo at Troy, whose temple was in the citadel, hence Virgilius, Arcti Phœliqū sacēdos. During the night that Troy was on fire, he eluded the Greeks, and, on his way to the house of Ænēas with the sacred things, the gods, and his young grandson, met that prince, and informed him that Troy was in the hands of the Greeks. Neither the sanctity of his character, nor the dignity of his office, protected him from the vengeance of the Greeks, by whom he was slain. From his father he is called Othryādes (Virg. Æn. ii. 319 seq.).—2. A rival of Propertius for the favour of Cynthis (ii. 21. 1).

Pānticāpæon, i, n. Kirchē, called also Bōspōrus, from its standing on the western coast of Cimmērius Bōspōrus, the Strait of Caffa, built by a colony of the Greeks. From Strābo it appears to have been a place of great note. Inh. Pānticāpēuses, ium, m. (Plin. i. 661).

Pānticāpēs, is, m. a Scythian river, which forms a lake, and at last mixes its waters with the Bōrysthēnes (Herod. iv. 54).

Pāntilius, i, m. a man whom Hōrātius, in contempt, calls cūcēx, a bug. It is said that this Pāntilius was a buffoon, and an enemy of Hōrātius (Sat. i. 10. 78).

Pāntolābus. See Mallus.

Pāntōmimi, orum, m. pantomimes, persons who express their meaning by dumb show and gesture. No senator was allowed to enter the house of a pantomime performer, and Roman knights could not attend the players on the street (Tac. Ann. i. 77).

Pāphlē, es, f. a name of Vēnus, from Pāphos, Baffa, q. v. (Stat. Syl. iii. 4. 82).

Pāphlāgōnia, s, f. a district of Asia Minor, bounded on the east by Pōntus, on the south by Gālātia, on the west by Bithynia, and on the north by Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea. It was anciently called Pýlæmēnia, from Pýlæmēnes q. v. Inh. Pāphlāgōnes, um (Sing. Pāphlāgon, v. Pāphlāgo, ōnis), m. Prōmāntōria Pāphlāgōnum (Sal. Frag.). Adj. Pāphlāgōnūs, a, um. Pāphlāgōnia gens (Plin. i. 649).

Pāphos, i. f. Baffa, was the capital of ancient Cyprus, built, according to Ovidius, by Pāphus, son of Pýgmālion, the famous statuary; according to Pausanias, by Agāpēnor, after the destruction of Troy; and, according to Apollodorus, by Cinēras, king of Assyria. Baffa contains interesting ruins, and other antiquities. The minerals in its neighbourhood are valuable, of which a crystallized quartz is often sold by the Armenian merchants for diamonds. Amianthus, as flexible as silk, and perfectly white, is found near Baffa, and called by the Cypriotes "the cotton stone." It had a beautiful temple, sacred to Vēnus, and Sālānis another, for the worship of Jūpiter. Adj. Pāphius, a, um. Pāphia mīrtūs, myrtles of Baffa.

This kind of tree abounded in the vicinity of that city, and, as well as Pāphos, was sacred to Vēnus, who was hence called Pāphia Vēnus (Tac. Ann. iii. 62), and Rēgina Pāphi (Hor. Od. i. 30. 1). Pāphia māter (Stat. Syl. iii. 4. 88). Pāphius hēros, Pýgmālion, father of Pāphus (Ōv. Met. x. 290).

Pāpilus, i. m. a man, to whom Mārtiālis writes several poems, equally remote from good taste and mental delicacy (iv. 48 seq.). In some editions, the reading is Pāpilus, not Pāmphilus, in epig. iv. 69.

P. Pāpīnūs Stātīus, P. Pāpīnī Stātīi, m. was born at Nēāpōlis, Naples, about the beginning of the reign of the Roman emperor, Claudius. His father, a native of Epīrus, Lower Albania, removed to Naples, where he taught oratory with great applause, and had under his tuition all the youth of the nobility, resident in that city and neighbourhood. Endowed with fine natural abilities, Stātīus made great progress in his education, under the superintendence of his father, with whom he afterwards removed to Rome, where he married Claudia, the daughter of a musician, whom he always mentions with the tenderness and respect to which her excellent disposition and literary accomplishments justly entitled her. He treated her daughter, by her former husband, with the kindness and affection of a parent. Stātīus obtained three prizes in the Alban games, but failed in the capitol. He composed occasional poems on miscellaneous subjects, which he called Sylvæ; and they introduced him to the wits of that age, whom he frequently mentions and compliments. Except Jūvénālis, none of his contemporaries have introduced his name into their writings, for which critics have advanced different reasons, but, being wholly conjectural, they need not be related. Through Pāris, a player, the chief favourite of Dōmītiānus, he became acquainted with the emperor, and had the honour of being admitted to his table. He procured the esteem of that tyrant by extravagant flattery and fulsome adulation, whose liberality placed in his power all the necessities, and some of the luxuries, of life. From Jūvénālis we learn, that he wrote tragedy, but none of his pieces for the stage (for some have supposed that he wrote more than one), have been transmitted to modern times. His great work, and, except the Æneid, almost the only Latin poem which appears in the form of Epic, is the Thēbais, in the writing of which he informs us he had spent twelve years. He retired to his native city to correct it, and soon after began the Achilleid, in which he had made little progress, having only composed two books, when death put an end to his labours, about the year 100. The moral character of Stātīus appears to have been without stain, and he merited the esteem of the virtuous by his reverence for the gods, his affection as a husband, his worth as a citizen, and his loyalty as a subject. His style is more natural and chaste in his Sylvæ, than in his Thēbaid or Achilleid. In general it is florid, but not without a stately magnificence, when he chooses to polish into elegance, or condense into sublimity. He is unequal, now soaring in the clouds, now creeping on the ground, now swelling into bombast, and now rising to grandeur. When his exalted mind made a powerful effort at superior excellence, he sometimes became extravagant and turgid. The strength of his imagination exceeded the accuracy of his judgment, hence the reader of taste is frequently disappointed, or, when he expects regularity, he finds disproportion. None of the Latin poets have approached nearer to Virgilius, than Stātīus (Juv. Sat. vii. 83).

Sextus Pāpīnūs, Sexti Pāpīnī, m. a Roman consul, who had for his colleague, L. Plautius, in the year 35. His family was of consular rank. In consequence of an unnatural passion on the part of his mother, he threw himself headlong from a precipice, and instantly expired. The senate banished her from Rome for ten years, that her second son might not be solicited to similar guilt, or forced to self-destruction. The death of Pāpīnūs happened the year after he had been consul (Tac. Ann. vi. 40).

Pāpīnus, i. m. a mountain of Galliæ Cisalpina, between which and Scimīna, the Roman consul, C. Licīnūs Crīssus, encamped in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 12). These mountains appear to have been at the very foot of the Alps.

Pāpīriānus, i. m. a man, mentioned by Mārtiālis (viii. 81).

Pāpīrius, et, Pāpīriānus, a, um. Pāpīrii gens, the clan of the Pāpīrii (Liv. ix. 16). Pāpīria tribus (Liv. viii. 27). Pāpīriāna sacritia (Liv. x. 3). See L. Pāpīrius Cūrsor.

Pāpīrius, i. m. a Roman youth, who had just assumed the pretexta, was taken by his father into the senatehouse, and, on returning home, importuned by his mother to tell her the subject which had been under discussion, and continued to another day. The laws of the senate did not allow of such a disclosure, on which account, the youth, to silence his mother, told her that the senate deliberated whether a man should have two wives, or a wife two husbands. She immediately rushed from her house, conversed with a number of other matrons, who accompanied her to the senate next day, supplicating that venerable body to agree to the latter proposal. Pāpīrius removed the wonder of the senate, by informing them of the fiction, which he had told to his mother, and, in approbation of his conduct, the senators gave him the surname of Prætextatus, ordaining that, in future, the Prætextati should be excluded, except of the Pāpirii (Gel. i. 16).—2. A centurion, despatched by Mūclānus, to assassinate L. Pīso (Tac. Hist. iv. 49).

C. Pāpirius (Māso), C. Pāpirii, m. enjoyed the consulship, in 233 B. C. From the consular calendar, it may be stated, that he was the first who triumphed on the Alban mount. On the surrender of the Fālisci, he acted honourably to that people, against whom the Romans seemed inclined to exercise severity (Val. Max. iii. 6).

C. Pāpirius Cārbo, C. Pāpirii Cārbōnis, m. elected praetor, in 171 B. C. He obtained Sardinia and the foreign jurisdiction (Liv. xlv. 17 seq.).—2. A consul, in 122 B. C. To a certain degree of turbulence, if not of sedition, Pāpirius must plead guilty, since, from his frequently lamenting in his harangues, the death of Tīb. Sēmprōnius Grāchus, it cannot be doubted, that his design was to promote discontent, or excite commotion, among the people. The laws which he proposed, when a tribune of the commons, had somewhat of a similar tendency. On these grounds L. Crāssus brought him to trial, and, from the writings of Cicero, he appears to have preferred a voluntary death. His powers as a speaker, and his mental attainments, would have commanded respect, had they been united with true patriotism and a peaceful disposition (Liv. Ep. 59, Tac. Or. 34).

C. Pāpirius Crāssus, C. Pāpirii Crāssi, m. a tribune of the soldiers, with consular power, in 383 B. C. (Liv. vi. 18).

C. Pāpirius Māso, C. Pāpirii Māsōnis, m. son of Calus, a Roman pontiff, who died in 245 B. C. According to some authors, he was one of the three commissioners for settling colonies at Crēmōna and Plācētia, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 23).

C. Pāpirius Tūrdi, C. Pāpirii Tūrdi, m. a tribune of the commons, in 180 B. C., who uttered severe reflections against A. Mānilius Vūlso q. r. (Liv. xli. 6).

Cn. Pāpirius Cārbo, Cn. Pāpirii Cārbōnis, m. consul, with C. Caeclius Mētellus, in 115 B. C., and was defeated by the Cimbri and Teutōnes (Liv. Ep. 63). Eutrōpius does not mention this circumstance (iv. 15), but it is found in Vellēius Pātērcūlus (ii. 12).—2. Commanded one of the four armies with which L. Cōrnēlius Cinna and C. Mārius besieged Rome, in 89 B. C., and, two years after, he obtained the consulship, with L. Cōrnēlius Cinna. Both consuls were solicitous to make war on L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, to whom the senate had sent a deputation to treat of peace. In his second consulship, with the same colleague, the latter died, and Pāpirius remained sole consul. His patriotism cannot be commended, since he opposed the terms offered by L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, although the senate had approved them; conceiving it would be of more advantage to him and his party, that the civil war should be continued than terminated. Pāpirius required from all the towns and colonies, in Italy, hostages, on purpose to bind them against L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, a measure to which the senate opposed a successful resistance. Failure in this attempt did not prevent him from making preparations for war against L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, who routed and cut off his army at Clūstium, Chiūsi, Fāvēntia and Fidēntia, in 84 B. C. Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus made him prisoner, in Sicily, and he died, says Līvius, weeping like a woman (Ep. 79—89). In his third consulship, he had C. Mārius for his colleague, although under twenty years of age. He is probably the person mentioned by Florus, as having been successful against the Lucāni, in the Social war (iii. 18). Adj. Cārbōnānus, a. um.

L. Pāpirius, L. Pāpirii, m. a military tribune, with consular power, in 381 B. C., who, with Sp. Pāpirius, fought a battle, with success, at Vēlitra, but did not lay siege to the town, because it did not appear to be their duty to destroy the colony. He is probably the person again mentioned as elected to the same office, in 367 B. C. (Liv. vi. 22—38).—2. A Roman praetor, who passed a law, in 332 B. C., conferring on the Aecrāni the right of citizenship, but without the power of voting (Liv. viii. 17).—3. A usurer, whose cruelty and criminality induced the Romans to pass a law, in 325 B. C., prohibiting the imprisonment of debtors (Liv. viii. 28). See C. Pābilitas.

L. Pāpirius Crāssus, L. Pāpirii Crāssi, m. elected consul, in 436 B. C. (Liv. iv. 21).—2. Held the consulship, in 430 B. C., and passed a law, very acceptable to the people, respecting the valuation of fines (Liv. iv. 50).—3. A Roman, whom, during his praetorship, in 339 B. C., T. Mānilius Tōrquātus nominated dictator, to carry on war against the Antīates; but performed nothing worthy of being mentioned. In his second consulship, 329 B. C., he gained an easy victory over the Privēnātes. The dictator, L. Pāpirius Cūrsor, appointed him master of the horse, in 324 B. C., and gave him the command of the city (Liv. viii. 12—36).

L. Pāpirius Cūrsor, L. Pāpirii Cūrsōris, m. was appointed a military tribune with consular power in 386 B. C., and three years after, re-elected to the same office. He held the censorship with C. Jūlius, on whose death in 391 B. C. rather than resign the office, he substituted M. Cōrnēlius Maluginēnsis as his colleague. During that lustrum, the city was taken, and no censor afterwards followed his example; but, on the death of his colleague, abdicated the office (Liv. vi. 5—ix. 34).—2. A distinguished Roman, who, after being master of the horse to L. Pāpirius Crāssus, was named dictator by L. Fōrtius Cāmillus in 324 B. C. to carry on the war against the Sāmmites, when he appointed Q. Fābius Māximus Rūllianus master of the horse. Pāpirius was reckoned the first general of that period, and Fābius was in high estimation for martial bravery. As they entered Sāmnum under doubtful auspices, the dictator returned to Rome to take the omens anew, ordering the master of the horse neither to change his position, nor charge the enemy in his absence; but the latter, having discovered that the Sāmmites might be attacked with advantage, disregarding the order of his commander, led on his troops to battle, gained a complete victory, and left twenty thousand of them dead on the field. He burned all the arms of the killed and the prisoners, either in fulfilment of a vow, or, according to Fābius, to prevent the dictator from having any share in the renown. Soon after the victory, the dictator returned in great wrath to the camp, burning with a desire of revenge, both because the master of the horse had fought in opposition to his orders, and had sent his letter announcing his success directly to the senate, not to his superior officer. To secure himself against the violence of the enraged commander, Fabius entreated the protection of the soldiers, which they readily promised, and faithfully fulfilled, when the dictator ordered him to be stript, and the rods and axes to be in readiness. In vain did the officers of the army supplicate for the safety of Fabius, their expostulation only increased the dictator's anger. On this, he fled to Rome, where neither the entreaties of the father of Fabius, nor the authority of the senate, nor an appeal to the people, had the slightest influence on the dictator. The plebeian tribunes seemed doubtful how to act. On the side of Fabius were the affection of the army, the majesty of the senate, and the favour of the people; on the other side, were urged the invincible authority of the Roman government, the discipline of the army, the edict of the dictator, always observed as the order of a god, and the authority of T. Manlius, surnamed Torquatus, who preferred public advantage to paternal affection. Both father and son then declining further contest fell down on their knees, deprecating the wrath of the dictator, who considered their intercession a sufficient confirmation of dictatorial authority and military discipline, pardoned Fabius, but prohibited him from acting in any case as a magistrate. Having named L. Papirius Crassus master of the horse, the dictator returned to the camp, where, by attention to the sick and wounded, he regained the favour of the army, which he had forfeited by this severity of procedure, compelled the Samnites to sue for peace, which he granted on hard conditions, and continued the dictatorship until the next consuls were elected. This brave officer was five times elected consul, and twice nominated dictator. Success attended him in every expedition, he took Luceria in Apulia, where he recovered a hundred horsemen given as hostages at Caudium, and obtained immense booty. The Saticani had revolted after the ignominy at Caudium, but Papirius soon reduced them to subjection, punishing capitally the instigators of the rebellion, and returned in triumph to Rome. Few Romans in bravery, military skill, and the duties of a commander, surpassed Papirius, who, to great vigour both of body and mind, added remarkable swiftness of foot, hence the surname of himself and family Cursor. Either from robustness of frame, or from much practice, he was capable of receiving a very great quantity of food and wine, which rendered him almost a stranger to fatigue. Than under him, military service was never severer, and he supported authority of command to its utmost extent, both among Romans and allies. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, with whom he lived in enmity, appointed him dictator in 310 B. C., to carry on war against the Samnites, whom he soon subdued, and returned in triumph to Rome. The shields of the Samnites adorned with gold, were distributed through the silver-shops to ornament the forum during the procession, hence originated the custom of the ediles decorating that part of the town in grand processions (Liv. viii. 12 seq.).—Adj. Papirianus, a. um. Papiriana savilla, became a proverbial expression, from the strictness of his discipline, and his severity against the master of the horse (Liv. x. 3).—3. A son of the former, a man of great celebrity, both on account of his father's merits and his own. During his consulship in 295 B. C., he took Düronia, a town of the Samnites, by storm. The person who had the charge of the chickens deceived him, pretending that the omen was favourable, when the reverse was the truth, on which account Papirius placed him in the first line, where he fell. A signal victory crowned his engagement with the Samnites, whose camp he took, having killed upwards of thirty thousand, and made nearly four thousand prisoners. In place of vowing a temple, he promised, during the battle, to Jupiter Victor, a libation of wine and honey, which was acceptable to the god, and the consequences fortunate. Extraordinary splendour distinguished his triumph, and the spoils gratified the military pride of the Romans, who compared them, in respect of beauty and magnificence, to those taken by his father. The immense quantity of brass and silver carried in the procession, Papirius lodged in the treasury, allowing no part of either to the soldiers. With the spoils won from the Samnites by his military skill, and the bravery of his troops, he adorned a temple to Quirinus, which his father, when dictator, had vowed. The quantity of these must have been very great, since the embellishment of the temple exhausted but a small part of them, the remainder was distributed among the allies and colonists, to ornament their temples and public places. Next year he was appointed praetor, and nothing further of his history has been transmitted (Liv. x. 9—47).

L. Papirius Mäso, L. Papirii Mäsonis, m. elected praetor in 179 B. C., and obtained the jurisdiction of the city (Liv. xli. 14 seq.).

L. Papirius Mugillanus, L. Papirii Mugillani, m. elected consul with L. Sempromnius Atratinus in 444 B. C. In the beginning of that year, military tribunes with consular power were elected. Livius, from want of good authority, writes hesitatingly with respect to the magistrates at this time. These consuls were next year appointed censors, probably to compensate for the short time they had held the consulship, and they had the honour of being the first who held that office. Papirius was afterwards consul, a military tribune with consular power, and intërrëx (Liv. iv. 7—43).—2. L. Papirius Mugillanus, v. Cursor, for so is his name written by different authors, was consul in 325 B. C. (Liv. viii. 23).

M. Papirius, M. Papirii, m. one of the aged and noble Romans who devoted themselves for their country, as the Gauls approached the city in 389 B. C. Provoked at the indignity of a Gaul, who stroked his beard, which at that time was universally worn long, he struck the savage on the head. This act of violence was the signal for universal massacre. Papirius, and all the rest were instantly put to death on their seats (Liv. v. 41).—Valerius Maximus calls him

C. Attilus (iii. 2).—2. One of the five commissioners appointed to accomplish a reconciliation between debtors and creditors, in 351 B. C. They were called Mensarii, bankers (Liv. vii. 21).

M. Papius Atratinus, M. Papius Atratinus, m. elected consul in 410 B. C. with C. Nautius Rutilius (Liv. iv. 52).

M. Papius Crassus, M. Papius Crassus, m. elected consul in 441 B. C. with C. Papius Pacillus (Liv. iv. 12).—2. Nominated dictator in 332 B. C., from its having been reported, that the Gauls were preparing for war. After levying troops with great despatch, intelligence was received, that the Gauls were in a state of perfect tranquillity (Liv. viii. 17).

M. Papius Mugillanus, M. Papius Mugillanus, m. elected a military tribune first in 417 B. C., and afterwards in 415 B. C. (Liv. iv. 45, 47).

Sp. Papius, Sp. Papius, m. elected a military tribune with consular power, in 381 B. C. (Liv. vi. 22). See L. Papius.—2. Another of the same name, elected to the same office, in 379 B. C. (Liv. vi. 27).—3. The brother's son of L. Papius Cursor, the consul, who informed his uncle respecting a doubt about the auspices before the battle at Aquilonia, in 295 B. C. For his bravery in that engagement, he was rewarded with a bracelet and crown of gold (Liv. x. 40, 44).

Papius Mutulus, Papius Mutili, m. one of the proscribed, who went privately to the back door of the house of his wife Bastia, but she refused to admit him, because a price had been set on his head, on which he killed himself, and besmeared the door of her house with his own blood, in 83 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 89).

M. Papius Mutulus, M. Papius Mutili, m. held the office of consul with Q. Poppaeus Sabinus during part of the year 9. Adj. Papius, a, um. Papia Poppaea lex, a law which imposed penalties on celibacy, in order to encourage marriage. These consuls were both bachelors, which rendered the law more acceptable, because, on their part, it was disinterested. It does not appear to have had the effect intended, or, that marriage was thereby brought into fashion (Tac. Ann. ii. 32: lib. 25).

Papremis, is, f. a town of Egypt. Inh. Papremisani, orum, m. Adj. Papremisani, a, um (Herod. ii. 59 seq.).

Parachelous, Idus, f. a town of Greece, on Achelous, the Aspropotamo (Liv. xxxix. 26).

Parataca, arum, e. Parataceni, orum, m. a people in the south of Media (Plin. i. 710). Parataceni, es, f. the country of the Parataceni (Plin. i. 717). Parataca, a, f. the chief city of that district. Adj. Paratacenus, a, um. Paratacena regio, the same with Parataceni.

Paratolun, i, n. Al-Baraton, a maritime town of Egypt, or rather of Marmarica, directly south of the eastern extremity of Cræta, Candia. Adj. Paratolunus, a, um, of Al-Baraton, Egyptian. Paratolunum litus (Sil. Ital. iii. 225). Paratolun urbs (Luc. Phar. x. 9).

Parapamisus, v. Paropamisus, i, m. Hindoo-ko (i. e. the stony girle), a mountain on which Baetra stood, says Curtius, unquestionably a mistake, although it may have stood near its foot (Curt. vii. 4). Inh. Parapamisade, arum, m. (Curt. vii. 3 seq.).

Parapamēni, orum, m. a people who lived at the foot of Mount Caucasus, and were conquered by Alexander the Great in 308 B. C. (Just. xii. 5).

Paraxmāleha, orum, n. a town near the Euphrates, which some write Bārāxmāleha (Ann. Mar. xxiv. 2).

Parca, arum, f. (a partu), the Fates; Clōthō, Lachēsis and Atropos. Cæsilius Vindex makes their names Nōna, Dēcima, and Mōrta (Gel. iii. 16). They were said to be the daughters of Nox (Night) alone; of Jūpiter and Thēmis; of Erēbus; and, according to Lycōphron, and of the Sea and Zeūs the master of the gods. The ancients were not only divided with respect to the parentage of the Destinies, but also with regard to their residence. Some place them in the Infernal Regions, others, in Heaven, and Ovidius describes them as inhabiting a place in which the fates of men were engraved in iron and brass, in such a manner, that neither the thunder of Jūpiter, nor the destruction of the universe could efface them. They were worshipped with great solemnity both in Holy and Greece. Respecting their form and dress, nothing certain can be obtained from the writers of antiquity. The descriptions of both are nearly as numerous as the authors who mention these fabulous divinities. They were represented as spinning the thread of human life. The first held the distaff, the second spun the thread, which the third cut, as is neatly expressed in the following verse:

Clōtho cōlum retinet, Lachēsis net, et Atropos occat.

Their worship and sacrifices were the same with those of the Furies (Paus. ii. 11). The three divisions of time, Past, Present, and Future, suggested the number and offices of the Fates. With the first life originates, is continued by the second, and terminated by the third.

Parion, ōnis, f. a town in Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, built by Pārius, a son of Iāson (Ann. Mar. xxii. 8).

Pāris, idis, m. a son of Priāmus, king of Trōja, and Hēcōba. His father ordered him to be put to death at his birth, in consequence of his mother having, during her pregnancy, dreamed that she was delivered of a fire-brand which reduced the city to ashes; and the augurs interpreted the dream to portend that the child, then unborn, would occasion the destruction of Troy. The persons appointed to this cruel office, contented themselves with exposing Pāris on mount Ida, the highest range of which was anciently called Gārgārus, Kazdaghy, or, Kazdaghy, where he was brought up by the shepherds. On account of his extraordinary strength and courage in defending the flocks from ravenous beasts, and repelling the attacks of robbers, he was called Alexander, i. e. the strong man. Here he passed the early part of his life, and, whilst engaged in tending his flock, gave judgment in the appeal of the three goddesses, Vēnus, Jūno, and Minēra, who contended for the golden apple, hence Ovidius calls him Iūdis iudex. See Peleus. Each endeavoured to bribe him to her interest. Jūno promised him a kingdom, Minēra, military glory, and Venus, the most beautiful woman in the world for his wife. Upon the mind of the noble shepherd, the promise of Venus made the deepest impression, and he adjudged the golden apple to her. The decision of Páris, by slighting the beauty of the other two goddesses, provoked their wrath against the empire and his nation, was the cause of the Trojan war, and all the train of evils and calamities to which that memorable siege gave birth. His father, at a future period, received him at his court, and treated him as his son. After spending some time in his native city among the Trojan princes, he set out for the court of Menélaus, king of Spárta, Mistra, with a view to carry off his wife Hélena, the most beautiful woman in the world, as the reward of the judgment which he had pronounced in favour of Venus. The young Trojan met with a most welcome reception at the Spartan court; but he abused the laws of hospitality, by prevailing on the queen to elope with him. Though demanded back by all the princes who had sworn to protect her, and threatened with the vengeance of the combined forces of Greece, he resolutely persisted in refusing their request. His father is said, on account of Ajax carrying off his sister Hélena, to have encouraged him in his obstinacy and guilt. In consequence of this denial, the Greeks immediately commenced hostilities, which ended in the total destruction of the city and kingdom of Troy. Páris discovered, according to Homer, little warlike courage or personal prowess during the war, and Horace represents him as effeminate and cowardly, and, in contempt, calls him pastor (Od. i. 15. 1). The time and manner of his death are uncertain.—2. A player, put to death by the emperor Néro (Suet. Ner. 54).—3. A player, with whom Dómítia Longina, wife of the emperor Dómítianus, fell desperately in love, and for which she was divorced, but afterwards taken back, because the emperor could not bear the separation (Suet. Dom. 3).

Párisi, orum, m. the inhabitants of Lútétia, from whom it was afterwards called Párisi, now Paris, the capital of France (Cæs. B. G. vi. 5). See Lútétia.

Párium, i. m. Camana, a city of Mysia, at the southwest extremity of Própontis, the Sea of Marmora. Its vicinity appears to have been dangerous, on account of hidden rocks, to which Válerius Fláccus refers (il. 622).

Párius, i. m. a son of Iáson, who built Párium q. v. (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Parma; æ. f. Parma, a town in the north of Italy, on a river of the same name, at which a colony of two thousand Latins was planted in 185 B. C., and each received eight acres of land (Liv. xxxix. 55). The modern city is large, divided by the river into two parts, and is about three miles in circumference. It is the capital of the duchy to which it gives name, about sixty miles in length, and thirty in breadth, generally fertile, and used to be famous for cheese, called, from the district, Parmesan. Inh. Pármenses, ium, æ. Pármānī, orum, m. (Cic. Phil. xiv. 3).

Párménion, ónis, m. a distinguished general of Philippos, king of Mæcédónia, and afterwards under his son, who condemned him to death on suspicion of treason. The murder of his friends forms a prominent feature in the character of Alexander the Great (Just. ix. 5 seq.).—2. An ambassador of Génius, king of the Illyrii, who, with Mórceus, was appointed to receive the oath, hostages, and money of Párcus, king of Mæcédónia, and thence to proceed to Rhódus, to attempt to persuade the inhabitants to join them against the Romans, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xiv. 23).

Párnāsus, i. m. Liakura (Hobhouse), Lakura (Clarke), and Lakoura (Walpole), a very high mountain of Phócis, an inland district of Græcia, Greece, the favourite residence of Apóllo and the muses. It is said, that Liakura was anciently called Lárnāsus, from Lárnāx, the boat of Dencálon, which rested there after the universal deluge. These celebrated rocks called Phadríades, rise almost perpendicularly above the Castalian spring, and are at a great distance from the summit of the mountain, which cannot be seen from Castri, and has an undulatory ridge with a number of points, none of which is distinguished by superior altitude. Above these rocks, Naupléia, and Hýāmpēa, is a small lake in a plain, the water of which probably yields a constant supply to the Castalian fountain. The superfluous water descends to the bottom of a valley through a narrow rocky glen, where it joins the river Pleistis. This spring flows in a copious stream, forming several cascades, and water-cresses cover its sides. The ancients thought that this mountain had two tops, which they called Cýrrha and Nisa; but Hérodótus calls them Tithóreā and Hýāmpēa, over which criminals, or persons who had incurred the displeasure of Apóllo, used to be thrown, as from the Tarpeian rock at Rome. Of these peaks the one was sacred to Apóllo, and the other to Bæchus, Mons Phæto Bromiæque iæcer (Luc. Phar. v. 74). Dêlphi, Castri, stood in a circular hollow of this mountain, about a mile from the bottom. The present town consists of a small number of mud houses, but Dêlphi appears, from ancient authors, to have been two miles in circumference. The observations of a late traveller, however, render this measurement doubtful; since there are only two small spots of level ground on which houses could have been built, and these could not contain a town of that size. About 200 paces above Castri, is a cave, which is said to have a pit fifty cubits deep. This, the natives consider as the cavern from which the priestess of Apóllo received the divine exhalations. The site must have been chosen for its security; as its situation renders it a place of great strength. Of the old city a few ruins are still visible. From Dêlphi, Castri, to the summit of Párnāsus, Liakura, the ancients reckoned sixty stadia, about seven miles; a measurement which modern observation has not proved, in consequence of the altitude of the mountain not being ascertained. To assert that Párnāsus, Liakura, has not two tops, because a late traveller, who viewed this mountain in different directions, observed only one, might be deemed inconsiderate; although it is no improbable conjecture, that the immense cleft in the vicinity of Castri, which rends the mountain from the top nearly to the base, and down which the Castalian rill drops, may have suggested the first idea of two summits. To the east of Castri, situated beneath a precipice of one hundred feet in height, is a large square shallow basin, the water of which is cool and pleasant to the taste. There is no doubt that this basin is filled with the pure Castalian water (Cástalia, v. Cástallus fons); but whether the spring itself rises up there, or whether it is conducted to it from some place farther up the mountain, is not precisely determined. Bicrētes Párnāsus (Stat. Th. i. 628). Párnāsīs, Idos, f. Parnasian, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Párnāsīs laurus (Ov. Met. xi. 165). Adj. Párnāsīus, v. Párnāsūs, a, um. Párnāsīa templā, the temples of Phoebus and Baccus (Ov. Met. v. 278). Párnāsīa rūpes, the mountain Párnāsus (Virg. B. vi. 29).

Párnēs, ētis, m. Nozen, or, Nozia, a mountain of Attica, which Hobhouse says has different names in different places; the south-west range is called Casha-vonni, and the northern heights Ozea. Statius has mentioned its fertility in vines, Párnēsque benignus vitibus (Th. xii. 620).

Párnōn, ōnis, m. a mountain in Peloponnesus, which contains the boundary between the districts of the Lacedemonians and Argives (Paus. ii. 38).

Pārōpāmīsiade, arum, m. See Pārōpāmīsus.

Pārōrē, ae, f. a district, probably of no great extent, and bordering on Mæcedonia, subject to the Thracians (Liv. xxxix. 27 seq.). It must not be confounded with a town of this name in Arcadia, and another in Epirus. Inh. Pārōrēi, orum, m. (Steph.).

Pāros, i, f. Páros, an island nearly in the centre of the Cyclades, ten miles long and eight broad. The soil is fertile and well cultivated. On account of its excellent wines, it was dedicated to Baccus. The marble of Pāros was long in high estimation, from being very white, hence Nīcēa Pāros (Virg. Æn. iii. 126); Marmōrēa Pāros (Virg. Cir. 476). The quarries were wrought under ground by means of lamp-light, as coal pits are in Britain; hence called Lychnites. In this island, a chronological table of the most remarkable events in the Athenian history for 300 years, was cut in marble, 163 B. C. It begins with the reign of Cærops, the founder of the Athenian monarchy. This valuable monument of antiquity was, in 1667, presented to the University of Oxford, by the earl of Arundel, from whom it is now called the Arundelian marble. A late traveller maintains, that this marble was not found in Pāros, but in the island Céos, &c. Inh. Pārīi, orum, m. Adj. Pārīus, ēt, Pārīanus, a, um. Pārīus lapis, Pārīum marmor, &c., Parian, i. e. the purest white, marble.

Pārhiāces, is, m. a freedman of Vōnōnes, who showed his ingratitude and perfidy, by betraying Mēhērdātes, the son of his benefactor, and delivering him up to his enemy, Gōtārzes (Tac. Ann. xii. 14).

Pārhiāsiā, ae, f. a town of Arcadia, so called from Pārhiāsus, one of the sons of Lycāon, by whom it was built. Inh. Pārhiāsiī, orum (Sing. Pārhiāsiūs, i), m. were amongst the most ancient inhabitants of Greece. Pārhiāsiīs, Idīs, f. of Pārhiāsiā, or Arcadia, applied to nouns feminine. Pārhiāsiādes stīllē, Cāllistō, daughter of Lycāon, and her son Arcas (Ov. Fast. iv. 577). Adj.

Pārhiāsiūs, a, um, of Pārhiāsiūs, of Arcadia, Arcadian. Pārhiāsiā dēa, Cārmēnta, the mother of Evānder, to whom the Romans paid divine honours after her death (Ov. Fast. i. 618). Pārhiāsiūs mos, the Arcadian manner (Virg. Æn. viii. 344.) Pārhiāsiā pēnnē, the wings of Mercūrius, from his being born and worshipped in Arcadia (Luc. Phar. ix. 660).

Pārhiāsiūs, i, m. a native of Ephēsus, a painter of great celebrity, who first gave symmetry to a picture, delineated the features of the countenance, the beauty of the hair, and general expression, with elegance and taste. In the opinion of artists themselves, he excelled in the accompaniments or scenery, and in giving them relief, so that they seemed to stand out from the canvass, which Plinius calls summa sublimitas picturæ. He competed with Zeūxīs and others for the palm of victory in his own art. Zeūxīs produced a picture, in which grapes were drawn so naturally, that the birds attempted to eat them, upon which, elated with that proof of his success, he desired Pārhiāsiūs to draw aside, what he supposed to be a linen curtain, and show his picture. Pārhiāsiūs replied, that what he had mistaken for a curtain, was the work of his pencil. Zeūxīs immediately acknowledged his inferiority, and yielded the palm to his rival, adding, "I only deceived birds; but you have deceived me, a painter" (Plin. v. 201 seq.).

Pārstrymōniā, ae, f. a district, subject to the Thracians (Liv. xlii. 51). Some include it in Thrācia; and, from the name, infer, that it was upon the river Strymon.

Pārthāon, v. Pōrthāon, ōnis, m. son of Agēnor and Epicāstē. He married Eurystē, daughter of Hippodāmas, by whom he had Genēus, Agnūs, Alcāthōus, Mēlus, Lycōpēus, and a daughter, Stērōpē, who, by Achēlōus, became the mother of the Sīrēnes. Nātus Pārthāonē, Genēus (Ov. Met. ix. 12).

Area Pārthāōniē, Ætōliā (Stat. Th. ii. 726). Pārthāōnīdes, ae, m. a patronymic of Mēhēager, grandson of Pārthāon (Val. Flacc. iii. 705). Adj. Pārthāōniūs, a, um. Pārthāōniā dōmus (Ov. Met. viii. 541).

Pārthēniā, arum, m. the children born by the wives of the Lacedemonians, during the absence of their husbands in the war at Mēssēnē. After it had been carried on for ten years, the Lacedemonians dreaded the destruction of their state from the want of children, and, having bound themselves by oath, not to return till they had taken Mēssēnē, sent home some of the young men, who had joined the army after the commencement of the war, and had not taken that oath, that the women might have children by them. The offspring of this illicit connexion were called Pārthēniē and Spūrtī, as a reflection on the chastity of their mothers. The Spartans, after a war of twenty years, took Mēssēnē by stratagem, and, on returning home, treated the Pārthēniē with contempt, who joined the slaves for the destruction of their countrymen. The timely discovery of the plot prevented its execution, and, being compelled to quit the Lacedemonian territory, they sailed to Italy, under Phālānthus q. v. (Just. iii. 4).

Pārthēniē, ae, f. the nurse of Cynthiā q. v. (Prop. iv. 7. 74).

Pārthēniūm, i, n. a town of Arcadia

(Plin. i. 420).—2. There was also a mountain of this name in Arcadia, now Roani, the pass is called Partheni, from the old name. Tortoises, which make excellent lyres, are found here, but from being held sacred to Pān, the ancients themselves neither touched them, nor allowed strangers to touch them.—3. A town of Mysia (Plin. i. 611).

Parthēnium, i. n. promontorium, Eski-forum, a promontory on the west side of Taurica Chersonesus, the Crimæa (Plin. i. 238).

Parthēnium Mārē, a part of the Mediterranean Sea, on the coast of Syria, to which Ammianus Marcellinus gives this name (xiv. 8). Others call it Isolæus Sinus.

Parthēnius, i. m. a Trojan killed by Rāpo (Virg. Æn. x. 748).—2. A son of Cýdnus, from whom, according to Stēphānus, Anchīala was afterwards called Parthēnia.—3. An engraver mentioned by Juvēnalis (Sat. xii. 44).—4. A Greek poet, whose writings appear to have been chiefly of the amatory kind. The emperor Tiberius, in his attempts at writing Greek verse, copied the manners of Parthēnius, Euphōrion, and Rhīanus (Suet. Tib. 70).—5. Lord of the bed-chamber to the Roman emperor Dōmītiānus, against whom he entered into a conspiracy, and let in Stēphānus, who murdered him. To this unjustifiable act, Parthēnius may have been induced from a wish to accelerate the promotion of Nērvā, who next assumed the purple. The prætorian guards compelled that emperor to give up the murderer of his predecessor, and necessity obliged him, at last, to submit, and they took a horrid delight in mangling and tormenting Parthēnius (Eutrop. viii. 1. Suet. Dom. 16). Mārtiālis frequently mentions him as a poet (iv. 45 seq.). Adj. Parthēniānus, a, um. Parthēniāna tōga (Mart. ix. 50).

Parthēnius, i. m. a mountain of Arcadia, on which were found the best tortoises, but held sacred to Pān (Paus. viii. 54). Adj. Parthēnius, a, um, of Parthēnius, Arcadian. Parthēni sālta, the forests on Parthēnius (Virg. B. x. 57). Parthēnium nēmus, an Arcadian grove (Ov. Met. ix. 188). Parthēnius pōrtus, a harbour built by the Phōcæans, on the Gulf of Policastro (Plin. i. 395).—2. The Partia, a rapid river of Paphlagonia, which, running northward, falls into Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea (Plin. i. 650). According to Valērius Flācius, Diāna had a particular attachment to this stream, by which he probably meant, that the natives inhabiting its banks chiefly worshipped that goddess (v. 104).—3. A branch of the Alphēus, on the right bank of that river.

Parthēnōpeus, i. m. son of Mēlēager and Attilānta (Hyg. 99). There are other accounts of his parentage. He was of uncommon beauty and bravery. To the former his name has been referred (of virgin countenance). He was by birth an Arcadian, and signalized himself, though very young, in the Theban war. He was one of the seven commanders in the army of Pōlyuces during that siege, and fell by the hand of Drýas q. v. (Virg. Æn. vi. 480. Stat. Th. iv. 248 seq.). His name occurs frequently in the writings of Mārtiālis.

Parthēnōpē, es, f. one of the Sīrēnes q. v., from whom Nēāpōlis, Naples, was called Parthēnōpē, in consequence of her having been buried there (Plin. i. 327. Sil. Ital. xii. 34). Adj. Parthēnōpēus, a, um, of Naples. Parthēnōpēia mēnia, the walls of Naples (Or. Met. xiv. 101).

Parthēnōpōlis, is, f. a town of Thrācia, taken by M. Licīulus Lūcullus, in 69 B. C. (Eutrop. vi. 10. Plin. i. 441). The site of this town is unknown.—2. A town in Bithynia (Plin. i. 628).

Parthia, æ, v. Parthis, Idia, et, Parthiæ, es, f. Chorasan, was, at first, a very small country, bounded on the W. by Media, and Mārē Cāspium, æ. Hýrcānum, the Caspian Sea; on the S. by Persia; on the E. by Bactria; and on the N. by Scythia. During the reign of the Arsācīdæ, it became a very large and powerful empire. At one period, the Parthian dominions extended from Syria to Mons Imāus, Himalaya; and from the territories of the Chorāsānī, and Māssāgētæ, to the Indian Ocean. Civis Parthia, a native of Parthia (Mart. x. 76). Parthia māgna tellūs (Manil. iv. 801). Inh. Parthi, orum (Siag. Parthus, i), m. the Parthians, were originally Scythian exiles, according to Jūstinus (xli. 1), others think the term Parthi originally denoted horsemen. Their language was a mixture of the Scythian and Median, their dress, at first, Scythian, afterwards Median, but they retained the Scythian armour. Slaves could not be set at liberty. They made no use of gold or silver, unless in their armour. They were a very brave and powerful people, who fought chiefly on horseback, and when they pretended to fly, discharged their arrows with a dexterity which did prodigious execution among the enemy, hence Parthus fidens fugā versisque sagittis, the Parthian trusting in flight, and in arrows shot backwards (Virg. G. iii. 31). Parthorum astūta tela remisæ fugā, the weapons discharged backwards in the running, or pretended flight, of the Parthians (Prop. iii. 9. 54). Parthus animōsus veras equis, the Parthian furious, having turned horse, &c., in pretended flight (Hor. Od. i. 19. 11). This practice, also common among the Persians, greatly intimidated the Roman soldiers, and to it frequent allusions are made by their poets. They defeated and killed M. Licīnius Crāssus, and, at a later period, obliged M. Antōnius to leave the country in great distress. At the time the Parthians made peace with Augūstus, they restored two standards which they had taken from M. Licīnius Crāssus and M. Antōnius (Liv. Ep. 139). They were subdued by Trajan, and finally deprived of their country and dominion by the Persians, a nation who had been subject to them for 475 years. Adj. Parthus, et, Parthicus, a, um. Partha tellūs, Parthia (Prop. iv. 3. 67). Parthica luxurica (Claud. xviii. 342).

Parthini, orum, m. a people of Hýrcōm, a district on the east coast, and towards the top of Adria, the Gulf of Venice. Their capital, Parthus, was not far distant from Dýrrāchium, Durazzo (Cæs. B. C. iii. 11. seq.). Parthos, i, f. a town of Africa, taken by Scīpio the elder (Ap. Bel. Pun. 21). Parýmæ, arum, m. a people who lived at the foot of mount Caucāsus, and were conquered by Alexander the Great, in 308 B. C. (Just. xii. 5). They are mentioned by no other author but Jūstinus.

Parthus, i, f. a town of Africa, taken by Scīpio the elder (Ap. Bel. Pun. 21).

Parýmæ, arum, m. a people who lived at the foot of mount Caucāsus, and were conquered by Alexander the Great, in 308 B. C. (Just. xii. 5). They are mentioned by no other author but Jūstinus.

Pāsārgāda, v. Pāsāgārda, m. f. a city of Persia, founded by Cyrus on the ground where he gained a victory over Astāges. The district had the same name. Inh. Pāsārgāda, arum, m. were esteemed the noblest of the Persians, and from them descended the kings of that country (Herod. i. 125).

Passas, m. m. a Thessalian, who, with Amisus of Megalopolis, and Pētilāus, formed a deputation to the horsemen in a state of insubordination, in consequence of Philip having been nominated king by a party, after the death of Alexander the Great (Curt. x. 8).

Pāsiphāē, es, f. daughter of Sol and Pērsēs, was the wife of Minos, king of Crēta, Candia, and sister of Æetes, king of Cōchis, and of Circē. The unnatural crime ascribed to Pāsiphāē by the writers of antiquity, and the monster, the Minotaur, the result of her crime, have rendered her character most infamous. It appears, on minute inquiry into her history, that this is most probably a fiction, resulting from the name of her paramour Taurus, and her husband. Though much guilt still remains, her crime is of a less shocking nature, and although she violated the laws of marriage, she did not outrage those of nature. See Minotaurus. Nēro exhibited, in his spectacles at Rome, a scene of the same detestable kind. To this Mārtiālis alludes (Spec. 5). Adj. Pāsiphāētus, a, um. Pāsiphāēta (fīlia); Phædra, daughter of Minos and Pāsiphāē, whom Thēsēus married, after the death of Hippolytē (Ov. Met. xv. 500).

Pāsithēa, es, f. one of the virgin Graces, whom Jūno promised to Sōmnus, on condition that he lulled Jūpiter fast asleep (Hom. Il. xiv. 269. Catul. lxiii. 43).

Pāsītigris, idis, m. the Jerake, a river of Sūsiāna, which joins Euleus; v. Chōāsēs, the Karoon, and their united streams fall into the Tigris (Curt. v. 3). Part of the Euphrātes, after it is joined by the Tigris, sometimes was called Pāsītigris, now Shut-ul Arab.

Pāsīro, v. Pāsārōn, ōnis, f. Drenichour, a town of Mōlōssis, of which the inhabitants were inveterate enemies of the Romans, through the advice of Antinōus and Hērōdōtus, chief men of the place; but on their being killed, Pāsārō surrendered, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 26).

Pāsīēnus, i, m. an orator, who said of Cālīgūla, that there never was a better slave, or a more detestable master (Tac. Ann. vi. 20).

C. Pāsīēnus Rūfus, C. Pāsīēni Rūfi, m. held the consulship at Rome, 4 B. C. C. Cālvisus Sābius was his colleague. He was a man of considerable merit, and gained triumphal honours in Africa (Vel. Pat. ii. 116).

Pātāra, m, f. v. Pātāra, orum, n. Palēra, a city of Lycia, a maritime district in the S. of Asia Minor, Natolia, at the mouth of the Xānthus, where Apōllo resided, and gave his oracles, six months every year. It was founded, according to Strābo, by Pātārus, from whom the name is derived, and appears from him to have been the capital of the country. Pōmpōnius Mēla says, the temple of Apōllo resembled that of Dēlphī, Castri, in riches and oracular celebrity. From this city he is called Pātāreus Apōllo (Hor. Od. iii. 4. 64). Pātāreūs, idis, f. of Pātāra, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine, Inh. Pātāreūs, ium, v. Pātārāni, orum, m. Adj. Pātāreus, a, um.

Pātāvium, i, n. Padua, a city in the north of Italy, built, according to Virgilius, by Antēnor, after the destruction of Troy (Æn. i. 247). It is situated in a fine plain on the Brenta, and surrounded with walls, strengthened by ramparts, and other works. It is of an oval form, about seven miles in circumference, and was a city of very considerable eminence, but for many years has been greatly on the decline. The streets are neither wide, well paved, nor clean. The university of Padua is the most celebrated of Italy, although of late years it has sunk in reputation very considerably. Līvius, the Roman historian, was a native of this city. Inh. Pātāvini, orum, m. Pātāvinus, āris, f. a provincial style, with which Pōllio charged Līvius (Quint. i. 5. 56). Adj. Pātāvinus, a, um. Pātāvinus ager, the territory of the Pātāvini. Pātāvinæ triticeæ. This cloth was so thick, that Mārtiālis says it could be cut with a saw, i. e. too thick for scissors, such as were used by the ancients (xiv. 143). Pātāvinī fontes (Plin. iv. 800).

Pāter Pātārus, Pātris Pātāri, m. one of the fētiāles q. v., chosen to conclude a treaty, and to take a solemn oath, in name of the Roman people. Not only did the Pāter Pātārus come under the obligation in the most solemn manner, that his countrymen would faithfully observe the conditions entered into, but imprecated the vengeance of the gods on the first violators of the agreement (Liv. i. 24).

Pātērus, i, m. a covetous man, on whom Mārtiālis writes an epigram (xii. 53). The readings here are various.

Pāthālia, m, f. et. Pātāla, orum, n. Tattānagar, a town in the delta of Indus, the Sind, whence it is called Pātālēnē (Curt. ix. 8).

Pātræ, arum, f. Patra by the Greeks, Balia Badra and Badradschik by the Turks, Patrasso by the Italians, and Patras by the English and French, a town of Achāia. It was anciently called Arōs, from its cultivation, and was erected by Eumēlus of Achāia. Afterwards Pātērus, son of Prēugēnes, surrounded it with walls, hence it was called Arōe Pātērens, and Pātræ. The modern town stands on a gentle eminence, within one mile of the sea, and three of Pānēhāichum, Mount Boidia. The streets are narrow and dirty, the houses built of earth dried in the sun, of which the eaves project so far as almost to meet, which excludes, in a very considerable degree, both air and light. It is the most commercial town in Greece, and the population amounts to about eight thousand. Of all the towns in the Moræa, Patras is the most unhealthy, except Corinth. Two miles from Patras is a famous cypress tree, twenty-three feet in circumference. Inh. Pātērens, ium, m. excelled, in ancient times, as slingers, surpassing the Bālēares, not only in throwing to a greater distance, but with surer aim, and with more powerful effect (Liv. xxvii. 29).

Pātērbas, m, m. a neighbour of Mārtiālis, who appears to have been a freedman of the emperor (ii. 32).

Pātērblius, i, m. a slave, to whom the emperor Nēro granted his freedom, and whom Gālba put to death. The head of the latter, fixed on a pole, the soldiers exposed to public view near the tomb of Pátrōbius. He appears to have acquired great riches (Tac. Hist. i. 49 seq.).

Pátrōcles, i. m. a native of Antígōnē, in conjunction with Didas q. v., commanded the royal horsemen, and picked men from the auxiliary troops which fought in the army of Persēus, king of Mācedōnia, in the battle near Securiūm, 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 58).

Pátrōclus, i. m. son of Mēnētus and Stihēnēla, a Grecian chief, and one of the suitors of Hēlēna. Apōllōdōrus gives different accounts of his genealogy. He was born at Opūs, to which Ovīdīus refers (Ep. Pont. i. 8. 73), and joined the Grecian army against Troy. He was the friend and companion of Achilles. When the latter retired to his ships, offended at the conduct of Agāmēmnon, the commander-in-chief, and refused to support his countrymen, Pátrōclus followed his example, on which victory declared for the Trojans. At the request of Nēstor, Pátrōclus again took the field, clad in the armour of his friend, the very sight of which intimidated the Trojans, who sought protection within their walls. After some time, Hēctor attacked Pátrōclus, when stripping a Trojan of his armour, after an obstinate contest deprived him of life, and took his arms. Achilles lamented his death with great bitterness, celebrated his funeral obsequies with the utmost magnificence, and immediately took up arms to avenge his death. The bravery of Achilles prevailed against the army of Priāmus, and his anger was only appeased when his rival, Hēctor, had fallen by his hand, and he had seen Troy in ashes. An island on the coast of Attica bears the name of Pátrōclus (Paus. i. 35). Mēnētīādes, a. m. a patronymic of Pátrōclus (Prop. ii. 1. 38). —2. A son of Hērōcles and Pyrippē (Apol. ii. 7). —3. A maker of closet-stools. Adj. Pátrōclānus, a. um. Pátrōclāna sēlla, a stool of Pátrōclus, i. e. such as Pátrōclus made (Mart. xii. 78).

Pátrōn, ōnis, m. a native of Tēgēa, a town of Arcādia, and one of the competitors for the prize in the foot-race (Virg. Ān. v. 298). —2. The commander of the Grecian soldiers under Dārius (Curt. v. 9).

Pátrōnus, i. m. a protector, defender, or patron. In the Roman state, each of the commons chose one of the patricians, whom he was bound to serve with his life and fortune; and, in return, it was the duty of the patron to assist this dependant, or client, as he was called, by his advice, his influence, and his wealth. The former lay under the obligations of a parent, and, when faithful, took the same interest in the latter, and performed the same duties as he would have done to his own child. The greater the number of clients, the more honourable. The closeness of the connexion between patron and client prevented their arraigning, or appearing as witnesses against each other; and violation of this custom would have exposed to the loss of life, since they were held victims devoted to the infernal gods, and any one had liberty to put them to death without risk of punishment. For upwards of six centuries these two classes strove to surpass each other in fulfilment of their respective duties, and no quarrel or contention existed amongst them. When the client was summoned before a judge, the patron appeared and pleaded his cause. Advōcātus was a friend (ad aux vocātus), who assisted in giving his opinion, sat beside the client, with whom he entered the court; but the defendant did not speak, that was the business of the patron. Sine advōcātis, sine patrōnis, ipse pro me dicere cogor (Liv. xl. 15).

Pātūclū, i. m. a name of Jānus, during war, when his doors were open, as Clūsius was in time of peace (Ov. Fast. i. 129).

Pātūclūs, i. m. a Roman knight, the whole of whose large possessions the emperor Tiberius gave up to M. Sērvilius, upon legal grounds, although a considerable part had been left to himself (Tac. Ann. ii. 48).

Patūmus, i. f. a town of Arābia, on the Red Sea, at which the canal of Dārius entered that gulf (Herod. ii. 158).

Paulinus, i. m. a man, to whom Mārtiālls addresses an epigram on Sēllus, a parasite (ii. 14). That poet has another epigram addressed to a man of the same name, alleging, that if he continued his present practice, his name, instead of Paulinus, would be Pāllinūrus; a play on the derivation of the latter word (Mart. iii. 78).

Paula, a. f. a woman of infamous character (Mart. i. 75 &c.).

Paulus, i. m. a man, ambitious to be thought a poet, who bought verses, and recited them as his own. This name frequently occurs in the verses of Mārtiālls, and probably the poet had different characters in view (Mart. ii. 20).

Paulus Fābius Māximus, Pauli Fābii Māximi, m. was consul, with Q. Ælius Tūbēro, in 13 B. C. From the way in which Hōrātius introduces his name, it is probable he was distinguished for personal accomplishments and prepossessing manners (Od. iv. 1. 10). Some have conjectured, that he was the son of Q. Fābius Māximus, whom C. Jūlius Cēsar appointed consul, for the last three months of the year, with C. Trēbōnius; but this rests on conjecture, rather than on historical evidence.

Paulus Fābius Pērsicus, Pauli Fābii Pērsici, m. a Roman consul, the colleague of L. Vitellius. According to Tacitus, the phoenix appeared in Egypt during their consulship, in the year 34 (Tac. Ann. vi. 28).

Paulus, i. m. a native of Tārsus, Tarsus, whose original name was Saul, was first a violent persecutor of the Christians, and, after his miraculous conversion, an able, intrepid, faithful, and successful preacher of the Faith which he once destroyed. His life will be best learned by diligently perusing the "Acts of the Apostles," and those Epistles, of which he is the author. His writings cannot be too often read, or his precepts too carefully observed. To them the reader is referred, with fervent wishes that they may be blessed to his everlasting happiness.

Pausānias, a. m. a king of Lācedæmon, the founder of Byzāntium, Constantinople (Just. ix. 1). —2. Son of Cleōmbrōtus, a Lacedæmonian general, of great talent, who obtained a decisive victory, at Platæa, over the Persians, under Mārdōniūs, for which his countrymen bestowed upon him the tenth part of the plunder taken from the enemy. His vanity, which he displayed on a golden tripod, presented to the oracle at Delphi, Castri, displeased his countrymen, and they changed the inscription, which recorded the merits of Pausanias only, to a simple enumeration of those states by whose assistance the Persians had been defeated. The success of Pausanias in a fleet, of which he had received the command, after the battle of Plataea, first at Cyprus, and afterwards in Heliöspontus, the Dardanelles, raised his spirits to a still higher degree than had been done by the victory already-mentioned, and he acted, not only with greater haughtiness, but with greater ambition. He aspired at being son-in-law to Xerxes, king of Persia, and promised, on obtaining his wish, to reduce the whole of Greece under the dominion of that monarch. Transported at the idea of reigning over the Greeks, the only nation who had resisted the power of his arms, Xerxes promised him not only his daughter in marriage, but assured him, that on the subjection of the Greeks, he would receive no refusal from him. The incautious measures, adopted by Pausanias for accomplishing his design, exposed him to the suspicion of his countrymen, who recalled him from the army, and tried him for his life; but although acquitted of the capital charge, they fined him in a sum of money, and did not restore his commission. He, of his own accord, returned to the army, where he disclosed his intentions, with an inconsideration bordering on madness. Of this conduct the necessary consequence was a second trial, which terminated in an acquittal, still a suspicion of his guilt remained, which the ingenuity of the Ephöri completely proved, by means of Argilus. His life atoned for this act of treason. Thus, says Cornélius Nepos, Pausanias tarnished his great renown in war, by a disgraceful death. The patriotism of the Lacedæmonians, at that period, may be estimated by the conduct of the mother of Pausanias. On being informed, that her son had conspired against the liberties of his country, and that he had fled to Chalcidæus, a temple of Minerva, she, although of a very great age, was amongst the first who brought a stone to shut up the entrance, in order to prevent his escape (Cor. Nep. vit. Pans.).—3. A noble youth of Mæcædonia, whom Attalus had violated, and the king, Philippus, refused him redress. On the contrary, he bestowed particular honour on Attalus, which induced Pausanias to take revenge on his unjust judge, whom he killed at the marriage of his daughter, Clæopatra, with Alexander, king of Epirus. According to some authors, he was prompted by Olympias, and that not without the knowledge of Alexander the Great. His life atoned for this rash act, and Olympias burned his body upon the remains of her husband (Just. ix. 6, 7).—4. A prætor of the Epiröta, through whom Philippus expected to procure a treaty of peace with the Romans, in 200 B. C. That monarch had a conference with the consul, T. Quinctius Flamininus, on the banks of Acus, but it was not attended with the effect which Pausanias expected might be produced (Liv. xxxii. 10).—5. The highest magistrate among the Phæaci, in 193 B. C. In an interview with Philippus, king of Mæcædonia, he showed courage and patriotism, but the king treated his remonstrances with disdain, which induced the Phæaci to persevere in their resistance, unfortunately without success (Liv. xxxvi. 9).

Pausias, m. a painter of Sicily, Basilico, who made several improvements in that art (Plin. iv. 106).—Ant. Pausiæus, a. um. Pausiæica tabella, a picture drawn by Pausias (Hor. Sat. ii. 7. 95).

Pausilypum, i. m. (which had this name from the Greeks, denoting a cessation from pain or grief) Pausilypo, a mountain of Campania, Campagna, near Naples, covered with trees, and studded with villas. It is one of the most delightful places of that beautiful coast, and has obtained great celebrity, from containing, according to general belief, the ashes of Virgilius. Near it stood a villa, Pausilypum, at which were imperial fish ponds, and in these, if we may credit the testimony of Plinius, some fishes lived upwards of sixty years (Plin. ii. 358).

Pausimachus, i. m. a Rhodian, who commanded the fleet sent by his countrymen to aid the Romans, in the war against Antiochus Magnus, and fell in battle with the Rhodian Polyxénidas, who fought on the side of Antiochus (Ap. Bel. Syr. 101).

Pausippus, i. m. a noble Spartan, who embraced the interest of Darius, as did also Onomastorides, Monimus, and Cælicrætes (Curt. iii. 13). Appianus names them differently.

Pausistratus, i. m. a prætor of the Rhödi, who distinguished himself by his bravery and military skill. He defeated Dinocrates, who commanded the Macedonian forces, and recovered Pærea, after which he joined C. Livius Salinator q. r., in the Archipelago, with twenty-five decked ships. At last Polyxénidas, his implacable enemy, laid a plan for his destruction, by pretending that he would deliver up the fleet of Antiochus, king of Syria, then under his command, and Pausistratus, confiding in his integrity, acted so incautiously, that he afforded an opportunity of attacking him with advantage, in which he lost his life, and almost the whole of the fleet was either taken or destroyed, in 192 B. C. The Rhodians deservedly held him in high estimation. His successor, Eudæmus, was, as much his inferior in warlike qualifications, as he was his superior in caution (Liv. xxxviii. 18 seq.).

Pæxæ, w. f. the wife of Pömpönius Læbæ, who had been governor of Mysia. To escape the hand of the executioner, he opened his own veins, and his wife followed his example (Tac. Ann. vi. 29).

Pæxus, i. f. Pæzo, an island to the south of Corcyra, Corfu, eighteen miles in circumference. Its population is about 4000, although there is not a single spring of fresh water in it, the only one is brackish. This necessary article of life is procured either from the continent, or Corfu.

Pædeus, i. m. an illegitimate son of Antenor, educated by Thæon, and killed by Mæges (Hom. Il. v. 69).

Pædanius Cösta, m. a man who had taken an active part against Néro, on which account he was put out of the nomination for the consulship, in the year 69, although that did not form the ostensible reason (Tac. Hist. ii. 71).

Pædanius Scæundus, m. murdered by one of his own slaves, in the year 61, and, according to ancient usage, after long discussion in the senate, the whole of his slaves suffered capital punishment. Tacitus has recorded the debate (Ann. xiv. 42-44).

T. Pēdānūs, T. Pēdānū, m. the first centurion of the third legion, whose bravery contributed greatly to the taking of Hannō's camp, in 214 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 14).

Pēdāsa, orum, f. Pēdāsūm, i, n. a town of Cāria (Liv. xxxiii. 30). Inf. Pēdāsēnses, ium, m. (Herod. vi. 20). Adj. Pēdāsēnsis, is, e.

Pēdāsūs, i, m. son of Būcōllōn and Abār-hārēa, twin-brother of Eēsēpus, killed by Eurýālus (Hom. II. vi. 21).

Pēdāsūs, i, f. one of the cities on the sea-coast of Mēssēnia, remarkable for its rivers, which, with other gifts, Agāmēmnōn promised to Achīllēs, if he returned to the Trojan war (Hom. II. vi. 35 seq.). There were several other towns of this name.

Pēdānūs, i, m. a fictitious name, introduced by Silius Itālicus, under which he has drawn the character of his friend Q. Ascōnūs Pēdānūs q. v. (xii. 212).

Pēdīcūllī, orum, m. a people in the vicinity of Brūndisium, Brindisi (Just. xii. 2).

Pēdīus Blasus, Pēdīi Blasī, m. a Roman, whom the Cyrenians accused in the reign of Nēro, of having plundered the temple of Esculāpius, of which crime having been found guilty, the senate expelled him. In the year 69, he was restored to his rank (Tac. Hist. i. 77). To this impeachment Pērsius alludes, Accusator ait Pēdio, es fur; quid Pēdīus? (Sat. i. 85).

Q. Pēdīus, Q. Pēdīi, m. a grandson of a sister of Jūlius Cēsār, was one of his lieutenant-generals in the Gallic war, and appointed in his will co-heir with Octāviūs, who had Pēdīus for his colleague in his first consulship, 45 B. C. He passed a law, from him called Lex Pēdia, declaring the death of C. Jūlius Cēsār to have been murder, and subjecting the assassins to capital punishment (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 83). Adj. Pēdīus, a, um.

Q. Pēdīus Pōplicōla, Q. Pēdīi Pōplicōlāe, m. an eminent orator, mentioned by Hōrātīus, whom some suppose to be the man to whom C. Jūlius Cēsār left the fourth part of his estate; but others think he was the son of that man. The latter is the opinion of Dacier (Hor. Sat. i. 10. 28).

Pēdō, ōnis, m. a lawyer, who, in order to procure clients, lived in greater splendour than his income supported, and thus ruined himself (Juv. Sat. vii. 129).—2. A præfect of the cavalry under Gērmānicus, in the year 15 (Tac. Ann. i. 60).

C. Pēdō Albīnōvānus, C. Pēdōnis Albīnōvāni, m. a Latin poet, contemporary with Ovidius, who wrote an elegy to Līvīa on the death of Drūsus, which some improperly attributed to Ovidius. He also wrote an elegy on the death of C. Mēcēnas, to which Mārtiālis alludes (ii. 77). A fragment of his poem on the navigation of Drūsus Gērmānicus, in the northern ocean, has been transmitted. Quintiliānus says Pēdō is not unworthy of being read (x. I. 90), and Ovidius calls him Siderēus, from the sublimity of his style, or perhaps from his writing on astro-nomy. The latter claims no further notice, than what is due to conjecture, for no ancient author mentions his writing on the stars (Ep.

Pont. iv. 15. 6). He appears to have meditated a poem on the exploits of Thēsēus, but the passage does not bear that he actually wrote it (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 10. 71 seq.).

Sextus Pedureus, Sexti Pedurei, m. an intimate friend of T. Pōmponius Atticus, for whom and his son-in-law M. Vipanius Agrippa, and L. Cōrnēlius Bālbās, that noble Roman sent, after he had formed a resolution of terminating his life by fasting. If the person of this name mentioned in different parts of the writings of Cicero, he was of senatorian dignity, had been prætor of Sicily, and was a man of great integrity. He does not appear to have acted any important part in the Roman government at that turbulent period, when luxury had destroyed the morals, and ambition, the liberties, of the Romans (Cor. Nep. Att. 21).

Pēdum, i, n. a town of Lātium, taken by Cōrīolānus, and given to the Volsi, in 491 B. C. (Liv. ii. 391). Inf. Pēdānī, orum, m. admitted citizens of Rome in 337 B. C. (Liv. viii. 14). Adj. Pēdānus, a, um. Pēdīna rēglo (Hor. Ep. i. 4. 2).

Pēgāsūs, i, m. the son of a commander of a ship with three banks of oars, whence some have derived his name. He possessed great knowledge of the civil law, uncommon learning, was governor of many provinces, and afterwards prætor of Rome by the appointment of Vespāsianus. On all occasions he appears to have discharged every office with strict integrity, and the decisions of this upright magistrate gave universal satisfaction. Adj. Pēgāsianus, a, um. Pēgāsianum jūis, from his being a profound lawyer (Juv. Sat. iv. 77).

Pēgāsūs, i, m. a winged horse, which, like his brother Chrysāor, sprung from the blood of the Gorgon Mēdūsa, at the time Pērsēus severed her head from her body when asleep; hence he is called Mēdūsaur, v. Gōrgōnēus. On seeing the light, he immediately flew to Mount Hēlicon, Zagara, on which, by a stroke of his foot, he produced the fountain Hippocrēnē, which was sacred to the Muses. On this mountain Pēgāsūs continued to live, until he was given by Mīnērva to Bellerōphon who mounted him, attacked, and conquered the Chīmæra. This remarkable horse afterwards threw his rider, either on account of his being only a mortal, or in consequence of having been stung by an insect sent by Jūpiter, because he attempted to rise to heaven. But Pēgāsūs continued his flight till he reached the stars, where he was changed into a constellation, but retained his name. During his residence on Hēlicon, Zagara, he was a favourite of the Muses; hence Pēgāsīs, Idos, f. a muse. Pēgāsides undæ, the waters of Hippocrēnē (Ov. Trist. iii. 7. 15). Mārtiālis uses Pēgāsīs undæ in the same sense (ix. 59). Adj. Pēgāsēus, e. Pēgāsēus, a, um. Pēgāsēum mēlos (Pers. Prol. 14).

Pēgāsūs, i, m. a ship captured by the Romans in an engagement with the Carthaginians, off the coast of Sicily, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 576).

Pēlāgia, æ, f. an ancient name of Rhōdus q. v. (Amm. Mar. xvii. 7).

Pēlāgo, ōnis, m. an eunuch, whom the emperor Nēro set over the ruffians, appointed to murder Rūbēllius Plautus (Tac. Ann. xiv. 59).

Pēlāgon, ōnis, m. one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar (Ov. Met. viii. 360).—2. The favourite attendant of Sarpëdon, who extracted the spear thrown by Tlepölemus, which had nearly cost him his life (Hom. Il. v. 695).—3. One of the Pylian chiefs who fought under Nestor at Troy (Hom. Il. v. 295).

Pelägonia, a. f. a district in the northern part of Mäcedönia, which had its name from the chief city, first mentioned by Livius, when Philippus, king of that country, marched to it, in 213 B. C. At that time it does not appear to have been a part of his kingdom (Liv. xxvi. 25). Inh. Pelägonēs, um, m. who, with the Eördæi, and Lyncæstæ, inhabited the fourth district of Mäcedönia, after that kingdom had become a Roman province. Atintänia, Stymphälis and Eliniötis were joined to them. The dispositions of the inhabitants of this tract were, like itself, cold, rough, and of difficult culture (Liv. xlv. 30).

Peläsgi, orum, m. an ancient people of Argölis, in Pelöpponnēsus, the Morea, between Sinus Särönicus, the Gulf of Egina, and Sinus Argölicus, the Gulf of Napoli, who seem afterwards to have settled in other parts not only of Greece, but also in several of the Grecian islands. In Italy they lived first with the Aböriqines. They had come from Hamönia, afterwards Thessälia, Thessaly (Dion. Hal. ii. 1). Their country was called Pelägia, a. f. a name frequently given to Greece in general; as Pelägi, orum, is a common appellation of the Greeks. According to Justinus, Pelägi was the original name of the Macedonians (vii. 1). Peläsgias, lädis, et Peläsgis, lädis, f. a Grecian woman, applied also to a noun feminine. Peläsglades urbes, Grecian cities (Ov. Ep. Her. ix. 3). Peläsgis Säpphö (Ov. Ep. Her. xv. 217). Adj. Peläsgus, et Peläsgicus, a, um, of the Peläsgi, Grecian. Peläsga clässis (Ov. Met. xiii. 268).

Pelätes, is, m. a Lybian, whose right hand Cörythus, at the nuptial feast of Përsëus, fixed to the door-post, whilst he attempted to tear part of it away, and in that position was killed by Abas (Ov. Met. v. 124).

Pelägonus, i. e. Pelägon, önis, m. a king of Peönia, and father of Astëropæus q. v. (Just. vii. 1. Hom. Il. xxi. 141).

Peläthronium, i. n. Mahriarachi, a town of Thessälia, Thessaly, at which Scrvius says the breaking of horses was first invented, but Titinius states, that Peläthronius was the inventor of trappings (ii. 100). It is probable Peläthronius was the king of the Läpithæ, and builder of this city. Some writers say, that he is the same with Chiron. Adj. Peläthronius, a, um, of Peläthronium, of the Läpithæ, of Thessaly. Peläthronius Erögäpüs, Erögäpüs, one of the Läpithæ (Ov. Met. xii. 452). Peläthronia plnus, a Thessalian spear (Stat. Th. ii. 598).

Peläus, cos, v. ei, m. a king of Thessaly, son of Eäcus and Endëis. Being privy to the murder of his brother Phöcus, to which Ulysses alludes (Ov. Met. xiii. 149), he was under the necessity of leaving his country to preserve his life. Ovidius says he went to the court of Cëyx, king of Trächin, v. Trächis; but the more generally received opinion is, that he fled to Eurätus, king of Phthia, by whom he was purified of the murder, according to ancient usage. After a variety of adventures, he married Thëtis, the goddess of the sea, by whom he had Achilles. At the celebration of his nuptials, all the gods and goddesses were present, except the goddess of discord, who, exasperated at not being invited, threw into the assembly a golden apple with this inscription, Detur pulchriori.

At first, all the heathen deities asserted their right to the apple; but afterwards it was only claimed by Jüno, Minërva, and Vënus. These three agreed to refer the matter to Jüpiter, and promised to abide by his judgment. But the sovereign of Ölympus, conscious that it could not justly be given to Jüno, and dreading the effects of her anger, if mortified by the preference of either of the other two, advised them to plead their cause before Päriss, a son of Prämus, king of Troy, who was then a shepherd on Mount Ida. The decision of Päriss in favour of Vënus, provoked the hatred of the other two, both against him and the Trojan nation. The consequence of their enmity was the memorable war of Troy, which terminated in the destruction of that city, and produced effects fatal to many of the Grecian states. Of the bravery and martial glory of Achilles, Peläus used frequently to boast; but he was rendered so miserable by the premature death of the hero, that Thëtis, to alleviate his poignant grief, conferred immortality upon her husband, and ordered him to retire to the island of Lëucë, where he would have the pleasure of conversing with the Manes of his son. He was one of the Argonauts, and Valërius Fläccus has given a lively description of his marriage, and also introduces him taking a tender farewell of Achilles, before he went on that expedition (i. 131 seq.). Peläus pænë dätum Tärtäro, that Peläus was almost given to Tärtärus, i. e. was nearly put to death, through the false accusation of Hippölytë, wife of Acästus, king of Mägnësia, with whose unlawful desire he had refused to comply (Hor. Od. iii. 7. 17).

Pelides, a, m. Achilles, the son of Peläus, Grävis stomächus Pelides, the terrible wrath of Achilles (Hor. Od. i. 6. 6). Pelides Nöptölëmus, Nöptölëmus, grandson of Peläus (Virg. Æn. ii. 263). Pelas, lädis, f. of Achilles, relating to a female, or to a noun feminine. Adj. Peläus, a, um. Peläia facta, the deeds of Achilles (Sil. Ital. xiii. 806). Peläus hëros, Achilles (Stat. Ach. i. 561).

Pelläs, a, m. a son of Neptünus and Tyrö, and twin-brother of Nölëus, whom their mother exposed, to conceal her disgrace. A horse-herd found the infants, brought them up, and named one of them Pelläs, because the hoof of a horse had discoloured a part of his face. These brothers lived on the most discordant terms, and Nölëus, after being expelled from the kingdom, removed to Mëssënia, where he built Pylös, Navarino; but Pelläs inhabited Thessäly, where he married Anaxibia, daughter of Bias, or, according to others, Philömächë, daughter of Amphion, by whom he had one son Acästus, and four daughters, Pisiäcë, Pelöpcä, Hippöthöu, and Alcëstis. Admëtus, king of Phëris, asked in marriage Alcëstis, when Apöllö was the servant of that monarch, and Pelläs, as a condition, demanded from him a chariot drawn by a lion and a bear, which, by the assistance of Apöllö, he accomplished, presented to Pelläs, and received his daughter.

After the death of Crēthēus, Pēlias reigned at Iōlcōs, where an oracular response of Apōllo, respecting his successor, put him on his guard against a man whom he should see with a shoe only on one foot. The arrival of Iāson explained to him that answer, which he did not previously understand, and he asked that hero what he should do, since Apōllo had forewarned him, that he should lose his life by a citizen. Iāson replied, that he should send him to Cōlchis for the golden fleece, on which Pēlias instantly commanded him to do that very thing. This circumstance, perhaps, originated in the anger of Jūno, whom Pēlias despised, in order that Mēdēa might accomplish his death. Iāson returned, contrary to the expectation of Pēlias, and gave him the golden fleece; but not before he had caused the death of the parents of that hero, and murdered his only brother. At the advice of her husband, Mēdēa soon deprived Pēlias of life, by persuading his daughters Astērōpēa and Antinōē to cut him in pieces, and throw his flesh into a chaldron, pretending, that she would restore him in the bloom of youth. The art and cunning, by which Mēdēa ingratiated herself into the family and favour of Pēlias, the means by which she obtained their confidence, and the manner in which she executed her scheme, Ovidius has beautifully narrated (Met. vii. 296—349). Gēner Pēlia, Admētus (Ov. Trist. ii. 403). Trēmūlas Pēlias, alluding to his great age (Mart. vi. 71). Pēliades, dum (Sing. Pēlias, ādis), f. the daughters of Pēlias (Phaed. iv. 6).—2. A Trojan, whom Ulysses wounded, and who attended Æneas in the night Troy was burned (Virg. Æn. ii. 435).

Pēlignī, orum (Sing. Pēlignus, i), m. the Pelignians, a people of Itālia, Italy, whose country lay between the sources of Sāgrus, the Sangro, and Atērnus, the Pescara, both of which fall into the Gulf of Venice. They pretended to have had a knowledge of future events, and many of them avowed their skill in sorcery and witchcraft. Nāsonē Pēlignī sonant, the Pelignians boast of Ovidius (Mart. i. 62). Pēlignus non spernet me (Mart. viii. 73). Adj. Pēlignus, a, um. Pēligna anūs, Pelignian witches (Hor. Epod. xviii. 8). Pēligna frigōra, Pelignian colds, i.e. excessive cold (Hor. Od. iii. 19. 8). Pēlignus pōctas, Ovidius (Mart. ii. 41).

Pēlīnna, æ, f. et, Pēlīnnaeum, i, n. a city of Thēssālīa (Pin. Pyth. x. 7).—2. A mountain in Chios.

Pēlīon, i, n. et, Pēlīos, i, m. Plesnid, or St. George, a mountain of Thessaly, the higher regions of which are covered with pine forests of great extent. The hollows or ravines, and the lower tracts produce oaks, chestnuts, beeches, &c., some of which are of uncommon size. It is adorned with twenty-four large and wealthy villages, of which Bolo, Portaria, Makrinitza and Agios Giorgios ought rather to be called cities. It unites with Ossa, which terminates at the vale of Tēmpē. Pēlīon, Ossa, and Olympos form the eastern boundary of the valley of Tēmpē, Lycostōmos, and are only different eminences of the same range. The giants, in the war which was carried on against the gods, placed Ossa on Olympos, and Pēlīon above Ossa (Hom. Od. xi. 314), in order that they might scale the heavens. But Jūpiter darted his thunderbolts against Ossa, which removed it to its former place. Lūcānus makes Hēracles remove Ossa from Pēlīon (vi. 348). Hērōdōtus informs us, that Iāson built the ship Argō at the foot of this mountain, with wood which had grown on it (iv. 179); hence Pēlias Arbor, the Argō. It cannot be doubted, that he meant Pēlīas, the port of Phēra, of which no ruins remain, in modern times, to ascertain its exact position. Pēlias, ādis, f. of Pēlīon, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Pēlias hasta, the spear of Achilles, from the shaft having grown on Mount Pēlīon (Ov. Met. xiii. 109), and cut by Chiron, on the top of Pēlīon (Hom. Il. xvi. 140). Adj. Pēlīas, et, Pēlīaeus, a, um. Pēlīum nēmus (Phaed. iv. 6). Pēlīaea orni (Val. Flacc. i. 406). Pēlīaea cuspis, the spear of Achilles (Ov. Met. xii. 74).

Pēlūm, i, n. Florina, a city of the Dēssārētī, which the Roman consul took in 292 B. C., carrying off the slaves, and giving up the city to the freemen. He placed a strong garrison in it, as it was convenient for making inroads into Mācēdōnīa (Liv. xxxi. 40).

Pēlla, æ, f. Pēllē, es, f. Palatisa, called, by the inhabitants of Salōnīca, Arachē, the capital of Mācēdōnīa, which stood near Axius, the Vardari, about twelve miles from the place where it falls into Sinus Thērmāicus, the Gulf of Salōnica. It is situated in a marshy district. According to Strābo and Pōmpōnīus Mēla, Philippus, and his son, Alexander the Great, were natives of this city. From the time in which the former assumed the reins of government, Pēlla became the royal residence, and surpassed, in greatness and splendour, all the other cities of Mācēdōnīa. Its situation and local advantages Livius has shortly stated, in consequence of Paulus Emilius, the consul, having added that country to the Roman empire (xlv. 46). The Ptolemies of Egypt were supposed to have been originally from Mācēdōnīa, on which account the adjective is frequently applied to them, as well as to Philippus and Alexander. Inh. Pēllaei, v. Pēllēni, orum, m. Adj. Pēllaeus, a, um. Macedonian, also of Egypt, Egyptian. Pēllaeus Cānōpus, Macedonian Cānōpus (Virg. G. iv. 287). Pēllaeus juvēnis, Alexander the Great (Juv. Sat. x. 168). Pēllaea sceptrā Pēllēmai (Sil. Ital. xi. 381). Pēllaea gūla, the throat of the Alexandrians (Mart. xiii. 85).—2. A city of Achāia, which appears to have been also called Pēllēnē (Val. Flacc. i. 365).

Pēllēnē, es, f. a town of Achāia, which stood on a hill now called Zugrā (Liv. xxxiii. 15). Inh. Pēllēnēnses, ium (Liv. xxxiv. 29), v. Pēllēnēi, orum (Plin. i. 413), m. Adj. Pēllēnēnsis, is, e. Pēllēnēnsis ager, the territory of Pēllēnē (Liv. xxxiii. 14).

Pēllīnaeum, i, n. a town of Thessaly, taken possession of by Amynānder, king of the Athāmānes, when he had joined Antiochus, king of Sýria, in 193 B. C. It was re-taken the same year by the Roman propætor, M. Bæbius Tāmphilus, who besieged it for some time, but on the arrival of the consul Manlius Acilius Glābrio, it surrendered, although defended by Philippus of Mēgālōpōlis, with five hundred foot, and forty horse (Liv. xxxvi. 10—14).

Pēllīci, orum, m. a people of Sārdīnīa, whose capital was Cōrnus, Corneto (Liv. xxiii. 40).

Pēlōpēa, æ, f. daughter of Thēstēs, who bare to her father a son, that received the name of Ægisthus, because, after his mother exposed the infant, shepherds found him and gave him to be suckled by a she-goat (αἴε, αἴγας). According to some authors, Pēlōpēa sustained that injury, without either party knowing their relationship; but the statement of Hēgēnus bears, that it was with the knowledge of Thēstēs, and that an oracle had informed him, that his son by his daughter Pēlōpēa would avenge his wrongs on his brother, a prediction which Ægisthus actually fulfilled.—2. A tragedy, written on the story of Pēlōpēa, perhaps sold or presented to Pāris, the favourite of the emperor Dōmītiānus, for which he made the author a prefect (Juv. Sat. vii. 92).

Pēlōpīdas, æ, m. son of Hippōclus, a Theban, applied his paternal inheritance to the relief of the necessitous, which secured to him the affections of his countrymen, who gratefully received tokens of his liberality and munificence. With Epāminōndas, he lived on the terms of the strictest friendship, but he could never prevail on him to accept any present, on which account he imitated the poverty of his friend in simplicity of dress, and plainness of diet. Their pursuits and amusements were of different kinds, Pēlōpīdas exercised his body, Epāminōndas his mind; Pēlōpīdas wrestled and hunted, Epāminōndas read and studied. Their friendship commenced in the campaign at Māntīnēa, Miltus, where the latter saved the life of the former, at the imminent risk of his own. When Phœbidās, a Lacedæmonian, took Cadmēa, the citadel of Thēbes, Pēlōpīdas and many of the noblemen fled, on which sentence of banishment was pronounced against them; but Epāminōndas remained unsuspected by the conquerors, on account of his poverty and love of philosophy, and constantly animated the youth to expel the invaders. A plan was afterwards formed for the recovery of Thēbes, at the head of which was Pēlōpīdas, Mēlon, Dēmōclides, Thēōpōmpus, and other eight, who, habited as hunters, entered the city in the twilight. Of this stratagem notice had been sent to the Lacedæmonian rulers, whose conduct had been most tyrannical; but Archias, the chief, being drunk, threw down the letter without reading it saying "business to-morrow." This saved the lives of the valiant patriots, who otherwise would most probably have fallen a sacrifice to the rashness of their valour. The exiles soon overpowered the most distinguished of their enemies, encouraged their countrymen to take up arms, and adopted measures which ultimately led to the victory at Lēuctra, Leftia. After this memorable battle, which secured the liberty of the Boeotians, Epāminōndas and Pēlōpīdas were appointed joint commanders, carried their arms into Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, where their achievements astonished the other Greeks, and brought over to the Theban interest, several of the Peloponnesian states. To crush the tyranny of the Lacedæmonians, and to exalt the character of the Boeotians, not for their own aggrandizement, they retained the command some time longer than the law allowed, which served as a ground of accusation, and this excess of zeal for the public good was eagerly seized, by those who envied their merit and fame, as a pretext for bringing them to trial. Pēlōpīdas was first arraigned, and after his acquittal, Epāminōndas was in less danger. The latter bore the malevolence and misrepresentation of their enemies, with wonderful patience, but the former, naturally of a warm temper, prevailed on the people to punish Mēnēclides, their accuser and slanderer, by subjecting him to a heavy fine. Pēlōpīdas next, at the solicitation of the Thessalians, went against Alexander, king of Phēra, a monster of barbarity, whom he attempted to soften and humanize, but without effect. He afterwards advanced into Mācēdōnīa whence he brought hostages to Thēbae, among whom was Philīppus, brother of Alexander, king of Mācēdōnīa, and, at a future period, the conqueror of Greece. The very terror of his name induced Ptolēmaeus, an illegitimate son of the late king, to agree to the terms which he proposed, and give his own son Philōxēnus, and fifty of his companions, as hostages, whom Pēlōpīdas sent to Thēbae. He incautiously fell into the hands of Alexander, king of Phēra, who treated him with great cruelty, and whose arrogance increased, by the want of skill and success in the Theban commander sent against him to recover the noble prisoner. At last, the troops were put under Epāminōndas, who soon subdued the savage, and procured the liberty of his friend. In a subsequent engagement with the same king, Pēlōpīdas, having in vain challenged him to single combat, and being transported with rage at the sight of the monster, rushed forward on him amidst a shower of javelins, by one of which he was transfixed, and fell lifeless to the ground, about 364 B. C. It will scarcely be denied, that he threw away his life without any necessity, or any sort of discretion, and that, too, when the times required such a man, and such a general. A deep silence prevailed among the troops as soon as they heard of his death. The highest honours were paid to his memory, and the Thessalians, for whose deliverance from tyrannical government, the Boeotians had taken up arms, begged permission of his countrymen to wash, adorn, and inter his dead body, which the latter granted (Cor. Nep. Pelop. Just. vi. 9).—2. An ambassador, sent to Rome by Mithridātes (Ap. Bel. Mith. 177).

Pēlōpōnnēsus, i. f. the Morea, a peninsula connected with the continent of Greece by the Isthmus Cōrīnthīācus, Hezumi. Its greatest length is about 120 miles, and its greatest breadth is nearly the same. The superficial extent of this once celebrated peninsula, may be estimated at 6,480 miles. In ancient times, it was divided into six districts, Argōlis, Lācōnīa, Mēsēnīa, Elis, Achāia, and Arcādīa. Plinius informs us, that its ancient name was Apīa, and Pēlūsgīa. When that country, or a considerable part of it, fell under the dominion of Pēlōps, son of Tāntālus, it received the name of Pēlōpōnnēsus, i. e. the island, or, peninsula of Pēlōps, which the author above-mentioned says, in celebrity ought not to be placed after any country, and adds that it resembles in form, the leaf of the plane tree, in which he agrees with Strābo, and Pōmpōnīus Mēla. In modern times, Pēlōpōnnēsus is called the Morea, from its supposed resemblance to the leaf of the mulberry tree. Its greatest length from *Mäläa prömöntörüm, Cape Mallo, to Rhium, Feno, in Achäla, is about one hundred and sixty-five Roman miles. In ancient times it was possessed by a number of states, or, in the language of Hērōdōtus, was inhabited by seven different nations, Arcadians, Cynurians, Achæans, Dorians, Ætolians, Dryopians, and Lemnians, and divided into the districts of Lācōnia, Mēssēnia, Elis, Achäla, Argōlis, and Arcädia. According to Pausanias, it was originally separated into five districts, of which the Arcadians, and Elians inhabited one; the Achæans another; and the Dorians, the remaining three (v. 1). Each of these included the territory of more than one separate people, some of them of many, who too frequently took up arms against each other. Their jarring interests naturally produced contentions which prevented their almost ever uniting, even to repel the aggressions of a foreign invader. An artful politician found little difficulty in persuading them to make war on the neighbouring state, which thus weakened their strength by diminishing their numbers. The two distinguished clans in ancient times, were the gens Æöllea, and gens Dōrica, each of whom spoke a dialect peculiar to themselves; the other inhabitants of this peninsula used a mixture of the two. When Sträbo wrote, the dialect of one city did not agree with that of any other. The history of Phīlippus, king of Mäcēdōnia, and the Peloponnesian war, of which Thucydides has written so excellent a history, and the pages of Līvius, will afford much information respecting these proud but petty states. Population about four hundred thousand. In modern times, bears are seldom seen in the Morea, formerly they were numerous in Arcädia. Pēlōpōnnēsus ipsa (Cic. Att. xix. 12). Pātūla ora Pēlōpōnnēsē (Manil. iv. 10). Inh. Pēlōpōnnēsē, arum, et, Pēlōpōnnēsēs, ium, m. Adj. Pēlōpōnnēsēlus, et, Pēlōpōnnēsēlācus, a, um. Pēlōpōnnēsēia civitātes (Cic. Att. vi. 2). Pēlōpōnnēsēlus litus (Plin. i. 249). Pēlōpōnnēsēlācum bēllum (Plin. iv. 66).*

Pēlōps, ōpis, m. was the son of Tāntālus, king of Phrygia, and Euryanassa, v. Euprytonē, v. Eurystemista, or of Diōnē. According to Tāctus, he was a native of Sārdes, Sart (Ann. iv. 55). On being expelled by Tros, king of Troy, he went over to Greece, and settled in Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea. When a boy, he was killed by his father, and served up to the gods, on purpose to try their divinity. Shocked at his cruelty, none of them would taste that dish, except Cēres, whom grief, for the loss of her daughter, rendered inattentive. Jupiter restored Pēlōps to life, and put ivory in place of the shoulder eaten by Cēres, hence Ovidius has Ebūrnus Tāntālidēs (Ov. Trist. ii. 385), and Virgilius, Pēlōps insignis ebūrnō hūmēro (G. iii. 7); which is said to have cured all kinds of diseases by a touch. On coming to Pisa, about 1860 B. C., he entered the lists with Cēnōmāus for his daughter Hippōdāmia, and by bribing his charioteer, easily obtained the victory. He gradually extended his conquests over the neighbouring districts. From him the whole of Greece to the S. of the Isthmus of Corinth, received the name of Pēlōpōnnēsus. That country is now called the Morea, from its supposed resemblance to the leaf of the mulberry-tree, in Greek, Morea.

He was one of the most eminent of the Grecian heroes, and, after death, was worshipped with divine honours. Pēlōpides, arum, a. descendants of Pēlōps. Pēlōpēas, idis, a. Pēlōpēis, idis, f. of Pēlōps, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Pēlōpēades Mēcēne (Ov. Met. vi. 414). Pēlōpēides unda (Ov. Fast. iv. 285). Adj. Pēlōpēlus, et, Pēlōpēus, a, um. Pēlōpēia virgo, Iphigēnia (Ov. Trist. iv. 4. 67). Pēlōpēia arva, the lands of Pēlōps, i. e. Phrygia, of which his father had been king (Ov. Met. viii. 622). Ad Pēlōpēmania, to the walls of Argos (Virg. Æn. ii. 193).—2. King of Lācēdæmon, who was a faithful ally of the Romans (Liv. xxxiv. 32).

Pēlōrus, i, m. a soldier in the army of Hannibal, by whom Tyrrhēnus lost his life (Sil. Ital. iv. 167).

Pēlōrus, i, m. the horse of Dūrlus, which ran in the chariot race for the prize given by Scipio Africānus, in Spain, in 208 B. C. (Sil. Ital. xvi. 355 seq.).

Pēlōrus, v. os, i, m. Pēlōrum, i, n. et, Pēlōris, idis, v. Pēlōrias, ādis, f. Cape Faro, a promontory on the northeast of the island of Sicily, under which, according to Ovidius, the right hand of the giant Typhōeus was buried. It is separated from Itālia, Italq., by Frētum Sicūlum, the Strait of Messina; hence Ausōnius Pēlōrus, Ausonian, Italian, Pēlōrus (Ov. Met. v. 350). It had its name from the pilot of Hannibal, who was buried there, after he had been killed by his master, who erroneously believed that he had deceived him (Sal. Frag.). From Faro to the nearest point on the opposite promontory, the distance is exactly 3,580 yards.

Pēlso, ōnis, m. Neusideler-See, a lake in Nōricum, which Plinius calls Pēiso (i. 384).

Pēlta, æ, f. a small shield, used by the Greeks. Pēltāsta, arum, m. the soldiers who carried it. They seem to have been of a description intermediate between the light and heavy armed soldiers, nearly the same with the Spanish and African Cētrāti, so called, because they wore Cētra q. v. In opposition to these were the troops who had a shield, Clēpēus, hence called Clēpēāti, v. Aglāsipides, from the brilliancy of their shields, or, Chālāsipides, from their shields being of brass (Liv. xxviii. 5: xxxi. 36).

Pēltæ, arum, f. Peloti, a town of Phrygia Māior, with a considerable population. Here Cērus halted three days on his expedition (Xenoph. Exp. i. 2).

Pēlūsiūm, i, n. Tineh, an ancient and strong city of Egyptus, Egypt, at the eastern extremity of the Delta, about 23 geographical miles to the E. of Eunmē fareggē, which is now dry, except during the swell. From Pēlūsiūm, the most easterly branch of Nilus, the Nile, was called Ostium Pēlūsiūcum. The date of the foundation of this city is lost in the remoteness of antiquity. It is said to have been built by Pēlōus, after he had murdered his brother Phōcus (Diod. Sic. Anab. Mar. xxii. 16). It served as a protection against the inroads of the Asiatic nations; hence Līvius calls it Clastrum Egypti, the key, or bulwark, of Egypt. Inh. Pēlūsiōtæ, arum, m. Pēlūsiōtæ capē non edunt (Gel. xx. 8). Adj. Pēlūsiācus, Pēlūsius, et, Pēlūsiānus, a, um, of Pēlūsiūm, of Egypt, Egyptian. Pēlūsiūcum ostium, the eastern branch of the Nile (Liv. xlv. 11). Pēlūsi- acea lens, Egyptian lentile (Virg. Ge. i. 228).

Pēlūsa ara Nili (Luc. Phar. viii. 825).

Pēnētes, iam, m. household gods, which the Romans kept and worshipped in the inmost part of the house, called from them Pēnētrālia, um, n. Except the Pēnētes Publici, brought by Enēas from Troy, to which divine honours were performed in the Capitol, the worship of this class of gods was confined to the most secret part of the house, a restriction to which the adoration of the Lāres, with whom they are often confounded, was not subject. The religious rites of the latter might be celebrated in the house, in the street, in the fields, in the camp, or at sea.

Pēnēlēs, eos, m. son of Hippāmus, of whom nothing is known, except that his name is found in Apollōdōrus, as one of the Argonauts.—2. One of the commanders of the Boeotians, whose name frequently occurs in the Iliad (Hom. II. ii. 494 seq.).

Pēnēlōpē, es, v. Pēnēlōpē, ae (Pēnēlōpēia, Homer.), f. daughter of Ikērus, and the Naid Pēribōia, was married to Ulysses, king of Ithāca. Soon after the birth of Tēlēmāchus, Ulysses, agreeably to the obligation of his oath, joined the combined forces of Greece, and remained at Troy until his countrymen had reduced that city to ashes. During his absence, a period of twenty years, many lovers solicited the hand of Pēnēlōpē, and urged their suit on the ground that her husband had perished by shipwreck. To prevent violence, she promised that she would make choice of a husband, as soon as she had finished the web then in the loom. Determined never to marry, from attachment to Ulysses, she undid in the night what she wove in the day, hence Pēnēlōpē telam retexēre, to undo what one has wrought, or to labour in vain, became a proverb. To the excellence of her spinning Juvēnalis alludes (Sat. ii. 56). Her conduct, as described by Hōmērus, is a perfect model of female propriety, virtue, and chastity, on which account her name became a general appellation of chaste women. Other authors, however, mention that Pēnēlōpē had no title to any such character, that, during the absence of her husband, she indulged in the grossest sensuality, and that she had a son whom she called Pan q. v., implying by that name that he was the offspring of all her lovers. On the return of Ulysses to Ithāca, he divorced her on account of her criminality, when she fled first to Spārta, and afterwards to Māntinea, where she died. Others maintain, that they continued to live together after the Trojan war, and that she bore him a daughter called Ptōlōpōrthē (Paus. viii. 12). Hyginus says, that she outlived Ulysses, and by the advice of Minēra, married Tēlēgōnus, son of that king, and Circē (127). Ovidius has entitled one of his Epistles, "Pēnēlōpē to Ulysses," a poem which does not claim to be ranked high, either for sentiment or diction. The wish which she expresses for her husband's return, has little ardour of affection, and contains none of those delicate sensibilities which her situation might be naturally expected to excite. Adj. Pēnēlōpēus, a, um. Pēnēlōpēus Tēlēmāchus (Catul. lxi. 229, 230).

Pēnēstia, ae, f. a district of Illyriūm, on the confines of Mācēdōnia and Thēssālia. Uscāna was the largest city in this district (Liv. xliii. 18, 19). Iah. Pēnēstae, arum, m. (Liv. xliii. 20). Adj. Pēnēstianus, a, um. Pēnēstianā terra, the territory of Pēnēstia (Liv. xliii. 18).

Pēnēas, v. os, i, m. the Salampria, so called from Pēnēas, son of Ocēānus and Tēthys, who was grandfather of Lāpithus and Centauros. The modern name, Salampria, or Salambria, has been derived from Σαλαμβρία, an outlet, which is a very appropriate appellation, when this river issues from Tēmpē, Tembi. It has its source in Mount Pindus, Metzova, waters the beautiful vale of Thessaly, runs through Tēmpē, Tembi, a deep and narrow ravine of nearly five miles in length, separating Olympus, Elinbo, and Ossa, Kissabos, and afterwards pours its waters into Sinus Thērmāicus, the Gulf of Salonica. In its course through the plain of Tēmpē, the Salampria receives five streams, some of which are considerable. The channel of this river, whilst it traverses the plain, is, in some places, nearly a quarter of a mile wide; but it is only in winter that its waters are of that breadth. Here and there it forms a few small islands which, like its banks, are covered with wood, chiefly pines. The Greek, and particularly the Latin, poets sung the laurels which shaded this beautiful stream. The Latins knew little of the geography of Greece, and the laurel is more a favourite with the poets than the pine, which may perhaps account for the mistake. On leaving the vale, the Salampria covers its whole channel in its passage through the gulf between Olympus and Ossa, while rocks, almost perpendicular, confine it to a space, in some places, not exceeding two hundred feet. Along this deep and narrow outlet, which does not materially differ from a straight line, Pēnēas, the Salampria, rolls its smooth and tranquil stream. Ovid's description of this river gives another proof of the ignorance of the Latin poets, with respect to the geography of Greece. He represents it as flowing with great rapidity, dashing from rock to rock, covering the trees on its banks with spray, and stunning the neighbourhood with its sound (Met. i. 569 seq.). So large a river as the Salampria having forced a passage for itself, between two mountains of so great a height as Olympus and Ossa, Kissabos, is a phenomenon, perhaps, without a parallel. But some idea of its approach to these mountains, and entering the deep ravine through which it flows into the sea, may be formed by those who have attentively surveyed the striking and remarkable scenery of Cartland Craigs, pronounced by the peasantry of the neighbourhood Cartlane Craigs, in the immediate vicinity of the town of Lanark. The Mouss, a considerable stream, which has its source near the boundary between the counties of West Lothian and Lanark, after a westerly course of about 15 miles, through a pastoral, rather than a well cultivated or fertile district, begins to have sloping banks of uncommon height, beautifully covered with coppice wood. After winding its course over a rocky bed for three miles, shaded by native woods, it runs against an eminence, in height nearly level with the top of its banks, which nature seems to have opposed as a barrier to its farther progress. Here the Mouss deviates, for three or four hundred yards, from a S. W. to a N. W. direction, finds an opening through the rugged, and, in some places, almost perpendicular, rocks above-mentioned, at the bottom of which it rolls its agitated and tortuous current to the Clyde. The height of Carlisle Craigs on the N. side is not much less than 400 feet, and their hollows and less precipitous steepes are adorned with oaks, mountain and common ashes, the wild apple tree, and most of the other trees indigenous in Scotland. These Craigs extend to nearly a mile in length, and present the appearance of having been once united; for wherever there is a projection on the one side, there is somewhat of a corresponding recess on the other. Amidst these clefts, the celebrated Dr. Lightfoot discovered several uncommon plants. The falls of the Clyde have long attracted the notice of travellers from all parts of the island, while the singularity and grandeur of Carlisle Craigs, although in their immediate neighbourhood, have been almost wholly overlooked. Pēnēs, ēidos, f. Dāphnē, the daughter of Pēnēs, who was changed into a laurel, a fiction most probably originating in the number of laurels with which the banks of this river were supposed to be adorned. Pēnēs, idos, f. of Pēnēs, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Pēnēides undae, the water of Pēnēs (Ov. Met. i. 544). Adj. Pēnēius, et. Pēnēus, a, um. Pēnēia Tempē, Tembi, traversed by Pēnēs, the Salampria (Virg. G. iv. 317). Pēnēia undae (Ov. Met. vii. 230). —2. The River of Gastuni, a river of Elis, which falls into the Mediterranean opposite Zacynthus, Zakynthos.

Pēninus, c. Pēninus, i, m. a hero, or god, worshipped on the top of Pēninus, or Pēnium, one of the ridges of the Alps, from whom the name of that summit has been derived. By it the Lingones and Boii crossed from Gallia to Italy. The object of Livius is to prove that Hannibal did not come by this range, and that, according to the Vērāgri, the mountain had this name from the hero or god worshipped there, not from Penus, a Carthaginian. It is probable that the name may be traced to the Gaelic Pen, in Scotland, Ben, a mountain, or hill (Liv. xxi. 38). Adj. Pēninus, c. Pēninus, a, um. Alpium forēs Penina (Plin. i. 371). Vallis Penina. The summit may be either called Pēninus (mōns), or, Pēnium (jūgum), the name given by Strābo. See Alps.

Pēntāpōlis, is, f. a division of Egypt, bounded by Libya on the east. It had this name from containing five principal cities, but is more commonly called Cyrenāica (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16). —2. Another, belonging to the Dorians.

Pēnthēsila, a, f. daughter of Mārs and Otrēa, who succeeded Orithyia, queen of the Amazons, and assisted the Trojans. Achilles, according to some, killed her, and, according to others, was captivated with her beauty. Servius brings a charge of a horrible nature against that hero, with respect to his conduct to Pēnthēsila, which it is better to suppress than to relate (Just. ii. 4).

Pēnthēus, ēos, v. ēi, m. the son of Echion and Agavē, was king of Bœotia. He despised the prediction of Trēsins, derided the oracles, and refused to acknowledge the divinity of Bacchus. To complete his impiety, the Theban king sent his servants to bring the god in chains before him. Assuming the appearance of one of his attendants, Bacchus allowed himself to be taken prisoner, and carried into the presence of the king, to whom, under the character of Acotes, he related the transformation of the Tænæa sailors. Despising the fictitious narrative, Pēnthēus ordered him to be put to death by torture. Loaded with chains, the attendants of that prince shut him up in prison, from which he miraculously escaped, and, according to Höratius, destroyed the palace of Pēnthēus (Od. ii. 19, 14). Pēnthēus then went out to see the Bacchanals, and to learn their mysteries; but, approaching too near, was torn in pieces by his mother and her sisters. Others say, that he wished to appease the frenzy, and check the licentiousness introduced by the worship of that deity; but perished in the attempt. Pēnthēus, a, m. a patronymic of Lycurgus, a descendant of Pēnthēus (Ov. lb. 607). Pēnthēus in Ov. lb. 447, should be written Pēnthēus, in the opinion of some commentators, denoting Hippodamæ. Adj. Pēnthēus, et. Pēnthēus, a, um. Pēnthēia mētēr, the mother of Pēnthēus, i.e. Agavē (Stat. Th. xi. 318). Pēnthēus sanguis, the blood of Pēnthēus (Claud. xx. 523).

Pēnthilus, i, m. a son of Orēstes, and brother of Tisāmēnus, who ascended the throne after their father's death (Vel. Pat. i. 1).

Pēntri, orum, m. were Sāmmites, whose capital was Bōvianum, Boiano. Except this tribe, all the Sāmmites revolted to Hannibal, after the battle of Cannæ, in 216 B.C. (Liv. xxii. 61).

Pēpārēthus, i, f. Piperi, an island in Mæd Ægæum, the Archipelago, with a cognominal town, formerly called Eveosus (Plin. i. 461). It lies to the east of Magnesia, at a considerable distance from the coast. Philippus destroyed the city, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 28).

Pēraa, a, f. a district of Caria, opposite to Rhodus, formerly in the possession of the Rhodians, hence called Pēraa Rhodiōrum. In 198 B. C., the Rhodian prætor, Pausistratus, regained possession of it by force of arms (Liv. xxxii. 33 seq.). —2. A town of Æolis, peopled by a colony of the Mitylænæi, which Antiochus, king of Syria, carried by storm, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 21). Here the reading is doubtful.

Pērcennius, i, m. a common soldier, formerly a leader of theatrical factions, who had a readiness of utterance, and the art of exciting tumult. In Pannōnia, aided by Vibullenus, he prevailed on three legions to revolt, and the emperor sent his son Drusus to quell the tumult. Having reduced the troops to submission, Drusus put the two ringleaders Pērcennius and Vibullenus to death, in the year 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 16—29).

Pērcotē, es, f. a town of the Troad, which Xerxes gave to Thémistocles. Some are of opinion that the word should be Pērcopē (Val. Flacc. ii. 622). Inh. Pērcōsi, orum, m. (Hom. Il. vi. 30). See Pidgtes. Adj. Pērcōsius, a, um. Pērcōsia conjur, Clitē q. v. (Val. Flacc. iii. 10).

Pērdiccas, a, m. a king of Macedonia, whose illustrious life and dying precepts, regarded like those of an oracle, rendered him remarkable. On his deathbed, he pointed out to his son Argæus, the place where he, and also his successors, should be buried, presaging that as long as the bones of the Macedonian kings should be deposited there, the crown would remain in his family. The race was considered as extinct in Alēxānder, because he changed the place of burial. After a reign of thirty-eight years, Përdiceas died in 676 B. C., and was succeeded by his son already named. Justinus, contrary to the chronology of Eusebius, makes him the successor of Cárinus (vii. 1, 2).—2. A son of Amýntas II. and Eurýdicé, and brother of Philippos. Iphicrátēs patronised Eurýdicé and her sons, after the death of their father. Córnelius Népos mentions only Përdiceas and Philippos as the children of Amýntas and Eurýdicé (Iphic. 3); but that monarch had three legitimate children, Aléxānder, Përdiceas, and Philippos, the father of Alexander the Great; besides an illegitimate son, Ptólémæus, who killed Alexander, son of Përdiceas, and mounted the throne of Mácédónia. Justinus makes Përdiceas fall a victim to the cruelty of his mother (vii. 4, 5).—3. A favourite general of Alexander the Great, who gave him, on his deathbed, his ring, which he considered as bequeathing to him the dominions of which that monarch died in the possession. Considering that Alexander had children of his own, the ambition rather than the judgment of Përdiceas, must have brought him to this conclusion; since it is not reasonable to suppose, that the monarch intended to disinherit his natural heirs. By bestowing on him his ring, the dying monarch most probably meant to secure his good offices during the minority of his children, and if this formed his sole intention, the conduct of Përdiceas proved, that the hero did not thoroughly understand either the principles or designs of his favourite. To strengthen his interest, he married Cléópātra, sister of Alexander, and he formed an alliance with Euménēs, by whose assistance he expected to accomplish his favourite scheme of becoming absolute monarch. Actuated by the same principles as their sovereign, all the generals of Alexander appear to have entertained similar sentiments with Përdiceas, and their whole thoughts being turned to that subject, they watched, with a jealous eye, the motions of each other, and soon discovered the ambitious plans formed by Përdiceas. Antípāter, Crátērus, and Ptólémæus, entered into a confederacy against him, which, after much bloodshed, completely succeeded. He wanted the qualities that command the esteem and secure the attachment of soldiers, and, therefore, after his hopes had been completely blasted, they assassinated him in Egypt, about 321 B. C. (Cor. Nep. Eum. 2).

Përfuga, v. m. See Fugileus.

Përga, v. f. a town of Pāmphyliā, about sixty stadia from the sea, on the river Cestros (Plin. i. 589. Liv. xxxviii. 37). Adj. Përgæus, a. um. Përgæa Diāna (Pom. Mel. i. 14).

Përgāma, orum, n. the citadel of Troy, often put for the city. Augustus formed the design of rebuilding Troy, to which Lúcanus has been supposed to allude (Phar. ix. 999), and against which Hórātius wrote (Od. iii. 3). Adj. Përgāmæus, a. um. of Troy, Trojan. Përgāmæus Lar, the household gods of Troy (Virg. Æn. v. 744). Përgāmæa rúinae, the ruins of Troy (Virg. Æn. iii. 476). Përgāmæus sūguis, Roman blood; from the Romans being of Trojan descent (Sil. Ital. i. 47).

Përgāmus, i. f. v. Përgāmum, i. n. Bergamo, a city of Mýsia, in Asia Minor, Nato- lia, on the north bank of Cáicus, the Grimolli, near the place where that river enters Ætōlia. This city was famous for an excellent library of 200,000 volumes, which Cléópātra afterwards, by permission of Antónius, added to the noble collection at Aléxandria. Tapestry and parchment are both said to have been invented at Përgāmus. The latter discovery was a consequence of Ptólémæus, king of Egypt, preventing the exportation of Pāpýrus to Mýsia, lest the library there should have rivalled that of Aléxandria. Heródōtus informs us, that it was an ancient and common practice among the Ionians to write on skins, and that it was in use among the barbarians to his own time. For a knowledge of letters, the Ionians were indebted to the Phenicians, and most probably too for the substance to which they committed their writings. To this town Scípio Násica was sent into banishment, under the honourable title of ambassador, and there he spent the latter years of his life in tranquillity and peace (Val. Max. v. 3). Galen was a native of Përgāmus, and Æsculāpius, who became the chief deity of the place, practised medicine there. Inh. Përgāmēni, orum, m. Adj. Përgāmēnus, et, Përgāmēus, a. um. Përgāmēa domus (Sil. Ital. iii. 4. 23). Përgāmēnus ager, the territory of Përgāmus (Liv. xxxvii. 21). Përgāmēna chárta, parchment (Euseb.).—2. A town of Crēta, Candia, built by Agamēmnon after the Trojan war (Vel. Pat. i. 1).—3. A town of the Piēres, in Thrācia (Herod. vii. 112).

Përgāsus, i. m. the father of Dēiōcōn. Përgāsides, v. m. Dēiōcōn (Hom. Il. v. 535).

Përgus, i. m. the Lake of Gordan, in Sicily, from the vicinity of which, Proserpina was carried off by Plúto. It appears to have been near Enna, v. Hēnna (Ov. Met. v. 586).

Përlānder, dri, m. son of Cypselus, king of Corinth. In the early part of his reign, he was mild, but afterwards became cruel and bloody; killing his wife Mēlissa by whom he had two sons, and banishing his younger son to Cōrcýra. On the approach of old age, he recalled him, yet still retained his unfeeling disposition (Herod. iii. 48 seq.).

Përlhæa, v. f. the eldest daughter of Acēssāmēnus, was the mother of Pélégon by the river Axius, which Hómērus calls the "broad flowing" (Hom. Il. xxi. 142).

Përibōmīus, i. m. a Roman of scandalous, but open and avowed, profligacy. Juvénalis commends him for not disgracing virtue by putting on a sanctimonious face (Sat. ii. 16).

Përiclēs, is, v. Përiclēs, ti (contracted i, Pers. Sat. iv. 3), m. an eminent Athenian, son of Xantippus, who, to the qualities of a distinguished statesman and celebrated orator, added the learning of a philosopher and the integrity of a patriot. Cicéro extols him for being the first who adorned eloquence with learning, and who enlivened the formal pleadings of the barrister with the intelligence of a man of science. Valérius Máximus, however, speaks of him as an usurper of the monarchy, and attributes the ascendancy which he gained over the minds of his countrymen to his captivating eloquence, which delighted the Athenians, even when he spoke on a subject contrary to their inclination. During the fifteen years he held the supreme government of the state, he directed his best efforts to promote the prosperity of Athens, despising the accumulation of wealth, and the aggrandizement of his family. He compelled, by force of arms, the Lacedæmonians to return to the Phocians the temple of Dêlphi, Castri, of which the former had illegally deprived them, gained a victory over the Sicyonians, and another over the Samians. Ambition at last impelled him to persuade his countrymen, to take up arms against the Lacedæmonians, and other states in Pelôpônnesus, the Morea, q. v. After considerable victories, an unsuccessful expedition exposed him to the capricious injustice of his countrymen, who fined him in fifty talents. The loss of all his children depressed his spirits more than loss of popular favour, which he afterwards regained, and had the satisfaction of witnessing their contrition, besides again receiving all his former offices with additional authority. The pestilence put a period to his life, in the seventieth year of his age, after he had held the administration of Athens fifteen years alone, and twenty-five years in conjunction with others. The account of Justinus scarcely agrees with this statement (iii. 6). His countrymen highly extolled his eloquence, publicly lamented his loss, and sincerely respected his memory. To purity of conduct he laid no claim, indulging in gross licentiousness, and corrupting the morals of the Athenians by his open lewdness. The fatal effects of these vices, the state soon had reason to lament, and it may be questioned, whether the community did not suffer more from his immoral behaviour, than it gained by his talents and integrity in office. In consequence of the death of all his legitimate children, he adopted a reputed son, but, before he could effect that measure, had first to repeal a law of his own passing, against spurious children.—2. Son of the former, who was one of the ten generals that succeeded Alcibiâdes, and like them suffered death after the unfortunate battle of Arginûsæ. For that defeat, the Athenians brought them to trial, and condemned them to lose their lives.

Pêrlêmênos, i. m. son of Nêleus and Chlôris, was one of the Argonauts. He obtained from Nêptûnus the power of assuming any form, hence, when Hercules took Pylus, Naxarino, he passed into the appearance now of a lion, now of a serpent, and now of an ape. Hercules put him to death, together with all the other sons of Nêleus except Nestor. Ovidius states, that after he had turned into all shapes, he at last assumed that of an eagle, and tore with his crooked talons the face of Hercules, who wounded him in the air with an arrow, on which he fell to the ground and expired (Ov. Met. xii. 556).

Pêrlctyônes, um. m. a people under the government of Cylæus (Orph. 496).

Peridas, æ. m. an officer and friend of Alexander the Great, sent by his sovereign to forbid the Scythians to cross into Europe, in 329 B. C., unless with his permission (Curt. vii. 6 seq.).

Pêridia, æ. f. the mother of Onytes (Virg. Æn. xii. 515).

Pêriêres, is. m. son of Æolus, and husband of Mêdusa. After his death, she married Cebalus, and was the first woman who had a second husband (Paus. ii. 21).

Pêrillaus, i. m. sent by Aridæus, successor of Alexander the Great, with Pasas, a Thesalian, and Amisias, a Megalopolitan, on an embassy to the Macedonian cavalry, in a dangerous state of insurrection (Curt. x. 8).

Pêrilla, æ. f. a daughter of Ovidius, to whom he addresses one of his elegies, mentioning his own love of poetry, and recommending to her mental improvement, and the cultivation of those endowments, which time and old age cannot destroy (Ov. Trist. iii. 7).

Pêrillus, i. m. an Athenian artist, who made to Phâlâris, tyrant of Agrigêntum, Girgenti, a brazen bull, which was employed to put to death whoever had incurred the displeasure of that monarch. The unhappy sufferer was shut up in the belly of the bull, a fire was placed under it, and from the formation of the machine the cries of the victim resembled the bellowing of a bull. Phâlâris made the first experiment on Pêrillus himself, and protracted his sufferings by placing a small fire under the belly of the bull. Adj. Pêrilleus, a. um. Pêrilleo eri, in the brazen bull of Pêrillus (Ov. Ib. 437).

—2. A creditor of Damâsippus, whom some erroneously suppose to have been a lawyer. He may have been a usurer (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 75).

Pêrimêdê, es. f. a woman skilled in the power of herbs, and in incantations (Theoc. ii. 16), called by Hômêrus Agamêdê q. s. Adj. Pêrimêdêus, a. um. Pêrimêdeia mânus, the hand of Pêrimêdê (Prop. ii. 4. 8).

Pêrimêdes, is. m. a noble Greek, father of Schêdius, who commanded the Phœciens (Hom. Il. xv. 515).—2. A companion of Ulysses (Hom. Od. xi. 23).

Pêrimêlê, es. f. daughter of Hippodâmas, violated by the river Achêlôus, on which account her father threw her into the sea near the time of her delivery. That river received her in her fall, and entreated Nêptûnus on her account, who changed her into an island, which bears her name (Ov. Met. viii. 590).

Pêrimus, i. m. a noble Trojan, son of Mêgas, killed by Pâtrôclus (Hom. Il. xvi. 695).

Pêrinthus, i. m. a man of Argos, whose countenance Eumênis, a Fury, assumed, to prevent Pôlyñices from listening to the advice of Adrastus (Stat. Th. xi. 199).

Pêrinthus, i. f. afterwards Hêrâclêa, v. Hêrâclêa Pêrinthus, Erethi, a town of Thraciâ, Romulia, on Prôpônitis, the Sea of Mar-mora (Cor. Nep. Alcib. 7). Prôcrôpius states that it was reckoned the metropolis of Europe, until the enlargement of Constantinople, after which it became second. Adj. Pêrinthius, a. um.

Pêripâtêfici, orum. m. a sect of Grecian philosophers, who had this name from their walking about in the Lyceum during their disputations (Tac. Or. 31).

Pêriphas, antis. m. a Grecian of great size, who was one of them who set fire to the palace of Pêrlâmus, on the Greeks becoming masters of Troy (Virg. Æn. ii. 476).—2. A very ancient king of Athens, who, according to Antôninus Libêrâlis, lived before the time of Cêcrôps, obtained the government by universal consent, and was distinguished for justice, riches, and piety. On account of his excellent virtues, men forsook the temple of Jupiter, and worshipped Pêriphas, at which the king of the gods, being displeased, resolved to consume his house by lightning. At the request of Apollo, Jupiter did not execute that intention, but changed Përiphas into an eagle, and his wife, who requested to undergo the same transformation, into Fulica, a sea bird. For his moral excellencies whilst he lived among men, Jupiter made Përiphas the king of birds, the guardian of the lightning, and the attendant of his throne. Ovidius has shortly alluded to this king, and his transformation (Met. vii. 400).—3. One of the Lâpithæ, who, in the battle with the centaurs, at the marriage of Pirithôus, conquered Përetus (Ov. Met. xii. 449).—4. A native of Pëlas, whom Ménéceus killed in the Theban war (Stat. Th. vii. 641).—5. A Theban, whom Tydæus put to death whilst he bore his expiring brother on his shoulders. They were among the fifty, whom Etéocles sent to waylay and despatch that gallant youth. Stâstus has celebrated the fraternal affection of both, which remained strong even in death (Th. ii. 631 seq.).

Përiphôtes, m., a man in the Trojan army, killed by Teucer, at the same time with Prôthoon (Hom. Il. xiv. 515).—2. Son of Cōpëus, was a native of Mýcænæ, and killed by Hëctor. He was a good son of a bad father (Hom. Il. xv. 638 seq.).

Përmessus, i. m. v. Përmëssis, Idis, f. the Pogia, a river which has its source in Hëlicon, Zagara-eguni, and, after joining with Olmeios, falls into Lâcus Cōpâs, the Lake of Topolia (Virg. B. vi. 64). Përmëssis, Idis, f. of Përmessus, applied to females, or to nouns feminine. Adj. Përmëssus, a. um. Përmëssus fons, the spring or source of that stream (Claud. xxix. 8). From the language of Claudianus, it may be inferred, he understood that the waters of Agâniupê ran into this stream (ib.).

Përo, us, f. daughter of Nêlëus, others say of Sâlmônëus, and Chlôris, a woman whose extraordinary beauty attracted a number of admirers, and her father in name of dowry demanded the oxen of Iphiclus (Paus. x. 31). Formosa Përo (Prop. ii. 3. 53).—2. Daughter of Cimon, who supported him in prison, when ordered to be starved to death, by her own milk (Val. Max. v. 4). This Cimon was not the son of Miltiades, nor is any thing known either of him or his daughter, except what is here stated.

Përolla, m., son of Pâcëvius Câlâvius, was a steady friend of the Romans, and opposed his father in admitting Hannibal into Cápua, his native city. At the request of Pâcëvius, Hannibal had forgiven the attachment of Përolla to the Romans, and had spared his life; but this favour did not abate his resentment against the Carthaginian general, whom he formed the resolution of killing, while he had the honour of dining in his company. He communicated his intention to his father, who was one of the party, supposing he would be averse to witness the bloody deed, and, at his earnest solicitation, desisted from his murderous purpose (Liv. xxiii. 8, 9).

M. Përpërna, M. Përpërnæ, m. sent ambassador by the Romans to Gëntius, king of the Illyrians, by whom he was thrown into prison, where he remained until liberated by L. Anicius Gâllus, who despatched him to Rome, to announce his victory over that monarch, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 32).—2. A foreigner, who commanded the Roman forces against the slaves, and having first defeated them in battle, he besieged them in Enna, where the greater part died from famine. He bound the remainder of the robbers with chains, and punished them on the cross. For this victory he was contented with the less triumph, that he might not sully the dignity of the greater with the name of slaves (Flor. iii. 19). He held the consulship with C. Claudius Pülcher, in 132 B. C., says Vâlërius Mâximus, before he was a citizen, and was sent into Asia, against Aristônëus, the reputed son of Eumënes, king of Asia, conquered him, and took him prisoner (Liv. Ep. 59). Eutrôpius informs us, that Përpërna died at Përgâmus, on his way to Rome, and, therefore, there was no triumph over Aristônëus (iv. 20). He is mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. iii. 62).—3. A Roman, who attached himself to Q. Sërtôrius in Spain, under whom he held a high commission. In the eighth year of that war, he, Mânlius Antônus, and other conspirators, killed that noble Roman at a feast. On the murder of Sërtôrius, Përpërna took the command of the army, was defeated, taken prisoner, and put to death by Cn. Pômpeius Mâgnus, in 74 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 96).

Përrânthë, es, v. Përrânthes, is, f. a rugged hill, at the foot of which stands Ambrâcia q. v. (Liv. xxxviii. 4).

Përrhæbia, m. f. a division of Thëssâlîa, nearly in the highest tract of the country, including part of Pindus, Metzoro. Inh. Përrhæbi, orum (Sing. Përrhæbus, i.), m. whom Plinius makes a people of Ætôlîa (i. 407). They were on the confines of Ætôlîa, Epirus, and Thëssâlîa. Adj. Përrhæbus, a. um. Përrhæbus Pindus (Prop. iii. 5. 33).

Përsa, m. f. a daughter of Occânus, and mother of Cîrcë. Përsëis, Idis, f. of Përsa, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Përsëides herbæ, magical herbs (Ov. Rem. Am. 263).

Përsägâdus, i. v. Përsägâde, arum, f. (i. e. the camp of the Persians), a town built by Cýrus, of which Gobâres was commander, and gave it up to Alexander the Great, in 330 B. C. It stood on the river Kores, on the spot where Cýrus had conquered the Medes (Curt. v. 6).

Përsëis, Idis, f. daughter of Occânus, the wife of Sol, by whom, according to Vâlërius Flâccus, she had Përses, Æëtes, and Cîrcë.

Përsëis, Idis, f. a city in Dëuriôpus, a district of Pæoniâ, which Philippus, king of Mâcëdônîa, began to build, in 185 B. C., not far from the old city, Stôbi, Stobi, and gave it this name in honour of his elder son Përsëus (Liv. xxxix. 58).

Përsëphônë, es, v. Përsëphônîa, m. f. the Greek name of Prôsërpîna q. v. (Hom. Od. x. 491). Përsëphônës conjug. husband of Prôsërpîna, i. e. Plûtô (Prop. ii. 28. 48).

Përsëpôlis, is, f. Estahar, or, Tchelminar, the capital of Përsîa (Just. xi. 14).

Përses, m. king of Taurica, Crimea, and maternal brother of Æëtes, king of Cólchis. He married Astëria, by whom he had Hëcâtë (Hes. Th. 409). Përsëis, Idis, f. a patronymic of Hëcâtë, from her father, Përses (Ov. Met. vii. 74).

Përsëus, cos, v. ði, m. the son of Jüpiter, by Dänâë, the daughter of Acrisius. Jüpiter is said to have entered the chamber of Dänâë, in a shower of gold. Hence Pērseūs is called Aurigeus (Ov. Met. v. 250). Immediately after his birth, he and his mother were, by order of her father, exposed to the sea in a slender bark, to prevent the fulfilment of a prediction, which foretold he would be killed by his grandson. The boat was driven by the winds to Sērīphus, Serpho, where fishermen found them, and carried them to Pōlydēctes, king of that island, who gave a kind reception to Dāniē, and paid particular attention to her child. Both were committed to the care of his brother Dictys, who discharged the duties of his trust with the utmost fidelity. As Pērseūs grew up to manhood, he discovered uncommon abilities, and astonishing fortitude, which alarmed that monarch, who, having conceived a violent passion for Dāniē, and not intending to marry her, devised a stratagem to crush a most affectionate son, of whose resentment, if he should offer injury to his mother, he entertained great apprehensions. He invited to a most magnificent feast, all the princes of his kingdom, among whom Pērseūs was included, on this condition, that each of the guests should, at the festival, present him with a beautiful horse. The poverty of Pērseūs, he knew, would prevent him from complying with the terms, and his proud spirit would not bear the affront of being absent. In this situation, Pōlydēctes expected that he would either sink in despair, or attempt some daring enterprise, in which he would lose his life. The princes gave each his present, agreeably to the requisition. Pērseūs readily acknowledged that he could not give a horse, but, in place of one, promised the head of Mēdusa, the only one of the Gorgons who was not immortal. Pōlydēctes gladly accepted that offer, believing it beyond his power to fulfil his promise, and that he would be thus for ever banished from Sērīphus. But Pērseūs, by the aid of Pluto's invisible helmet, Minerva's buckler, and Mercury's wings and Tālārīa (hence Pēnnipes, Cat. iv. 25), and a short dagger, made of diamonds, called HARPE, deprived Mēdusa of life, and carried off her head in triumph. On his return, he killed the sea monster to which Andrōmēda, daughter of Cēphēus, king of Æthiōpia, was exposed, and then married her. The inhabitants of Jōppē, Jaffa, pretended, in the first century of the Christian era, to shew the marks of her chain on Parīn, a rock in the sea, within a few yards of the shore near that town. A memorable battle ensued at their nuptials. Phīnēus, the uncle of Andrōmēda, who passionately loved her, entered with a body of armed men, and attempted to carry her off by violence. But Pērseūs made a brave resistance, and, at last, finding himself on the point of being overpowered, he presented the Gorgon's head, which instantly turned all his enemies to stone, in the posture in which they were then standing. Immediately after this, he returned to Sērīphus, Serpho, in time to protect his mother from the insult of Pōlydēctes, to whom Pērseūs showed the Gorgon's head, which converted him to stone. He then visited Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, went to Lārissa, Larissa, or, Yeniseri, engaged in the games which Tēntāmus was then celebrating in honour of his father, and unknowingly killed his grandfather with a coit.

He founded a city, to which he gave the name of Mycēne, from having dropped in that place the point (point) of his sword. After his death, the time and manner of which are unknown, he received divine honours. Pērseūs, id. sc. f. Pērseūs, v. Pērseūs, sc. f. of Pērseūs, with relation to a female, or to a trust feminine. Adj. Pērseūs, v. Pērseūs, sc. um. Pērseūs hīrē, Adriatus (Stat. Th. iii. 441). Pērseūs ombus (Ov. Met. v. 128). Pērseūs Argi (Stat. Th. i. 225).—2. v. Pērseūs, i. et Pērseūs, sc. a, a son of Philippus, king of Macedōnia, whom his father sent, when a boy (202 B. C.), to guard the passes of Pēlagōnia, appointing some of his friends to direct his inexperienced age. Eleven years after, he received troops to recover Dōlōpia and Amphīlōchia, but the approach of the Ætōli obliged him to raise the siege of that city, and to return home. In the year 187 B. C., the Romans apprehended a war with this prince, who, by the murder of his brother, and other nefarious means, had succeeded his father in the crown of Macedōnia. The idea of the war did not originate with him, but with Philippus, who had laid up provisions and money sufficient for carrying it on for ten years. Pērseūs was the son of Philippus, by a concubine, and in every respect he was inferior to Dēmētrius, the legitimate son of that monarch. Livius has recorded, at great length, the various deceptions and plans adopted by Pērseūs to accomplish the death of Dēmētrius. Philippus lent too ready an ear to the insinuations and false statements, made by this illegitimate son against the legal heir to the crown, and, to his extreme sorrow, only came to the knowledge of the whole after Dēmētrius had, by his orders, suffered a violent death. To avoid his father's fury, Pērseūs withdrew from the court, and eluded the search of the men sent by Philippus to put him to death. Satisfied of the innocence of Dēmētrius, and guilt of Pērseūs, Philippus resolved to disinherit the latter, and to secure the crown to his younger son, Antigōnus; but his death, which happened soon after, prevented the ultimate success of his design. One of the first acts of Pērseūs, as sovereign of Macedōnia, was to put Antigōnus to death, both because his father intended for him the kingdom, and because it was through his agency that Philippus became convinced of the innocence of Dēmētrius, and criminality of Pērseūs. The prospect of hostilities between the Romans and Pērseūs, excited great interest among the states of Greece and Asia. In the raising of troops, he displayed great activity, and in attempting to form alliances with different states, his prudence merits commendation; but his disregard of human life, and concerting measures for cutting off his enemies by assassination, excites only detestation. He hired assassins to cut off Eumēnes, king of Asia, as he went to the oracle at Dēlphī, Cas-tri, merely because he was a steady ally of Rome. This prince recovered from the wounds, by which the assassins supposed that they had deprived him of life. Other instances of similar atrocity might be mentioned. During the war, we perceive none of the bold designs or rapid movements of an able general; no judicious expedient, or successful availment of existing circumstances, either to obtain important advantages, or successfully to thwart the schemes of the enemy. Even when his troops had routed the combined army on one remarkable occasion, he did not follow up the victory, and the Romans soon met him again in the field. Defeat roused the courage and stimulated the industry of that nation, and he should have attended to the character of his enemy, and shown his judgment, by active preparation for the result. At last, L. Æmilius Paullus gained a decisive victory over him; then led him with his whole family in triumph before his chariot, after which he was sent prisoner to Alba. With this war ended the kingdom of Mæcedonia, of which Përseus was the twentieth monarch, reckoning from Cárannus, the first king of that country. The Romans treated Përseus with great kindness, allowed him to retain his attendants, money and furniture, and granted him every indulgence consistent with the security of his person. To him Sallustius alludes (Cat. 51. Jug. 81). In the character of ambitious princes and great conquerors, we generally discover features nearly of the same kind, a disregard of human life, a restless activity, and a want of all moral principle. Slight shades of difference occasionally appear; but the chief characteristics bear a strong resemblance, in many cases approaching almost to identity. Përseus violates treaties or fails to fulfil them, as he judges most advantageous, and he cuts off his most faithful friends to conceal crimes, the discovery of which would have been hurtful to his interest. In cruelty and baseness, his conduct to Eumenes reminds the reader of the fate of the Duke D'Enghien, whose murderer avowed, that every warrior ought to carry his heart in his head.

Përseus, ēs, f. the name of one of the Roman ships, which were made use of in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 516).

Përsia, æ, c. Përsis, idos, f. Persia, a small country of Asia, which, at first, had on the S. Sinus Përseus, the Persian Gulf, on the W. Súsiana, on the N. Média, and on the E. Cármaná. These narrow territories were gradually enlarged, until they included all Asia to the west of the river Indus. The name is thought to be derived from Përses, the son of Përseus and Andróméda, who settled there, and built the capital of the kingdom, which, in honour of its founder, was called Përspólis, Estakhar, or rather, Tehelmianur, on a most beautiful plain, to the east of Aráxes, the Beud-enir. Ipsa Përsia (Manil. iv. 748). Përsis, idis, f. a Persian woman, also of Përsia, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Përsidea rãtes (Ov. Art. Am. i. 172). Inh. Përse, arum (Sing. Përse, æ), m. (Stat. Syl. v. 3. 187). Sëmi-përse, half Përse. Adj. Përseus, a, um. Përseum mārē (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). Përseus arcus (Flor. H. 8). Adv. Përseē, after the manner of the Persians.

Përseus, i, m. a friend of Juvénalis, to whom he addresses his eleventh satire, but of whom no other Roman author makes mention.

Përsius, i, m. a merchant, who had a dispute with Rúpilius Rëx, which Hórátius describes with considerable humour. His father was an Asiatic, and his mother a Roman; hence the term used by the poet (Sat. i. 7).

A. Përsius Flaccus, A. Përsi Flacci, m.

a Roman, of equestrian rank, was born at Völâtërre, Volterra, in Etrúria, Tuscany, about the year 84, during the reign of Tibérius. According to some authors, he continued at his native city until he entered his twelfth year, when he removed to Rome, and prosecuted his studies under Pálemón, a grammarian, Virgínius Flaccus, a rhetorician, and Annæus Córnutus, a Stoic philosopher of great eminence. He was nearly of the same age with the poet Lúcanus, whose writings he highly applauded at the recitations or rehearsals. It has been disputed, at what age he lost his father, some making him only six, others twelve, years old. Few particulars of his history have reached modern times, for he seldom speaks of himself, still we have his own authority for stating, that his father came to hear him repeat, or recite, the dying speech of Cato, and that he showed great anxiety, that his son should acquit himself well. This could not have occurred when he was only six years old. He formed an uncommon attachment to Córnutus, from whose company he seldom withdrew, and thus became acquainted with all the eminent characters with whom that philosopher associated. In such society, his powerful mind, stimulated by a strong desire for knowledge, could not fail to make great progress in philosophy and literature. His strictness of principle appears in his writings, and his life corresponded with the rigid doctrines of the Stoic philosophy. To a figure uncommonly handsome he added extreme modesty, and every valuable quality of the heart, which he discovered in affection to his widowed mother, tenderness to his sisters, and kindness to all around him. A stomach complaint occasioned his death, in the twenty-eighth year of his age. Córnutus advised the suppression of his earlier poetical compositions, lest they should injure the high reputation he had deservedly acquired by his six satires, which have been transmitted to modern times. To this species of composition, tradition informs us, he had been led by perusing the writings of Lúciilius. Of his merits as a satirist, justice requires that he be placed high in the first class. To the delicate raillery of Hórátius, and the formidable indignation of Juvénalis, he has very slender pretensions. Contemptuous sarcasm, rather than indirect reprehension; or ludicrous exposure, distinguishes the lines of Përsius. His verse has not the natural simplicity or polished elegance of a refined writer, and is deficient in that forcible impetuosity which hurries on the reader through the pages of Juvénalis. In his commendation of virtue and spotless integrity, he shines with a lustre which neither Hórátius nor Juvénalis has surpassed. His virtuous life and moral rectitude give an energy and interest to every sentiment, and the reader enjoys a high satisfaction in knowing, that the habits of his life accorded with the purity of principle which he approves and recommends. The heaviest charge preferred against Përsius is obscurity. When persons cannot be mentioned by name, the poet can scarcely fail to fall under this censure. The remote allusion to characters and circumstances, well known both at the time and place where he writes, can never be sufficiently known, when great distance either of place or time intervenes. How frequently is this felt in modern times! A Satire, distinctly comprehended and highly valued at the one end of London, is neither understood nor valued at the other, until a key is furnished, which enables the reader to go into the history and character of the persons referred to. This local nature of Satire, added to its fleeting interest, when depending upon particular circumstances and characters, diminishes its value in proportion as it travels from the scene in which it originated. Much, however, of the excellence of the three Roman Satirists, rests on a more fixed and permanent basis, and applies to mankind in similar circumstances in every age and country.

C. Pērsius, C. Pērsii, m. a Roman officer, of courage and activity, who gained a considerable advantage over the Tarentines, in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 39).

Pērtināx, ācis, m. was the son of a freed-man, who supported his family by the labour of his hand as an artist, and gave his son a good education, the best inheritance which his circumstances afforded. In early life, Pērtināx kept a school, but whether in his native city, Alba Pōmpeia in Ligūria, or not, history is silent. Quitting that laborious profession, he entered the army, rose from one rank to another, and always appeared superior to the appointment which he at the time held. His military character obtained for him the government of Dacia, from which the emperor Aurēlius recalled him, on the discovery of a conspiracy against his life, a loss which he amply compensated by conferring on him the command of a legion, besides other favours. The merit of Pērtināx justified the conduct of the emperor, whom he accompanied to Sýria, and, on returning, he distinguished himself in Moesia and Dacia against the barbarians. The resolution of Cōmmōdus q. v., to extirpate, or at least banish from court, the friends of his father, induced Pērtināx to retire to Ligūria, where he lived for three years; at the end of this period, the emperor appointed him to command the legions in Britain, where he maintained his allegiance, at the risk of his life, among troops which hated the Roman government and refused submission to military discipline. At his urgent request, Cōmmōdus allowed him to return to Rome, shortly before a conspiracy, which deprived that emperor of life, and raised Pērtināx to the throne. With reluctance, the praetorian guards acknowledged his authority, but the senate did not withhold all the titles of imperial power. The excellence of his government, seems almost to justify the means adopted for his elevation. His justice in liquidating the debts which he owed, and the frugality which he practised, both raised him in public esteem, and added to the comfort of the community by a diminution of taxes. Private families followed his example, preferring frugality to luxury, and payment of their accounts to a load of debt. To the punishment of rapacity, and the impartial administration of justice, may be referred the death of Pērtināx, whom the praetorians hated for these very virtues, and, instigated by their prefect Lætus, murdered him in the year 193, after a reign of about three months, in the sixty-seventh year of his age (Eutrop. viii. 16).—2. Son of the former, whom his father brought up with a just sense of honour and aggrandizement, which convinced the community, that his mind was under the control of reason, not of ambition. On the empress, Flavia Titiana, the senate had conferred the title of Augusta, and that of Caesar on her son. The emperor refused both, considering the former extravagant, and the latter unmerited. Under Cāraccalla, the younger Pērtināx obtained the consulship, and he incurred, by a witricism, the hatred of that tyrant, who had assumed the titles of the great Sarmāticus; and the great Pārthicus. Pērtināx, on hearing these appellations, said "Add the great Gēticus," an expression which stung the emperor to the heart, by suggesting at once his war with the Gēte, and the murder of his brother Gēta q. v., and he instantly ordered the execution of the consul.

Pērsia, w. f. Perugia, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, about seventy-five miles north of Rome. Its situation on an eminence contributes to its salubrity, its population is considerable, and its general appearance pleasant. The date of its foundation, which is unknown, was long before that of Rome, and it was built by the Achæi (Just. xx. 1). Perugia occupies the site of the ancient town, which had been destroyed by fire, and gives name to Læcus Trāsimēnus, now the Lake of Perugia. Inh. Pērsini, orum (Sing. Pērsinus, i.), m. were brave, and displayed their resolution and military skill in defence of their liberty from Roman encroachment. Famine only obliged them to surrender to Augustus in 42 B. C., and the destruction of their town was the result of their admitting L. Antōnius within their gates (Liv. Ep. 126). Adj. Pērsinus, a. um. Pērsina cohors (Liv. xxiii. 17). Pērsina fūera, alluding to the destruction of the town by Augustus (Prop. i. 22. 3). Pērsinæ bel-lum (Tac. Ann. v. 1).

Pērsinus, i. m. a son of Crista, who fell by the hand of Abāris, the armour-bearer of Hānnibal, at the battle of Cānna. In that engagement, Hānnibal deprived his father and his five brothers of life (Sil. Ital. x. 156).

Pēscēnnius Niger, Pēscēnnii Nigri, m. a man of obscure birth, who distinguished himself by his bravery, when he served as a private soldier in the Roman army. According to Eutrōpius, he raised a rebellion in Sýria and Egypt, on the death of Pērtināx, and according to Herōdiānus, he held the consulship, and was declared emperor at that time. His merits had raised him to the government of Sýria, and his popularity with the army promised to secure for him the imperial sovereignty. Besides the military virtues of courage, activity, and a knowledge of war, he had a vigorous mind, and a contempt for riches and grandeur. Conscious that discipline is essential to the success of an army, he exerted himself to revive that hardness, simplicity of food, steadiness, and sobriety, which distinguished the ancient forces of Rome. Sēvērus, who had likewise been declared emperor, prepared to enforce his claim by the sword, and the two rivals met at Cýzius, where Pēscēnnius Niger fell (Eutrop. viii. 18).

C. Pēscēnnius, C. Pēscēnni, m. a keen supporter of Roman chastity, of which Vālērūs Māxīmus has given a notable instance (Val. Max. vi. 1).

Pēssīnūs, ūntis, f. Tribunda, the capital of the Gālīi, or, Cēlts, Tolistoboi, in Gālātia, a part of Phrygia Major, said to have had this name from Cēbēlē falling there from heaven (are tou teneu), others say, that Ius, son of Tros, gave it this name, which Thēōpōm-pus attributes not to Ius, but to Midas, king of Phrygia (Amm. Mar. xxii. 9 seq. Liv. xxix. 10). Adj. Pēssīnūntius, a. um. Pēssīnūnti aselli, a kind of fish (Gel. vii. 16).

P. Pēssīvius Tētricus, P. Pēssīvī Tētrici, m. a usurper in Gālīa, France, during the reign of Gālīenūs. Victōria, or, Victōrius, mother of M. Aurēlius Plāvōnūs Victōrinus, procured the appointment, first of M. Aurēlius Mārius, who only reigned three days, having been killed by a soldier who formerly wrought in his shop as an armourer, and afterwards of P. Pēssīvius Tētricus, who, after reigning six years over France, Spain, and Britain, voluntarily surrendered himself to Aurēli-ānus, who ungenerously led him in triumph. In other respects, however, the emperor treated him with kindness, restored him to senatorian dignity, appointing him reformer of Lūcānia and part of Italy, and calling him his colleague, and sometimes emperor. According to some authors, Pēssīvius received divine honours after his death, which appears doubtful, since it was contrary to the Roman practice, to deify those who died in a private, station, or unconnected with the reigning family.—2. The son of the former, who was of the same name, received from the emperor every honour, which he could reasonably expect; and both father and son, giving up all ideas of ambition, lived at Rome quietly, securely, and respected by Aurēliānus and his successors (Eutrop. ix. 13).

Pētālē, es, f. a maidservant, whose name occurs in the poems of Propertius (iv. 7. 43).

Pētēlia, v. Pētīlia, ae, f. Helicastro, or, Strongoli, a town of the Brūtīi, which was either built or fortified by Philoctētes q. v. (Virg. Æn. iii. 402). Inh. Pētēllīni, orum, m. were the only people of the Brūtīi, who remained steadfast in their alliance with the Romans, after the battle of Cānne. They made a brave but unsuccessful resistance for several months, at the time Himilco, a Carthaginian officer, took possession of the empty houses after all the men had fallen; for, in order that they might longer endure the famine resulting from the siege, they had put all the old men unfit for war, the women and children, out of the town, in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxlii. 30). Adj. Pētēllīnus, a. um. Pētēllīna fides, the most steadfast and trusty fidelity (Val. Max. vi. 6).

Pētēllūs lūcus, a grove in the vicinity of Rome, in which the Cōnclia were held when M. Mānlius was condemned (Liv. vi. 20).

Pētēon, ōnis, f. a village of Bōōtia, near the road which led to Anthēdon, Anthedona, so called from the name of its founder. Hōmērus has mentioned this village, a proof of its remote antiquity (Il. ii. 500), and Stātilus (Th. vii. 333).

Pētēros, i, f. a town of Hispānia, Spain, the vicinity of which appears to have produced a number of roses. Mārtiālls enumerates it among other towns of Cēlōbēria, but its exact geographical position, as well as its history, is uncertain (Mart. iv. 55).

Pētēus, i, m. king of Athens, and father of Mēnēsthēus, who commanded the Athenians at Troy (Hom. Il. iv. 327).

Pētīllus Rūfūs, Pētīllī Rūfī, m. one of four who entered into a conspiracy, to work the destruction of Titus Sābīnus q. v., in the year 28 (Tac. Ann. iv. 68).

L. Pētīllius, L. Pētīllī, m. called by Aurēlius Victor, Tērēntius (Vir. Il. 3), a notary at Rome, in whose property at the foot of Jānicūlum, Monte Gianicolo, were found, in 183 B. C., two stone chests, the one containing two parcels, in which had been carefully wrapt up the writings of Nūma Pōm-pilius q. v., and the other the body of that king. Q. Pētīllius Spūrinus, city praetor, solicited and obtained a perusal of these writings; but, instead of returning them to the owner, he persuaded the senate, that they ought to be destroyed, because they contained opinions subversive of the established religion. On the evidence of the city praetor alone, the senate condemned the writings of Nūma to the flames, and the Victōmārii burned them in presence of the people. The praetor urbānus was instructed by the senate, to allow Pētīllius a moderate compensation for these writings. The historian has unfortunately neglected to mention, at what sum they were valued (Liv. xl. 29). Vālērīus Māxīmus says, there were seven books on the laws of the Pontiffs, and the same number in Greek, on the culture of knowledge; that the former were carefully preserved, and the latter publicly burnt (l. 12). The statement of Plūtārchus agrees with that of Līvīus, that the whole were burned.—2. Roman ambassador at the court of Gēntius, king of the Illyrii, in 170 B. C. That monarch threw him into prison, until L. Aniclus Gāllus conquered the country, and procured his freedom (Liv. xlv. 27 seq.).

Q. Pētīllius Spūrinus, Q. Pētīllī Spūri-ni, m. a plebeian tribune, who, with another tribune of the same name, preferred an action against P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus, after his return from the Asiatic war, where he had served in the rank of lieutenant-general, under his brother Lūcīus. The charges were of the most frivolous nature, originating in malevolent envy, not in justice, or love of country. Scīpio's purity of character, and splendid talents, crushed his malicious enemies, who failed to produce the slightest evidence of guilt. Even his violent opponent, Tib. Sēmprōnīus Grāechus, another plebeian, treated with contempt the prosecutors, and delivered a high eulogium on the character of that illustrious Roman, in 189 B. C. After the death of Scīpio, M. Pōrcīus Cāto, who was supposed to have instigated the Pētīllīi, supported them in a motion against Scīpio, for which every one of the tribes voted (Liv. xxxviii. 50—55). Authors are not agreed with respect to the names of Scīpio's accusers (Aur. Vic. Vir. Il. 49).—2. A plebeian tribune at Rome, in 189 B. C., who joined his colleague of the same name, in the impeachment of P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus. See former article. Adj. Pētīllius, a. um. Pētīllīna rōgātio (Liv. xxxviii. 69).—3. Was elected city praetor in 183 B. C., when the senate ordered him to raise two tumultuary legions, to compel every man under fifty years of age to enlist, in consequence of the Ingaunī Ligūres besieging L. Aemilius Paullus in his camp. From L. Pœdilius, notary, he borrowed a reading of the works of Numa Pœmilius, found in the property of the latter, preserved in stone chests. A perusal of their contents convinced him, that they ought to be destroyed, from their containing sentiments and precepts subversive of the established religion. The owner, on purpose to compel him to restore them, applied to the tribunes of the people, who referred the matter to the senate, and the latter adopted the opinion of the prætor, ordered the writings to be burned, and a reasonable compensation given to the notary. Five years after, he obtained the consulship, and was killed in Liguria (Liv. xl. 18 seq.).

Pœtitarus, i. m. the Voinicovo, a river of Ætolia (Liv. xlii. 22).

Pœtôsirîs, is. m. an Egyptian mathematician and philosopher of great eminence, who seems, from Plinius, to have had considerable knowledge of astronomy; but blended in his mind with the absurdities of astrology (i. 177 seq.). At the latter science Juvénalis sneers (Sat. vi. 581).

Pœtôvio, ôvis. m. Petave, a town on the confines of Illyricum, Ammianus Marcellinus says of Noricum, washed by one of the northern branches of Dravus, the Drave (Tac. Hist. iii. 1).

Pœtra, æ. m. the name of two Roman knights, whom Suilius accused of giving their house to Pœppæa, on purpose to carry on her intrigue with Mnestor. In addition to this charge, and what procured their death, one of them was said to have had a dream, which the injustice of the times perverted into treason (Tac. Ann. xi. 4). Adj. Pœtrînus, a. um. Pœtrina ala (Tac. Hist. iv. 49).

Pœtra, æ. f. a rising ground near Dyrrachium, Durazzo, a sea-port of Macædônia, on Mære Hædræticum, the Gulf of Venice, on which Pœmpæus, in the Civil war, fortified his camp. Tuta Pœtra (Luc. Phæ. vi. 70).—2. Petræglia, an inland town of Sicily, on a hill in which Himæra, the Termini, has its source. Inh. Pœtrîni, orum. v. Pœtrînses, ium. m. Silius mentions a pool in their territory, deadly to serpents, and healthful to man (v. 20). Adj. Pœtræus, a. um. Pœtræa (urbs) (Sil. Ital. xiv. 248).—3. A town of Piæria, a district of Thessaly (Liv. xxxix. 26).—4. Another in Mædica (Liv. xl. 22).—5. A village of the Corinthians (Herod. v. 92).

Pœtræus, i. m. a centaur, whom Pirithôus, at the celebration of his own nuptials, transfixed with his lance, fastening him to a growing oak. The centaur, possessing uncommon strength, was endeavouring to tear up the tree, and had loosened it, at the time he received this mortal wound (Ov. Met. xii. 327).

Pœtræus, i. m. a Thessalian nobleman, at the head of that party of his countrymen who had embraced the interests of Cæsar.

M. Pœtræus, M. Pœtræi, m. a lieutenant-general of C. Antonius, who, in consequence of the indisposition of the consul, led on the troops of the republic against Cætilina, routed the rebel army, and left the traitor himself among the slain. He, in the Civil war, joined Pœmpæus, and, in conjunction with L. Afranius, exerted himself to protect Spain against the forces of Cæsar. They were at last obliged to surrender. These officers made a very able resistance, and, for a considerable time, baffled the utmost efforts of their brave enemy. From the account which Cæsar gives of their fidelity, activity, and martial talents, as well as from the honourable terms which he granted them, it is manifest he respected both their military valour, and their personal influence. After their capitulation, Pœtræus joined the army of the commonwealth in Africa, and, on being defeated, Juba, king of Mauriânia, Morocco and Fez, and he engaged in single combat, that they might die honourably. Juba soon laid Pœtræus dead at his feet, and then, at his own request, fell by the hand of a slave (Hirt. B. Af. 94). Livius gives an opposite statement (Ep. 114). See Juba.—2. A centurion of the 8th legion, who was killed at the siege of Gergovia, Gergoi (Cæs. B. G. vii. 50).

Pœtrînum, i. n. according to some writers, a mountain, now Rocca di Monte-Rosone, and, according to others, a town, or village, near Sinuessa. The former was the opinion of Dacier, who adds, that it yielded one of the best wines in Italy. Stadæssimum Pœtrînum (Hor. Epis. i. 5. 5).

Pœtrôcôrîi, orum. m. a people of Gallia Cæltica, who lived on the river Ille. Their chief town was Vésuna, afterwards Pœtrôcôrî, now Perigueux, the capital of Perigord. The modern city, which is ill built, contains only 6000 inhabitants, but has some Roman antiquities (Cæs. B. G. vii. 75).

Pœtrônia, æ. f. the first wife of the Roman emperor Vitellius, whom he had no sooner divorced than Dolabella married. The emperor gratified his resentment at this marriage, by the murder of Dolabella. The father of Pœtrônia was of consular rank, and she had a son to Vitellius, called Pœtrônianus g. v. (Tac. Hist. ii. 64).

Pœtrônianus, i. m. son of the Roman emperor A. Vitellius, by Pœtrônia, put to death by his father's orders, who pretended that his son intended to commit the crime of parricide, and that a consciousness of guilt induced him to end his days by poison (Suet. Vit. 6).

Pœtrônîus Priscus, Pœtrônîi Prisci, m. a man banished, with several others, to an island in the Archipelago, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xv. 71).

Pœtrônîus Sécundus, Pœtrônîi Sécundi, m. præfect of the prætorian guards under the emperor Nerva. His authority induced the cohorts under his command to declare for Nerva, on the death of Domitîanus, against whom Pœtrônîus Sécundus, among others, had conspired. To appease the fury of the prætorians, who soon after Nerva's accession to the sovereignty, demanded the conspirators, Nerva found himself obliged, after many ineffectual efforts, to give them up, and they put Pœtrônîus Sécundus to death by a single blow (Eutrop. viii. 1). See Pæthentæ.

Pœtrônîus Urbicus, Pœtrônîi Urbici, m. governor of Pannônia, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. i. 70).

C. Pœtrônîus, C. Pœtrônîi, m. a noble Roman, who held the office of consul, and showed great strength of mind, united with great softness of manners, both during his consulship, and when proconsul of Bithynia. He spent the day in sleep, and the night in business or revelry. His gaiety recommended him to the emperor Néro, and this excited the jealousy of Tigellinus, who treated him as a rival. On that account he preferred against him a false accusation, to which he gave the appearance of truth, by bribing one of his slaves to become an informer against his master. The art of his enemy prevented his being heard in his own defence, and, scorning to linger between doubt and fear, he opened his veins, and expired: Under the fictitious names of abandoned men and women, he wrote a short account of the debaucheries of Nero, and his new modes of vice, which he sealed, and sent to the emperor, having destroyed his seal, that it might not in future endanger the safety of any one (Tac. Ann. xvi. 17—19). Pope, in his Essay on Criticism, celebrates Pëtrônus in the following couplet,

"Fancy and art in gay Petronius please,
The scholar's learning with the courtier's ease."

L. Pëtrônus, L. Pëtrônii, m. a man of low birth, but rose to equestrian dignity, and to distinction in the army through P. Cælius. The latter, having been taken by the army of Cinnæ, at the time he commanded Plæcëntia, Phicenzo, fled for protection to L. Pëtrônus, who was unable to save his life, and, therefore, fell by his own hand, that he might not outlive the maker of his fortune (Val. Max. iv. 7).

P. Pëtrônus, P. Pëtrônii, m. a noble Roman, in whose house C. Lütörus Prisenæ read his verses on Drusus, for which he lost his life. Tacitus mentions that Pëtrônus was added, at the desire of the consuls, to the four sons of the emperor Tiberius, appointed commissioners to estimate the damages sustained by the fire on Mons Aventinus, in the year 35 (Tac. Ann. iii. 49: vi. 45).

P. Pëtrônus Tärpiliänus, P. Pëtrônii Tärpiliäni, m. an officer in the Roman army, who succeeded Suetônus Paullinus as commander-in-chief of the Roman armies in Britain, in 62, the year after he had held the office of consul. The emperor Nero bestowed triumphal ornaments on Pëtrônus, as if he had gained an important victory over the enemy, although he undertook no warlike enterprise, but remained inactive. The Britons enjoyed tranquillity under his government. The emperor Gälba, in the decline of life, as he advanced to Rome, put Pëtrônus to death; because he had obtained the command of the army under Nero. Adj. Pëtrônus, a, um, et, Tärpiliänus, a, um. Pëtrônica lex, a law, which prevented masters from compelling slaves to fight with wild beasts, unless for some offence proved before a magistrate. Tärpiliänum senatus consultum, subjected to severe penalties all who either abandoned a prosecution, or distressed the defendant by unnecessary delays (Tac. Ann. xiv. 29).

L. Pëtrösidus, L. Pëtrösidii, m. a standard-bearer of the army which, under the command of Q. Titüsus Sälünus and Lúcius Aurüculëus Cotta, wintered among the Ebürönes. These troops were, in consequence of a stratagem of Ambiorix, attacked on disadvantageous ground, two miles from their camp, by him, and almost wholly cut off. Pëtrösidus having, with a few of his men, returned to the camp, threw his standard within the rampart, and was killed fighting with great bravery before the fortifications (Cæs. B. G. v. 37).

Pëtrus, i, m. one of the twelve Apostles of our Blessed Saviour, and author of the two Epistles in the Sacred Volume, which bear his name (Clauß. lxxvii. 1).

Pëttälus, m. a friend of Phinëüs, who, at the nuptials of Përsëus, killed Iäpëtidës, and was himself put to death by Lycörmus (Ov. Met. v. 111 seq.).

Pëucë, es, f. Picëzia, an island at one of the mouths of Ister, the Danubë, and this branch is from it called Pënces. Fiction reckoned Pëucë the wife of Ister, hence Stätius, Pëucë circumflua undoso conjugë (i. e. Istro) (Syl. v. 2. 157). Gëtlica Pëucë (Mart. vii. 83). Inh. Pëucëni, orum, m. the Pëucëniäns (Plin. i. 479). Tacitus doubts, whether they should be reckoned Germans or Sarmatians (Mor. Ger. 46).

Pëucëstas, a, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, to whom that monarch was in some degree indebted for his life, in storming a town in India (Curt. ix. 5).

Pëucëstes, a, m. one of the body guards of Alexander the Great. After the death of that monarch, he received Persia (Justinus says Babylon, xlii. 4), as his share of the kingdoms (Cor. Nep. Eum. 7).—2. Another, by birth a Macedonian, whom Alexander the Great appointed joint governor of Egypt with Æschylus, in 331 B. C. (Curt. iv. 8 seq.).

Pëucëstus, i, m. a son of Lycëon, who, with his brothers Iäpëx and Daunius, migrated to Italy, and, having expelled the Ausönes, took possession of the southeast part of that country. Pëucëstia, a, f. the district which belonged to Pëucëstus. Inh. Pëucëstii, orum (Sing. Pëucëstius, i), m. Adj. Pëucëstius, a, um. Pëucëstri strus, the bays of Pëucëstia, i. e. the windings of the coast.

Pëucölaus, i, m. a prefect of Alexander the Great, who conspired against him (Curt. vi. 7 seq.).

Pëucron, önis, m. son of Mæötis, who gave her name to the Sea of Azoph. During the Argonautic expedition, he was one of the Scythian commanders (Val. Flacc. vi. 564).

Phacium, i, n. a town of Hëstieötis, which Philippos, king of Mæcëdönia, burned, in 200 B. C., to prevent its falling into the hands of the Romans. Eight years after, M. Bæbtus Tämphilus took and garrisoned it (Liv. xxxii. 13 seq.).

Phacëla, w, f. afterwards called Cörcëra q. v., now Corfu, from the ancient name of its citadel (νεφερά). Hömërus gives it also the name of Schëria, and Cälimächus, of Drëpänë. The ancients fabled this island to have ripe fruits all the year round, to which Jüvënalis refers (Sat. v. 151). Inh. Phacëes, um (Sing. Phacëx, icis), m. whom Höratius represents as indolent, fat, and luxurious (Epis. i. 15. 24: i. 2. 28). Phacëis, idis, f. a poem written by Tüticänus, in which he celebrated the praises of Alcëöndus, king of the Phacëians (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 12. 27), also of Phacëla, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Adj. Phacëtus, et, Phacëus, a, um. Phacëtia tellus, the island Corfu (Tibul. iv. 1. 78). Phacëia silva (Prop. iii. 2. 11).

Phacësiänus, a, um. Phacësiänus deus, a white-sandalled god. The ancient Greeks represented their deities with white sandals (Φαεινάρια). Some editions of Jüvënalis read hæc Astänorum, which suggests a very different idea, and the one preferred by Rupert (Sat. iii. 218).

Phacëma, a, f. daughter of Otänes, who, at her father's suggestion, discovered, that one of the Mägi, who had usurped the government of Persia under a false name, was an impostor (Herod. iii. 69).

Phædinus, i. m. the third son of Niöbë, whom Apölo deprived of life by an arrow, whilst wrestling with his brother Tântälus. The same weapon transixed both, and they expired at the same instant (Ov. Met. vi. 239).—2. A descendant of Penthëus, killed by Tydëus. He was one of the fifty who waylaid that hero returning on his embassy from Thëbæ, Thera, to Argos. He left his children young, but of that age, that they recognised him deprived of life (Stat. Th. ii. 575 seq.).—3. A descendant of Äästus, a king of the Argives, who fell in the Theban war by an arrow from the bow of Boeotian Amÿntas. He had been twice proclaimed victor at the Isthmian games (Stat. Th. vi. 558 seq.).

Phædon, önis, m. a native of Elis, and an eminent philosopher, who studied under Söcrätes. In early life, he appears to have been a slave, and compelled by his infamous master to submit to violation, on purpose to procure money. To him Plätö, who was his intimate friend, inscribes his treatise on the immortality of the soul (Gel. ii. 18).

Phædra, n. f. daughter of Minös, king of Crëta, Candia, and Päsiphäë, was married to Thëseüs, after the death of his wife Hippölyta. She conceived a violent attachment to her stepson Hippölytus, a man of a pure and virtuous mind, who rejected her advances with abhorrence, and his refusal impelled her to self destruction. Her name has been derived from Phædra, bringing sweetness (Fulgen. Myth. ii. 10). Ovidius writes, in her name, an epistle to Hippölytus, of which the poetry is more commendable than the subject (Ep. Her. iv.).

Phædrus, i. m. a Latin poet, of very considerable merit, has generally been accounted a Thracian by birth, and has been supposed to have been carried a captive, from his native country to Rome, by Octävius, the father of the emperor Augustus. That he was the slave of the latter we know from his own writings. Besides his liberty, he probably owed the advantages of a good education to that patron of literature. Gratitude and a high regard for his benefactor, give a favourable idea of the qualities of his heart, nor does his sincerity admit of any doubt, since he wrote as strongly in the praise of the emperor after his death, as during his lifetime. Sëjanus, the favourite of Tiberius, persecuted him with great injustice, which the poet has recorded to the infamy of that detested character. The causes, as well as the nature, of his sufferings, have not been transmitted; and where evidence fails, conjecture is fruitless. The poet could give no offence by his wealth, since he studiously avoided riches, lest he should thereby be exposed to danger. He enjoyed the patronage of Pärticilo and Eutychus, of whom nothing else is known. He lived to a great age, surviving Sëjanus, and treating his memory with a severity which would never have been pardoned; had he published the lines when that minister was living. Phædrus appears to have confined himself to the writing of fable, and took Äsöpus for his guide. The learned have extolled the purity of his language, and the sentiment frequently merits high commendation. In some instances, a greater regard to good taste and mental delicacy, would have given an additional value to his writings. When the exceptional passages are excluded, the fables of Phædrus form an entertaining and instructive school-book; but ought never to be put into the hands of youth, until divested of whatever tends to injure the delicacy of the tender mind. Improbus Phædrus, jeering, arch, Phædrus (Mart. iii. 20).

Phænäs, n. m. a prince of the Ätöli, who joined the Romans against Philippus, king of Mäcëdönia. From his having been present at the interview between T. Quintus Fläminius and that monarch, as well as his joining the former, with two thousand foot and four hundred horse, it is evident he must have been a man of considerable note. Besides, at that time he held the office of prætor. In all his transactions we observe a strict regard to the interests of his country, advancing claims in behalf of the Ätölians, which the Roman commanders did not grant, although he probably stood high in their favour, otherwise he would not have been intrusted with such important messages. From the hard conditions imposed by the Romans, after they had subdued Ätölia, the natives had again recourse to arms, and solicited the assistance of Antiochus, king of Syria, whom Phænäs thought it were better to employ as a mediator between them and the Romans, than as a commander. In this proposal, Thöas overpowered him, and the Syrian monarch was declared commander-in-chief in 194 B. C. In an interview with the consul, respecting the terms of a surrender, he acted with the spirit of a soldier, and the integrity of a patriot; but the conqueror, knowing they were completely in his power, resisted his terms, and submission was the necessary result. In 191 B. C., his countrymen invested him and Damotëles q. v. with full power to conclude a peace with the Romans (Liv. xxxii. 32 seq.).

Phænöps, öpis, m. an old man, the father of the twins Xänthus and Thöon, who were his only sons, and both killed by Diömëdes (Hom. Il. v. 152 seq.).—2. Son of Äsüs and father of Phörcys, lived in Äbydos (Hom. Il. xvii. 312 seq.).

Phæöcömes, is, m. a centaur of prodigious strength, who threw the trunk of a tree, which two oxen could scarcely move, at the head of Phönölönides, by which he killed him. While stripping his dead body, he received, from Nestor, a mortal wound, and instantly expired (Ov. Met. xii. 491—441).

Phæsäna, n. f. the chief city of Arcädia (Pin. Ol. vi. 55).

Phæstum, i. n. v. Phæstus, i. f. an inland town of Crëta, Candia (Pin. i. 451). Stëphänus states, that Phæstus, son of Rhöpälus, and grandson of Hërcöles, built it, whence its name; but Sträbo makes Minos its founder. Phæstias, adis, f. of Phæstus, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Phæstlades, um, f. the women of Phæstus (Ov. Met. ix. 715). Loth. Phæstii, orum (Sing. Phæstius, i), m. Adj. Phæstius, a, um. Phæstia tellüs, the district of Phæstus (Ov. Met. ix. 668).—2. A town of the Löcri Ozöle (Pin. i. 409).—3. A town of Thessaly, on Enrötas, a northern branch of Pënnüs, the Sakimpria, taken by M. Bæbius Tämpillus, the Roman prætor, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 15).

Phaestus, i. m. son of Bōrus, a Maeonian, killed by Idōmēneus (Hom. II. v. 43).

Phaëthon, ōtis, m. an Ethiopian, the son of Apōllo by Clymēnē according to Ovidius and Hyginus. Apollōdorus makes him the son of Tithonus, but it is not clear that he understood Aurōra to be his mother, since he makes Tithonus her son by Cēphālus. Hesiodus says that he was the son of Cēphālus and Aurōra (Th. 935). After he was grown up, a quarrel ensued between him and Epāphus, the son of Iō, who, in contempt, asserted that Mērops, Clymene's husband, and not Apōllo, was his father. Proud of his celestial origin, and disdaining to submit to this insult, Phaëthon, at the suggestion of his mother, went to the palace of the sun to ascertain the truth respecting his birth. Apōllo not only acknowledged him his son, but swore by the river Styx, that he would, in proof of it, grant him whatever he should ask. Phaëthon incautiously requested to drive the chariot of the sun for a day, which his father, in consequence of his oath, could not refuse. After pointing out the danger, and impropriety of his demand, and finding him fixed in his resolution, Apōllo gave the necessary directions, and reluctantly put the reins into his hands. But his strength being unequal to the management of the horses of the sun, they left their usual tract, and set the world on fire. Jūpiter, to prevent the destruction of the universe, darted at the presumptuous youth a thunderbolt, on which he tumbled lifeless into Eridānus, v. Pādus, the Po, near the mouths of that river. Phaëthontias, īdos, v. Phaëthontis, īdos, f. a sister of Phaëthon, also of females, or nouns feminine. In consequence of their excessive grief on account of his premature fate, all the sisters of Phaëthon were fabled to be transformed into poplar trees, and their tears into amber (Electrum). No satisfactory theory has yet been published of the origin or formation of this beautiful bituminous substance. Phaëthontia gutta, a drop of amber (Mart. iv. 32). Adj. Phaëthontēus, v. Phaëthontēus, et. Phaëthontius, a. um. Phaëthontea umbra, the shade of the poplar tree (Mart. vi. 15). Phaëthontea favilla, the cinders of Phaëthon, i. e. the effects of his setting the world on fire (Stat. Th. i. 221). Phaëthontia fabula, the fable or fiction respecting Phaëthon (Stat. Syl. ii. 4. 9). Phaëthontius amnis, the Po (Sil. Ital. vii. 149).

Phaëthusa, e. f. the eldest sister of Phaëthon, who was changed into a poplar tree (Ov. Met. ii. 346).—2. A daughter of Hēpērion and Nēera, who, with her sister Lampētē, herded the flocks and oxen of the sun (Hom. Od. xii. 132).

Phalarinē, es. f. Amatrice, a village in the district of Rēātē, on the river Trūētus, the Tonto, at which the Roman emperor Vespasianus was born (Suet. Vesp. 2).

Phalē, v. Fālē, arum. f. wooden towers, which had their name from their height, a phalando, in the Tuscan language, the sky. They were oval, or in the form of an egg, supported on pillars carved like dolphins, but some suppose, that their general appearance resembled that of eggs or dolphins, which were used at the Lūdi Circēnses, originally sacred to equestrian Nēptūnus, which accounts for the dolphins, and the other requires no further explanation. The Phalē were also warlike machines, from which Phālāricæ were thrown. Various conjectures respecting the term Phālā have been advanced. Some derive the word from φαλαί, bright, because the weapons had iron points (Fest.); others have advanced different etymologies, of which an enumeration is unnecessary.

Phālānna, v. f. a town of Thēssālīa, on Pēnēus, the Salampra, to which Pērsēus, king of Macēdōnīa, marched, on his taking and destroying Myle, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 54). Inh. Phālānnai, orum. m. Adj. Phālānnēus, a. um. Phālānnēus ager, the territory of Phālānna (Liv. xlii. 65).

Phālānthus, i. m. son of Arātus, a Lacedæmonian, by whose counsel the Spartans sent young men from Mēssēnē, that the women might have children by them, and prevent the destruction of the state. He put himself at the head of the Pārthēniē, the offspring of that illegitimate connexion, with whom he sailed to Italy, took possession of the citadel of Tārētum, Taranto, and expelled the ancient inhabitants (Just. iii. 4). Fiction narrates that, having been shipwrecked in Crisseum Mārē, a dolphin carried him to the shore, where he built Tārētum. He married Æthra. After many years, the Tārētini expelled him, when he fixed his residence at Brūndisium, Brindisi, whither the ancient Tārētini had removed, and, by an artful stratagem, secured the perpetual possession of Tārētum to the Pārthēniē, on which account they decreed him divine honours. Adj. Phālāntēus, et. Phālāntius, a. um. Phālāntēum Tārētum (Sil. Ital. xi. 16). Phālāntius Gālēsus (Mart. v. 38).

Phālānthus, i. m. a mountain in Arcādīa, on which was a town of the same name; but in ruins when Pausānias wrote (Paus. viii. 35).

Phālāntus, i. m. a Boeotian, of Tānāgra, slain in the Theban war by Hippōmēdon (Stat. Th. ix. 127).—2. A man in the army of Hannibal, whom the Roman consul Scipio killed in the engagement with that general, at the foot of the Alps, when he first made his descent on Italy. He was born on the lake Trītōnis (Sil. Ital. iv. 329 seq.).

Phālāra, orum. n. Srglida, a town of Phthiōtis, a district of Thēssālīa, Thessoly. It stood on Māliacus Sinus, had an excellent harbour, safe anchorage, and other advantages both by sea and land (Liv. xxvii. 30).

Phālāris, īdis, acc. im. m. a tyrant of Agrigētum, Gergenti, who delighted to put the guilty or the suspected to death, by the most exquisite torture. Pērillus, having made a brazen bull, of which the construction was his own invention, presented it to Phālāris, that he might enjoy the agonizing screams of the tortured, as they passed through the throat of the bull, and resembled the bellowing of that animal. Phālāris handed the machine, by making the first experiment on the inventor (Plin. v. 130). To this kind of torture, Juvēnalis alludes (Sat. viii. 81).

Phalāsārna, v. f. a town of Crēta, Candia. Inh. Phalāsārnei, v. Phalāsārni, orum. m. (Liv. xlii. 51).

Phālāsia, v. f. Kandili, a promontory of Eubœa, which some consider the true reading, not Telāsium (Liv. xxxi. 46).

Phālces, is. m. a Scythian who, in the war against the Argonauts, commanded the Cōralli, and fell by the hand of Argus (Val. Flacc. vi. 88 seq.).—2. A noble Trojan (Hom. Il. xii. 791).—3. A Trojan soldier, killed by Antilochus (Hom. Il. xiv. 513).

Phalēris, is, m. a soldier of Æneās, whom Tarnus killed (Virg. Æn. ix. 762).

Phalērum, i, v. Phalēra, orum, n. Porto Phanari, one of the three ports of Athens. The promontory is of an elliptical form, upwards of a mile in circuit. The bay is two miles long, and terminated on the northeast by a promontory, anciently called Cōlias, on which was a temple sacred to Vēnus, now The church of St. Nicholas. Into this bay fall both Cephissus and Ilissus. Inh. Phalēreī, orum, m. Adj. Phalēreus, et. Phalēricus, a, um. Phalēricus portus (Cor. Nep. Them. 6). Phalēricus fons (Plin. i. 249).

Phalērus, i, m. son of Alcon, and grandson of Erētheus, king of Athens, was one of the Argonauts. According to Orpheus, Phalēras founded Gyrtōn, a city of Thessalia, but this rests solely on the authority of that poet (144). Pausanias states, that the harbour Phalērum, the work of the Athenians, received from him that appellation. Tradition informs us, that he afterwards removed to Italy, and built a city to which he gave his own name, afterwards called Pūthēnōpē, and, at a later period, Nēapōlis, Naples. Apollonius has Eumēlēs Phalērus, whence Statius, in the opinion of some critics, uses Eumēlis, to denote Nēapōlis. See Eumēlis. Phalōria, is, f. a town of Thessaly, and the first which the Romans attacked in 200 B. C. At that time, the garrison consisted of two thousand Macedonians, whom Roman bravery compelled to yield, on which the town was plundered and burned (Liv. xxxii. 15 seq.).

Phāmeas Himilco, Phāmeas Himilcōnis, m. a prefect of the Carthaginian cavalry, of great courage and activity, whom P. Cornēlius Scipio Æmiliānus persuaded to desert to the Romans (Liv. Ep. 50). Eutrōpius does not mention the treachery of Phāmeas (iv. 10). In Greek, the name is written Phāmēs.

Phāne, aram, f. a promontory and port of Chios, which had this name, because from it Delos became visible (αναφανειν) to Lātōna (Steph.). Ptolēmæus calls it Phamæa.

Adj. Phāneus, a, um. Phāneus (mōns) rex, i, v. inter mōtes vitiferos, from the excellence of its wines (Virg. G. ii. 98).

Phanagōrus, i, v. rather Phanagōrēa, is, f. Αραγία, a city on Bosphōrus, which Ammianus Marcellinus calls an island, from its being insulated by the Black Sea and two mouths of Hypānis (xxii. 8). Inh. Phanagōrēnses, ium, m.

Phānōtē, es, f. v. Phānōta, orum, n. afterwards Justinianōpōlis, called by the modern Greeks, Drinopōlis, a fort of Epirus, which Appius Claudius Cēntho attempted, but without success, to take, in 171 B. C., in order to repair the disgrace which he had incurred at Uscina (Liv. xliii. 21—23). Phānōtē was afterwards by additional buildings enlarged to a town.

Phānōtēa, is, f. a city of Phōcis, taken at the first assault by the Roman consul, T. Quinctius Flāminius, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 18).

Phāntisōs, i, m. a son of Sōmnus, who, in dreams, assumed the appearance of inanimate objects. Mōrphēus, Phōbētōr, and Phis-tāsōs, were sent only to kings (Ov. Met. ii. 642).

Phanus, i, m. son of Būcehus, whom Apollōdōrus makes one of the Argonauts, and of whom nothing further is known.

Phāon, ōnis, m. a beautiful youth, a native of Lēsbos, Mityleni, with whom Sapphō, the eminent poetess, fell ardently in love. He rejected her advances with disdain, which drove her in despair to self-destruction (Ov. Epist. xv). Dūrus Phāon (Mart. x. 33).

Phāon, ōntis (Suet.), ōnis (Aur. Vic.), m. a freedman, who accompanied Nēro when he fled for his life, on hearing that the senate had condemned him to suffer punishment according to ancient usage (Aur. Vic. Ep. 5).

Phāre, arum, f. Kalamata, a town of Lācōnia, which Hōmērus and Stārtus call Phāris, stood on the banks of the Nēdon, near the mouth of that river, and now gives name to the gulf anciently Sinus Mēssēniācus. It was destroyed by the Lacedemonians. Inh. Phāritæ, arum, m. Adj. Phāreus, a, um. Phārai duces (Stat. Th. ii. 163).—2. A town of Achāia, which Augustus gave to the inhabitants of Patras, Patra (Paus. vii. 22).—3. A town of Mēssēnia, which had a temple of Fortūna, called Tyche by the Greeks (Paus. iv. 30).

Phāriōn, ōnis, m. a king of Egypt, to whose history the reader is referred to Exodus (chap. 1—14). To him Claudian refers (lxxvii. 8).

Phāris-mānes, is, m. king of Asiatic Ilēria, and brother of Mithridates. When advanced in age, to divert the attention of his son Rhādāmistus, who expressed discontent at his living so long, he advised him to make himself master of the kingdom of Armēnia, held by his uncle Mithridates. After the murder of his uncle and benefactor, Phāris-mānes and his son took possession of the country, from which the emperor ordered them to withdraw, in the year 51. Phāris-mānes afterwards put Rhādāmistus to death, for imputed treason. Having formed a treaty with the Romans, at the time they declared war against the Armenians, he gratified his rooted aversion to the inhabitants of that kingdom, by entering into the war against them with great zeal and ardour, whilst he wished to be considered as acting the part of a faithful and active ally (Tac. Ann. vi. 32 seq.).

Phāris, is, v. Phāre, es, f. Vafio, a town of Lācōnia (Hom. Il. ii. 582).

Phārmācūsa, is, f. Fernaco, an island in Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, near which Jūlius Cēsar was made prisoner by pirates (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 4). Strābo mentions two islands of this name.

Phārnabāzus, i, m. a Lacedemonian commander, who, with Mindārus, had an engagement with the Athenians, at Sēstos, in 410 B. C. (Just. v. 4).—2. A Persian viceroy, or lord-lieutenant, who governed Iōnia and Lydia, under Artaxerxes Mnēmōn, about 400 B. C. His name occurs frequently in the writings of Cornēlius Nēpos. From the circumstances which he mentions, the reader will easily perceive, that he regulated his conduct rather by the policy of the statesman, than the principles of the moralist. The murder of Alcibiādes, who may be considered his guest, imprints an indelible stain on his character (Cor. Nep. Alcib. 10).—3. An officer under Darius, whom he appointed governor of the seacoast, which had formerly been under Memnon. After the battle of Issus, he was made prisoner, with his wife and son, by Alexander the Great (Curt. iii. 3 seq.).

Pharnaces, is, m. a king of Pontus, who sent ambassadors twice to Rome, in 184 B. C., and in 183 B. C., to complain of grievances. He was the grandfather of Mithridates (Liv. xl. 2. ge. Just. xxxviii. 6).—2. Son of Mithridates, king of Pontus, who made war upon his own father, besieged him in his palace, and, by this conduct, obliged him to swallow poison, which having no effect, he prevailed upon Bitautus, a Gaul, to put him to death, in 65 B. C. He successfully opposed Cn. Domitius for some time; but afterwards was conquered. Livius calls him king of Pontus (Ep. 102—113). In the civil war, he attempted to recover the whole of his father's possessions, of which Cn. Pompeius had rewarded his undutiful and unnatural conduct towards his father, with only part; on which account Caesar, after the death of that noble Roman, marched an army into that country and conquered him, according to Florus, before he saw him. Writing to a friend at Rome, Caesar describes his victory in these words, "Veni, vidi, vici," judging neither the victory nor the enemy worthy of a more detailed account. From Velleius Paterculus, it appears, that through his treacherous conduct, Cn. Pompeius overpowered his father (ib. 40).—Impla signa Pharnacis (Luc. Phar. x. 476).

Pharnicia, called also Cērazunt, or Cērāsus g. r. Pharnicia, called also Cērazunt, or Cērāsus g. r.

Pharsalia, v. Pharsalia, orum, m. an Indian nation (Curt. ix. 2), called by Justinus Presidia g. r. Pharsalia, called also Cērazunt, or Cērāsus g. r.

Pharsalia, v. Pharsalia, orum, m. a place on the west coast of Greece, where Caesar landed his forces, when he went to that country in pursuit of Pompey (Caes. B. C. iii. 6). Some editions falsely have Pilestis, on the authority of P. Mārus, who found that reading only in a single manuscript.

Pharsalus, v. Pharsalus, i. f. Pharsa, or Pharsala (Greeks), and Tzatalze (Turks), a town of Phthiotis, a district of Thessalia, Thessaly, on the east bank of the river Enipeus, not far from its junction with Apidānus, the Epideno, a southern branch of Peneus, the Salampria. Pharsalia, v. f. a large plain in the vicinity of Pharsalus, noted for the victory which Caesar obtained there (12th May, 48 B. C.) over Pompey and the forces of the republic. Pharsalia, v. f. an epic poem, written by Lucan, on the civil war between Pompey and Caesar. Inh. Pharsalii, orum, m. (Diog. Laert. ii. 6). Adj. Pharsalius, et, Pharsalius, a, um. Pharsalia terra (Liv. xxxiii. 6). Pharsalia juga, the mountain tops in the vicinity of Pharsa (Luc. Phar. vi. 573). Pharsalius annus, the year in which the battle of Pharsalia was fought (Luc. Phar. v. 391). Pharsalia acies (Suet. Jul. Caes. 30).

Pharsalus, i. m. a man killed in the Theban war by Hippomedon, in Ismēnus, the Ismēno (Stat. Th. ix. 312).

Pharus, i. m. a man in the army of Tūrnus, killed by Aeneas, who fixed a dart in his mouth, at the time he was giving vent to his stupidity in foolish words (Virg. Aen. x. 322).

Pharus, v. Phāros, i. f. an island, said at one period to have been distant from the continent of Egypt a day's sailing, which may, among the ancients, be estimated at 35 miles, with a good breeze. This assertion, although recorded by Pliny, surely exceeds the truth. It is now joined to the continent, and the modern town of Alexandria stands on the alluvions which has extended the Delta to that island. At the time Caesar pursued Pōmpēius to Egypt, Phāros contained a number of houses so considerable as to have the appearance of a town. On it stood the famous lighthouse, a square building, each of its sides a stadium in length, erected by the celebrated architect Sōstrātus of Cnidus. The tower was so high, that it could be seen at the distance of one hundred miles. This pile cost Ptolēmaeus Philādēphus 800 talents, and was esteemed one of the wonders of the world, hence called Phōsnaea. Phāros (Prop. ii. 1. 30), or perhaps the poet meant simply by the adjective, Egyptian. Inh. Phāritar, arum, m. seem, at the period above-mentioned, to have been a horde of robbers and pirates, who plundered every ship which entered their harbour, either from inadvertency, or from stress of weather. Adj. Phāritar, et, Phāritar, a, um, of Phāros, Pharian; also Egyptian. Phāritar Rex, the king of Egypt. Phāria conjux, Clēōpātra (Mart. iv. 11). Phāria urbs, Mēmpis (Mart. vii. 29). Phārium acētum, Egyptian vinegar, which was highly esteemed by the Romans (Juv. Sat. xiii. 85. Mart. xiii. 122). Phāria juvēna, Isis (Ov. Art. Am. iii. 635). Phāritar piscis, the Egyptian fish, i. e. the crocodile (Ov. Art. Am. iii. 270).—2. Phanari by the Greeks, and Phanar by the Russians, in both languages signifying a lantern, or lighthouse, stands upon a rock about Yerihale, towards Mæotis, said to have been built by Mithridates, hence often called by the modern Greeks Phanari Mithridati.

Phaselis, Idis, f. a town in Lycia, the site of which projects far into the sea, and is the first land seen by people coming from Cilicia. Ships can be descried from it at a great distance, and this seems its chief advantage; since it is very unhealthy, particularly in the summer months. Livius mentions this evil, which has probably increased in modern times; for there are few towns in the Mediterranean not subject to noxious air, some time of the year (xxxvii. 23). P. Sērvilius Isauricus destroyed it during the war against the pirates, in 79 B. C. (Flor. iii. 6). In the neighbourhood of Phaselis, blazed Chimæra (Plin. i. 256). Parva Phaselis (Luc. Phar. viii. 251). Inh. Phaselite, arum, m. (Cic. Agrar. ii. 19).

Phasis, Idis, m. a man who assumed, in the theatre at Rome, the rank and place of a Roman knight, to which he had no claim (Mart. v. 8).

Phasis, is, v. Idos, f. Fazs, a river of Cōlchis, which rises in Armēnia, and falls into Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea. Near the mouth of this river, were a town and a grove of the same name. The latter is distinguished by the story of the golden fleece. According to Ovidius, it had a rapid current, and probably brought down a considerable quantity of alluvion, hence Rapida vada limosa Phāsidos (Ov. Met. vii. 6). Jūstinus makes it a boundary of Scythia (ii. 2). Phāsias, fādos, et, Phāsias, Idos, f. of Phāsias, applied to a female, or to a noun feminine. Phāsia, Mēdza (Ov. Ep. Her. xvi. 345 &c.). Phāsides (galline) (Mart. xiii. 45). Adj. Phāsiaeus, et, Phāsianus, a, um, of Phāsias, or Cōchis, Colchian. Phāsiaea unda (Ov. Trist. ii. 439). Phāsianū avis, a pheasant, first brought to Greece by the Argonauts from Phāsias, whence the name is derived (Mart. xiii. 72). The Phāsias of Xēnōphon, is a river of Armenia, and appears to be the upper part of Araxes q. v. Phāsiani, orum, m. a people who lived on the banks of the Phāsias, from whom the country was called Phāsiana, now Passin.

Phaulus, i, m. father of Apisōn, hence called Phaulstades (Hom. II. xi. 577).

Phēa, w, f. a city of Thessaly, on Pēneus, the Salamoria, not far from Gōmphi (Liv. xxxii. 14), probably the same with Phēcādis, mentioned by the same historian (xxxi. 41).

Phēcādis, i, f. a city of Thēssālia, Thessaly. See Phēa.

Phēgēas, w, v. Phēgēus, ēs, m. a king of India, who presented Alexander the Great with gifts, obeyed the orders of that monarch, and thus secured his own property, and that of his subjects (Curt. ix. 1). Phēgēus is the preferable reading.

Phēgēus, ēs, m. a servant (Virg. Æn. v. 263).—2. A Trojan, slain by Tūrnus (Virg. Æn. ix. 765).—3. Another, who also fell by the hand of Tūrnus, but not before he had displayed great personal intrepidity (Virg. Æn. xii. 371).—4. A son of Alphēus, and king of Psōphis in Arcādia, was the father of Arsīnōē, Alphēsibea, or, Psōphis, whom Alcēmēon married. He appears to have possessed the gift of prophecy. Phēgis, Idis, f. Arsīnōē, daughter of Phēgēus (Ov. Rem. Am. 455). Adj. Phēgēus, a, um. Phēgēus censis, the sword of Phēgēus, with which he slew his son-in-law, Alcēmēon (Ov. Met. ix. 412).—5. A Theban, killed by Tydeus. He was one of the fifty, who lay in ambush for the life of that hero (Stat. Th. ii. 609).—6. A priest of Bāchus, who killed Acōntēus, in the Theban war, after that warrior had exhausted all his weapons on the tame tigers which strayed about the town of Thēbae, Thēba. Agrēus cut off his right hand, which, after being separated from his body, both held the sword and moved. Acētes beheld this sight with horror, and therefore lopped it off (Stat. Th. vii. 603; viii. 442).—7. A man despatched by Thēseus, at the end of the Theban war, to Crēon, king of Thēbae, Thēba, demanding the rites of interment for the Argives who had fallen during that bloody contest (Stat. Th. xii. 596 &c.).

Phēmīus, i, m. son of Terpius, a very learned poet and musician, said to have been the instructor of Hōmērus in these arts. He appears, although reluctantly, among the lovers of Pēnēlōpē, whom he entertained with songs and music (Hom. Od. i. 154 seq.).

Phēmōnōē, v. Phēmōnōē, ēs, f. a daughter of Apōllo, whom Pliūius mentions (ii. 390). According to some authors, she was the first priestess of Apōllo, according to others, an Arcadian; but the opinion of commentators ought not to be set in opposition to the authority of a Roman author. Lūcānus frequently mentions Phēmōnōē, in the fifth book of the Phārsālia. Arcāna Phēmōnōē (Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 39).

Phēnēs, i, f. a lake of Arcādia, in the vicinity of Phēnēum, which some say was afterwards called Nōnācris. The waters of this lake, according to Ovidius, were noxious if drunk during the night, but might be taken with safety during the day (Met. xv. 332). Pausānias says, that at certain times it was fatal both to man and cattle, and mentions other circumstances manifestly fabulous. According to Stātius, Styx derived its source from this lake, Et Phēnēs nigro Stēgga mittēre crēdita Diti (Th. iv. 291). The town Phēnēum had its name from the founder Phēnēs.

Phēnēs, ēs, v. ēi, m. a commander in the army of Pōlyneices, during the Theban war. The reading in Stātius is disputed (Th. ix. 847).—2. Son of Mēlas, killed by Tydeus (Apol. i. 8).

Phēnēs, i, f. v. Phēnēum, i, n. Phonia, a city of Arcādia, at the foot of Cyllēnē, mount Olonos, at which Evānder entertained Anchises, father of Ænēas (Virg. Æn. viii. 165). Cyllēnēum Phēnēum (Catal. lxxvii. 109). Phēnētis, Idis, f. a woman of Phēnēum. Iuh. Phēnētē, arum, m.

Phēra, arum, v. Phērē, ēs, f. a well-built maritime town of Mēssēdia, in Pēlōponnēsus, the Morea, which, with other gifts, Agāmēmnon promised to Achilles, if he returned to the Trojan war (Hom. II. v. 543 seq.).

Phēra, arum, f. Belestina, a town of Thēssālia, Thessaly, at no great distance from Sinus Pēlāgicus, the Gulf of Volo. Antiōchus took it in 193. B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 9). The Hyperian fountain (Τρυγὴν ὑπερίαν), Kephalo-brusi, is in the suburbs, at the foot of the ancient Acrōpōlis. It is a small lake, apparently about a hundred yards in diameter, the water uncommonly pure, and surrounded by many beautiful trees. Strābo, by mistake, places Kephalo-brusi in the middle of the town. Belestina contains few ancient remains, but its situation is most delightful. Iuh. Phērēi, orum (Sing. Phēraus, i), m. Rites Phērēi, after the manner of Alexander, king of Phērē, whom his wife killed in his bed-chamber, on suspicion of his incontinency (Ov. Ib. 321). Adj. Phērēus, a, um. Phērēus gens (Ov. Ep. Pont. ii. 9. 43). Phērēus vacca, the cows of Admētus, king of Phērē (Ov. Ep. Her. v. 151).

Phērēclēs, i, m. son of Hārmonides, the man who built the ship which carried Paris from the coast of Troy to Greece, and in which he returned to his native shores, carrying with him Hēlēna, the wife of Mēnēlāus, king of Spārtā. He was killed by Mēriōnes. Adj. Phērēclēs, a, um. Phērēclēs puppis (Ov. Ep. Her. xvi. 22).

Phērēcydes, is, m. a philosopher of great antiquity, the preceptor of Pēthāgōras. The place of his birth has been disputed, some making him a native of Scyros, and others, of Syria. He had a considerable knowledge of astronomy, which enabled him to calculate eclipses with precision. The immortality of the soul, and the metempsychosis, were the most important articles in his philosophical creed. Pēthāgōras, who gave celebrity to these opinions, probably improved upon the ideas of his master, whom he esteemed and venerated, attended on his deathbed, and performed his funeral rites in a manner creditable both to the preceptor and scholar. According to Cicero, he lived in the reign of Servius Tullius. Phérécyade, arum, m. the inhabitants of Pátēōli, Puzzuolo, so called from that town having been built by Samians, among whom Phérécydes resided some time, and, as already-mentioned, had been the instructor of Pythagoras (Sil. Ital. xii. 159). Others say, a different Phérécydes conducted to Italy, the colony of Samians who built Pátēōli, Puzzuolo, and to him that appellation may be referred.—2. A historian, who flourished before the time of Herodotus, was born at Athens, during the reign of Darius Hystaspides (Cic. Orat. ii. 13).

Phérénice, es, f. a woman whose father, brothers, and sons were victorious at the Olympic games, where she was the only woman ever present, females being strictly prohibited, because the combatants appeared naked (Val. Max. viii. 14).

Phéréniceus, i, m. the name of a horse of Híeron, which gained the prize in the Olympic games (Pin. Ol. i. 29 seq.).

Phérēs, ētis, m. a man in the army of Æneās, killed by Hálēus (Virg. Æn. x. 413).—2. The father of Admētus, king of Phéræ. Phérēlades, æ, m. a patronymic of Admētus (Ov. Met. viii. 310). Phérētlādæ cōjūx, Alēstis (Ov. Art. Am. iii. 19).—3. A man who, in the Theban war, killed Abas, and attacked Hippomēdon when attempting to carry off the dead body of Týdēus (Stat. Th. viii. 446 seq.).

Phérinum, i, n. a fort in Thēssālía, which surrendered to Amýnānder, king of the Athānānes, after he had taken Gómphi, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 14).

Phállā, es, f. one of Diana's nymphs (Ov. Met. iii. 172).

Phidias, æ, m. an Athenian, who attained high eminence as a statuary. He was the son of Chármidas. Pausānias and Plinius have mentioned several pieces of his workmanship, which commanded the admiration of all who saw them. Few artists have rivalled, and none have surpassed, the excellence of Phidias. Adj. Phidiācus, a, um. Phidiācus Jūpiter, a statue of Jūpiter, the workmanship of Phidias (Prop. iii. 9. 15). Phidiācum ebur rēbat (Juv. Sat. viii. 103). Phidiācu mēnus, the hand of Phidias (Stat. Syl. v. 1. 6).

Phidippus, i, m. brother of Antiphus; both were commanders in the Trojan war (Hom. Il. ii. 678).

Phidilēs, es, f. a woman, to whom Hórātius addresses one of his odes (lii. 23). Some have supposed, that she kept his house in the country, and that she foolishly imagined the gods were most successfully propitiated by magnificent sacrifices. In such a situation, she would, according to the Roman practice, have the charge of domestic sacrifices, to lessen the expense, in which, perhaps, she was extravagant, and to convince her that the gods had greater delight in moral purity, and upright behaviour, than in costly offerings, the poet wrote that ode.

Phila, æ, f. a town of Mācēdōnia, at which Pērsēs left Timōthēus, one of his generals, in 173 B. C., to endeavour to gain the affections of the Māgnētes and other neighbouring states (Liv. xlii. 67).

Philādēlphā, v. Philādēlphēa, æ, f. Ala-

Sher, a city of Lýdia, built by Attālus, son of Philādēlphus, who gave it this name in honour of his father. It was destroyed by an earthquake in the year 17. Iah. Philādēlphēni, orum (Siag. Philādēlphēnus, i), m. (Tac. Ann. ii. 47).—2. A city of Sýria, according to some of Arābla, and to others of Dēcāpōlis, first called Ammāna, afterwards Astārtē, and at last Philādēlphā, from Ptōlēmæus Philādēlphus (Steph.).

Phile, arum, f. El-Heif, or, Heza, a small island in the Nile, above the first cataract, which Plinius places opposite Sýnē, Es-souan. The island was nearly covered by a town, most probably strongly fortified, since Lūcānus calls it Claustra regni (Phar. x. 313). Strābo makes it the common residence of the Ethiopians and Egyptians (1158).

Phileni, orum, v. on, m. two brothers, whom their countrymen, the Carthaginians, deputed to set out from Cārthāgo, at a certain hour of a particular day agreed on between them and the Cýrēnēnses, when two should likewise be sent from their capital, and the place where they met was to form the boundary between the two contending nations, who both asserted their right to a tract of land of uniform surface, which lay between them. After having exhausted their strength in the mutual destruction both of fleets and armies, and dreading a superior force might attack them both, when weakened by alternate defeats, they agreed on this mode of decision to prevent the further loss of lives and treasures. The Phileni travelled with extraordinary celerity, and the deputies from Cýrēnē having loitered by the way, either from indolence, or from hurricanes, which prevail in these sandy tracts, they met much nearer Cýrēnē than Cārthāgo. The commissioners from the former state, dreading the vengeance of their countrymen, at first accused the Carthaginians of setting out before the stipulated time, which the latter denied; and, therefore, at last proposed, that the Phileni should be buried alive in the spot which they required as the boundary of the empire, and, if they hesitated, that they would advance to the place which they considered the proper limit, and would fulfil the same condition. The Phileni accepted the offer, and were buried alive at the place where they met the Cyrenian deputies. There the Carthaginians dedicated altars to their memory, which were kept in repair for many ages, Philanōrum Ara, now Mukdar (Sal. Jug. 79). The remote period in which this occurrence took place is unknown, and the story, it must be confessed, has more the appearance of a legendary fiction, than of an historical truth. Besides, if the distance between Cýrēnē and Cārthāgo be divided into eight equal parts, the Phileni will be found to have travelled six, while the deputies from Cýrēnē travelled only two, of these parts. This is too absurd to require confutation.

Philenis, idis, f. a woman of forbidding appearance, ridiculed by Mārtiālis in several of his epigrams (ii. 33 gc.).

Philāgus, i, m. king of the Bālācri (Curt. iv. 13).

Phlāmmon, ōnis, m. a Thracian, who had, by the nymph Argiōpē, Thāmýras q. v.—2. A son of Phæbus and Chlōnē, daughter of Dēdālōn, brother of Cēyx. Chlōnē bare, at the same birth with Phlāmmon, Autōly-ceus, son of Mērcūrius, a notorious thief. Philaemon was a most skilful player on the flute (Ov. Met. xi. 317). Some commentators consider him the father of Thāmyras. It has been maintained, but not on good authority, that he was one of the Argonauts.

Philēas, æ, m. a native of Tarentum, Taranto, a man of a restless disposition, and of great activity. Having been a long time at Rome, under pretext of an embassy, and wearied of inaction, he gained admission to the Tarentine hostages in that city, and prevailed on them to make their escape with him, in 214 B. C. Their flight was discovered early on the following day, and on being overtaken, they were brought back, scourged in the Casmilium, and thrown down the Tarpeian rock. This cruel measure had the approbation of the commons (Liv. xxv. 7).

Philemēnus, i, m. a young nobleman of Tarentum, Taranto, who, with Nico q. v., formed a conspiracy of the youth of their own rank, against the Romans, who had lately put their hostages to death. See Philēas. By an artful stratagem, they succeeded in betraying that city to Hannibal. The manner of his death is unknown. When the Romans regained possession of Tarentum, he escaped on horseback, and his horse was afterwards found without a rider; but his body was never discovered (Liv. xxv. 8 seq.).

Philemon, ōnis, m. a Phrygian, the husband of Baucis, who gave a lodging, and such provisions as his poverty afforded, to Jupiter and Mērcūrius, traversing Phrygia, in the form of men, to try the dispositions of the inhabitants. Before these gods quitted the place, to prove their divinity and respect for the virtuous, they changed the cottage, inhabited by Philemon and Baucis, both of a great age, into a temple, and, at their request, made them the priests of it. At death they were both transformed into trees (Ov. Met. viii. 631—720). These deities punished the inhospitalities and wickedness of the Phrygians, by turning their country into a lake.—2. A writer of the new comedy, whom some prefer to Mēnander. In the general opinion, his writings are considered inferior to those of Mēnander, yet his merits entitled him to rank next to that unrivalled Greek (Vel. Pat. i. 16).—3. Secretary of C. Jūlius Cæsar, who had undertaken to poison him, and, therefore, Cæsar put him to death, but not by torture (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 74).

Philēnus, i, m. a man, ridiculed by Martialis (x. 102).

Philēros, ōtis, m. a man beloved by Galla, a woman to whose lewdness old age had not put an end. Martialis wishes she were the wife of Philēros, that is, wishes her death, since this infamous man had been seven times guilty of murder, by administering poison to each of his seven wives (ii. 34).

Philētærus, i, m. a brother of Eumēnes, king of Asia, whom that monarch left at Pergamus, in 173 B. C., to manage the affairs of the kingdom, whilst he, with his brothers, Attalus and Athēneus, went to Greece, to assist the Roman consul, P. Licinius Crassus, against Pērseus, king of Mæcedonia (Liv. xlii. 55).

Philētus, æ, m. a grammarian of considerable eminence, whose merits, as an elegiac poet, have placed him, in the opinion of Quintilianus, next to Callimachus. Prōpertus imitated him, and begins the first elegy of the third book, with an invocation to Callimachus and Philētus. He was a native of Cos, Lango, and the preceptor of Ptolemaeus Philadēphus. Athēnus writes, that he was so slender and light, that, to prevent his being blown away by the wind, he kept pieces of lead in his pocket. Adj. Philētus, a, um. Philētis cōrganis, with the chaplets of Philētus, i. e. the poetic fame of Philētus (Prop. iv. 6. 3).

Philētus, i, m. a man, to whom Sextus pretended to be in debt, on purpose to prevent Martialis from applying to him for the loan of money (Mart. ii. 44).—2. A man whom Phædrus addresses, in the last line of his fables.

Phileus, ōis, m. a native of Thēbe, whom Thēseus killed in the Theban war (Stat. Th. xii. 745).

Philippi, orum, m. a town on the frontier of Mæcedonia, Macedonia, and Thracæ, Romania. When first mentioned in history, it is called Crēnides, then Dātos, afterwards Philippi, from being enlarged and fortified by Philippus, the father of Alexander the Great. The vicinity of this town, is noted for being the spot on which the last effort was made, for the recovery of Roman liberty, in 44 or 42 B. C. The republican forces were under the command of Brūtus and Cæssus, and at the head of the other army were Augustus and Antōnius. Brūtus defeated Augustus, and took his camp: but the troops of Cæssus were routed, and his camp carried by Antōnius. Being prevented by the dust, from seeing the success of his colleague, Cæssus concluded all was lost, and, in despair, killed himself. The command of the whole army then devolved on Brūtus, who, from circumstances, was reluctantly compelled to risk a general engagement, in which he was completely routed, and, like Cæssus, fell by his own hands. Stātus has conveyed a striking idea of the carnage at Philippi, in a single line, Albos æstibus Rēna Philippus (Syl. ii. 7. 65), and Lucānus describes its situation, in the following words, Latosque Hæmi sub rupē Philippus (Phar. i. 680). The battle of Pharsalla weakened, but that of Philippi crushed, the spirit of Roman independence. From that period no regular plan was formed, no united effort made, to regain their usurped rights. The descendants of a brave and free people continued to live in subjection to the will of successive tyrants, until the northern barbarians obtained possession of Italy, Italy.

—2. Another, in Thessaly, near Pharsalos, Pharsala, or, Tzatalze. Of this town, the original name was Thēbe, and, to distinguish it from Thēbe in Bœotia, Thessalia, or, Phthia, v. Phthiotica was annexed. But, on falling under the power of Philip, it was, in honour of the conqueror, called Philippopolis (i. e. the city of Philippus), which the inhabitants, from convenience of pronunciation, contracted to Philippi. No vestige of it now remains. Adj. Philippæus, Philippicus, Philippus, a, um, et, Philippensis, is, a. Philippæi campi (Manil. i. 907). Philippensis acies (Tac. Ann. iii. 76). Philippici campi (Flor. iv. 2). Philippi campi (Aur. Vict. Vir. ii. 83).

Philippopolis, is, f. Philippopoli, or, Philiba (as the Turks pronounce it), anciently Eumolpas, a city of Thræcia, near the sources of Hébrus, the Maritza, built by Philippus, father of Alexander the Great, from whom it received this name. It was the capital of Thræcia, and stood in the canton of the Bessi (Tac. Ann. iii. 38).—2. A city of Thessaly, of which the former name was Thèbe Pthiæ, e. Pthiotices. After Philippus, king of Mæcédônia, had enlarged it, he gave it this name (Liv. xxviii. 7. seq.).—3. A city of Arabia, built by the emperor, M. Julius Philippus, who was a native of that country (Aur. Vic. Cæs. 28).

Philippus, i. m. son of Argæus, who succeeded his father as king of Mæcédônia, and was the first monarch of that state, who bore this name. Cut off by an early death, Aërôpus, a very young boy, by the appointment of Philippus, ascended the throne (Just. vii. 2). If the chronology of Eusebius be correct, Justinus is very inaccurate, Philippus having obtained the monarchy in 644 B. C., and Aërôpus in 609 B. C.—2. A son of Amyn-tas, king of Mæcédônia, and Eurydice, and brother of Alexander, Pêrdiccas, Archelaus, Aridaeus, and Mênclæus. Having been sent, in early life, as a hostage to Thebe, he acquired great knowledge of military affairs, under Epaminondas; but he had neither by nature or acquisition, the mildness, temperance, magnanimity, and justice which constituted the character of that great warrior and statesman. Ambition stimulated Philippus to vigorous exertion, for the attainment of useful information, and he acquired, during his residence at that town, a thorough acquaintance with the customs, practices, and general character of the Greeks. After his return to Mæcédônia, on the death of his brother Pêrdiccas, he assumed the reins of government, as tutor for his nephew, when ambition destroyed in his breast all sense of relative duty and moral obligation; therefore, instead of fulfilling the part of a faithful guardian, he acted that of an iniquitous usurper. At first he averted, by policy, the hostilities to which he was unequal, afterwards he took, by force, Amphipolis, a Grecian colony, conquered part of Thræcia, which contained mines of gold, and, to increase his power, married Olympias, daughter of Nêoptôlemus, king of the Môlôssi, by whom he had Alexander, surnamed the Great, and Clêôpâtra. Universal conquest only could satiate his unbounded love of dominion, which he endeavoured to gratify by the utmost activity, conjoined with a powerful mind and great military talents. Not trusting wholly to the strength of his armies, he had recourse to bribery, by means of which he carried many towns and forts. In spite of the eloquence of Demosthènes, the well-concerted schemes of Philippus enabled him ultimately to overpower the Athenians, and to render himself master of almost all Greece. To enumerate the towns which he took, the battles which he fought, and the designs which he formed, for the aggrandizement of himself and family, would be to write a history, rather than to exhibit a biographical summary. The victory at Côrônêa leaving him no enemy in Europe, he meditated the conquest of Asia; but the dagger of Pausanias q. v.; as he entered the theatre, at the marriage of his daughter, Clêôpâtra, to Alexander, king of Epirus, put an end both to his military enterprises and life. No historian has traced this murder to its undoubted cause, although most authors attribute it to the divorce of Olympias, and the resentment of her son Alexander. The reason assigned in the life of Pausanias, has more the appearance of fiction than truth. The character of Philippus stands higher as a warrior and a politician, than as a man and a husband. He possessed great sagacity, an accurate knowledge of mankind, which secured him against being overreached. Cunning, fallacy, and intrigue, he appears to have considered necessary qualifications in an ambitious monarch. In his private life, there is little to commend, either in principle or conduct. The revolting crimes which he unblushingly committed, and the flagrant debauchery which he openly practised, excite only indignation and disgust. Besides Olympias, he had other wives. Some reckon Ptolémæus I. son of Philippus, by Arsinoë, who married Lægas during her pregnancy.—3. Philippus Aridaeus. See Aridæus.—4. A general of Alexander the Great, who, on the death of that conqueror, obtained Hyrcania (Just. xiii. 4).—5. A physician of Alexander the Great, whom Pârménion accused, to that hero, of having received a bribe from Darius to effect his death; but unjustly, since to him Alexander was indebted for the cure of a dangerous disease (Just. xi. 8).—6. Son of Antigater, who was one of the cupbearers of Alexander the Great (Just. xii. 14). See Tollas.—7. The father of Antigonus, who obtained Phrygia Major, on the death of Alexander the Great (Just. xiii. 4).—8. A son of Agathôcles, and brother of Lysimachus, who lost his life in India, pursuing the enemy with Alexander the Great (Just. xv. 3). Cœrtius mentions that he excelled in walking (viii. 2).—9. A son of Lysimachus and Arsinoë, killed, in early life, by his maternal uncle, Ptolémæus Ceraunus, and also his brother Lysimachus (Just. xxiv. 3).—10. Son of Dêmétrius, and king of Mæcédônia. On his father's death, Antigonus ascended the throne, and governed with the authority of a lawful sovereign; for twelve years, although he acted only as the guardian of Philippus. At the age of sixteen, the latter assumed the reins of government, and, wishing to enlarge his territories, attached himself to Hannibal. The Romans, notwithstanding the successes of that noble Carthaginian, sent into Greece the consul Valerius Levidus, who defeated him at Apollonia, burned his fleet, and compelled him to accept of such terms as he chose to offer. The Macedonian monarch, unwilling to submit long to the Roman restraints, again exposed himself to their fury, by aiding the Carthaginians, and T. Quinctius Flamininus, having marched against him, in a decisive engagement near Cynôcéphalæ, left him no other resource, than that of accepting the humiliating terms which the conqueror dictated. His reputed son, Pêrsêus, had art and deceit sufficient to persuade his father, that his legitimate son, Dêmétrius, plotted his dethronement, on which he caused the heir to the crown to be put to death. No sooner had he rashly deprived his son of life, than he became convinced of his innocence, on which account he adopted measures for securing the succession to his son Antigonus, but death prevented the accomplishment of that design, and Pērsēus q. v. obtained the reward of his crime in the crown of Mācēdōnia. To him Lūcānus alludes, Præda victi Philippi (Phar. iii. 158). Pellæus Philippus (Luc. Phar. x. 20).—11. Son of Cāsānder, who succeeded to his power and possessions, in 293 B. C. (Just. xv. 4).—12. A prætor of the Epirōtæ, who met Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, at Phenicæ, in Epirus, in 207 B. C., to negotiate a peace between him and the Romans (Liv. xxix. 12).—13. The elder son of Alexander of Mēgālōpōlis, who refused to intrust himself to Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, but fell into the hands of the Roman consul, Mānius Acilius Glābrius, in 193 B. C., and was sent to Rome in chains (Liv. xxxv. 47 seq.).—14. Master of the elephants to Antiochus, king of Sŷria, and held a command in the centre, at Thŷātira, in 192 B. C., where fifty-four elephants appeared in the Syrian army. Victory declared for the Romans (Liv. xxxvii. 41).—15. A contemptible Carthaginian (Liv. xxxix. 42).—16. Commanded the garrison at Cāsāndrēa, in 171 B. C., with Pŷtho, who, after the Romans had made a breach in the wall, and entered the city, not only repulsed them, but compelled them to desist from the siege (Liv. xlv. 11, 12).—17. The brother of Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia, by birth, and his son by adoption. He was made prisoner, and led in triumph, by L. Æmilius Paullus, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 52 seq.).—18. A tribune of the people, who opposed the prætorship of Faustus Sūlla, in that senate which was held without the city, when arrangements were made to support the commonwealth against the traitorous plans of Cæsar (Cæs. B. C. i. 6).—19. A noble Roman, of consular dignity, who, like Mārcellus, was, from personal considerations, passed over in the appointments which were made by the senate, at the beginning of the Civil war (Cæs. B. C. i. 6).—20. An ignorant surgeon, whose apprentice, Jūvénalis says, might be more safely trusted than himself (Sat. xlii. 125).—21. A man of great extravagance (Mart. vi. 84).

Philistio, ōnis, m. one of the præfects of Sŷracūsæ, appointed by Epicydes, put to death by the inhabitants after he had quitted their town (Liv. xxv. 28).—2. A comic poet, a native of Sārdes, who lived about the time of Socrātes, and died, if we may trust Suidas, from excessive laughter. To his writings Mārtiālis alludes (li. 41).

Philistus, i, m. a historian whom Diōnŷsius, tyrant of Sŷracūsæ, recalled to that town, when he brought Plātō from Athens, at the request of Dion. During his banishment, he had written a history of Sicily, of which no fragment now remains. He was a man of great riches, and paid the fine imposed by the magistrates on Diōnŷsius, son of Hermocrātes. Cōrnēllus Nēpos states, that Philistus was not more a friend to the tyrant than to tyranny itself (Dion 3). Nothing further respecting him is known, in consequence of the book which that biographer wrote on the historians being lost. Quintiliānus gives his character in the following words:—"Philistus deserves to be distinguished from the crowd of historians who followed Hērōdōtus, Thŷcŷdides, and Thēōpōmpus. He imitated Thŷcŷdides, and as he was much weaker, so he was somewhat clearer" (x. 1. 74).

Philo, ōnis, m. a philosopher of the academic school, who fled from Athens to escape the fury of Mithridātes, who had long carried on the war against the Romans, and fixed his residence at Rome. Cicero, who became his scholar, calls him "the prince of the academy." The orator mentions a number of particulars respecting Philo, in various parts of his writings. To him Titian alludes (Orat. 30).—2. An officer under Alexander the Great, at whose death he obtained Illyricum (Just. xiii. 4).—3. A native of Chalcis, whom Scipio Africanus demanded to be delivered up to the Romans, together with Eubulidas of the same town, and Mæsilochus, an Acarnanian, in 192 B. C. Ten years after, in the treaty with Antiochus, a clause was added, with respect to putting them three in the power of the Romans. These, an Ætolian, and Hannibal were added (Liv. xxxvii. 45 seq.).—4. A poor man, who boasted that he never dined at home, for which Mārtiālis gives this sarcastic remark, that unless invited, he got no dinner (r. 48).

Philocles, is, m. an Athenian commander, sent with a fleet to Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, and, having rejected the advice of Alcibiades, allowed Lysander, who commanded the Lacedemonian fleet, to carry a triumphant victory over him, near Ægæ Potāmos. Philocles was taken prisoner, carried to Lāmpsacus, Lamsaki, by Lysander, who killed him at that city, according to Diōdorus Siculus, by cutting his throat. From this historian, Cōnon appears to have been joined in the command with Philocles, but the latter had the command that day when the fleet was defeated, and himself made prisoner (xiii. 106).—2. A general of Philip, king of Mācēdōnia, who, with an army of Thracians and Macedonians, desolated the lands of the Athenians, made an unsuccessful attempt to take Elēūsīs by stratagem, and besieged both Elēūsīs and Athens, without obtaining possession of either. To the Eretrians he promised assistance, when their town was besieged by L. Quinctius Flāminius, but fulfilment exceeded his power. After he had raised the siege of Corinth, Argolis fell into his hands by the treachery of its inhabitants. On purpose to ascertain the truth, respecting the correspondence which Pērsēus maintained his brother Dēmētrius carried on with the Romans, Philippus sent him and Apēlles to Rome in 183 B. C., supposing they were neutral; whereas they were the mere creatures of Pērsēus. They not only returned with inaccurate statements, but a forged letter, as if from T. Quinctius Flāminius to Dēmētrius, which convinced the king of his son's guilt, and the youth was almost immediately deprived of life. After the death of Dēmētrius, Philippus came to a correct knowledge of the facts, caused Philocles to be seized, and put to death (Liv. xxxi. 16 seq.).

Philocrates, is, m. a Rhodian ambassador, who, with Astymēdes, came to Rome, at the head of a deputation from that state, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 25).—2. The slave of C. Sēmprōnius Grāccus, by whose hand that noble youth fell (Val. Max. vi. 8). Others call him Euporus q. v.

Philoctetes, et, Philocteta, as, m. the son of Pean and Demodassa, a native of Mēlissa, a city of Thessaly, was the husband of Melibœa (Stat. Syl. iii. 5. 48), and the particular friend of Hércules, whose armour-bearer he was in the Argonautic expedition. He set fire to the funeral pile which that hero had erected on Œta, Banina, and on which he had voluntarily stretched himself, to be delivered from the excessive torment produced by the poisoned robe, which his wife Dēianira had given him in a fit of jealousy. From Hércules, after a solemn promise to conceal the spot where his ashes were deposited, he received the arrows which had been dipt in the blood of Hýdra, as a reward for that last service. In consequence of a very unpleasant smell from a wound in his foot, occasioned either by the bite of a serpent which Jūno sent to torment him, because he was the companion of that hero, or by one of the poisoned arrows falling on it, as a punishment for having discovered by stamping on the ground, not to violate his oath, the spot where he had buried the ashes of his friend, he was landed by the Greeks, when they went against Troy, on the island Lēmnos, Lemno or Stalimen (hence Valérius Flaccus has "his Lemnum visurus" i. 392; as Phineus had visited Lēmnos in the Argonautic expedition), where he continued till the last year of the war. As that city could not be taken without the arrows of Hércules, he was solicited, after his wound had been cured by Æsculāpius, to join the confederate army. On account of the ill usage received from his countrymen, he at first obstinately resisted their entreaties. Hence Dūrē Philoctetē (Ov. Met. xiii. 329). The artful address and specious eloquence of Ulysses at last prevailed. At Troy he excelled all the Greeks at shooting with the bow. Ulysses was inferior only to him (Hom. Od. viii. 219). He did not return to Greece after the war was ended, on account of an insurrection in Melibœa; but went to Italy, and built the city Pētilia, Strangoli, in latter times the capital of the Brūtti, about five miles from the shore of Sinus Tārēntinus, the Gulf of Taranto. It stood on a hill of difficult ascent, and its natural advantages were greatly improved by art. In the second Punic war, the inhabitants (Pētilini), made a long and brave resistance against the Carthaginian troops, after almost the whole of Magna Græcia had submitted to Hannibal. Compelled at last by famine, more than force of arms, they opened their gates to Himilco, a prefect of that general. Justinus says that he built Thūrinorum urbs. This must be understood to mean Pētilia, not Thūri (l. v. (xx. 1). In Lēmnos was an altar to Philoctetes, mentioned by Apollonius, exhibiting monuments of that hero's calamities (Bel. Mith. 223). Peantilades, æ. m. a patronymic of Philoctetes, who, from his father Pean, is also called Peanthia proles (Ov. Met. xiii. 45); and, from being one of the Grecian commanders, Una pars ducum, i. e. Unus ducum (Ov. Met. xiii. 51). Melibœus dux, Philoctetes (Virg. Æn. iii. 401). Adj. Philoctetes, v. Philoctetēs, a. um. Philoctetēs clamor (Cic. Tusc. Dis. ii. 23).

Philodēmus, i. m. a poet mentioned by Strābo, of whom there still remain some epigrams.—2. An Epicurean, mentioned by Cicero (Fin. ii. 35).—3. A man, whose opinion Horācius gives, on a subject for which his modest readers will not thank him

(Sat. i. 2. 121). Commentators are not agreed, whether these three authors refer to one person or more.—4. An Argive, who commanded the fortress Euryālus in Sýracūse, and, after part of the city was in possession of M. Claudius Mārcellus, deferred surrendering it, in expectation of the coming up of Hippocrātes and Himilco; but being disappointed, and assured of a safe return to Epleydes, he withdrew his garrison, and delivered up the fortress to the Romans (Liv. xxv. 25).

Philoctēs, i. m. the neatherd of Ulysses, very faithful to his master. He had the charge of the other herds upon the continent of Epīrus (Hom. Od. xx. 185).

Philomēdusa, æ. f. wife of Arēthōus, king of Arna, and mother of Mēnēsthēus. Hōmērus calls her "ox-eyed" (Il. vii. 10).

Philomēla, æ. f. daughter of Pāndion, king of Athens, and Zēuxippē, was the sister of Prōcnē, who had married Tērēus, king of Thrācia. At the request of his wife, that monarch set out for Athens to bring Philomēla to his court. Pāndion, who had the strongest affection for his beautiful daughter, with the utmost difficulty prevailed on himself to part with her; but to gratify the Thracian queen, at the urgent solicitation of Tērēus, agreed to the journey. After promising an early return, they departed from Athens, which that ill-fated princess was doomed never to see again, and set sail for Thrācia. Tērēus, on returning to his native country, violated Philomēla, cut out her tongue to conceal his crime, and shut her up in a tower, pretending to her sister that she was dead. The Thracian queen not doubting the truth of her husband's assertion, bewailed in deepest anguish the premature fate of her only sister. But, after a considerable lapse of time, Philomēla having wrought her tragical story in tapestry, got it conveyed to Prōcnē, who soon effected her escape. The sisters concerting the best method of revenge, agreed to kill Itys, to dress his dead body, and serve it up to his father. Having executed their inhuman resolution, in the midst of the feast, when Tērēus called for his son, Prōcnē boasted of having been the murderer of her own child, in order to avenge his barbarity to her sister, and assured him that he had already devoured part of their infant's mangled corpse. To confirm the truth of her assertion, Philomēla threw her nephew's head on the table. Tērēus, transported with rage and grief, drew his sword to plunge into the hearts of both; but all were instantly changed into birds, himself into a hoopoe or lapwing, Epops, Philomēla into a nightingale, Luscinia, or, Philomela, Prōcnē into a swallow, Hirundo, and Itys into a pheasant, Phasianus.

Philomēlides, æ. m. a Lesbian nobleman, who used to challenge his guests, and was himself killed by Ulysses (Hom. Od. iv. 344 seq.).

Philomēlium, i. n. Algoun, called also Baliam, or, Poliam, a town of Phrygia.

Philomēlus, i. m. a commander of the Phōcēsses, under whom they plundered the temple at Dēlphi. Castris, in 364 B. C., and defeated the Thebans in the first engagement, but fell in the second, fighting with great bravery (Just. viii. 1).

Philomiusus, i. m. a man, against whom

Minutilli written an epigram (Ant. 27).— Perhaps he is the person mentioned by that poet, in other epigrams, as a haughty and perverse (Ant. 25 &c.).

Philoponus, Aris, m. a king of Cilicia, who died in the year 17 (Euc. Ann. B. 42).—2. See Alexander.

Philopomen, Aris, m. a native of Aradella, who was the father of the Achai, and commanded the army with great celebrity and success. Of naval and foreign affairs he knew little, in consequence of the place of his birth, and he had only once served abroad, in Crisa, Cordis, as a commander of auxiliaries. With respect to military operations on land, he was equal to any of the most celebrated officers, both in ability and experience. To encouragement he had paid particular attention, and excelled in the knowledge of that part of a commander's duty. The loss which the Achai sustained, at sea, through his ignorance of naval affairs, he compensated, by destroying the forces of Nabis, tyrant of Laconia, who had taken up arms on Philopomen being succeeded by Cleibides &c., and compelled the tyrant to confine himself within the walls of Sparta. He then plundered the lands of the Lacedaemonians, and, on the assassination of Nabis, formed an alliance between them and the Achai. With the view of having a pretext, the Lacedaemonians attacked Laus, which furnished Philopomen with a pretext for declaring war against that nation, whose power he wished to reduce, unless they delivered up the authors of the outrage. Enraged at this demand, the Lacedaemonians proceeded to acts of violence, renounced their alliance with the Achai, and resolved to surrender themselves to the Romans. Winter prevented the commencement of hostilities, and the consul M. Fulvius Nobilior prevailed on them to send deputies to Rome, who brought back an obscure answer, which the Achai maintained left them at liberty to act as they should see proper. Philopomen was continued in command, advanced against the Lacedaemonians in 191 B. C., restored Agar Balbinates to the Metropoli, from whom the tyrants of Lacedaemon had taken it, and destroyed the discipline of Lycurgus, after it had lasted seven hundred years. The Messeni broke the league with the Achai in 184 B. C., when Philopomen, at the head of the army, soon overcame them; but, falling from his horse, whilst crossing a ditch in a narrow defile, he was unable to regain his seat, in consequence of his having but lately recovered from a tedious illness, and being seventy years old, the enemy took him prisoner. At first the Messeni treated him with great respect, afterwards put him in a place of security, where he was exposed to public view. Judging it unsafe to trust him to any one person during the night, they shut him up under ground in a public treasury, enclosed with hewn stone, and covered with a large stone placed over it by machinery. It was immediately resolved, that he should be put to death; a cup of poison was sent him, which, after learning that Lycortas, the other commander, and the horsemen had escaped, he undauntedly swallowed, and soon after expired, in 184 B. C. In the same year died Hannibal and P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and hiktorians, both Greek and Latin, have considered that his merit as a general, were not inferior to those two celebrated commanders. On the conquest of the Minutilli, the house of Philopomen was recovered, and buried by the whole Achian citizens with more than human honours (Liv. xxv. 25.—xxvi. 5). Philopomen equal to E. Quintus Flaminus (xxv. 3).—2. The father of Melias (Ap. Bel. Mith. 184).

Philometrus, i. m. governor of the Egypt, who invaded the territory of Asia, and gained a considerable advantage over the natives, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 25).

Philotes, m. m. son of Parricidius, a general, and intimate friend, of Alexander the Great. Both father and son fell laurel victims to the cruelty of that ruthless conqueror, in 329 B. C. (Just. xii. 5). Curtius says, he acknowledged that he had conspired against the life of his sovereign (viii. 6).—2. An officer under Alexander the Great, who obtained Cilicia for his kingdom on the death of that monarch (Just. xiii. 4). To his name is added Angens, of which no explanation can be given, probably from the reading being corrupt (Curt. v. 2).—3. The commander of the garrison in Abides for Antiochus, king of Syria, in 192 B. C., when it was besieged by C. Livius Salinator, who would have carried it, had he not received intelligence, that the fleet of the Rhodes had been destroyed by Polixenus, commander of the fleet of that monarch (Liv. xxxvii. 12).

Philostinus, i. m. a native of Smyrna, who, with Nynio, Clethines and Asclepiodotus, conspired against Mithridates, and their treachery cost them their lives (Ap. Bel. Mith. 202).

Philoxenus, i. m. an officer of Alexander the Great, who obtained Cilicia, on its being taken from Philotas (Just. xiii. 6).—2. A poet of Syracuse, whom the tyrant Dionysius confined in prison, because he would not commend the foolish verses of the sovereign. Nothing could induce the poet to flatter the tyrant, or eulogize poetry, at once absurd and ridiculous, and to his steadiness he afterwards owed both his freedom, and the kindness of Dionysius. He is said to have died at Ephesus about 380 B. C. (Amm. Mar. xv. 5).

Philysa, m. v. Philysa, es, f. a daughter of Oecanus, who was the mother of Chiron by Saturnus (Ov. Met. vi. 126). Philysides, m. m. a patronymic of Chiron, from his mother (Virg. G. iii. 550). Adj. Philysides, a, um. Philysides heros, Chiron (Ov. Met. ii. 676). Philysides tecta, the house on Pellion, Plesid, in which Philysa bore Chiron (Ov. Met. vii. 352).

Philys, um. m. a people of Pontus, who inhabited the coast towards the northeast extremity of that district. Valerius Flaccus derives their name from the nymph Philysa &c. (v. 152).

Phineus, eos, m. the brother of Cepheus, king of Aethiopia, who was betrothed to Andromeda his niece, previously to her being exposed to a sea-monster, in order to appease the wrath of Neptunus. During the celebration of her nuptials with Perses, to whom she owed her deliverance, Phineus, unable to bear the disappointment, entered the assembly with armed companions, and endeavoured to carry her off by force. Perseus made a brave resistance, and by his own hand and the aid of his friends, put to death a number of the assailants, and the remainder, 200, among whom was Phineus himself, were turned to stone, by his presenting to them Medusa's head (Ov. Met. v. 8 seq.) Adj. Phineus, a, um. Phinea manus, the hand of Phineus (Ov. Met. v. 109).—2. A son of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, a native of Tyros, Sor (Val. Flacc. iv. 692), who went to Græcia, Greece, and afterwards obtained the kingdom of Thracia, Romania, was distinguished for his skill in augury. He married Cleobula, or Cleopatra, a daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, and sister of Calais and Zethes (Val. Flacc. iv. 464 seq.), by whom he had two sons, Plexippus and Pandion. He divorced this princess, to marry Idae, daughter of Dardanus, and credulously believing the false accusations which she preferred against her stepsons, put out both their eyes. The gods avenged this act of cruelty, by inflicting the same punishment on himself (Ov. Met. vii. 3), and sent the Harpies to torment him, which devoured his food, and polluted every thing with their touch. The Argonauts consulted him about their voyage, and he agreed to communicate the necessary information, provided they delivered him from these ravenous and pestilential birds. Calais and Zethes were appointed to this service, which they quickly performed, and Phineus fulfilled his promise, by giving directions, which enabled these celebrated sailors to accomplish the most memorable naval expedition recorded by antiquity. It is probable the Thracian king sent with them skilful pilots, who were acquainted with the Straits, the rocks Cyaneæ, and the navigation of Pontus Euxinus, the Black Sea. Their practical skill would be of more advantage to Iason and his companions, than any knowledge which Phineus could obtain from the flight of birds, or the entrails of beasts. Martialis uses his name in the plural, to denote blind men (ix. 26). Phinides, æ, m, a patronymic of a son of Phineus. Duo Phinides, Orphus and Cræmbis (Ov. Ib. 271). Commentators differ as to the name of the two sons of Phineus. Adj. Phineas, et, Phineus, a, um. Phinea domus, the house of Phineus (Virg. Æn. iii. 212).

Phintis, is, m, a Syracusan, who appears to have been a charioteer (Pin. Ol. vi. 37).

Phia, v. Phila, æ, f, an island in the lake Triton in Africa (Herod. iv. 175).

Phlegethon, ōntis, m, one of the rivers of the Infernal Regions. Phlegethon Tartarus (Virg. Æn. vi. 551). Phlegethōntis, Idos, f, of Phlegethon, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Phlegethōntis unda (Ov. Met. xv. 532). Adj. Phlegethōntæus, a, um. Phlegethōntæ ripe (Claud. xxxiii. 88).

Phlegon, ōntis, m, one of the horses of the sun (Ov. Met. ii. 154).

Phlegra, æ, f, afterwards called Pallænæ, a promontory between Sinus Thermæicus, the Gulf of Saloniki, and Sinus Tōrōnæicus, the Gulf of Cassandria, anciently inhabited by the giants.—2. The town which gave name to that peninsula. Adj. Phlegraeus, a, um, of Phlegra, or the giants. Phlegrai Campi, Campo Quarto, a plain in the neighbourhood of Pūtēoli, Pizzuolo, which the Latins called Lābōrium, and the Greeks Phlegraeus, v. Phlegrai. The ancients seem to have applied this adjective to any place where sulphur was found, from the giants having been destroyed by lightning, and whatever the lightning strikes emitting a smell resembling that of sulphur. The Greeks, on migrating to Italy, would naturally carry their national traditions and fictions along with them, and to some of these give a locality in their new settlements. This perhaps may account for the Phlegrai cāmpi, near Naples. Phlegraei victōria, the victory over the giants (Mart. viii. 78).

Phlegraus, i, m, a centaur, killed by Pelæus in the battle with the Læpithæ, at the nuptials of Pirithous (Ov. Met. xii. 378).

Phlegyæ, arum, m, a people of Thessaly, some say of Bœotia, described by Hæmus (Il. xiii. 302) as brave soldiers; but they were said to be exceedingly insolent and rapacious. Headed by Phorbas, they plundered the temple of Apollo at Delphi, Castris. In consequence of this sacrilegious crime, they all, says Pausanias, were destroyed by lightning, earthquakes, and famine.

Phlegyas, æ, m, a man killed by Perseus (Ov. Met. v. 87).—2. A man in the army of Etæcles, killed by Amphiaræus (Stat. Th. vii. 711).—3. The father of Ixion, who, besides other sacrilegious crimes, had set on fire the temple of Apollo, on which account, Valerius Flaccus represents him as tormented in the Infernal Regions, by Tisiphonæ (ii. 173).—4. A nobleman of Cyzicus, Chizico, whom Valerius Flaccus introduces carrying a blaze of light, on the return of the Argonauts to that city (iii. 125 seq.).

Phleas, v. Phlias, ōntis, m, son of Bæchus and Ariadne, was born at Phlius, Staphlica, a town of Achæia. According to Orpheus, Apollonius, and Valerius Flaccus (i. 412), he was one of the Argonauts, and probably the person called Phliasius by Hyginus. Pausanias makes Aræthyrea his mother, and Orpheus says, he was the son of Bæchus by a nymph, whose name he does not mention.

Phlius, ōntis, f, Staphlica, a town of Achæia, which had this name, according to Stæphanius, from Phlius, son of Diônysus and Chthônophylæ; but Pausanias makes the name of the founder, Phlias. Phliasia, æ, f, the district around Staphlica. Inh. Phliasii, orum (Sing. Phliasius, i), m. (Liv. xxxiii. 14). Adj. Phliasius, a, um. Phliasius uger, the territory of Phlius (Liv. xxxiii. 14). Phliasia regna (Ov. Ib. 327).—2. Polyfengo, a town of Argolis.

Phlogis, Idis, f, a lewd woman, whom, in the prurient of a gross imagination, Martialis compares with Chlônæ (xi. 61).

Phlogius, i, m, a son of Phryxus and Chlônæ. He and his brothers joined themselves to the Argonauts, at the island Dia, according to Hyginus. It must be acknowledged, that this statement appears very improbable, on considering the situation of Dia, and the port from which the Argonauts sailed, and would require some reason assigned for these daring adventurers departing so far from their proper course (Val. Flacc. v. 115).

Phobëtor, ōris, m, (fear), one of the sons of the god Sômnus, who assumed the form of wild beasts, serpents, and birds. By the gods he was called Ichlos q. v. (Ov. Met. xi. 640).

inspired by that god. Phæbas æra, Cassādra (Ov. Amor. ii. 8. 12). Phæbigēna, æ, m. Æsculāpius g. v., the son of Apōllo (Virg. Æn. vii. 773). Adj. Phæbēus, et, Phæbēus, a, um. Phæba lampas, the sun (Virg. Æn. iii. 637). Phæbēus ales, the crow (Ov. Met. ii. 545). Phæbēus jūvénis, Æsculāpius (Ov. Met. xv. 642); also called Phæbēus anguis (Ov. Met. xv. 742).—2. A freedman of the Roman emperor Néro, who spoke with insolence to Vespāsianus, merely because he was ready to fall asleep during an entertainment (Tac. Ann. xvi. 5).

Phœnicē, es, f. Phenike, a city of Epīrus, on the banks of Dodon or Simōis, the Pis-trizza, at which Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnia, concluded a treaty with the Ætōli and Romans, in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 12).

Phœnicia, æ, v. Phœnicē, es, f. a country on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea, now part of Asiatic Turkey. It was a province of Syria, but what extent of country the ancients included under this name, it is impossible to ascertain. Ptolēmaeus makes Syria its boundary on the E., Ægyptus, Egypt, on the S., and the river Eleuthērus on the N. Others seem to consider it as occupying only a small part of that territory. This diversity of opinion most probably arises, from its limits being different at different times. The name is said to have been derived from Phœnix, a son of Agēnor, who, like his brothers Cādms and Cilix, was sent to search for Europa, and, being equally unsuccessful, settled there. Some make Agēnor king of that country. Isid. Phœnices, um (Sing. Phœnix, icis), m. the Phœnicians, were ingenious, active, and enterprising; but avaricious and deceitful. Letters (Herod. v. 58), navigation (Prop. ii. 27. 3), and colonization are generally supposed to have originated among them. Plinius ascribes to them the invention of letters, astronomy, navigation, and the art of war (i. 565. Herod. v. 58). To these Pōmpōnius Mela adds conquest and other arts, which being a general expression, he probably meant several of the useful arts (i. 102). Other writers of antiquity state the same facts. Hērōdōtus says, that the Ionians adopted the Phœnician mode of writing from right to left, and like them wrote on skins (zupheai), hence this word was used to denote writing. Adj. Phœnicus, Phœnicus (red, applied to colour only, Plin. ii. 441), et, Phœnissus, a, um. Phœnicus color, a red colour, in which the titles and chapters of books were originally written, from the Phœnicians being the inventors of letters (Isidor. Tac. Ann. xi. 14). Phœnicum mārē, that part of the Levant which washed the coast of Phœnicia (Plin. i. 565). Phœnicum caput, a red head (Plin. ii. 441). Phœnisia agmina (Sil. Ital. xvii. 146). Phœnisia Dido, Dido, a native of Phœnicia (Virg. Æn. i. 670). These words also apply to Thēbæ, Theva, and Carthage, from their having been founded by colonies from Phœnicia.

Phœnicus, ūntis, f. a port of the Erēthraei (Liv. xxxvi. 45).—2. A port of Lycia, two miles distant from Pātara (Liv. xxxvii. 16).

Phœnix, icis, m. the son of Amynthor, king of Argos and Clēobulē, was one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar. Having incurred the displeasure of his father, for which he put out his eyes, Phœnix fled to Pelēus, king of Thessaly, who carried him to Chiron, by whom his sight was restored, and that monarch afterwards appointed him tutor to his son Achilles, hence Stātus, Indōmiti Phœnix moderātor olumnī (i. e. Achillis) (Syl. v. 3. 192). He accompanied that prince to the Trojan war (to which Stātus alludes, Syl. ii. 1. 91), who treated him with every mark of respect, and retained the utmost gratitude, for the benefit which he had received from the useful instructions of his teacher. He returned to Greece, and was buried in Trāchīnia, where a small stream, one of the branches of Asōpus, bears his name. Amynthōrides, æ, m. a patronymic of Phœnix (Ov. Ib. 259).—2. A Carthaginian, who held a command in the army of Hannibal in Spain, from which he was driven by Scipio Africanus, in 209 B. C. (Sil. Ital. xvi. 25).—3. A man of royal descent, an officer in the army of Mithridates, and deserted to Lūcillus (Ap. Bel. Mith. 224.)

Phœnix, icis, m. a bird, of which Plinius and other writers of antiquity have given an account unquestionably fabulous. It was said to live five or six hundred years, and that, on obtaining this advanced period of life, it builded a funeral pile, which, by the flapping of its wings, it set on fire, and from its ashes sprang a worm which afterwards became a bird of the same kind. Some suppose, that the Phœnix was an Egyptian symbol, denoting five hundred years, and Bochartus thinks, that the fiction originated in the word Phœnix, which signifies the palm tree, of some kinds of which, after the trunk is decayed from age, the root sends out a new shoot, which grows to the full size, and thus perpetuates the same tree in the same place. Ovidius has described this fabulous bird, with his usual liveliness and accuracy (Met. xv. 391 seq.).

Phœnix, icis, m. a small river in Greece, which runs into Asōpus (Herod. vii. 200). Plinius does not mention it as a branch, but seems to understand by it a separate river (i. 429).

Phōlōc, es, f. a Cretan slave, skilled in spinning and weaving, whom, with her infant twin sons, Æneas gave to Sergestus (Virg. Æn. v. 285).—2. A woman mentioned by Horātius, as haughty and cruel to her lovers, which is the meaning of fugax (Od. ii. 5. 17). She appears to have been the daughter of Chlōris (Od. iii. 15. 7). Tibullus mentions one of this name, under the same character, probably the same person (i. 8. 69).

Phōlōc, es, f. one of the mares of Admetus (Stat. Th. vi. 461).

Phōlōc, es, f. a city, and mountain of Arcadia, the latter of which had its name from Phōlus, a centaur. On it Hercules fought with the centaurs (Apol. ii. 5 seq. Ov. Fast. ii. 273). Strābo seems to consider Phōlōc to have formed a considerable part of the great summits, now jointly known by the name of Olonos, as far as the plains of Elis, Paleopoli. Plinius only mentions the town. Opāca Phōlōc (Stat. Th. iii. 604).—2. A mountain of Thessalia, which appears to have been inhabited by the centaurs, hence Lūcanus, Phōlōc mentita biforem populum (Phar. iii. 198). Is it not more probable, that Hercules fought with the centaurs on the latter mountain?

Phōlus, i, m. one of the centaurs, remarkably addicted to drinking, to which Juvénalis of Cýrus," i. e. of Pärthia, of which Cýrus had been king (Od. ii. 2. 16). He was succeeded first by his reputed son Phrāatēs, who having been banished in a short time, Orōdes II., one of the Arsēidae, mounted the throne, from which he was soon driven, and the nation petitioned for Vōnōnes q. v.—5. Phrāates V., son of Phrāates IV., succeeded to the crown of Pärthia, in the year 35. Four princes filled the Parthian throne between the death of Phrāates IV., and the accession of Phrāates V. His father had sent him as a hostage to Angūstus, and Tibērius, at the request of the Parthians, returned him to his native country, loaded with valuable presents, suited to the dignity of an eastern monarch, where he died soon after his arrival (Tac. Ann. vi. 31 seq.).—6. A noble Parthian, who, with Hērō and others, exerted themselves to restore Artabānus, who had been deposed, and Tiridātes appointed in his stead (Tac. Ann. vi. 43).

Phrādātes, is, m. a Persian of high rank, who commanded a great army of the Cāspian, under Dārjūs, and was put to death on suspicion of aspiring at the monarchy, in 325 B. C. (Curt. iv. 12 seq.).

Phrādmon, ōnis, m. the father of Agēlāus, hence called Phrādmōnides (Hom. II. viii. 257).

Phragādes, arum, m. an obscure people, bordering on Thrācia; others, with more propriety, say a town of Mēdica, of which Jamphorina was the capital (Liv. xxxvi. 25).

Phratāphērnēs, is, m. a praefect, or satrap, to whose lot Armēnia fell on the death of Alexander the Great (Just. xiii. 4).

Phrēxus. See Phrēxus.

Phrōntis, idis, f. wife of Pānthus, and mother of Euphōrbus (Hom. II. xvii. 40).

Phrōntis, is, m. a son of Phrēxus and Chālēōpē. Like his brothers Argus and Mēlas, he joined the Argonauts, and does not appear to have distinguished himself in their celebrated expedition (Val. Flacc. v. 461 seq.). Apollōnius Rhōdius gives a very interesting account of the children of Phrēxus, and makes their agency at the Colchian court of very considerable avail.—2. Son of Onētor, and an expert seaman. He was pilot of Mēnelāus, and killed by Apollō (Hom. Od. iii. 282).

Phrēgia, ae, f. a country in Asia Minor, Nātolia, divided into Major and Minor. Both these provinces, along with other lands, were given to the Romans by Eumēnes, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 56). Some maintain that the name is derived from the Brēges, a nation of Mācēdōniā, Mācēdōniā, who settled there. The boundaries of Phrēgia are not properly defined by ancient authors. The chief city of Phrēgia Minor, called also Trōas, idis, f. Troad (Eng.), was Trōy, renowned for the destructive war which it maintained, against the combined forces of Greece, for ten years. Phrēx, ōgis, a Phrygian, a Trojan. Strābo says their original name was Brēges, and that they were a Thracian nation, as were also the Mygdōnes, Bēbrēces, Mēdibithyni, Bithyni, Thyni, and Mariāndyni (427). Hērōdōtus also says, they were originally Europeans, and afterwards migrated to Asia Minor (l. 72). Adj. Phrēgius, e. Phrēgiacus, a. um, et. Phrēx, yx, yx, gen. ōgis, of Phrēgia, of Trōy, Phrygian, Trojan. Phrēgius mōritus, a Trojan husband, i. e. Aenēas (Virg. Aen. iv. 103). Phrēgius pāstor, the Trojan shepherd, i. e. Pāris (Virg. Aen. vii. 363). Phrēgius pādo, the Trojan robber, i. e. Aenēas (Virg. Aen. xi. 484), who is called Phrēgius tyrānnus, the Trojan tyrant (Virg. Aen. xii. 75). Phrēgia māter, the Phrygian mother, i. e. Cēbēlē (Virg. Aen. vii. 139). Phrēgium aquor, the sea which washes the coast of Phrēgia Minor, or, Trōas, i. e. Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, and part of Mārē Aegēum, the Archipelago (Virg. Aen. i. 381). It is probable the poet meant the lower part of the Dardanelles, since Aenēas built his fleet at the foot of mount Ida. Phrēgia tiāra, a Phrygian turban, which tied below the chin (Juv. Sat. vi. 516). Phrēgius mos, the manner of the priests of Cēbēlē (Juv. Sat. ii. 115). Phrēgia nox, a Phrygian night, i. e. a sacrifice to Cēbēlē, from being always performed during the night (Stat. Th. xii. 224). Phrēgia urbs, i. e. Trōja (Mart. ix. 106). Phrēgia sedes (Val. Max. vii. 5). Phrēx semivir, effeminate Trojan, i. e. Aenēas (Virg. Aen. xii. 99). Phrēgio, ōnis, m. an embroiderer, from the Phrygians being considered the inventors of embroidery. Phrēgiōnus, et, Phrēgiānus, a, um, embroidered, made by an embroiderer.

Phrēgius, i, m. a river of Iōniā, one of the branches of Hērmos, the Sarabāt. Near this stream, the Romans, under L. Cōrnēlius Scipio, defeated Antiochus, king of Sēria, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 37). See Hēllus.

Phrēne, es, f. a woman of great beauty, but of loose morals, who, being accused capitally, was acquitted, not by the pleading of Hēpērides, although admirable; but by the sight of her person, which she exposed, by opening her tunic (Quint. ii. 15. 9). Praxitēles formed a statue of this abandoned female, in which the merit of the artist claimed higher praise than the mental purity of the man (Plin. v. 121). Hōrātius mentions a woman of infamous character, of this name (Epod. xiv. 16), probably the same mentioned by Tibullus, and called, by him, a bayd (lena) (ii. 6. 45).—2. Another, whose name occurs in Propertius (ii. 6. 6), is supposed to have lived about 350 B. C. It appears that, among the Greeks, there were many worthless women of this name.

Phrēxus, i, m. a son of Athāmas, king of Thēbes, Thēca, and Nēphēlē, who, with his sister, Hēllē, fled from the cruelty of Inō, their stepmother, through the air, on a ram, which had a golden fleece (Phrēxa cēllēra, Ov. Met. vii. 7), intending to go to their relation, Aētes, king of Cōlchis. Tēctius says, he either crossed the sea on that animal, or on a ship which had the figure of a ram on the prow (Ann. vi. 34). Hēllē, in consequence of the rapid motion, at a great distance from the earth, became giddy, and fell into the Strait, called, from her, Hēllēspōntus, i. e. sea of Hēllē, the Hellespont (Eng.), now the Dardanelles, from Dardāniā. Phrēxus continued his flight, and reached Cōlchis, where he sacrificed the ram to Mars, uncertain to what god, and hung up its fleece in the temple of that deity. He married Chālēōpē, a daughter of Aētes, by whom he had Argus, Cēgēōrus, Mēlas, and Phrōntis (Val. Flacc. v. 461). She, from a desire to obtain the golden fleece, or, from Phrēxus aspiring at the crown, afterwards killed him. Aētes

Phrygians in Ashematon (5. 1. 1. 4 q) who are the cause, the destruction of Mithras & in which the destruction by the Athenians because he remained alone of the Phryxus, from being the grandson of Edna (Val. Flacc. vi. 542). That poet likewise calls him Ednides (l. 286). Adj. Phryxianus, a. um. Phryxæus Póntus (Luc. Phar. vi. 16), or, Phryx Smith, the Dardanelles. Phryxæus aris, HIE. Phryxum molle, the golden fleece (Val. Flacc. v. 635). Phryxum amplex, i. e. Hellepóntus (Val. Flacc. ii. 595). Phryxæus molles, i. e. aris (Mart. xiv. 21) 1.—2. A Scythian commander against the Argonauts, who marched his army from the river Arcthius, and, according to Valerius Flaccus, he had a stag for his standard. Some editions have Chrysus (vi. 70).

Phthia, s. f. daughter of Alexander, king of Epûria, by his sister, Olympias. Her father gave her in marriage to Dénétrus, king of Mácédônia (Just. xxviii. 1).

Phthia, z. f. a city of Thessaly, at which Achilles was born, and where his father lived during the Trojan war; hence, Phthium Scyrioe ferantur (arma Achillis), let the arms of Achilles be sent to Phthia, i. e. to his father, Pelæus, or, to Scyros, Shyro, i. e. to his son, Pyrrhus, who was then at the court of his grandfather, Læomædes, king of that island, by whom he was brought up (Ov.

Met. xiii. 56). Phthias, Idia, f. a woman of Phthia. Phthiōtis, idos, f. a district of Thessaly, of which Phthia was the capital. It contained three districts, one under the dominion of Pelēus, another subject to Proteſſſſus, and a third to Phthiōtēs. Iak. Phthiōta, arum (Sing. Phthiōta, æ), m. Adj. Phthius, Phthiōtus, æ, Phthiōticus, a, um. Phthia rex, Pelēus (Ov. Amor. ii. 17. 17). Phthiōtica Tempa, Thessalian Tempi (Cat. liv. 35).

Phthiōta, Idis, f. a district of Thēssalia, Thessaly, bounded on the east by Pēlāgius Sinus, the Gulf of Volo. Livius writes Phthiōtis Achāia, because peopled by the Achaei (xlii. 22). Inf. Phthiōta, arum, m. The historian adds the adjective Achaei for the reason above given (Liv. xxxiii. 32). Adj. Phthiōticus, a, um. Phthiōticus opes, appears to be the same with Phthiōtis (Liv. xxxiii. 3). Thēba Phthiōtica, Armira, a large town in Thessaly, the capital of a province, situated in a fertile valley, and varied by many different kinds of trees (Liv. xxviii. 7). Phyāces, is, m. a king or prince of the Gētes, or Sarmātae, mentioned by Ovidius. He appears to have been a man of enormous cruelty, surpassing in barbarity, Polyphēmus himself (Ep. Pont. iv. 10. 24).

Phycēus, untis, m. a town of Libya (Steph.), which Strābo calls a promontory of Cýrēnaica, now Cape Rasat, low and flat, projecting to a considerable distance northward, directly opposite to Tēnariūm prōmōntōriūm, Cape Matapan. Phycēus meritis sævas rapinas (Luc. Phar. ix. 40).

Phylacē, es. f. a town of Thēssālīa, Thessaly, which had its name from being built by Phylacēs q. v. To it Valērius Flaccus alludes (i. 474). Of this town Alemele, the mother of Iason, was a native. Phylacciā, idis, f. of Phylacē, applied to females, or to nouns feminine. Inh. Phylacciē, orum (Sing. Phylaccēus), 1, m. Adj. Phylaccēnsis, is, e. —2. A town of Mōlōssis, which surrendered to the Romans, without a siege, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xiv. 28).

Phylacēs, i, m. son of Dēlon, king of Phōciā, and Diōmedē. He had one sister.

Asplenium, and three brothers, Ferns to and Cephaelis. His grandson, Tristram
p. v., succeeded to the crown. Pyth- ides, x, is a putative son of Prædilectus
(Prop. i. 18. 7). Phylactes, Ulla p. 10, Prædilectus. Phylactes under the shade of Tristram (Stat. Sci. v. 3. 273). As- plenium, x, um. Phylactes caput, Lili-
(Or. Trist. v. 14. 39). — 2. Father of Lili- who is hence called Phylactes (Hom. ii. xiii. 698). — 3. A man killed by Lili- (Hom. ii. 35).

Phylas, Antis, m. a Grecian prince the father of Polynæus, and grandfather of Demus (Hæm. II. xvi. 181 seq.).

Phylæ, es, f. a strong fort in Attica of which Theseus took possession in B. C., before he expelled the thirty tyrants whom the Lacedæmonians had set over Athens (Diod. Sic.: Cor. Nep. Thes. 2-2). A people of the tribe Gegei.

Phyleus, Éos, m. a native of Elis, one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar (Od. Met. viii. 308).—2. A Theban, betrayed to Mērpiass. He was one of the fifty whom Éteócles appointed to surprise Týdros, who returned to Argos, Argos, and put him to death. That hero slew the whole fifty, except Mæon g. r. (Stat. Th. iii. 773).—3. A Theban, killed by Amphláranx.—4. A prince of Dülchiúm, subject to Ulysses. Hæmarríed Ctiméné, a sister of Ulysses, by whom he had Méges, hence called Phylides (Hes. fl. ii. 628).

Phyllis, Idis, f. a country girl (Virg. E. iii. 76).—2. Daughter of Lycurgus, King Thraciæ, Romania, and Crustemlia. She fell in love with Dæmophoon, son of Thæus, who was entertained at her father's house.

court, as he returned from the Trojan war. On the death of Mnestheus, king of Athens, he suddenly quitted Thræcia for that city, after he had engaged this princess to marry him; but before the celebration of the nuptials. He promised, at parting, to return for her, which he failed to perform, as she put an end to her life by strangulation.

or drowning, and was changed, after death, into an almond tree. Ovidius calls Rhódopēta Phyllis, from her being a native of Thrācia, and Rhódopē, one of the principal mountains of that country (Ep. Her. 1).—3. A beautiful young woman of Ionian birth, with whom Xanthias Phōceus was in love (Hor. Od. li. 4. 14). It is probable that Horatius intended this spirited ode be, in a certain degree, ironical; since the Romans reckoned it disgraceful to be in love with a slave.—4. Nurse of Jūlia, daughter of the Roman emperor Titus, and of the emperor Dōmītiānus, whose ashes, after having buried them in the Latin way, in property of his own near Rome, she private conveyed to the temple of the Flavian clan and mixed them with those of Jūlia (Suet. Dom. 17).

Phyllis, is, m. a river which runs into the Black Sea (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8). The true reading seems to be Psillis, v. Psillus q. v.

Phyllis, i. m. a youth who formed a strong attachment to Cynus, and presented him with birds and a lion which he had tamed, but could not procure mutual affection, for which reason, he refused a bull to Cynus, which the latter had asked. Indignant at this refusal, Cynus, in a passion, threw himself from a rock, and in his fall was transformed into a swan (Ov. Met. vii. 372). Autóñnus Libérālis gives a different account, stating, that all the companions of Cýnus deserted him from the crossness of his temper, except Phýllus, whom he commanded to kill a lion of prodigious size, which then infested Ætōlia, to bring to him alive vultures of monstrous magnitude, which destroyed a number of men, and to lead a bull to the altar of Júpiter, all of which he performed, displaying, at the same time, great courage and great ingenuity. Cýnus then threw himself into the lake Cónope.

Phýllódōce, es, f. a sea nymph, one of the train of Cýrene (Virg. G. iv. 336).

Phýllus, i, f. a town of Thēssālia, Thessaly. Phýlleis, idis, f. applied to females, or nouns feminine. Phýllēis mātres (Ov. Ep. Her. xiii. 35). Adj. Phýlleus, a, um. Phýlleus jāvénis, Cænūs (Ov. Met. xii. 479). In some editions of Strābo, the reading is Phýllūs, ūntis, m.—2. A town in Argolis, mentioned by Stātilius, who calls it Pecōrōsa Phýllus, indicating the excellence of its pasturage (Th. iv. 45).

Phýscus, i, m. the Odorēh, one of the branches of Tigris, the Değilāh. This stream is so called by Xēnōphon, and in the writings of others, Torna or Tornadōtus. Rennell seems to consider it the little Deullāh.

Picēnus, i, m. a mountain of Apūlia, a southern district of Itālia, Italy, on Mārē Hādrīāticūm, the Gulf of Venice (Sil. Ital. iv. 302). Picēni occurs in some editions of Avienus (Des. orb. ter. 500); but the better editions read Picēni.

Picēus, ēntis, m. a Roman, killed by Crýxus, in the first engagement with Hānibal on his invading Italy (Sil. Ital. ix. 175).—2. A man of whose teeth only three remained, and who spat them all out at the same time, while sitting at his own tomb, or burying-place. He collected them, and put them under ground, at which Mārtilis attempts to be merry, alleging that he had performed his own funeral rites (viii. 57).

Picēuses, ium, m. a neighbouring nation with the Amicēses q. v. (Amm. Mar. xvii. 13 seq.).

Picēntia, æ, f. the capital of Picēnum, mentioned by Strābo (361), and Silius Itālicus (viii. 578).

Picēntinus, i, m. a wretch who trafficked in poison, and married Gālla, after she had, by the same means, effected the death of seven husbands (Mart. ix. 80).

Picēnum, i, n. La Marca d'Ancona, a district of Itālia, Italy, which extended along the coast of Mārē Hādrīāticūm, the Gulf of Venice, from Aternūm, Pescara, at the mouth of Aternus, the Pescora, on the south to Æsis; but, with respect to its western boundary, writers on ancient geography are not agreed. Ich. Picēntes, ium (Sing. Picēns, ēntis), m. the Picēntians. Adj. Picēnus, et, Picēntinus, a, um. Picēnum pōmum, praised by Juvēnalis (Sat. xii. 74); and Hōrātius (Sat. ii. 3. 272). Picēnus ager (Tac. Hist. iii. 42). Picēntinus ager (Plin. i. 384).

Picēntina pīra, which Plinius says are very late (iii. 188). Picēntina Cēres, the bread of the Picēntes, made of a kind of grain (ālica) resembling wheat, which could not be eaten, until softened with milk (Plin.). To this Mārtilis refers (xiii. 47).

Pictānus, i, m. the lower Strait of Amānus, now called the Pass of Bylan.

Picti, orum (Sing. Pictus, i), m. the Picts, ancient inhabitants of the northern part of Britain. From their painting their bodies, writers in Latin have concluded, perhaps rashly, that their name may be traced to this practice. Had they only been known by this name to continental writers, the etymology might have been acquiesced in; but since they called themselves Picts, and were so called by their neighbours, a different derivation must be sought. Like other names of nations, it, perhaps, never was significant, or the period or circumstance which gave rise to it so remote, that it cannot be traced with the slightest degree of certainty. Some, supposing that their language was Celtic, which is likewise doubtful, have referred their name to Pictich, which, in that tongue, signifies a plunderer. This conjecture derives some support, from the Lowlanders in Scotland never calling this nation Picts, but Peghs, scarcely sounding the g, and giving a strong aspiration to the h. It appears certain, that the Picts never were in possession of the whole of Scotland, but only of the east, and north-east coasts, and this, added to their antiquity, accounts for the many fictions respecting them, prevalent in the island, and western districts of this country. Ammānus Mārcellinus mentions, that they were divided into two nations, or clans, the Dichlēdōnes and Vēctōriōnes (xxvii. 8). The Scots, under Kenneth M'Alpin, conquered them in the ninth century, and since that period they have ceased to exist as a separate people, their name being lost in that of the conquerors. The Picts are mentioned in the writings of Claudianus, from Hōnōrius admitting them into the service of the Roman empire (vii. 54).

Pictōnes, um, e. Pictōni, orum, m. a people of Gāllia Cēltica, on the south bank of Ilgēris, the Loire, where it falls into the sea. Their capital, Limōnium, afterwards bore their name, now Poitiers, and their country Poitou (Cæs. B. G. iii. 11 seq.). Adj. Pictōneus, a, um. Pictōnea (urbs), Poitiers (Auson. ec. 40).

Picus, i, m. a son of Sātūrnus, and king of the Laurentes, was the husband of Cānēs, daughter of Jānus and Vēnila, for whom he despised the love of Cīrcē, who, indignant at the insult, changed him into a woodpecker, retaining his former name. According to Ovidius, Picus was fond of cavalry horses, Utilium bello studiōsus equorum (Met. xiv. 321), and according to Virgilius, who makes him the husband of Cīrcē, he excelled in horsemanship (Æn. vii. 189).

Pidytes, is, m. a native of Pērcōtē, killed by Ulysses at Troy (Hom. II. vi. 30).

Pielus, i, m. son of Pýrrhus, and grandson of Achilles (Just. xvii. 3).

Piera, æ, f. a city of Thēssālia, which surrendered to the Roman consul, T. Quinctius Flāminius, in 209 B. C.; who pardoned the inhabitants (Liv. xxxii. 15).

Pieria, æ, f. a district of Mācēdōnia (Liv. xxxix. 26). Ich. Pīeres, um, m. Adj. Pīerius, a, um. Pīeria alca, a wood, at which Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia, separated from his troops, after his defeat by the Roman consul, L. Æmilius Paullus, in 170 B. C. It is perhaps the same with Pīeris mōns (Liv. xlv. 43).

Pitres, i. m. a Thracian, who was very rich in land. Pitres, um, f. the nine daughters of Pitres and Enkyops, who challenged the muses to a contest in singing, and, on being surpassed, were changed into magpies (Or. Met. v. 302 seq.).

Pitres, i. m. a mountain of Macedonia, from which the district was called Pitria, a. f. It is a considerable extent of country, fertile, richly wooded, and of pleasant aspect to the eye. It contains much fine oak, besides chestnut and plane trees, of remarkable size. Macedonius alighted on Pitria, as he carried the order of Pigmeus to Cilixus, commanding her to Gonios Ulysses (Hom. Od. v. 30).

Pitres, um (Sing. Pitria, idis), f. the Muses, from their residence on Pitres. Adj. Pitria, a. um. Pitria mod. Florian strains; poetry (Har. Art. Poet. 405). Pitria um, the Florian shade; the very shade of the Muses (Jur. Sat. vii. 8). Pitria (sic), the Muses (Stat. Th. vii. 628).—2. A mountain of Syria, near Antiochia.

Pitres, itis, f. filial affection, to which M. Atilius Gibula, tribune, dedicated a temple at Rome, in 183 B. C., which had been vowed by his father, on the day that he gained a victory over Antiochus, king of Syria. The temple of filial affection stood in the green market (Forum Olitorium) (Liv. xl. 34).

Pitres, i. m. a cap of white wool, worn on the head as a badge of liberty. Slaves on being set free received this token of their deliverance from bondage. Those who wore a cap of this kind, were called Pitri (Liv. xxiv. 16).

Pitres, i. f. a town on mount Athos (Herod. vii. 122).

Pitres, i. m. a son of Saturnus, and father of Vénus, the mother of Turmus and Juturna. Authors are not agreed, respecting the degree of propinquity, in which Pitres stood to Turmus. Virgilius, however, makes him his grandfather, and there is no good reason for deviating from his opinion (Æn. ix. 4).

Pimpla, a. f. a mountain, according to Strabo, anciently of Thracia, but of Macedonia at the time he wrote. In the ninth book he writes Pimpla, and mentions, that Hélion was consecrated to the muses by the Thracians. In Pimpla there was a spring of this name, which was dedicated to the muses, from its waters, like some other springs, being supposed to possess the power of poetic inspiration; hence, Enthia Pimpla (Stat. Syl. l. 4. 26). Pimplides, um (Sing. Pimplis, idis), f. the muses; applied also to nouns feminine. Dulcis Pimplis (Hor. Od. 4. 26. 9). Rigida Pimplis (regio) (Auson. cecili. 9). Adj. Pimplus, a. um. Pimplinus mons (Catull. ev. 1). Pimplan antrum, the cave of the muses (Mart. xii. 11).

Pinari, um, m. one of the most distinguished families in the neighbourhood of Rome, Rome, at the time Hercules was in that country, on his return from Gades, Callis; with the cattle of Geryon, and were with the Potiti appointed priests of that hero. It happened that the Pinari were not present at the first festival, when the entrails were eaten, and it remained a custom, that they never ate of that part of the victims, which were offered in sacrifices, at any future period (Liv. l. 7). Diônysius of Halicar- nassus mentions the same circumstance, and adds, that the Pinari were, in point of not as priests, inferior to the Potiti, and on this mark of disgrace was a just consequence of their coming too late. These priests of Hercules performed their offices with the hands uncovered, which was contrary to the Roman practice. Adj. Pinari, a. m. Pinarii alius, cogn. Herculi, id. the Pinarian family, guardians, i. e. priests, of the sacred rites of Hercules (Virg. Æn. vii. 279).

Pinari, i. m. a Roman knight, whom Augustus caused to be put to death before his eyes, on the mere suspicion that he was spy on his conduct (Suet. Aug. 27).

Pinari, Natta, Pinari, Natta, a creature of Sejanus, who, with Saturnus Sejanus commenced a prosecution against Orbitus Cordus, because he had called C. Gaius Longinus the last of the Romans (Tit. Ann. iv. 34).

L. Pinarius, L. Pinarii, m. (sursum i. m. cal. Rufus Mamerinus), obtained the consulship in 472 B. C., the year in which Volturnus Pillilius proposed to the people, that a law should be established, appointing plebeian magistrates to be elected at Cluita Tribuna (Liv. B. 56).—2. Was appointed master of the horse by L. Manlius Inpilius. In 348 B. C., he obtained the pre-ship, and the command of four legions, to try in check, or repel the Gauls who harried the Romans by land, as the Grecian phalanx did by sea (Liv. vii. 3 seq.).—3. A Roman prefect, who commanded at Henna in Sicily, in 216 B. C., where he put all the nobles to death, merely because they had sold the keys of the city. M. Claudius Murena, at that time besieging Syracusa, did not condemn this barbarous massacre, which no circumstances could justify, and which lost the Romans the alliance of all the Sicilians, then wavering between the interests of Rome and Carthage (Liv. xxiv. 37–39).

L. Pinarius, L. Pinarii, m. grandson of a sister of C. Julius Cæsar, to whom he left the eighth part of his property (Suet. J. Cæ. 83).

L. Pinarius Mamercinus, L. Pinarii Mamercini, m. was elected a military tribune with consular power, in 491 B. C., the year in which the commons carried a law, that candidates for any office should not white their garments. This trivial matter gave rise to a hot contention, between the patricians and plebeians, in which the latter prevailed (Liv. iv. 25).

M. Pinarius Pöca, M. Pinarii Pöcan, m. a Roman prætor in 182 B. C., to whose lot Sardinia fell. After defeating the Corsicans, compelling them to give hostages and a hundred thousand pounds' weight of wax, he proceeded to Sardinia, in which he fought several successful battles with the Ilenses, a nation, says Livius, not very friendly to us at this day (xl. 18–34).

Pinarius, i. m. the Deli-um, a river of Cilicia, near Issus (Curt. iii. 8).

Pindarus, i. m. a native of Thèbe, Thèbe, who may be considered the prince of lyric poetry. His father, a flute player, gave him his first lessons in music. History records, that Mÿrtis, a distinguished poetess, communicated to him useful instruction in lyric poetry, and that, on the same subject, he owed obligations to Cörinna, who was a fellow student with him under Mýrtis. His countrymen undervalued his first lyrical compositions, and five times adjudged the prize to Cörinna in preference to him; but acknowledged his superiority over Mýrtis. Pausanias accounts for the triumph of Cörinna over Pindárus, by remarking, that the judges, natives of Æolia, were perhaps more sensible to the charms of female beauty, than to those of music and poetry; and particularly from his writing in the Doric, and Cörinna in the Æolic dialect (ix. 22). Simónides, then in extreme old age, gave many valuable hints to Pindárus, which improved the taste, corrected the errors, and excited the genius of the youthful poet. He afterwards wrote lyric odes, in praise of the conquerors at the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games, which commanded the admiration of all Greece, and succeeding poets have frequently imitated, but rarely equalled, and never excelled the grandeur and sublimity of Pindárus. It has been objected to this poet, that his muse was an hireling, and it is not denied that he was paid for some of his best pieces. To a man born in poverty, and supporting himself by mental exertion, candour could, on that account, impute no blame, since even detraction has not ventured to charge him with perversion of the truth, or violation of propriety, in order to please his employers. To this must be added, that his works abound with the purest morality, and that the personal character of no poet of antiquity has been less censured, than that of Pindárus. He lived to a great age, respected by his countrymen, and honoured by the god of poetry, who, by an oracle, ordered him a conspicuous place in the temple of Delphi, Castris, and the inhabitants of that town to appropriate one half of the offerings. Pausanias saw the chair of Pindárus, in the temple at that place, which the priests preserved as a curious relict. He died at the age of eighty-six, in 435 B. C. His descendants, long after his death, derived great benefits from the respect paid to his memory. When Alexander the Great destroyed Thēbe, Thera, he spared the house and family of Pindárus; and the Lacedæmonians did the same, when they burned the capital of Bœotia to the ground. Adj. Pindáreus, a, um. Pindáreulijra (Stat. Syl. v. 3. 152).—2. A manumitted slave of C. Cæsius Longinus, by whose hand Cæsius fell. He afterwards killed himself, but his body was never found (Val. Max. vi. 8). Apollonius expresses a doubt respecting the death of Cæsius, and also with regard to the conduct and fate of Pindárus (Bel. Civ. 655).

Pindus, i, m. Mezzovo, or, Metzovo, a chain of mountains in Greece, the greatest height of which is estimated at 7000 feet. It anciently separated Thēssalia, Thessaly, from Epirus, Lower Albania, and is the most elevated summit in that chain of mountains, which take their rise near Attica, and extend in a N. W. direction upwards of 200 miles. In this range, the most celebrated heights to the S. of Pindus, Metzovo, are Ceta, Basina, Párcasus, Liakura, and Hēlicon, Zagara. Besides inferior streams, four large rivers have their sources in Metzovo: Pēnēus, the Solampria, q. v.; Aōus, the Pollina, or the Viosa, which falls into the Gulf of Venice;

Arctēus, the Arta, which runs into Sinus Ambracius, the Gulf of Arta, to which it gives name; and Achēlōus, the Aspropotamo, which flows in a southerly direction, and empties itself into Mārē Iōnium, the Ionian Sea.—2. The Mauro, a river of Dōris, a branch of Cēphissus, the Mavroneri.

Pinēus, i, m. son of Agron, and grandson of Pleuratus, was king of the Illýrii, to whom the Romans sent ambassadors in 219 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 33).

Pinna, æ, f. Citta di Penna, a town of the Vēstini, immediately to the south of Picēnum (Sil. Ital. viii. 517). Cluverius mentions it as sinking fast from its ancient splendour. Inh. Pinnēnses, ium, m. (Plin. i. 359). Adj. Pinnēnsis, is, e (Val. Max. v. 4).

Pinnētes, is, m. a general of the Pannonians, taken prisoner by the Romans. He appears to have been a commander of great merit (Vel. Pat. ii. 110 seq.).

Pinnirāpus, i, m. a gladiator, who endeavoured to catch the crest of his opponent's helmet, which was generally adorned with the feathers of a peacock, and sometimes with the figure of a fish. Hence the name has been derived from pinna, a feather or fin, and the verb rapio, because he fought with a net, with which he endeavoured to catch the helmet of his adversary. Others say, that the Rētārīi had pinnae in their helmets, and were, therefore, called Pinnirāpi, for as soon as the Rētārīus fell, his antagonist seized on his plume (pinnam rapit), which he held up to the people, as a proof of his victory (Juv. Sat. ii. 158).

Pipa, æ, f. daughter of Attālus, king of the Germans.

Piræus, i, e. Piræūs, ēos, m. now called by the Greeks Draco, and by the Turks Porto Lionē, or, Porto Leonē, from a statue of a lion, a celebrated port, five miles from Athēne, Athens, with which it was connected by walls of great length, and about forty cubits high. The stones of these walls are all of uncommon size, and joined together by pieces of iron, without any kind of cement. Including the Munychian peninsula, Piræus extends to seven miles and a half. It withstood, for a long time, a close blockade of the Roman army, under L. Cornēlius Sūlla, who at last overcame the brave defenders under Archēlaus, who commanded for Mithridātes (Ap. Bel. Mith. 190, 191). Piræus had, at one time, three harbours or quays; but has now, in a great measure, lost that appearance. The one on the right is become a marsh, and that on the left is very shallow. The middle harbour is of greater depth, although too shallow to admit a British sloop of war. Stāsius describes it as a very safe harbour; Trēpīdīs stābīlem Piræa nautia (Th. xii. 616). Adj. Piræus, a, um. Piræa littōra, Athenian shores (Ov. Met. vi. 446).

Piræus, i, m. father of Ptolēmaeus hence called Pirōides (Hom. Il. iv. 228).—2. A noble Ithacan, the faithful friend of Telēmachus (Hom. Od. xv. 538).

Piraticum bīllum, the war against the pirates, who inhabited Cilicia, and who, having fitted out a number of armed ships, scoured the Mediterranean. The Roman senate invested M. Antōnius, the father of the triumvir, with extraordinary powers, to clear the seas of these freebooters in 70 B. C. He does not appear to have extirpated them; for, three years after, Cn. Pompeius Magnus received a similar commission, and, in a very short time, took or destroyed every vessel belonging to that lawless banditti (Tac. Ann. xii. 62 seq.).

Pirēnē, es, f. a fountain in the citadel of Corinth, sacred to the muses. Pēgāsus was drinking at this fountain, when taken by Bellerophon. It branches into several small rills, which find their way imperceptibly into the lower city. Athenæus says, the water of Pirēnē was the healthiest in Greece, and compares its excellence to that of Lerna, a doubtful name, since there was a fountain so called, as well as the Lerna of Argolis. According to Pausanias, the nymph Pirēnē was changed into this fountain, in consequence of lamenting the death of her son Cēnchrius, whom Dāna, for his imprudence, had killed (Paus. ii. 3). Of this name there appear to have been more springs than one, in and near Corinth. Pirēnē cōnsēcia (vātum) (Stat. Syl. i. 4. 27). Pirēnis, Idis, f. of Pirēnē, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Adj. Pirēneus, a, um. Pirēneā antra (Claud. xxix. 77).

Pirēsē, es, f. a district, in which the river Apidānus joins Pēncus (Orph. 164).

Pirēsius, i, m. a noble Celtiberian, of distinguished bravery. In the use of arms he was inferior to Q. Cōtius q. v. (Val. Max. iii. 2).

Pirisabōra, æ, f. Jedida, a city of Pērsia (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 2).

Pirithōus, i, m. son of Ixion, and a cloud, was king of the Lāpithæ, and was present at the famous hunt of Cālŷdon. Hŷginus makes him one of the Argonauts, which Apollōn Rhōdius denies (i. 103). He married Hippodāmē, and at their nuptials a dreadful battle was fought, between the Cēntauri and Lāpithæ, in which he put to death some of his enemies by his own hand (Ov. Met. xii. 330 seq.). He was the intimate and faithful friend of Thēsēus, with whom he went down to the Infernal Regions, intending to carry off Prōserpina, to whom he had a strong attachment, on which account Hōrātius calls him Amātōrem, i. e. Amātōrem Prōserpinæ, using the word Amātōr in its worse sense (Od. iii. 4. 78). Plūtō overpowered both, and put them in chains, from which Thēsēus was liberated by Hērclēs; but the fetters of Pirithōus were made faster. Hōrātius says, he was bound with three hundred chains (Od. iii. 4. 79). Hŷginus mentions, that their attempt on the queen of the Infernal Regions, was by order of Jūpiter, after they had carried off Hēlēna, that being overpowered, they were long lacerated by the Furies, and that Hērclēs, at their own request, prevailed on Plūtō, who allowed them to be carried off in safety. From his father, Pirithōus is called Leōnides (Ov. Met. viii. 566).

Pirus, i, m. a Thracian chief, son of Imbrāsus, killed by Thōas (Hom. Il. iv. 520 seq.).

Pirus, i, m. a mountain in Germany, near Heidelberg (Amm. Mar. xxviii. 2).—2. A river of Achāia, in the Morea (Herod. i. 145). It appears also to have been called Pīeris (Paus. vii. 22).

Pirustæ, arum, m. a people of Illyricum, on the east coast of Mārē Hādriaticum, the Gulf of Venice (Liv. xlv. 26).

Pisa, æ, f. a city of Elis, in Peloponnesus, the Morea, near the river Alphæus, the Roufia, which is supposed to unite with Arēthusa q. v. Olympia, at which the famous games were celebrated at the completion of every fourth year, was supposed to have been built on the ruins of Pisa. From it the district was called Pisatis, Idos, f. Idus, Pissei, orum, m. Adj. Pisæus, v. Piseus, v. Pisānus, a, um, et, Pisatis, v. Pisatilis, a, a Pisæa Arēthusa, Pisæan Arēthusa, from Alphæus, the Roufia, having its source in Elis, and passing through that city in its course to Ortŷgia, where it joined the fountain Arēthusa (Ov. Met. v. 409). Pisæa olivæ, the Pisæan olive. A chaplet of olive branches formed the reward of the conqueror at the Olympic games (Juv. Sat. xiii. 99).

Pisæ, arum, f. Pisa, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, on both banks of Arnus, the Arno, not far from the sea. In its passage through the town, the Arno is confined by stone quays, and a broad street runs along the front of the houses, between them and the river. The situation of Pisa, at a distance from the mountains, renders the winter milder there than at Florence. A colony from Pisa in Elis founded this town, and gave it the name of their native city, hence Claudianus calls it Alphæa Pisa (xx. 48). Inh. Pisani, orum, m. offered land to the Romans, in 182 B. C., for the establishment of a Latin colony, and, for this act of friendship, they received the thanks of the senate (Liv. xl. 43). Adj. Pisānus, a, um. Pisānus finis (Liv. xxxiv. 56), et, Pisicinus ager, the territory of Pisa (Liv. xxxix. 2). Pisānus sinus, the Gulf of Pisa (Tac. Hist. iii. 42).

Pisānder, v. Pisāndrus, i, m. a noble Ithacan, one of the lovers of Pēnelōpē, during the absence of her husband (Ov. Ep. Her. i. 91). He was slain by Philoctetus (Hom. Od. xxii. 268).—2. One of the two sons of warlike Antimachus, whom Agamemnon took alive, but afterwards killed on his father's account (Hom. Il. xi. 122).—3. Son of Menālus, hence called Menādides, commanded the third division of the army of Achilles. In bravery he surpassed all the Myrmidōnes except one (Hom. Il. xvi. 193).—4. A Trojan, put to death by Mēnelāus (Hom. Il. xiii. 601 seq.).—5. A Spartan, to whom his countrymen gave the command of a fleet, which Cōnon attacked at Chidus, routed, took a number of the ships, and sunk more, about 394 B. C. (Just. vi. 3).—6. An Athenian, with whom Alcibiādes conferred, at the time he had the command of an army at Sāmos, about his restoration to his native country. Like Alcibiādes, he was unfriendly to the power of the people, and consequently a favourite of the nobles (Cor. Nep. Alcib. 5).

Pisaurum, i, n. Pesaro, a town of Umbria, in Italia, Italy, pleasantly situated on the south bank of Pisaurus, the Foglia, where it falls into the Gulf of Venice. It appears from Cātullus to have been unhealthy, hence Moribunda sedes (lxxxi. 3). The Romans sent a colony to it, 186 B. C., allotting to each man six acres of land (Liv. xxxix. 44). Inh. Pisaurēnses, ium, m.

Pisēnor, ōris, m. a centaur, who, in the battle with the Lápithæ at the marriage of Pirithôus, sought safety in flight (Ov. Met. xii. 303).—2. A Trojan, the father of Citus (Hom. Il. xv. 445).—3. The father of Ops, and grandfather of Eurýclæa, nurse of Ulysses. Pisenôrides, w. m. Ops (Hom. Od. i. 429).

Pisidia, w. f. a district in Asia Minor, Natolia, to the north of Pámphylia, and south of Phrygia. Inh. Pisidæ, arum, m. In the army of Antiochus, king of Syria, the Pisidæ were Cetrati, and fought in the battle at Thýatira, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 40).

Pisistrátus, i. m. a noble Athenian, of high rank, who, by the force of his eloquence, the greatness of his courage, and artfulness of address, gained such an ascendancy over his countrymen, as secured him in the government of the state for thirty-three years. Sôlon, the celebrated legislator, opposed his schemes of ambition, although he was his relation by birth. With that illustrious Athenian, love of country had a more powerful influence than the tie of kindred, and notwithstanding the great authority and respect which he enjoyed among his countrymen, from the extent of his information, and the rectitude of his principles, the usurper possessed the crown till the day of his death. Like every other votary of ambition, he assumed the appearance of virtues to which his heart was a stranger; but which he knew were necessary, to gain the favour of the populace. On this account, he appeared courteous, mild, generous, and liberal; his language captivated by its softness, whilst his modesty exalted him in the opinion of all. Had his actions and conduct proceeded from the natural impulse of his heart, or the right exercise of his mental faculties, he would, as Sôlon told him, have been the best citizen of Athens. The Roman Orator frequently mentions Pisistrátus, whom he commends for his eloquence and learning. To him we are indebted for preserving the poems of Hómærus, which otherwise would probably have perished, or remained in traditional fragments, and he had the merit of presenting them to the Athenians, in the same order in which they now appear. Formerly, no regard had been paid to the arrangement, and consequently they would have nothing of the appearance, or the effect of the Epic. The oldest manuscripts have something of that character, the different parts having the name of the "Story of Ajax," &c. He was the first who established a public library for the benefit of the community (Gel. vi. 17). Valérius Máximus states, that his orations had more eloquence than those of Sôlon, and to this quality he ascribes his influence over the Athenians (viii. 9). Pisistrátidæ, arum, m. Hipplias and Hipparchus, sons of Pisistrátus, who succeeded him in the government of Athens.—2. A nobleman of the Bœotii, who was friendly to the Romans, on which account neither he, nor Zeuxippus, who was of the same sentiments with him, had been elected Bœotarches. These two resolved, that Brachyllus, a favourite of Philip, king of Mæcedônia, who had been appointed to that office, should be cut off, and, therefore, hired assassins, who murdered him. Zeuxippus fled first to Tánagra, and afterwards to Athens. Pisistrátus, after being several times examined by torture, was put to death (Liv. xxxiii. 27. 28).

Piso, ônīs, m. a surname of the Cælpurnian clan, and, according to some, acquired from one of the Cælpurni, excelling in the raising of peas; but Plinius derives it a pisendo, from using a pestle and mortar, or perhaps, from inventing the pestle (iii. 435). They considered themselves descendants of Numa Pômpilius; hence Hôrâtius, addressing Pisones, has Vos, ô Pômpilius sanguis (Art. Poet. 292). See Cælpurnius.

Piso, ônīs, m. a Roman, who, after being severely wounded, and lying among the killed at the battle of Cannæ, attempted to give a mortal stab to the horse of Hännibal, that he might engage his rider, on being brought to the ground. In return for this act of Roman bravery, Hännibal transfixed Piso with his spear (Sil. Ital. ix. 250 seq.).—2. A Roman prætor, whose camp the slaves carried in the Servile war (Flor. iii. 19).—3. Surnamed from his country, Aquiltanus, a nobleman of Aquiltania, whose grandfather had been supreme magistrate in that country, and called Friend by the Romans (Cæs. B. G. iv. 12).

Piso Frugi Licinjanus, Pisonis Frugi Liciniani, m. was the son of M. Licinius Crassus and Scribonia, both of illustrious descent. The Roman emperor Gâlba adopted him, in the year 69. With deep anxiety, he saw a storm gathering in Germany, and named a successor, judging that to be the best expedient. The measure had not the effect which the emperor intended; for Otho, on gaining the ascendancy, caused him to be put to death. In his choice, Gâlba appears to have been directed by a due regard to the dignity of the empire; since the public allowed, that Piso had great excellencies, and the gravity of his deportment suggested the idea of primitive manners. The speech which Tacitus has put into the mouth of Gâlba, at his adoption, extols the merits of Piso, and contains many excellent observations, suited to the occasion on which it was supposed to have been delivered. His murderers cut off his head, which his wife Verania ransomed (Tac. Hist. i. 14—47).

Cn. Piso, Cn. Pisonis, m. who commanded the cavalry of Adrûmctum, and 3,000 Moors. He afterwards joined Brutus and Cæsius, and was, notwithstanding, allowed to return to Rome, and made consul (Hist. B. Af. 3).

L. Piso, L. Pisonis, m. the grandfather of Piso above-mentioned, who was a lieutenant-general of Cæsius, both of whom fell in an engagement with the Hêlvêti (Cæs. B. G. i. 12).

Pistoria, w. f. Pistoia. See Pistorium.

Pistorium, i. n. v. Pistoria, w. f. Pistoia, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, about twenty Italian miles northwest of Florência, France, on the Stella, which falls into the Ombrone, a northern branch of Arno, the Aeno. Near it, the battle between the forces of the republic, and the rebels under Catiina, was fought (65 B. C.). Writers on this subject have differed very widely, and much pains and ingenuity have been exercised in ascertaining the ground where that traitor fell. Latterly the general opinion seems in favour of the vicinity of Pistoia, and the language of Sallustius leads to that conclusion. Inh.

Pistūriūnes, lexm. m. Adj. Pistūriēnsis, is. a. Pistūriēnsis ager (Suet. Cat. 27).

Pistūrius, is. f. a public villa in Pannōnia (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Pistyrus, i. f. a town of Thraciā, in the vicinity of which was a salt lake abounding with fishes (Herod. vii. 109).

Pistia, is. f. a town of Caria. Isk. Pistiata, arum, m. were among the auxiliaries of the Rhodians, in 199 B. C., and fought in the battle at Alabinda, in which Diomedes, and the troops of Philip, king of Mæcedonia, were routed (Liv. xxxiii. 18). Some degree of uncertainty prevails respecting this people.

Pitānā, es, et, Pitānā, is. f. a town of Eolia, on Evēnos, which had two harbours: It was the native place of Arctidēus. To this town Ovid alludes (Met. vii. 357). Isk. Pitānē, arum, m. Pitānites, arum, m. made bricks so light that they floated on the water. —2. A city of Locris, near Enorūs, the Vasiliptanus (Plin. i. 416). —3. A town of Elis, on the coast between which and Phōia, Alphēus, the Rhōia, falls into the sea (Strab. 498).

Pithēgōrās, is, m. a man in the army of Alexander the Great, endowed with the gift of prophecy, who foretold circumstances which claimed his attention, but were disregarded (Ap. Bel. Civ. 327).

Pithēcūsa, is. f. an island off the coast of Cāmpānia, Campēna, some supposing it to be Vivara, and others Ischia. The Cūmāni first landed on Pithēcūsa, afterwards they returned to settle on the adjacent continent; but at what period seems doubtful. Ovid's description corresponds with the appearance of Vivara, although it may also apply to Epōpēus, Epōpēus, a volcanic mountain, which forms the principal feature of Ischia. By Hōmērus it was called Inārimē, by the Greeks Pithēcūsa, and by the Romans Enāria, from the fleet of Enāos anchoring there. In the opinion of Plinius, who mentions this derivation, Pithēcūsa is not derived from the number of apes (edēs) with which it abounded, but from pottery (edēs), the inhabitants excelling in the making of earthen-ware. Ovidius writes, that Jupiter detested the fraud and perjury of the Cērcōpes, a Lydian nation, changed them into apes, that they might both be like and unlike human beings, depriving them of the use of words, but allowing their tongues, framed only for perjury, to emit horrible yells, and sent them to this island as their proper habitation. Pithēcūsa sometimes occurs as a common appellation of the islands which lie to the north of the bay of Naples, a sense in which it is used by Ptolemy and Strābo. Lāvius, in recording the transactions of 327 B. C., notices the arrival of the colony of the Cūmāni, at Pithēcūsa, without reference to the date. He makes Enāria, a different island from Pithēcūsa (viii. 22).

Pithōlūs, i. m. a man who wrote severe lampoons against Jūlius Cæsar, yet they did not provoke the emperor to resentment (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 75). — See L. Oticiellus Philētus.

Pithōleon, ōtis, m. a native of Rhodes, who wrote bad epigrams, mixing Latin with Greek words, at which Hōrātius sneers, saying, that by this mixture, the poet joined strength with sweetness, like a mixture of Chian and Falernian wine (Stat. i. 10. 22).

Pittheus, i. m. son of Hēracles, a native of Mitylēnē, Mitylēnē, the capital of Lēshos, Mitylēnē, and reckoned one of the seven wise men of Greece. He possessed an ardent love of liberty, which, added to his martial bravery, rendered his service successful in the expulsion of the tyrant, who oppressed that island. His countrymen, conscious of his important and meritorious exertions for their freedom, placed him at the head of the state, and, after holding that office for ten years, and giving them an excellent code of laws, he resigned it, and passed his disinterestedness by accepting only a part of the lands which the Lēshians offered him. According to general report, he died in the eighty-second year of his age, about 579 B. C. His works have wholly perished; but a few of his maxims have been transmitted to modern times. Si quis esset Pittheus, if any one should buy a status, or but a Pittheus (Juv. Sat. ii. 6).

Pittheus, ēs, m. king of Tracēnā, a city of Argolis, in Pēlōpōnnēsos, the Mæna. He was the son of Pēlōps and Hippodamē. His brother, Tracēnā, founded the city in which he gave his own name, and Pittheus, having survived him, succeeded to the crown. Pittheus, ōtis, f. a patronymic of Edna, daughter of Pittheus (Ov. Ep. Her. x. 11). Adj. Pittheus, et, Pittheus, is. um, De tracia Tracēnā (Ov. Met. vi. 418). Pauli Tracēnā (Ov. Met. xv. 296).

L. Pittheus, L. Pittheus, m. an astrologer, who suffered death at the same time with P. Mæcius, when, by a decree of the Roman senate, the magicians and astrologers were banished from Rome, in the year 16. He was thrown from the Tarpeian rock (Tac. Ann. ii. 32).

Pitya, is, et, Pitya, is. f. a town of Bithynia, near Lāmpēdus, Lampidus. Some allege that it was an ancient name of Lāmpēdus; but both Strābo and Valērius Flācus distinguish them (Val. Place. ii. 623).

Pityus, ōtis, f. Pitynda, an island in Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Pityusa, is, cap. Pityusæ, arum, f. two islands in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Spain, nearly opposite the mouth of Sicuri, the Xucar. They had this name from the number of pines which grew upon them, the greater was called Ebūsus, Arca, q. n., and the less Ophūsia, Formentera, q. n.. From the smallness of the latter, it is seldom mentioned, and Lāvius uses Pityusa in the singular, manifestly referring to Ebūsia (xxviii. 37).

Pius Aurēlius, Pii Aurēlii, m. a Roman senator, who applied to that assembly for indemnification, because his house had been rendered insecure by the making of a public road, and laying an aqueduct. The prætor refused his claim; but the emperor, Thāius, considered it just, and gave him the value of his property (Tac. Ann. i. 75).

Placentia, is, f. Placentia, a city on the southern bank of Pādus, the Po, at which the Romans settled a colony, 221 B. C., in consequence of their having taken that part of the country from the Gauls. Deprived of a considerable extent of territory in the north of Italy, and it occupied by the Romans, the Boii and Insūbres, from resentment, offered their assistance to Hānnibal, when he was on the banks of the Rhône, who readily accepted their services, and they directed his march across the Alps. In the neighbourhood of this city, that noble Carthaginian failed in attempting to take a magazine, his troops were repulsed, and himself wounded. Hasdrubal, a brother of Hannibal, on his way to Spain, in 209 B. C., to join his countrymen in Italy, laid siege to Placenza, spent a considerable time before it to no purpose, found himself under the necessity of abandoning it, and soon met a Roman force, which brought on a general engagement, when his army was destroyed, and himself killed (Liv. Ep. 20 seq.). The modern town contains about thirty thousand inhabitants, and is a very delightful residence, the buildings elegant, the streets regular, and numerous fountains supply it with water. The university of Placenza has been long celebrated. The country around is fertile and well cultivated. Inh. Placentini, orum (Sing. Placentinus, i), m. had considerable interest with the Roman senate, which attended to their complaints with more readiness than in many other cases. From being annoyed by their neighbours, the Gauls, desertions were frequent, which lessened their numbers, an evil increased by the accidents of war, by sickness, and by insecurity of property. Adj. Placentinus, a, um. Placentinus ager (Liv. xxxiv. 56).

Placidianus, i, m. a famous gladiator (Hor. Sat. ii. 7. 97).

Placidia, æ, f. daughter of the emperor Theodosius, and sister of Honorius and Arcadius. Claudianus hints at her marriage with Eucherius, although it probably never took place. To her the word virginis applies (Claud. xxii. 359).

C. Platorius, C. Platorii, m. one of three commissioners for conducting a settlement at Crète in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 45).—2. An ambassador, sent by the Roman senate to Gentius, king of the Illyrians, in 174 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 26).

Plānāla, æ, f. Pianosa, an island off the coast of Etruria, Tuscany, to the south of Iva, Elba (Tac. Ann. i. 3).

Plāncina, æ, f. wife of Cn. Cālpurnius Piso, who possessed great riches, which, added to her high descent, for she was the granddaughter of L. Mūnācius Plāncus, who founded the city Lugdūnum, Lyons, filled with pride the mind of her husband, who considered himself as scarcely inferior to the emperor Tiberius. In his improper practices, Plāncina, forgetting the modesty of the female character, did every thing to promote his views, attended the troops at drill, and railed against Gērmānicus and Agrippina. On the death of Gērmānicus, she put off her mourning for a deceased sister, and in her gayest dress celebrated that event, which excited the most rapturous joy in her heart. This conduct rendered not only herself an object of public detestation, but also her husband, with whom she had resolved to share his fate, whatever it might be. Having obtained her pardon by the influence of Livia, she changed her plan, and pursued a separate interest. At last, the death of Agrippina brought on the ruin of Plāncina. Court favour, which had formerly protected her, was now at an end, and being accused of facts well known to the public, she laid violent hands on herself, "thus suffering" says Tacitus, "a late, rather than an unmerited punishment," in the year 32 (Tac. Ann. ii. 43 seq.). Her full name probably was Mūnātia Plāncina.

Plāncius Vārus, Plāncii Vāri, m. a man of prætorian rank, and most intimate friend of Dōlābellā, whom Otho had banished to Aquinum, Aquino, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. ii. 63).

Plātēa, arum, v. Plātēa, æ, f. Cokla, a town of Bœōtia, at the foot of Cithæron, Elatias, near which the Greeks under Aristides and Pausānias, gained a complete victory over the Persian forces commanded by Mārdōnius, about 481 B. C. The bravery of the Athenians in this engagement procured them the chief command at sea (Cor. Nep. Arist. 2). Inh. Plātēenses, imm, m. (Civitatē) Plātēnsium (Cor. Nep. Milt. 5). Adj. Plātēnsis, is, e.

Plātānon, ōnis, m. a place near the portico of Vipsāna, which appears to have been ornamented with statues of beasts both in marble and brass (Mart. iii. 19).

Plātēa, æ, f. an island on the coast of Africa, first peopled by the Thērai (Herod. iv. 151).

Plātō, ōnis, m. one of the most eminent philosophers of antiquity, was a native of Egina, Egina, an island in that part of Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago, called Sinus Sārōnicus, the Gulf of Egina. His father considered himself a descendant of Cōdrus, the last king of Athens, and his mother traced her descent from Sōlon, the celebrated lawyer. His birth, as fixed by modern inquirers, preceded the Christian era, 430 years.

He gave early proofs of a vigorous mind, a lively fancy, and originality of genius, which an education, corresponding to his high rank, cultivated and improved. Painting and poetry first engrossed his whole attention, to which he applied with extraordinary diligence, and his success amply rewarded his unwearied assiduity. He wrote an epic poem and a tragedy, before he completed his twentieth year. The former he burned, from its inferiority to the Iliad of Hōmērus, withdrew the latter after it was in rehearsal, and would not suffer it to be acted, from his having been captivated with the intelligence and eloquence of Sōcrātes, whom he had accidentally heard deliver a discourse. He then destroyed all his poems, and devoted himself solely to the study of philosophy. It has been said, that he received his first instructions in the study of wisdom from Crātēlus, and Hērmodēnes, but, if he attended the lectures of these teachers, he must have been very young, since, at the age of twenty, he became the scholar of Sōcrātes, with whom he continued eight years. He offended his fellow-scholars, by founding doctrines on the opinion of that philosopher, which he did not acknowledge, still this freedom did not weaken their attachment, which continued unabated till the death of his teacher. When arraigned, Plātō undertook his defence; but the violence of the judges did not allow him to proceed with his speech, and, after the condemnation, he offered to his master a sum sufficient to ransom his life, which Sōcrātes refused. During the whole of his imprisonment, Plātō showed him every kindness, and immediately before his death, was present at the conversation, which that great man held with his friends, respecting the immortality of the soul. The beautiful dialogue, Phædon, contains the substance of that conversation, intermixed, as has been alleged, with certain opinions of the writer. Dreading the severity of the government, the philosophers of Athens fled from the city, and Plato retired to Mégara, overwhelmed with excessive grief at the death of Socrætes. He afterwards crossed into Italy, and obtained from the most distinguished followers of Pythagoras, his knowledge of natural philosophy. On comprehending thoroughly the doctrines of the Pythagoreans, he went to Cyrênæ, Cerea, where he studied mathematics under Théodorus, whence he passed into Egypt, with a view to obtain a more perfect acquaintance with that science, and to learn the theology of the priests. It has been asserted, but without sufficient evidence, that he then acquired a knowledge of the books of Moses. The immortality and transmigration of souls constituted part of the opinions of the Pythagoreans, but the latter forms no part of the Jewish Scriptures, and the writings of Moses do not very clearly reveal the former. The Egyptians probably knew the Mosaic account of the creation, which they either did not adopt, or did not communicate. Unsatisfied with his great attainments, Plato travelled into Persia, in quest of knowledge, and intended to have visited the Brachmans in India, had the wars in Asia permitted. On returning to Europe, he settled first in Italy, and seems to have blended his own system with that of the Pythagoreans. To this school he had a strong predilection, which he, sometime after this, showed, by buying, at an enormous price, from Philolaus, some books which contained the doctrines of Pythagoras. The liberality of Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily, enabled him to make this purchase, when he first visited that island. After having his mind stored with almost all the knowledge of that period, he fixed his residence at Athens, and opened a school in what was afterwards called Acadēmia q. v., where he instructed the youth in philosophy. Crowds attended his lectures, which his talents, learning, and eloquence, rendered most instructive and captivating. Of his scholars it is sufficient to mention Démôsthènes, Isocrâtes, and Aristôtèles. He thrice returned to Sicily, probably expecting to prevail on the tyrant of that island, to adopt a milder system of government, or to attempt the establishment of his ideal republic. Incurring, during his first visit, the displeasure of Dionysius, who attempted his life, he escaped through the activity and friendship of his pupil, Dion; and obtained permission to sail for Athens. The tyrant retaining his resentment, obtained a promise from Pölois, the master of the ship, either to kill him, or sell him for a slave. He preferred the latter, and disposed of the philosopher, in Egina, as that island then carried on a war against Athens, for thirty minæ. Anicæris, a philosopher of Cyrênæ, discovered Plato, procured his freedom, and refused to accept re-payment, from the relations of the philosopher. Detraction generally persecutes merit, and Plato had numerous enemies, who assailed his opinions and reputation, with greater bitterness than justice or success. Envy and malignity vainly attempted to injure the man, or to depress the philosopher. His celebrity increased with his years, and many states solicited him to come, and give them a code of laws for their government. He preferred, however, giving lectures on the general principles of legislation, by which all may be benefited, wasting his time in the minute detail of enacting regulations, adapted to any one community. The instruction of youth and the study of philosophy, occupied almost entirely the latter years of his life, and he died in the eighty-first year of his age, when statues and altars were erected to his memory; the learned and virtuous regretted his death, as a loss to mankind. He never married, and having no children, left his property by will to his friend Adimantus. Cicero carries his respect for Plato almost to adoration, and ancient authors, in general, speak in the highest terms both of his genius and writings. His powerful imagination gives a liveliness and brilliancy both to his conceptions and style, although it sometimes carried him beyond the limits of certainty, into the fanciful region of general or abstract ideas. His writings are all in dialogue, a species of composition in which the Greeks excelled, and they have been transmitted almost entire to modern times. Xenophon and Plato were supposed rivals by ancient writers, and A. Gellius has written on the subject at some length (xiv. 3). Impliciti Platonis, writings like those of Plato, not easily understood (Mart. ix. 48). Æthêræus Plato (Manil. i. 772). Adj. Platonicus, a um. Platōnia disciplina (Gel. vi. 10).—2. An Athenian, who commanded the troops raised in Chilæ, which joined Alexander the Great in Media (Curt. v. 7).

Platōr, ōris, m. a man whom Philippus, king of Macedonia, appointed governor of Orœum, which he gave up to the Romans, in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 6).—2. Brother of Gentius, king of the Illyrians, by whom he was killed (Liv. xlv. 30).

Plautia Urgulanilla, Plantia Urgulanilla, f. first wife of the Roman emperor Claudius who divorced her, on account of her excessive lewdness, and being suspected of murder, after she had born him Drusus and Claudius (Suet. Claud. xxvi. seq.).

Plautius Ælianus, Plauti Æliani, m. a Roman pontiff, who, at laying the foundation stone of the capitol, sacrificed a sow, a sheep, and a bull; and, having spread the entrails on the green turf, invoked Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, with all the tutelary deities of Rome, to favour the rebuilding of that edifice, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. iv. 53).

Plautius Lâtérânus, Plauti Lâtérâni, m. the most distinguished of the Lâtérâni, was the gallant of Messalina, for which crime he would have suffered death, had not the great merit of his uncle A. Plautius saved him. Nero restored him to the senate, from which he had been expelled for his criminal intrigues with that vicious woman. He was consul elect in the year 65, during which he entered into a conspiracy against Nero, notwithstanding of the act of clemency above-mentioned, and was put to death so suddenly by the tribune Stâlius, that time was not allowed him to take leave of his children (Tac. Ann. xii. 30 seq.). The splendid houses of the Lâtérâni, were on Cælius mons, Monte Cælio, on the site of which a church of St. John was erected, and given to Pope Sylvester by Constantinus Magnus, and is still called the Lätëranum (Juv. Sat. x. 17). Adj. Lätëranus, a, um. Lätëranæ adæ.

Plautius Rufus, Plautii Rufi, m. a Roman who attempted to excite an insurrection against Augustus (Suet. Aug. 19).

Plautius Silvianus, Plautii Silviani, m. a Roman praetor, who threw his wife Apronia out of the window of her bedchamber, and killed her on the spot. L. Apronius, his father-in-law, carried him immediately before the emperor, in whose presence he declared that, while he lay asleep, she had voluntarily leaped over the window. The emperor visited the chamber immediately, and, having perceived marks of a person who had struggled, but had been overpowered, he reported to the senate, and commissioners having been appointed to investigate the matter, Plautius, at the suggestion of Urgulania, his grandmother, had his veins opened, and bled to death (Tac. Ann. iv. 22).

A. Plautius, A. Plautii, m. a Roman officer, to whom, with Cn. Sertius Säturinus, the emperor Claudius gave the command of the troops which he sent into Britain. It required considerable address on the part of Plautius, to prevail on the troops to embark for that distant island, which they considered another world. The emperor, on hearing of his success, followed him, embarked at Gesoriacum, Boudogne, and joined the army on Tamesis, the Thames. He only remained with the army for sixteen days, and returned to Rome. Plautius continued four years in Britain, and gained several advantages over the natives, who made a brave resistance in defence of their liberties. Part of the country on the Thames he reduced into the form of a province, and, for his victories over some of the tribes, he had the honour of an ovation, in the year 44 (Eutrop. vii. 13).

C. Plautius, C. Plautii, m. (surnamed, in con. cal., Pröclius), was one of the Roman consuls in 357 B. C., when he conquered the Hernici, and his colleague, C. Fabius Ambustus, was defeated by the Tarquinenses. He was afterwards master of the horse to C. Marcius Rutilus, the first plebeian dictator (Liv. vii. 12-17).—2. (Surnamed, in con. cal., Hÿpsæus), a Roman, who, in his second consulship, 340 B. C., conquered the Volscei, and declared the arms of the slain were an offering to Mater Læa. Then entering the enemy's country, he laid it waste to the coast (Liv. vii. 27 seq.).—3. (Surnamed, in con. cal., Dëclianus), obtained the office of consul in 323 B. C., and defeated the Privernates, over whom he had the honour of a triumph. That nation, through his means, were admitted to the right of citizenship the same year. In 312 B. C. he was elected censor with Appius Claudius, who made the road called by his name, but Plautius resigned the censorship, from being overwhelmed with shame for a disgraceful choice of senators (Liv. viii. 20 seq.).—4. A Roman praetor, sent into Spain against Viriathus, who routed his army and took himself prisoner, in 147 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 52).

C. Plautius Nümida, C. Plautii Nümide, m. an eminent Roman, who killed himself on the death of his wife, from excessive grief (Val. Max. iv. 6).

L. Plautius, L. Plautii, m. a Roman praetor in 322 B. C., on account of whose illness A. Cornélius was appointed dictator, that there might be a magistrate to give the signal for the starting of the chariots at the Roman games (Liv. viii. 40).

L. Plautius Hÿpsæus, L. Plautii Hÿpsæi, m. was elected praetor in 191 B. C. The north of Spain became his province (Liv. xxxvii. 47 seq.).

L. Plautius Vëmo, L. Plautii Vëmonis, m. a Roman who obtained the consulship in 329 B. C., plundered the country of the Privernates, marched into the territory of the Fundani, who declared they were at peace with the Romans, and, at a future period, obtained the praetorship (Liv. viii. 19 seq.).—2. Was elected consul in 318 B. C., which appears to have been a year of perfect tranquillity, as it only occupies a few lines in the pages of Livius (ix. 20).

M. Plautius Hÿpsæus, M. Plautii Hÿpsæi, m. was consul at Rome in 127 B. C., with M. Fulvius Flaccus. The senate had given him the command of a fleet of sixty ships for Asia, and he had arrived at Tarantum, whither his wife Orëstilla followed him and died there. From excessive grief, he fell upon his drawn sword at her funeral pile; and his friends reduced his body to ashes in the same fire, without making any change in his dress (Val. Max. iv. 6).

M. Plautius Silvianus, M. Plautii Silviani, m. a tribune of the people, who passed three laws, which all took their name, according to Roman custom, from the person by whom they were proposed and carried; the first was an agrarian law; the second regulated the election of jurymen in criminal cases, ordaining that they should be chosen annually from the senators, knights, and plebeians; and the third, De vi, under which was included every kind of conspiracy and rebellion, violence of whatever sort offered to the senate, or to public functionaries, carrying of arms in public, all attempts to disturb the public peace, and the forcible seizure of property. On this law L. Sërgius Cätina was arraigned by L. Æmilius Paulus (Sel. Cat. 31). Adj. Plautius, c. Plötius, a, um. Plautia leges, the three laws above-mentioned. To Plautia lex de vi reference is made in the declamation of Sallustius against Clëtro. Plautia rogatio (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 5).—2. Was consul in 2 B. C., and had for his colleague Augustus. Under that emperor, he commanded against the Pännöni, whom he conquered (Vel. Pat. ii. 112).

P. Plautius Hÿpsæus, P. Plautii Hÿpsæi, m. a candidate for the consulship with P. Cornélius Scipio Näsica, and T. Annius Milo. They contended with open violence and arms, to repress which Cn. Pömpëius Magnus, in his absence, was elected consul a third time, and without a colleague, an honour then conferred for the first time, a proof of the high estimation in which he was held, in 54 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 107).

P. Plautius Pröclius, P. Plautii Pröclii, m. was appointed consul with P. Cornélius Scipio, in 327 B. C., a year of peace and tranquillity (Liv. viii. 22).

Q. Plautius, Q. Plautii, m. was consul with Sëxtus Papiñius in the year 38 (Tac. Ann. vi. 40).

Plēiades, dum (Sing. Plēias, adis), f. seven of the daughters of Atlas, whose mother, Plēiōnē, was one of the Océānides. They were changed into the constellation commonly called the seven stars, in the neck of Taurus, the second sign of the Zodiac. Their names were Alcōnē, Mērōpē, Cēlanō, Elēctra, Stērōpē, Tāygētē, and Maia (Apol. iii. 9; Hyg. 192). Some derive their name from the Greek adjective plēios, more, on account of their number, or from their union, plēnion. Others from the Greek verb plēō, to sail, from their rising in spring, on which account the Romans called them Vērgillae. Hannibal crossed the Alps at the time when this constellation sets (Liv. xxi. 35). Hyginus states, that the Hyādes q. v. were also the daughters of Plēiōnē by Atlas. Lucida Plēias, Maia (2 syl.), the mother of Mercury (Ov. Met. i. 670).

Plēie, arum, f. Apithia, a town of Lāconia, of which nothing certain is known (Liv. xxxv. 27). From Pōlybius, Pausanias and Strābo, it is probable the reading should be Boe q. v., a town near Lēucē.

Plēiōnē, es, f. a daughter of Océānus and Tēthys, who was married to Atlas, king of Maurītānia. To him she bare seven daughters, called Plēiades q. v. Nēpos Plēiōnes, Mercūrius (Val. Flacc. i. 798).

Plēstus, i, m. the Sisafiska, a river which runs from Parnāsus, and discharges its waters into the sea, after passing through Cirrha, which is the port of Dēlphi (Paus. x. 8).

Plēmīnius, i, m. brother of Hērīus, both of whom fell by the hand of Hannibal, in the battle at Zama (Sil. Ital. xvii. 459).

Q. Plēmīnius, Q. Plēmīniū, m. a propraetor, commanded by Scipio Africānus to assist at the retaking of Lōcri, the inhabitants of which had revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cānna: By the favour of some, who were within one of the citadels, he easily took it, but Hāmīlar and the Carthaginians retained the other two. There were skirmishes betwixt the hostile armies, almost every day, with nearly equal success. The cruelty of the Carthaginians induced the inhabitants to join the Romans, who expelled the enemy, and Scipio's arrival prevented Hannibal's making any attack on the town. That general left Plēmīnius governor of Lōcri, and the army under his command, both officers and men, treated the Lōcrēnses with the greatest cruelty and injustice, plundered them of their property, violated their wives, and robbed their temples. In a quarrel betwixt the officers and common soldiers, the latter attacked Plēmīnius himself, cut off his nose and ears, and left him almost lifeless. Scipio returned, and quelled the commotion, after which the Lōcrēnses complained to the senate, of Plēmīnius, on which he was sent in chains to Rome, where he died in prison before his trial was finished, in 206 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 6—22). In a subsequent book, Līvius writes, that he was put to death in prison, for entering into a conspiracy to burn the city (xxxiv. 44).

Plēmmyrium, i, n. Massa d' Oliveo, a promontory of Sicilia, Sicily, on the south side of the great harbour of Syracūsa, which Virgilius calls Undosum, from its being partly overflowed by the waves in storms, whence the name seems to have been derived (undulosus) (Æn. iii. 693). According to Cluverius, there appears to have been an island of this name, now San Martino, in which was a fort, which reconciles the three different accounts of ancient authors, some describing Plēmmyrium as a promontory, others as an island, and others as a fort.

Plēptōlēmus, i, m. a commander under Alexander the Great, who ascended the throne of Persia on the death of that conqueror (Just. xiii. 4).

Plēstina, ae, f. a city of the Mārsi, taken by the Roman dictator, M. Valērius Māximus, in 303 B. C. (Liv. x. 3).

Plēmōsi, orum, m. a people of Gallia Belgica, supposed to have lived on Scēdis, the Scheldt, near the place where the city Tournay now stands (Cæs. B. G. v. 39).

Plēurātus, i, m. son of Scērdilēadus, king of the Illyrii, who owed his kingdom to his joining the Romans against Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia. In 209 B. C., the former included them in a treaty, entered into with the Macedonian monarch, after which they gave him Lycus and the Pārthini. He afterwards desolated the coast of Ætōlia, in which he was joined by the Achæi. He was the father of Gēntius q. v. (Liv. xxxiii. 1 seq.).

—2. An Illyrian exile, who lived at the court of Pērseus, king of Mācēdōnia, and was sent, as an ambassador, by that monarch to Gēntius, king of the Illyrii, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 19).

—3. Son of Gēntius, and grandson of the former, was carried captive to Rome in 170 B. C., with his father, mother, brother Scērdilēadus, and uncle Caravāntius (Liv. xlv. 32).

Plēuron, ōnis, f. St. Irene's Castle, an inland town of Ætōlia, which Strābo states was once an ornament to Greece, but had sunk in its importance, before the time at which he wrote. Mēlāgria Plēuron (Stat. Th. iv. 103).

Plēurōnia, ae, f. the district belonging to Plēuron. Inh. Plēurōniū, orum (Sing. Plēurōnius, i, m. Adj. Plēurōnius, a, m. Plēurōnius Acmon (Ov. Met. xiv. 494).

Plēxippus, i, m. a son of Thēstius, who, with his brother Tōxēus, was killed at the hunting of the Calydonian boar, by their nephew Mēlāger, because they had taken from Atālānta, with whom he was in love, the skin and head of the boar with which he had presented her (Ov. Met. viii. 434—440).

Thēstiadē, arum, m. Plēxippus and Tōxēus (Ov. Met. viii. 434).

C. Plīnius Cæcilius Sēcundus, C. Plīniū Cæciliū Sēcundū, m. son of L. Cæcilius and Plīnia, sister of the writer on natural history, was born at Cōmum, Como, a town in the north of Italy, about the year 61. To distinguish him from his maternal uncle, he is in general called Pliny the younger. His father died during his infancy, and Plīnia with her son, from that time, lived in the house of her brother, who both educated and adopted his nephew. According to the Roman custom, he then assumed his uncle's name, and, afterwards, inherited his property. He lived in terms of the closest friendship with Tācītus, Silius Itālicus, Mārtiālis, and Suetōnius. From early life he applied his mind to the study of literature, and had for his instructor in eloquence, the celebrated Quīntiliānus. His writings indicate a powerful mind, richly imbued with Grecian and Roman learning. From the facility with which he composed, it cannot be doubted that the greater part of his works have perished. Only his Epistles in ten books, and a panegyric on the emperor Trajānus, have escaped the destroying hand of time. From these a considerable list of his publications might be formed, of which the principal are Libri de Helvidii Ulpiōne; Oratiōnes apud Centūvīros; Pro Acciā Variolā; Oratio ad Municipē suos; Carmīna varia Latina, et Græca; Tragœdia Græca; Volumen Hendecasyllaborum, &c. He composed the Greek tragedy at the age of fourteen. The instructions of his tutor, added to his strong natural abilities and unwearied application, placed him high among Roman orators. Tacitus and he were considered the best plunders at Rome. To protect innocence, to repel injustice, to support the poor, and to produce an equal administration of the laws, he readily presented himself at the bar, but never for hire. The estates left him by his uncle rendered him independent, and he preferred the gratuitous exercise of his talents, for the benefit of individuals of every rank, both to remaining inactive, and to the accumulation of wealth. On the accession of Trajānus to the empire, he obtained the highest offices in the state, and, at his appointment to the consulship, he pronounced a panegyric on his benefactor, which, at the request of the senate, he published. It is still extant. In his proconsulship of Pōntus and Bithynia, he displayed that humanity, and love of justice, which characterized his whole life. With all the partialities of a Roman, he did justice to the Christians, and bore honourable testimony to their character and conduct. By the knowledge which he acquired from study, he regulated his life. Amidst luxurious extravagance and dissolute profligacy, he distinguished himself by moderation, sobriety, and regularity. He died in the fifty-second year of his age. His letters contain much valuable and curious information, although it is probable, that the greater number never formed any part of a real correspondence. The tenth book must not be included, since it is well known, that they were the very letters addressed to the emperor, and the answers of Trajānus to the provincial governor. The pure age of latinity had passed away before Plinius began to write, and his style is marked by that pomposity and brilliancy, which characterizes the reign of that monarch. Plinius facundus (Mart. x. 19).

C. Plinius Sēcundus, C. Plinii Sēcundi, m. an eminent Roman author, to whom Vērōna, an inconsiderable town on Athēsis, the Adige, had the honour of giving birth, in the year 23. His family ranked high among the Roman nobility, and he possessed a large hereditary fortune. It is to be regretted, that so few particulars respecting his education and private life have been transmitted. In the different offices which he held under government, he discovered the bravery of a soldier, and the principles of an active and virtuous citizen. Literary study seems to have engaged his attention much more than the honours of ambition, or political distinction. Of his voluminous writings, only his Natural History, in thirty-seven books, has come down to modern times. This work embraces a variety of subjects, many of which the author has treated with great accuracy and intelligence. The most candid reader, however, can scarcely refrain from smiling at many absurd and improbable circumstances, which he records as facts, seemingly with a firm conviction of their truth. The geographical may be considered as by far the most useful part of the work. All his writings must have been valuable, the productions of a mind naturally vigorous, improved by intense study and a prodigious accumulation of facts. He died in an eruption of Vēsūvius, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. His irresistible curiosity impelled him to go too near, and he fell a martyr to the study of nature, in one of her most awful forms. Tacitus frequently mentions him in his History (Ann. i. 69 seq.). C. Plinius Cæcilius Sēcundus, commonly called the younger, was a sister's son of the natural historian, and has left on record a minute account of the circumstances attending his death.

Plinthinētes, is, m. a bay, which, according to Hērōdōtus, forms the boundary of Egypt (ii. 6).

Plisthēnes, is, m. son of Pēlōps and Hippodāmia, who died in early life, leaving two sons, Agāmēmnon and Mēnelāus to the care of his brother Atreūs. The fidelity and tenderness with which Atreūs educated his orphan nephews, and his leaving them his heirs, in consequence of having no children of his own body, caused them to be reckoned his sons. It is, however, proper to mention, that this is not the generally-received account, and that many authors reckon Agāmēmnon and Mēnelāus the sons, not the nephews, of Atreūs q. v. Plisthēnida, æ, m. a patronymic of Mēnelāus (Auson. cxxi. 19). Adj. Plisthēnius, a, um. Plisthēnius tūrus, the bed of Agāmēmnon (Ov. Rem. Am. 778).

Plistia, æ, f. a town of Sāmnlum, in alliance with the Romans, before which the Sāmnlites sat down in 316 B. C., because they had been driven from Sātēcula. They took it by force in 315 B. C. (Liv. ix. 21).

Plitendūm, i, n. a town of Bithynia, or Galligræcia (Liv. xxxviii. 18).

Plōtia, æ, f. an old woman, of monstrous lewdness, on whom Mārtiālis writes an epigram (x. 67).

Plōtina, æ, f. wife of the Roman emperor Trajānus. Historians have extolled the character of this empress, for modesty, prudence, tenderness, and integrity. From governors of provinces often acting with great cruelty and rapacity, she appears to have looked narrowly into their conduct, and furnished to the emperor information, by which he checked and punished the violation of the laws. To her Adriānus owed his whole success in life (Eutrop. viii. 6).

Plōtius Firmus, Plōtīi Firmi, m. at first a common soldier, and, afterwards, prefect of the night guard, appointed by the prætorians on the death of Gālba. During the lifetime of this monarch, he had adopted the interest of Otho, and continued firm to the emperor in cases of great tumult and danger. Under him he commanded the prætorians (Tac. Hist. i. 46).

Plōtius Grīphus, Plōtīi Grīphi, m. a Roman, whom Vespāsianus raised to senatorian rank, and gave him the command of a legion. The praetorship was taken from Tertius Jullianus, and bestowed on Plotius Grapheus. On its being afterwards restored to the former, the latter was not deprived of that honour (Tac. Hist. iii. 32 seq.). To him Scallus wrote one of his poems (Syl. iv. 9).

Plotius Macrinus, Plotii Macrini, m. a friend of Persius, to whom he addresses his second satire. He appears to have been a man of great learning, and had a father's affection for the poet.

Plotius Tucca, Plotii Tuccae, m. an excellent poet, a friend of Virgilius and Horatius, to whom, with Varius, Augustus intrusted the correction of the Æneid, after the death of Virgilius. Servius makes Plotius and Tucca different persons.

A. Plotius, A. Plotii, m. a lieutenant-general, who conquered in battle the Umbri, in 91 B. C. Cornélius Cinna and C. Marius, having been joined by the Samnites, overthrew his army and killed himself, in 89 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 74-80).

C. Plotius, C. Plotii, m. a Roman, who was imprisoned by order of the senate, for his cruel and iniquitous treatment of T. Vetturius Calvulus (Val. Max. vi. 1).—2. A common soldier, who killed C. Lucius, son of a sister of C. Marius, and a tribune of the soldiers, because he had attempted to violate his person. Marius commended the conduct of Plotius (vi. 1).

C. Plotius Plancus, C. Plotii Planci, m. a Roman, whom his brother, L. Munatius Plancus, had interest enough, says Velleius Paterculus, to prevail on the second triumvirate to proscribe (ii. 67). Velleius Maximus has given a short account of the manner in which he met his fate (vi. 8).

L. Plotius Gallus, L. Plotii Galli, m. a rhetorician, and the first who taught Latin rhetoric at Rome. In part of a letter from Cicero to M. Titinius, the orator mentions his great anxiety to attend him in early life, but had refrained, because men of the greatest learning were of opinion, that the mind was more improved by exercises in Greek than in Latin. M. Coelius, in an oration now lost, spoke slightly of the qualifications of Plotius, laughed at his style as inflated, undignified, and mean (Suet. Clar. Rhet. 2).

M. Plotius, M. Plotii, m. a centurion in Caesar's army, who was wounded at the interview respecting peace, which took place between T. Labienus and Vatinus, on different sides of Apsus, the Crevasta, a river of Illyricum, or, Macedonia (Cæs. B. C. iii. 19).

Plumbinum, i. n. Piombino, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, built near the ruins of Populonia q. v.

Plutarchus, i. m. a native of Cheronea, a town of Boeotia, a district of Greece. History has not transmitted the particular year of his birth, although from the time when he studied philosophy at Delphi, it seems probable that he was born towards the end of the reign of Claudius. From what he has himself mentioned, respecting his grandfather and father, it appears, that his family was above the common class of Boeotians, and his excellent education shows at least that his father was in easy circumstances. Love of study characterized the boyhood of Plutarchus, and the knowledge which he acquired under Ammonius, an Egyptian philosopher, who settled at Athens, raised him a distinction among his countrymen. He satisfied with his attainments at Athens, travelled in quest of knowledge, and his treatise on Isis and Osiris shows a thorough acquaintance with eastern theology and philosophy, which he obtained from conversing with the priests and learned men of Egypt. He appears to have visited every school to which he could obtain access, and, from these various sources, collected much of that valuable information with which his writings abound. The paradoxes of the Stoics, and the impiety of the Epicureans, excited in his mind only hatred and disgust. From his celebrating the birth days of Socrates and Plato, it may be inferred, that he approved of their opinions, and admired their genius, although it does not appear that he embraced their tenets. Truth, not the system of any particular sect, engaged his attention, and his mind preferred roaming at large in pursuit of information, without submitting to the trammels, or adopting the tenets, of any individual. Acting on this principle, he bought every book of excellence, and collected with uncommon diligence all the sayings of wise men, which had been uttered in his presence, or he had obtained from others by tradition. Of every city which he visited in his travels, he examined the records, and in this manner, acquired an extensive acquaintance with the laws and practices of many states, and the result of these investigations may be discovered in many parts of his writings. The excellent observations, in which his works abound, added to the knowledge of human nature which they display, have rendered him, in the opinion of some moderns of great eminence, the most useful and valuable author of all antiquity, whose writings have escaped the ravages of time. Much of what this celebrated philosopher wrote is irretrievably lost, and of his own history we know little. Even the name of his wife is doubtful. He had two sons, Plutarchus and Lamprias, the latter inherited some of the genius and philosophy of his father, and to him the moderns are indebted for a catalogue of his father's writings. At what time of life Plutarchus went to Rome, how long he remained there, or when he returned to his native country, it seems doubtful. According to some ancient writers, he spent forty years in the Roman capital, where he gave lectures on philosophy to the greatest men in the city, searched the records of the capitol, examined the libraries, conversed with the principal characters, and studied the manners of the people. To observe and scrutinize human nature in every form, and in every country which he visited, appears to have been the chief object of his attention, and in a knowledge of men and manners perhaps no ancient author could, with advantage, be set in opposition to him. The emperor Trajanus appointed him to the consulship, and some have asserted that he followed the counsels of Plutarchus, to whom much of the happiness of that excellent reign has been attributed. That he returned to Greece, and died at an advanced age, admits of no doubt; but the precise period of his quitting Rome, and the particular age at which he breathed his last, can only be conjectured.

The writings of Plūtarchus are divided into lives and morals. He never studied the Latin language with attention, and to compose in elegant Greek seems to have been no part of his plan. His works are recommended by accurate thought, extensive learning, and a deep knowledge of the human heart, more than by elegance of style, purity of diction, or felicity of expression (Eutrop. viii. 12).

Plūto, ōnis, m. a son of Sātūrnus and Ops, was the brother of Jūpiter and Nēptūnus, and king of the infernal regions. Hence he is called Stīggius Jūpiter (Virg. Æn. iv. 638), Tūrtūrus Jūpiter (Val. Flacc. i. 730), and Stīggius frāter (Virg. Æn. x. 113). His character, as described in the writings of the ancients, is that of an inflexible, insatiable, and stern tyrant. He was represented sitting on a throne of sulphur, holding a sceptre in his right hand, and a soul with his left. On his left hand sat Proserpina, daughter of his sister Ceres, with a countenance dark and fearful. At his feet lay the dog Cērbērus, and he had the three Harpies near him. From his throne issued four streams, Lēthē, Cōcytus, Phlēgēthon, and Achēron. The Furies and Fates had their station at his throne, and seem to have formed a part of his attendants. Adj. Plūtōnius, a. um. Ætūs dōmus Plūtōnia, the shadowy mansion of Plūto, i. e. inhabited only by shades, or disembodied spirits (Hor. Od. i. 4. 17).

Pluvina, ae, f. a city of Mācedōnia, to which the Roman consul, P. Sūlpicius Gālba, marched, after quitting Stūbēra in quest of Philippus, king of Mācedōnia, who had retreated (Liv. xxi. 39).

Phytāgōras, ae, m. King of Sālāmīs, Cos-tanza, in Cyprius, in 333 B. C. Cūrtius calls him king of the Cyprians (iv. 3).

Pōdētus, i, m. a youth descended from Æōlus, who fought against the Romans in the second Punic war, and was killed in a naval engagement off Sicily, Sicily, by Mārcellus (Sil. Ital. xiv. 492 seq.).

Pōdāliriūs, i, m. a man in the army of Æneas, who killed the herdsman Abus (Virg. Æn. xii. 304).—2. Son of Æscūlāpius and Cōrōnis, was the brother of Māchāon, who went to the Trojan war with nine ships. He was eminent for his knowledge of medicine (Ov. Art. Am. ii. 735). After the destruction of Troy, he was carried by a tempest to Sýros in Cāria, where, according to tradition, he settled. His name is said to have been derived from the torqueness of his feet. Mārcellus uses the word Pōdāliriūs to denote any eminent and successful medical practitioner (Mart. x. 56).

Pōdārcēs, is, m. the original name of Priāmus q. v.—2. Son of Iphiclus, and brother of Protēsilius (Hom. Il. ii. 704).

Pōdārcēs, is, m. the spotted horse of Thōas (Stat. Th. vi. 466).

Pōdārgē, es, f. (Harpyia), the mother of Xānthius and Bālūs, the horses of Achilles (Hom. Il. xvi. 150).

Pōdārgus, i, m. one of Hector's four horses (Hom. Il. viii. 185).—2. A horse of Mēnēlāus (Hom. Il. xxiii. 295).

Pōdes, v. Pōdias, ae, m. a warrior of great bravery; son of Ectōn, and the intimate companion of Hector, who lost his life by Mēnēlāus (Hom. Il. xvii. 575 seq.).

Pōēs, āntis, m. a Grecian, son of Phylācus, and father of Philōctētes, hence Ovidius, Sītus Pōētē, the son of Pōēs, i. e. Philōctētes (Met. ix. 233). Apollōdōrus considers Pōēs one of the Argonauts, and son of Thaumacus. Pōētātiādes, ae, m. a patronymic of Philōctētes (Ov. Met. xiii. 313). Adj. Pōētīus, a. um. Parāntia prōles, Philōctētes (Ov. Met. xiii. 45). Paētānus hēros, Philōctētes (Mart. ii. 84).

Pōellē, es, f. (παῖς ἐσση), a porch at Athens, adorned with various paintings, whence the name (Cor. Nep. Milt. 6).

Pōmēnis, is, f. (Shepherdess), one of Actaeon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 215).

Pōnē, es, v. Penna, ae, f. a monster, which Apollō sent to distress the Argives, because the dogs belonging to the king's herds had torn in pieces the child born to him by Psāmāthē, daughter of Crōtōpus. This pest took the children from the arms of their mothers, and destroyed them. Chōrebus q. v. moved with pity for the unhappy Argives, killed the monster, an act which offended Apollō (Paus. i. 43).

Pōni, orum (Sing. Pōnus, i, m. the Carthaginians. Sērvius derives the name from Phœnices, because Carthage was built by Phœnicians. They gradually extended their influence westward, and, at one time, possessed the greater part of Hispānia, Spain, in which they built Cārthāgo Nōva, Carthage, hence Pōnus frequently denotes an inhabitant of either city. Adj. Pōenus, Pūnicus (seldom Pōnicus), et, Pūnicānus, a. um, of Carthage, Carthaginian, African, also faithless, treacherous. Pāni lēones, the African lions (Virg. B. v. 27). Pōenus nāvita, the Phœnician sailor (Hor. Od. ii. 15. 14). Pūnica corda, Carthaginian, i. e. treacherous hearts (Sil. Ital. xii. 737). Pūnicānus lectūlus, a Carthaginian couch (Cic. pro. L. Mur. 36). Adv. Pōnicē, et, Pūnicē, after the Carthaginian manner; in the Carthaginian language (Plaut. Pōn. v. 2. 22).

Pōnius Pōstūmus, Pōnī Pōstūmī, m. prefect of the camp of the second legion, who, having prevented the soldiers under his command, from sharing in the honour of the decisive victory obtained over the unfortunate Boadicea, queen of the Iceni, fell upon his own sword, and immediately expired (Tac. Ann. xiv. 37).

Pōtēlinus, a. um. Pōtēlinus lūcus. In this grove an assembly was held, by which M. Mānlius Cāpitōlinus was condemned to be thrown over the Tarpeian rock (Liv. vi. 20).

Pōtēlus, i, m. a plebeian tribune, who endeavoured to excite a commotion, without effect, at Rome, in 440 B. C., and rendered himself ridiculous, by threatening to prevent a levy, when there neither was war nor a prospect of it (Liv. iv. 12).

C. Pōtēlus, C. Pōtēlī, m. a tribune of the people, who proposed a law to prevent bribing the voters at elections, in 357 B. C. (Liv. vii. 15).—2. Surnamed Libo Visōlus, in con. cal., was raised to the consulship in 325 B. C., and twelve years after was nominated dictator, when the Roman army was besieging Bōviānum, Bojano (Liv. viii. 23 seq.).

C. Pōtēlus Bālbus, C. Pōtēlī Bālbi, m. obtained the office of consul in 359 B. C., when he commanded an army against the Tibūrtes. The Gauls advancing to their assistance, were routed by Q. Servilius Ahāla, dictator, and afterwards, when joined by the Tibúrtes, were driven into the city by Pœtēlius, who obtained a double triumph from having conquered both (Liv. vii. 11).

M. Pœtēlius Lābo, M. Pœtēlii Lābōnis, m. was invested with the consulship in 314 B. C. After his colleague he had made inquiry into the disaffection which existed in the state, they led an army against the Sāmīnites, over whom they gained a complete victory, and then advanced to besiege Bōvianum, Boviano, where they remained until C. Pœtēlius, dictator, came and took the command of the troops (Liv. ix. 24—28).

P. Pœtēlius, P. Pœtēlii, m. a Roman, one of the three ambassadors sent with presents to Sŷphāx in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 4).

Q. Pœtēlius, Q. Pœtēlii, m. one of the second dēcēmviri, appointed in 451 B. C. (Liv. iii. 35).

Pœtēnūm, i, n. a fort belonging to the Athamanians, of which they claimed the restoration from Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, in presence of the Roman ambassadors in 187 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 25).

Pōla, æ, f. Pola, the capital of Istria, which stood at the head of a deep creek or inlet. Here, according to report, Crispus, a son of Cōstāntīnus, was killed (Amm. Mar. xiv. 11).

Pōlēmo, v. Pōlēman, ōnis, m. appointed by Alexander the Great to guard the sluices of the Nile, in 331 B. C. (Curt. iv. 8).—2. Son of Andrōmēnes, and youngest brother of Amyntas (Curt. vii. 1 seq.).—3. A king of Pōntus, and father of Zēno q. v. (Tac. Ann. ii. 56).—4. Son of Zēno the rhetorician, and native of Laodicēa, whom M. Antōnius made king of Pōntus, and whom Augustus confirmed in his dominions, although he had fought at Actium in the army of Antōnius. He attempted, secretly, to make war on the neighbouring nation, the Mæotæ, who, having discovered his stratagem, commenced hostilities, took himself prisoner, and put him to death about the year 13.—5. Son of the former, succeeded his father in the throne, which he appears afterwards, to have resigned, either from choice or necessity, since that country became a province under the emperor Nēro (Eutrop. vii. 14). Adj. Pōlēmoniācus, a, um, Pōlēmoniācus pontus (Eutrop. vii. 14).—6. Son of Philōstrātus, an Athenian philosopher. In his earlier years, Pōlēmon indulged in pleasure and dissoluteness. Returning from one of his nocturnal debauches, after the sun had risen, he observed the gate of Xēnōcrātes open, which induced him to go in, not to be benefited by the instructions of that philosopher, but to show his contempt. Xēnōcrātes observing him enter, crowned with a garland, the usual badge of nocturnal rioters, and perceiving him inflamed with wine, discontinued his lecture, and began to discourse on temperance, modesty, and propriety, with such energy as rendered the intoxicated youth ashamed of his conduct and appearance. The impression made on his mind was so forcible, that he not only discontinued his irregular practices, but became a scholar of Xēnōcrātes, and afterwards succeeded him in the school, which he taught with great ability and success (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 254).

Pōlēmonion, i, m. Fatsa, a city of Pōntus (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Pōlēocrētes. See Dēmētrius.

Pōlites, æ, m. one of the sons of Priāmus, who was killed by Pŷrrhus, on the night that Troy was taken by the Greeks (Virg. Æn. ii. 525).—2. A son of the former, who came into Italy with Ænēas, and, according to Cāto, built Pōlitōriūm (Virg. Æn. v. 564).—3. One of the companions of Ulysses, whom Circe transformed into swine (Od. Met. xiv. 251).—4. A man in the army of Etēocles, infamous for having murdered his brother. Amphilārius, whilst Apōllō acted as his charioteer, deprived him of life (Stat. Th. vii. 757).—5. A youth killed in the Theban war by Hæmon (Stat. Th. viii. 491).—6. A Theban, pierced through the middle by Hippōmēdon in the Theban war (Stat. Th. ix. 125).

Pōlitōriūm, i, n. a city of the Latins, first taken by storm by Ancus Mārcius, who carried the inhabitants to Rome, and placed them on Mōns Avēntīnus. Being left unoccupied, the ancient Latins took possession of it, on which account Ancus levelled it with the ground (Liv. i. 33).

Pōlla, æ, f. the wife of the poet M. Annæus Lūcānus, to whom Stātiūs addresses a poem, on the birthday of her husband, after his death (Syl. ii. 7).—2. The wife of Pōllius Fēlix, a woman of great elegance of form and delicacy of manner (Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 16).—3. A woman, who attempted by dress to conceal the marks of age (Mart. iii. 42).

Pōllēntia, æ, f. a goddess in the circus at Rome (Liv. xxxix. 7). Pōtēntia in the opinion of some was the same goddess; others think the reading ought to be Pōllēntia (a pōllēntia hostibus). The idea conveyed by the three terms is nearly similar.

Pōllēntia, æ, f. Pollenza, a city of Ligūria, famous for the excellence of its black wool, and for the bloody battle fought there between the Romans and Goths under the emperor Arcādiūs and Hōnōriūs. Plinius writes Pōllēntia Cārrēa, and adds, that it had the additional name of Pōtēntia (l. 318). Adj. Pōllēntini, orum, m. Adj. Pōllēntinus, a, um. Pōllēntina lāna. Pōllēntinus cāmpus, the plain of Pollenza (Claud. xxviii. 125).—2. A town in one of the Bālēāres, afterwards called Māior, nov. Majores, which Cluvērius says is now a village.—3. A town of Picēnum, at which a Roman colony was planted in 186 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 44). Adj. Pōllēntini, orum, m. (Plin.).

Pōlljo, ōnis, m. a harper, mentioned by Jūvénālis (Sat. vi. 387), and by Mārtiālis, from whom he appears to have been held in high esteem by the Romans (iv. 61).—2. A man who had a pleasant property, four miles from Rome (Mart. iii. 20).

Pōllita, æ, f. an adulteress, or lewd woman, of so great notoriety, that her name became a common appellation for degraded females of that character (Juv. Sat. ii. 68). This name is very differently written in different MSS.

Pōllius Fēlix, Pōllii Fēlicis, m. a friend of the poet Stātiūs, to whom he addresses Syl. ii. 2. He lived in the neighbourhood of Nēāpōlis, Naples, possessed a large fortune, and spent much of his time in the acquisition of useful knowledge. His name frequently occurs in the writings of Stātiūs, as does also that of his wife Pōlla.

Q. Pōllius Valēriānus, Q. Pōllii Valēriāni, m. a bookseller in Rome (Mart. i. 114).

Pöllutia, as f. daughter of L. Antistius Vetus, who used every measure which prudence and fortitude suggested, to prevail on the monster Néro, to save her father's life. When not a ray of hope remained, she exhorted her father to meet his fate with becoming resolution, on which he opened his veins, when his mother-in-law and Pöllutia followed his example, using the same instrument, in the year 65 (Tac. Ann. xvi. 10 seq.).

Pöllux, ucis, m. a son of Jüpiter and Lēda, the wife of Tyndarus, king of Sparta. That god having transformed himself into a swan, at the time of his intercourse with the Spartan queen, she produced an egg from which sprung both Pöllux and his twin-brother Cästor. According to Hyginus, Pöllux and Hēlena were the children of Jüpiter; Cästor and Clytemnestra of Tyndarus. Fülgentius writes, that Cästor, Pöllux, and Hēlena were produced from the same egg, and adds fanciful derivations of the names of these two brothers, and also of their mother (Myth. ii. 16). Apollodorus describes Pöllux as fighting only with the cestus, while Virgilius represents him as excelling in horsemanship (G. iii. 89). Höratius agrees with Apollodorus, and has copied Hómērus (Sat. ii. 1. 26). Other ancient authors might be quoted, who have adopted the opinions of Hómērus; but as both Cästor and Pöllux are frequently mentioned in ancient writings, as excelling in horsemanship, it does not appear that the critics are justified, in attaching blame to Virgilius, in the line above referred to. They were in the Argonautic expedition, were both beardless, and stars were said to have been seen on their heads during that expedition. Diöddorus Siculus says that this happened during a storm, when they were imploring the gods for their safety, and that a calm having immediately ensued, they came to be regarded as the gods of mariners. On the death of Cästor, Jüpiter took Pöllux to heaven, and afterwards allowed them to be one day each amongst the gods, and doomed them to spend the next amongst the dead. The two brothers were changed into the sign Gēmini (Ov. Fast. v. 694). Amyclæus Pöllux, from his being brought up at Amyclæ, or perhaps from its vicinity to Lacedæmon (Virg. G. iii. 89).

Pölus, i, m. an Athenian comedian, remarkable for the fineness of his voice, and the elegance of his gestures (Gel. vii. 5).

Pölus, i, m. a pole, Plur. Pöli, orum, the poles. In geography, the poles are the extremities of the earth's axis, or that imaginary right line, about which it performs its diurnal revolutions. There are two poles, the North and the South; the former is in the centre of the northern frozen zone, the latter in that of the southern frozen zone. At the poles, there is only one day and one night in the year. In consequence of refraction, or that power of the atmosphere which exhibits luminous bodies before they could otherwise be in sight, the day is, in length, somewhat more, and the night consequently somewhat less, than six months. In astronomy, the poles are those points in the heavens, round which the whole sphere seems to revolve. The poets often use Pölus, in the same sense with Cöelum, heaven. The ancients seem to have believed the north pole differed from the south, the former being cold, and the latter hot (Luc. Phars. i. 54).

Pölusca, as, f. a city of the Völsci, taken by the Romans in 493 B. C., and restored to that people by Cöriölänus, in 491 B. C. (Liv. ii. 39).

Pölyæmon, önis, m. a noble Trojan, the father of Hämöpsion hence called Pölyæmonides, killed by Tēucer, at the same time with others of his countrymen (Hom. Il. viii. 276).

Pölyænus, i, m. a Syracusan, whose speech to his townsmen Līvius has recorded (xxiv. 22.).

Pölyarätus, i, m. one of the principal men of the Rhödi, who, with Dino, authorized Metrodörus in 170 B. C., to declare to Pērseüs, king of Mäcëdönia, that the Rhödiäns were ready to join him against the Romans. Next year he was delivered up to the very people, against whom he had a strong desire to make war (Liv. xlv. 23 seq.).

Pölybius, i, m. an eminent historian, son of Lycörtas, general of the Achæans, the most distinguished at that period of all the Grecian republics. Mëgälopölis, Leondari, a town of Arcädia, had the honour of giving birth to this illustrious Greek. From nature he enjoyed great talents, which, after being cultivated and improved in Greece, received every advantage which the literature of Rome could bestow. To this city he had come early in life, and here he contracted an intimate friendship with P. Cörnëlius Scipio Africänus, and his friend C. Lellius. That he benefited much from their society and conversation admits of no doubt, and the authority of the former furnished him with ships for sailing to whatever place he judged necessary, in order to obtain accurate information either of the scenery, or the facts of which he wished to write. This circumstance shows how deeply imprinted on his mind was truth, the essence of historical narrative. He crossed the Alps, in order to ascertain Hannibal's route into Italy, travelled over Spain, in order that he might be able to describe accurately the military achievements of his friend in that country. He appears to have intended chiefly to write of Roman history which, as Rome, at that time, reigned over almost the known world, gives a unity to his design, whilst the affairs of inferior states, like episodes, enliven, without distracting, the reader's attention, and form one great whole. In eloquence he is inferior to Hërodötus and Thücydides, perhaps also to Xënöphon; but in judgment, candour and knowledge, he at least equals, if he does not excel, these distinguished authors. Besides the advantages derived from the arts and sciences, his experience as a politician, added to that of his father, would give him a superiority over most other historians, either of Greece or Rome. Līvius owes great obligations to Pölybius, which he does not acknowledge, and speaks of him in terms very unequal to his merits, although he calls him "an accurate historian in all Roman transactions, particularly those carried on in Greece" (xxxiii. 10). Being frequently employed as an ambassador, gave him an opportunity of displaying his skill in negotiations, whilst he acquired a familiarity with the terms in which treaties were formed, and the means of judging of the consequences likely to result from them. At that period, the conquerors too often dictated to the conquered, and imposed degrading servitude, being more anxious to show their own superiority, than to contribute to the happiness of nations, by a reciprocity of mutual advantages. In such high estimation did Cicero hold the Great, that his diplomatic despatches, that he caused them to be accurately transcribed, and frequently employed them in transactions with foreign princes. The history of Polybius consisted of forty books, of which the first five only remain entire, and of the rest considerable fragments have been preserved. It embraced a period of fifty-three years, from the beginning of the second Punic war till Macedonia was reduced into a Roman province. Much of what he records, he had either transcribed or witnessed. He attended his friend both at the siege of Carthage, and at that of Numantia. In the strong and accurate judgment of Polybius, Scipio bears honourable testimony, declaring that he never failed in any attempt, when he followed the advice of his friend. After the death of that great Roman, Polybius returned to his native city, where he died at the age of eighty-two. From respect to his memory, his countrymen erected numerous statues, which, candour must allow, Polybius deserved, on account of his pre-eminence as a warrior, a statesman, and an historian. It were fruitless to record the censures heaped upon his works, by different authors of considerable merit, since all acknowledge that he wrote with judgment, and the strictest regard to truth.—2. A dexterous player at a particular game (Mart. vii. 71).—3. A freedman of Augustus, who wrote part of his will, as did also another freedman, Hilario (Suet. Aug. 101).—4. A favourite freedman of the emperor Claudius (Suet. Claud. 28).

Polybus, i. m. a son of Antenor (Hom. Il. xi. 50).—2. An Ithacan nobleman, the father of Eurymachus, one of the lovers of Penelope (Hom. Od. i. 309 seq.).—3. One of the lovers of Penelope, killed by Eumæus (Hom. Od. xxii. 283 seq.).—4. An Egyptian prince, the husband of Alcandra (Hom. Od. iv. 126).—5. An artist among the Phœnicians (Hom. Od. viii. 372).—6. A king of Corinth, whose name, whose name, Phœbus, found Oedipus, and brought him to his master. This monarch and his wife Merope, brought up Oedipus as their own son, hence, Statius makes Oedipus say Falsus Polybus, unrel Polybus, i. e. Polybus, my unrel father (Th. i. 64).

Polycharmus, e. Polycharmus, i. m. a man accused by Martialis, of the grossest crimes (lx. 71). This name occurs several times in the writings of the same poet; but it is probable the allusions are made to one individual.

Polycestē, ea, f. youngest daughter of Nestor, who washed, anointed, and then clothed Telemachus, when he arrived at the court of Pylus (Hom. Od. iii. 464 seq.).

Polyclitus, i. m. a statuery of the highest celebrity, reckoned by some to surpass Phidias. He excelled also in architecture. Pausanias mentions a number, if not the whole, of his works. If Statius be accurate, he excelled not only in carving, but also in moulding. Martialis frequently mentions this famous artist (Sill. It. xii. 40).—46. Polydorus, a son of Polydorus (Sill. It. xii. 40).—47. Polydorus, a son of Polydorus (Sill. It. xii. 40).—48. A freedman of the emperor Nero, sent from Rome to inspect the state of Britain, in consequence of the difference between Julius Claudius and C. Suetonius Paulinus, in the year 6. From the weight of his authority, the emperor expected he would produce a reconciliation between these generals. The splendid manner, and extravagant grandeur of Polydorus, hardened the provinces through which he travelled, and his presence overawed the Roman soldiers in Britain; but his second importance excited only derision and contempt in the minds of the natives. Tacitus states, that he accumulated prodigious riches (Hist. i. 37 seq.).

Polydorus, i. m. one of the profets of Syracuse, appointed by Epichorus; put to death by the inhabitants, after he had quieted their town (Liv. xxv. 38).

Polyerates, is, m. the king of Samos at the time Pythagoras returned from his travels. He appears, from ancient history, to have been singularly fortunate, and to have added several of the neighbouring islands and continental cities to his empire. Of his tyranny and despotism, nothing particular occurs in the pages of antiquity, notwithstanding Ovid's insinuation (Met. xv. 61). It is no improbable conjecture, that the disaffection of Pythagoras to the government of his native island, arose from his love of republicanism, and consequent aversion to absolute monarchy, rather than from abuse of power on the part of the Samian king, since history furnishes no facts which could have justified personal hatred. Polyerates was murdered at Mænesia, by Oronas, the Persian governor. It was the intention of Calligula to rebuild the palace of Polyerates (Suet. Cal.).

Polyeratia, e, f. the wife of Aratus, a man of distinction among the Achæi, whom Philippus, king of Macedonia, carried away from her husband, pretending that she would be married to a sovereign prince (Liv. xxvii. 31).

Polyerita, e, f. a woman of high birth, a native of Naxos, who, Aristoteles writes, died from sudden and excessive joy; as did also the comic poet Philippides, and Diagoras (Gel. iii. 16).

Polyetor, oris, m. son of Pterelæus, and brother of Neritus and Ithacus (Hom. Od. xvii. 207).—2. An Ithacan, the father of Pisander, one of the lovers of Penelope. Polyetorides, e, m. Pisander (Hom. Il. xviii. 298).

Polydæmon, onis, m. an Assyrian prince, descended from the famous queen Semiramis, whom Perseus killed (Ov. Met. v. 85).

Polydāmas (more properly written Pōlydāmas), antis, m. a Trojan, distinguished for his prudence and bravery, first mentioned by Homerus, in whose writings his name frequently occurs. Hector dreaded the censure of Polydāmas, whose name seems to have become proverbial, denoting a man of great sagacity and knowledge (Pers. Sat. i. 4). Adj. Pōlydāmāntēs, a, um. Pōlydāmāntēs arma (Sill. Ital. xii. 212).—2. A general of Alexander the Great, whom he dismissed in his old age (Just. xii. 12).—3. A man of pro-diglous strength; but who fell at last a victim to his own folly, in attempting more than he could accomplish (Val. Max. ix. 12).

Polydamne, es, f. a noble Egyptian woman, the wife of Thoon (Hom. Od. iv. 228).

Polydectes, e, Polydectas, a, m. a king of the island Sériphus, Serpho, to which Perseus and his mother were drifted in their slender bark. On being carried before him, he appointed his brother Dictys to take charge of both. By this prince the utmost attention was paid to the education of the boy, and every mark of respect to his mother. But the conduct of Polydectes with regard to Danaë, indicated a mind less pure, and passions less under the government of reason. Perseus, after his return from the conquest of Médusa, resented the insult which the king meditated against his mother, by showing him the Gorgon's head, which converted him to stone (Ov. Met. v. 242 seq.).—2. A son of Eunomus, king of Sparta, who, at his death, was succeeded by his brother Lycurgus (Just. iii. 2).

Polydora, a, f. the daughter of Peléus, married Bórus, and had Menesthus to the river Sperchius (Hom. Il. xvi. 175).

Polydorus, i, m. the youngest son of Priamus and Hécuba, was sent by his father to Polymestor, king of Thræcia, with a great quantity of gold, soon after the commencement of the Trojan war, that he might remain in that country till peace was restored. As soon as that monarch heard that Troy was taken, and Priamus dead, he murdered his ward, in order to obtain possession of the gold, and threw his body into the sea (Ov. Met. xiii. 432). Virgilius makes his shade inform Æneas, that he had been overwhelmed with a multitude of darts, of which the shafts had been myrtle, that took root and grew from his body. Whilst Æneas attempted to pull one of these myrtles, the blood dropped from the root, and the shade declared, that it formed a part of his body. On learning the nature of his death, and the cruel avarice which led to the commission of the crime, Æneas resolved to quit that inhospitable shore; but not before he had performed anew the funeral rites to Polydorus (Virg. Æn. iii. 23 seq.). Adj. Polydoreus, a, um. Polydoreus sanguis, the blood of Polydorus (Ov. Met. xiii. 629).

Polyhymnia, a, f. one of the muses, who were the daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne (Virg. Cir. 55). Horatius represents her as the muse of lyric poetry (Od. i. 1. 33).

Polyidos, e, Polyidus, i, m. son of Cærius, who restored to life, by means of an herb by which he had seen one dragon re-animate another, Glaucus, son of Minos, king of Cræta, Candia. That monarch would not allow Polyidos to return to Argos, unless he taught his son Glaucus the art of prophecy, which, from necessity, he at last did, and when on the eve of sailing he made Glaucus spit into his mouth, which he had no sooner done, than he forgot what Polyidos had taught him (Apol. iii. 3).

Polymla, a, f. daughter of Phylas, famous for her skill in leading down the dance (Hom. Il. xvi. 180).

Polyneus, i, m. son of Argæas, hence called Argæades, was in the Trojan army, and killed by Patroclus, clad in the armour of Achilles (Hom. Il. xvi. 417).

Polyimestor, oris, m. a king of Thræcia, who was married to Iliônê, daughter of Priamus and Hécuba. The Trojan king, during the war, sent his son Polydorus to be brought up at the court of his brother-in-law, and Iliônê educated him as her own son, and Delphylus, whom she bore to Polyimestor, as her brother, that whatever might befall either of them, she might discharge her duty to her parents. On the destruction of Troy, the Greeks sent to Polyimestor, promising him Elætra, a daughter of Agamemnon, in marriage, and a great sum of money, if he would murder Polydorus. He accepted the bribe, and killed his own son Delphylus, supposing him to be Polydorus. The latter afterwards learned from his sister his true parents, on which, by his advice, she deprived Polyimestor of his eyes, and then killed him. According to Ovidius, Polyimestor killed Polydorus, in order to get possession of the wealth, which his father had sent along with him, and for this murder Hécuba tore out his eyes with her fingers (Met. xiii. 430—564).

Polyimestrus, i, m. the father of Bittus, the first king of Lydia (Pin. Pyth. iv. 104).

Polymnis, is, e, idis, m. a Theban, father of Epaminondas. The common editions of Cornélius Nepos read Polymnus, although in Greek the name is uniformly written Polymnis (Epan. 1).

Polyneus, i, m. a nobleman of Syracuse, who, on the assembling of the people in the senatehouse, in 216 B. C., after the murder of Hieronimus, addressed them in a speech distinguished by moderation and love of liberty, recommended to send deputies to Andranodorus, requiring him to obey the direction of the senate and people, to open the gates of the city, and to withdraw the garrison, at the same time advising the people to secure their liberty in opposition to him, if he persisted in retaining the sovereignty, under pretext of acting for the king. This speech had its just and proper effect (Liv. xxiv. 22).

Polyneus, i, m. son of Tecton, and father of Amphialus. Tectonides, a, m. Polyneus (Hom. Od. viii. 114).

Polyneices, is, m. the younger son of Edipus, king of Thèbe; Theba; and Iocasta. The Theban monarch, by his will, bequeathed the government to his two sons Etœcles and Polyneices, limiting the royal dignity of each to one year alternately. Etœcles first ascended the throne, but refused at the end of the year to resign the crown to Polyneices, who fled to Adrastus, king of Argos, clothed in the skin of a lion. In the porch he had an encounter with Tydeus, who wore the skin of a bear. After Adrastus had procured a reconciliation between these strangers, he gave his daughter Argia in marriage to the former, and Deipylê to the latter. By this conduct he obeyed an injunction of the oracle, which commanded him to marry his daughters to a lion and a bear. Adrastus espoused the cause of his son-in-law, raised a powerful army, and marched against Thèbe, Theba, to compel Etœcles to place Polyneices on the throne of that kingdom. The brothers met, engaged in single combat, and fell by mutual wounds (Stat. Th.).

Pölypetes, α, m. son of Pirithöus, one of the warriors at Troy (Hom. Il. xii. 129).

Pölypemon, ν, Pölypémon, óis, m. father of Sciron, and, according to Ovidius, grandfather of Háleýónē. Neptis Pölypémónis, Háleýónē (Ov. Met. vii. 401).—2. A king, whom Ulysses pretended to be his grandfather. Pölypémónides, α, m. Aphidas, son of Pölypémou (Hom. Od. xxiv. 304).

Pölyphántas, α, m. one of the officers of Philippos, king of Mácédónia, to whom and Ménippus, that monarch gave two thousand five hundred armed men, to protect the allies, on his quitting Achálcum béllum, and returning to Mácédónia (Liv. xxvii. 32 seq.).

Pölyphémus, ι, m. one of the Cyclopes, was, according to Ovidius, a giant of prodigious size, who had his residence in Sicily, not far from Ætna, Monte Gibello, where he fed his flocks, hence Virgilius calls him Pastor (Æn. iii. 657). He is represented as having only one large eye, which was in the middle of his forehead, and living on human flesh. When Ulysses, on his return from the Trojan war, landed on that coast, Pölyphémus seized him and his companions, whom he put into a cave, where he ate two of them every day. To avoid a similar fate, Ulysses mixed strong wine with his victuals, which lulled him asleep, and seizing a firebrand he put out the eye of the monster, and afterwards effected his escape, which it is said he accomplished between the legs of one of the rams, after he had tied his companions to the sheep. Virgilius has given an admirable description of Pölyphémus (Æn. iii. 641—665). Ætneus Pölyphémus (Ov. Ep. Pont. ii. 115). To a Cyclops of this name and Gálátēa, Appianus refers the origin of the Celts, Illyrians, and Galatians, as they had three sons, Celtus, Illyrius, and Gallus. What he states respecting the sons and daughters of Illyrius, is probably equally fabulous (Bel. Illyr.).—2. A man killed by Lárónius, in a naval engagement between the Carthaginians and Romans, during the second Punic war, near the coast of Sicily, Sicily (Sil. Ital. xiv. 527 seq.). From the description of the poet, the character of this Sicilian bears a strong resemblance to the Cyclops, in general appearance and disposition.—3. Son of Elátus and Hippēa, daughter of Antippus, was by birth a Thessalian. The Scholiast on Apöllónius Rhódios mentions, that some made him a son of Néptúnus, from which it may be inferred that he possessed great bravery, or some other quality which gave him distinction among his countrymen and companions in arms. Many of the ancient heroes on this account had two fathers, a mortal and a god. He was one of the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. i. 457).—4. A servant or slave of the Roman emperor Sévērus, who appears to have been a man of prodigious size (Mart. vii. 97).

Pölyphidēus, έος, m. son of Mántius, and brother of Clitus. After the death of Amphíraus, Apölo endowed him with the gift of prophecy, and having quarrelled with his father, he removed to Hýpērēsia. He was the father of Thēoclýmēnus (Hom. Od. xv. 249).

Pölyphotes, α, m. a Trojan, sacred to Cēres, i. e. priest of Cēres, whom Ænēas met in the infernal regions (Virg. Æn. vi. 484). This word is very differently written.

Pölyspērchon, ν, Pölypērchon, ótis, m. one of the officers of Alexander the Great, whom Antipater, in preference to his own son Cassander, on his deathbed appointed governor of Mácédónia, and tutor to the children of Alexander. At that period he was advanced in life, and discovered none of the qualities which fit for the administration of a great kingdom. Cruelty of disposition overcame every virtuous principle, and he treated with severity, not only the Greeks who set themselves in opposition to his measures of unjust aggrandizement, but even the children of Alexander, to whom he owed his advancement in life. From Justinus and Q. Curtius, he appears to have been treated by Alexander with singular distinction, which renders his ingratitude the more odious, and his harshness to the children the more detestable. According to Justinus, he was killed in the battle with Eumenes (Just. xii. 12—xiii. 8). The account of Dídōrus Siculus is different (xviii. 38).

Pölystrátus, ι, m. a Macedonian in the army of Alexander the Great, mentioned by Curtius (v. 13).

Pölytimētus, ι, m. the Sogd, a river of Sögdiana, which waters a valley of great fertility. It had this name from the Greeks under Alexander the Great, and signifies highly honoured, very precious (Curt. vii. 10).

Pölytimus, ι, m. a man on whom Märdälis writes an epigram (xii. 86). His name occurs also in xii. 76.

Pölyxēna, α, f. a daughter of Prámus, whom Pýrrhus sacrificed on his father's tomb, in revenge of his father's death, who was killed by Páris in the temple of Apölla, to which he had gone to celebrate his nuptial rites with that princess. Hömérus has been blamed for not mentioning this circumstance, noticed by all the other poets who have recorded her fate (Paus. i. 22). Pölyxēna forms the principal character in the Hécuba of Euripides. Adý, Pölyxēnia, α, um. Pölyxēnia caedes, the murder of Pölyxēna (Catul. lxiv. 369).

Pölyxēnidas, α, m. a native of Rhódas, from which he was banished, and entered the service of Antióchus, king of Sýria, who gave him the command of his fleet in 193 B. C., when he was at war with the Romans. C. Lívius Sálinátor gained a decisive victory over him, although he had only half his number of ships, and pursued him almost to the very harbour of Ephesus. By a disgraceful artifice, he deluded Pausistrátus, the commander of the Rhodian fleet, to his destruction, besides taking the whole of his fleet, except five ships. In a second engagement with the Roman fleet under L. Æmilíus Régillus, he lost forty-two ships, then set sail for Ephesus, where he learned that Antióchus had been conquered at Thyátra, afterwards landed at Pátara in Lycia, and, from dread of the Rhodian fleet, pursued his journey by land to Sýria, attended only by a small retinue (Liv. xxxvi. 41 seq.). Flórus joins Hannibal with Pölyxēnidas in that command (ii. 8).

Pölyxō, ús, f. an old woman, who persuaded the women of Lémnos to kill their husbands and their sons. Of this unsexed Státius has given an excellent description, in the 5th book of the Thebaid. According to some authors, she was a prophetess, who stood high in the favour of Apollo. This seems to have been the opinion of Valerius Flaccus (il. 316); but Apollonius Rhodius makes her the muse of Hysipyle, queen of Lemnos, and Hyginus, her adviser, at least with respect to the Argonauts. This, however, might be a consequence of her great age, and her intimacy with that princess.

Pomētia, æ, f. e. Pōmētī, orum, m. a city of Lātium, which is first mentioned by Livius when the sons of Ancus Mārcius fled thither, after they had accomplished the death of Tāquinius Priscus, fifth king of Rome. Tāquinius Sūpērbus carried it by storm, and the value of the plunder amounted to forty talents, which he set apart for erecting a temple of great magnificence to Jūpiter. This town afterwards revolted to the Aurūnci, was taken, plundered, and levelled with the ground. The inhabitants were treated with the greatest cruelty, although they had surrendered on the approach of the Roman forces. It must have been rebuilt, as it is mentioned afterwards by the same historian, who states, that it was first a city of the Latins, and afterwards of the Volscians (Liv. i. 41 seq.). Adj. Pōmētīnus, et, Pōmētīnus, a, um. Pōmētīna manabula, the spoils of Pōmētia (Liv. i. 55). Pōmētīnus ager, the territory of Pōmētia (Liv. ii. 34). Pōmētīna pāludes, the Pomptine marshes or fens, which are eighteen English miles in length, nine in breadth, and thirty-five distant from Rome at the nearest place of the city. Via Appia passes through them (Plin. i. 325). C. Jūlius Cēsār intended to drain these marshes, a design which he did not live to accomplish (Suet. Jul. 44).

Pōmērium, i, n. sacred ground on each side of the walls of Rome, on which no building was erected, nor crop raised (Liv. i. 44). Gellius has entered minutely into the meanings and uses of this term (xiii. 14).

Pōmōna, æ, f. a nymph who lived under king Prōca, and received her name from her attention to fruit-trees and gardening. She had no delight in woods, rivers, or hunting; but loved the country, and boughs bending with fruit. In her right hand she held a pruning knife, with which she lopped off the superfluous fruit, or checked excessive luxuriance. At other times she employed herself in engrafting and irrigation. After she had refused many lovers, she married Vērūmīnus (Ov. Met. xiv. 623 seq.).

Pōmpēia, æ, f. daughter of Q. Pōmpēius Rūfus, grand-daughter of L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, and second wife of C. Jūlius Cēsār, who divorced her on suspicion of criminality with P. Clōdīus (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 6).

Pōmpēia Mācrīna, Pōmpēia Mācrīna, f. wife of Argēllus, banished by the Roman senate, in the year 33. Her father, an illustrious knight, and her brother, a man of praetorian rank, to avoid a similar sentence, put an end to their lives (Tac. Ann. vi. 18).

Pōmpēia Paullīna, Pōmpēia Paullīna, f. wife of the philosopher Sēneca, who resolved to die with her husband, and the veins of both were opened at the same time. From natural decay and meagre diet, the blood flowed slowly from his exhausted frame. To accelerate his death, he ordered the veins in his legs to be cut, and soon after he experienced excruciating pains. Lest his sufferings should overpower her constancy, or her dis- tress overcome his own sensibility, he persuaded her to retire to another room. The emperor commanded Pōmpēia to be preserved, and her arms were bound up by the slaves as she lay in a state of languor. Vulgar malignity, says Tacitus, spread a report that she wished to live, and she lingered out a few years, cherishing a fond regret for the loss of her husband, whilst the weakness of her frame and the sickly paleness of her countenance showed, that she had been reduced to the last extremity (Ann. xv. 63, 64).

Pōmpēi, orum, m. Torre della Annunciata, a town of Cāmpānia, Campagna, on Sārnus, the Sarno, not far from Vēsūvius, Vesuvio, into which P. Cōrnēlius Scipio put the Roman fleet, in 310 B. C. This is the first Roman squadron mentioned by Livius, which had troops on board, and seems to have sailed on purpose to plunder (ix. 38). An earthquake laid Pōmpēi in ruins, in the year 63 (62, Tac.), and about sixteen years after, an eruption of Vēsūvius overwhelmed it, burying the town and destroying every living creature. An entrance was opened into this town a few years ago, by removing part of the lava, and almost every thing was seen in the state in which it had been, when that burning deluge entombed it in its ruins. The houses were found entire, the bodies of the inhabitants, from the total exclusion of air, in the very posture in which they had been suffocated to death. The painting on the walls in some instances remained uninjured, and female skeletons were found standing upright against the sides of the buildings, and the ashes having hardened, retained the form of their persons, and part of their dress. The houses generally were of one storey, the principal apartments were behind, and two of them had glass windows, the rest shutters only. It must have excited a very uncommon sensation, in the minds of the persons who first descended into this subterranean town, to see by torch-light, streets and houses which had been concealed for nearly two thousand years, to discover the people in the attitude they happened to be in, when the town was over-spread with the eruption of Vesuvio, to enter apartments long uninhabited, each presenting a different appearance, and the whole heightened by the fearful silence which pervaded this region of desolation and death. The spectators had in some measure a view of a Roman town, and its inhabitants, at the remote period when that dreadful calamity happened. The whole has not yet been explored. Inh. Pōmpēiān, orum, m. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 17). Adj. Pōmpēiānus, a, um. Pōmpēiānus Sārnus, the Sarno of Pōmpēi (Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 265). Pōmpēiāna pālūs, perhaps once a marsh, now a rich plain raised and fertilized by the ashes which destroyed the town (Eust.).

Pōmpēiōpōlis, is, f. Palesoli (Mezzella, Leake), a town in Cilicia, built by the Greeks, of which the original name was Sōlli. Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus settled there the pirates whom he allowed to surrender, and called the town Pōmpēiōpōlis, from his own name. It stood at the mouth of Lātus, the Lamuro (Tac. Ann. ii. 58).

Pōmpēius, i, m. a Roman knight, charged with a conspiracy, and condemned to death, in the year 32 (Tac. Ann. vi. 14).—2. cruel informer, of whom nothing is known, except what Juvénalis has related (Sat. iv. 119).

Pompeius Albinus, Pompeii Albinus, m. a native of Sparta, charged with being accessory to the guilt of Valerius Fictorius, and banished both from that country and Italy, in the year 61. He had held the office of quaestor (Tac. Ann. xiv. 41).

Pompeius Græpius, Pompeii Græpius, m. a Roman, probably of senatorian rank, to whom Horatius addresses one of his odes (il. 16). He most likely had an estate in Sicily, to which the poet in that ode alludes, together with other proofs of his wealth. Horatius mentions him again (Epis. l. 12). Some consider him the person to whom he ascribes the 7th ode, of book II, whilst others, with more probability, think that ode addressed to Pompeius Varrus q. s.

Pompeius Longinus, Pompeii Longinus, m. a tribune of the praetorian cohorts, promoted, out of his turn, by the friendship of Gallia. Tacitus refers to him (Ann. xv. 71: Hist. l. 51).

Pompeius Mæcer, Pompeii Mæcer, m. a Roman praetor, who asked the emperor Tiberius, when defamatory libels were, by a forced construction, included in the law of treason, whether the sentence for treason would be pronounced. The emperor replied, "The laws must be put in force" (Tac. Ann. i. 72).

Pompeius Paulinus, v. Paulinus Pompeius, Pompeii Paulinus, m. finished the embarkment to prevent the inundation of the Rhine, sixty-three years after it had been begun by Drusus. At that period he and L. Antonius Vetus commanded the legions in Germany. The emperor Nero, intrusted the public imposts to Pompeius Paulinus, L. Calpurnius Piso, and Ducennius Geminus, in the year 62 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 53: xv. 16).

Pompeius Præpincus, Pompeii Præpincus, m. procurator of Gallia Belgica, the Netherlands, in the year 69. The soldiers who embraced the interest of Vitellius, put him to death that year (Tac. Hist. l. 12—98).

Pompeius Urbicus, Pompeii Urbicus, m. a Roman knight, ordered to immediate execution, by the emperor Claudius, in the year 48, for his having been an accessory with Silenus (Tac. Ann. xi. 35).

Pompeius Varrus, Pompeii Varrus, m. a friend of Horatius, who had been present at the battle of Philippi, in the army of Brutus. The poet congratulates him on his safe return to his native country, and on his regaining the rights of a Roman citizen. Horatius addresses to him an ode, in which he expresses his joy at the return of his old and early friend, with great warmth of affection, and in the lively strains of unaffected rapture. Perhaps in no part of his writings, do the dispositions of Horatius appear in a more favourable point of view (Od. ii. 7).

A. Pompeius Bithynicus, A. Pompeii Bithynicus, m. a Roman praetor, killed in Sicily, by Sextus Pompeius, son of Cn. Pompeius Magnus, in 44 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 123).

C. Pompeius Longinus Gallus, C. Pompeii Longinus Gallus, m. was the consular colleague of Q. Verrucius, in the year 49 (Tac. Ann. xii. 5).

Cn. Pompeius, Cn. Pompeii, m. surnamed Magnus, on account of his splendid achievements, the son of Cn. Pompeius Strabo and Lucilla, was born 105 B. C. He displayed uncommon fortitude and success in war, at a very early period of life, when serving under the eye of his father, whose life he saved, when Terentius and others, hired by Cinna, were sent to assassinate him. To elegance of form and beauty of countenance, he added the winning graces of an accomplished orator. When Rome was convulsed by the avarice and ambition of C. Marius and L. Cornélius Sulla, and when their barbarity had, in some measure, desolated the city by the carnage of her butchered citizens, Pompeius, with three legions, attached himself to the latter, and obtained his patronage. He, in a few days, overran Sicily, then under the partition of C. Marius, recovered all the parts of Africa which had withdrawn from L. Cornélius Sulla, and greatly extended the former limits of the Roman territories in that country.

On his return to Rome, Sulla, at the head of the nobility, met and saluted him with the title of Magnus. It was not without resistance, they allowed him to enter the city in triumph, then only Eques, and not admitted into the senate. On the death of Sulla, Pompeius joined Cælius, and supported himself against the Marian faction, headed by Lepidus. He defeated Sertorius in Spain, and obtained a second triumph, although still a private citizen, and only of equestrian rank. The senate had, in his absence, and before he completed his 36th year, elected him to the consulship, during which he restored the tribunes to their former power, which Sulla had lessened, and in return was, through the interest of Cælius, a tribune, invested with extraordinary powers, in order to destroy the pirates who infested the Mediterranean, and had nearly annihilated the naval force of Rome. Of the Mediterranean Sea he assigned different parts to different commanders. Gellius had a squadron in Tuscan Mare, the Tuscan Sea, Plorius in Sicilian Mare, the Sicilian Sea, Gracilius in Ligurian Sinus, the Gulf of Genoa, Torquatus in Balaëricum Mare, Tiberius Nero in Gaditanum Frætum, the Strait of Gibraltar, Lentulus in Libyan Mare, the African Sea, Marcellinus in Egyptian Mare, Terentius Varrus in Mare Egæum, the Archipelago, and Mare Ponticum, the Black Sea, Metellus in Mare Pamphylium, and Cæpio in Mare Asiaticum. Pompeius himself commanded in Sinus Gallicus, the Gulf of Lyons, and his sons Cneius and Sextus, in Mare Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice (Flor. iii. 6). This important war he finished in sixty days, without the loss of a single ship (Flor. iii. 6), which added greatly to his former celebrity. Pompeius was next sent against Mithridates, king of Pontus, and Tigranes, king of Armenia. He, in a short time, not only subdued these potent monarchs, and great warriors, but likewise annexed all Asia lying west of the Tigris to the Roman empire. Appianus says, that after conquering Mithridates and Tigranes, he subjected to the Roman powers Coele-Syria, Phœnicia, Palestina, Idumea, Ituraea, part of Syria, and completed the conquest of Cilicia (Hel. Mith. 244). On his return to Italy, his countrymen dreaded that he would march his victorious troops against the city, and secure himself in the government; but he disbanded them at Brundisium, Brindisi, keeping only a small retinue. He was received at Rome with the utmost joy, and his third triumph, the most splendid that had ever been exhibited, continued for two days. In consequence of many of his acts in Asia being arbitrary and despotic, the senate refused to confirm them. Enraged at this affront, he entered into an agreement with Caesar and Crassus, that nothing should be done in the state but by their common consent, which was called the FIRST TRIUMVIRATE. To ratify this nefarious treaty, Pompeius married Julia, the daughter of Caesar. By this alliance, he promoted the ambitious views of his father-in-law, not only in direct violation of justice and patriotism, but also in opposition to the strong and urgent remonstrances of Cicero, and many of his best friends. The first step, in consequence of this pernicious compact, was to cause a law to be passed, appointing Spain and part of Africa to Pompeius, as his province; to Caesar, Gallia, France, for five years; and to Crassus, Syria, for ten years. Julia died next year in childbed, which dissolved the hollow friendship which subsisted between her father and husband. Their mutual jealousy was daily heightened, and no restraint remaining to check the ambition of the former, or the power of the latter, they came at last to an open quarrel, which ended in the Civil War. Pompeius continued inactive, affecting to despise Caesar, and it was not until his father-in-law had passed the Rubicon, the boundary between Gallia Cisalpina and Italia, that he made any exertion. Finding himself unable to meet Caesar on equal terms in Italy, he withdrew to Greece, and, by an unaccountable oversight, did not take the treasury with him. In this, as well as in his former wars, Pompeius displayed uncommon military talents. He completely routed Caesar's army at Dyrachium, Durazzo, and had he not, either from suspecting a feint on the part of that general, to draw his troops into a snare, or from irresistible fatality, ordered his men to discontinue the pursuit, that day had put a full period to the war, and, most probably, to Caesar's life. But failing to improve this advantage, a second was denied. These two great generals soon after came to a decisive engagement, on the plains near Pharsalus, Pharsala, or, Pharsa, in Thessaly, in which Pompey's army was destroyed, and his camp taken. He fled to Ptolemaeus, king of Egypt, expecting to receive assistance from him, as he had restored his father to the crown. But Pothinus, v. Pothinus, an eunuch, his minister, Theodotus, his preceptor, and Achilles, commander-in-chief of his forces, advised him to invite Pompeius on shore, and kill him, in order to obtain the favour of Caesar. This treacherous design was executed by Achilles, and Scipianus, a Roman, formerly a centurion in Pompey's army. They cut off his head, and embalmed it to preserve its features, and thus render the present more grateful to the conqueror. His body was thrown overboard, washed ashore, and afterwards burned on a small funeral pile, formed by the wreck of a fishing boat, by his freedman Phillip. The Egyptians erected a monument on the place, which, after it had been defaced by time, the emperor Hadrianus repaired. Pompeius did not possess the talents of a great man, but owed his distinguished celebrity to military success, a genteel appearance, and engaging manners. Elated by the favour of the populace, he arrogated merits to which he had no claim, and an influence in the state, to which his abilities were unequal. Vanity formed the most prominent feature in his character, and induced him to adopt those measures which terminated in his destruction. To pamper this passion, unknown in a great mind, many submitted to his authority with a meanness truly contemptible. It has been remarked, that all the murderers of Pompeius, like those concerned in the assassination of Caesar, atoned for their cruelty and perfidy to that general, by violent deaths. Achilles and Pothinus were slain by order of Caesar, and Theodotus, after wandering for some time, like a vagabond, in Egypt, was found in Asia by Brutus, who put him to death by torture. Cn. Pompeius was four times married. His first wife was Antistia, daughter of Antistius, a praetor, whom he divorced, on purpose to marry Emilia, the daughter-in-law of Sulla. She died in childbed. He then from policy married Julia, Caesar's daughter, a lady of the most amiable dispositions, whose address and prudence prevented any quarrel between her father and husband, during her life. Next year Julia expired, soon after the birth of her first child, who did not long survive his mother's death. Pompeius then married Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, whose beauty, accomplishments, and virtues, have been much commended. She witnessed the murder of her husband; but escaped the bloody hands of his assassins, by the superior sailing of her ship. Florus says her children were in the same vessel with her (iv. 2). Pompeius, orbis domitor (Manil. l. 791 seq.). Juvenalis uses Pompeius to denote Cn. Pompeius and his two sons Cneius and Sextus (Sat. x. 108), and Martialis has in the same sense Pompeius juvenes. (v. 75). Adj. Pompeius, et Pompeianus, a, um, of Pompeius; of the party of Pompeius; conquered by him. Pompeia manu, by the hand of Pompeius (Prop. iii. 11. 68). Pompeiani triumph, the triumphs of Pompeius (Claud. xviii. 221). Pompeianus Cilix, the Cilician conquered by Pompeius (Luc. Phar. iv. 448). — 2. The elder son of Pompeius the Great, after the death of his father, joined Metellus Scipio in Africa; and, on his being defeated by Caesar, fled to Spain. In this country, he, and his younger brother, Sextus, raised considerable forces, and renewed the war with great vigour. Caesar was again compelled to leave Rome, and march against these ambitious and enterprising youths. After some maneuvering and skirmishes, they came to a decisive engagement at Munda, Munda, in which the Pompeys evinced their superior knowledge of military tactics, by the skill with which they led on their newly-raised troops. Caesar's hardy veterans were forced to retire, which that great commander observing, seized the shield of one of his soldiers who had fallen, rushed into the middle of the battle, and animated his soldiers, by his example, to renew the charge. This well-timed act of courage gained him the victory. The troops, which the sons of Pompeius commanded, were completely routed, and Cnēus was soon after taken, and killed.—3. A Roman, who was well skilled in the language of the Gauls, and acted as interpreter to Q. Titūrius. After the credulity of that lieutenant-general, had placed himself and his men at the mercy of Ambiorix, he sent Cn. Pōmpeius to the king of the Eburōnes, begging him to spare their lives. See Titūrius.—4. Surnamed Māgnus, a descendant of the first of that name. To him the emperor Claudius gave his daughter Antōnia in marriage, and afterwards put him to death (Suet. Claud. 27).

Cn. Pōmpeius Strābo, Cn. Pōmpeii Strābōnis, m. father of Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus, defeated in battle the Picēntes, and laid siege to their town, in 92 B. C. Next year, he overcame the Mārsi, took Ascūlum in the following year, and the Italians there were put to death by Māimercus Aemilius. To Q. Pōmpeius Rūfus, consul, he must have delivered over the army, unless he had procured his death. Retaining the command of the troops added to his influence, and he secretly encouraged both factions, probably with the view of diminishing their strength. To him must be conceded the merit of terminating the Social War. He spread, says Florus, devastation wherever he went, not only with the sword, but also by fire, thus making atonement to the gods of the plundered cities, and to the shades of so many armies and consuls (iii. 18).

Q. Pōmpeius Nēpos, Q. Pōmpeii Nēpōtis, m. the son of a trumpeter. He held the censorship with Q. Cæcilius Mētellus Mācēdōnicus, in 132 B. C. They were the first two plebeians who held that office at the same time (Liv. Ep. 59).

Q. Pōmpeius Rūfus, Q. Pōmpeii Rūfi, m. (Surnamed, in con. cal., Bithynicus), was the colleague of Cn. Sērvilius Cæpio in the consulship, 143 B. C. Pōmpeius succeeded Q. Cæcilius Mētellus, surnamed Mācēdōnicus, in the command of the army in Spain, where the Numāntini completely routed him, and necessity obliged him to make a disgraceful peace with that people. He was the first of the Pōmpeii who was consul (Eutrop. iv. 16 seq.).—2. Was consul in 90 B. C., with L. Cornēlius Sūlla, both of whom opposed the proceedings of the turbulent tribune P. Sūlpius Rūfus, who was supported by C. Mārius. His son of the same name, the husband of a daughter of his colleague, was murdered by that same P. Sūlpius Rūfus. Through the exertions of Cn. Pōmpeius Strābo, whom he was to have succeeded in the command of the army, he lost his life (Liv. Ep. 77). He was the first consul in whose blood the Roman soldiers imbrued their hands (Vel. Pat. ii. 20).—3. Son of the former, and son-in-law of L. Cornēlius Sūlla, his father's colleague in the consulship. P. Sūlpius Rūfus, a tribune of the people, procured his assassination, on which his father-in-law marched his army into Rome, defeated the faction of that turbulent tribune, and C. Mārius, both of whom he drove out of the city. The senate declared twelve of that faction enemies, in which number were C. Mārius, with his son, of the same name, and the tribune already mentioned. A price seems to have been offered for their discovery, as Sūlpius was put to death, on the place of his concealment being pointed out by one of his own slaves, who both claimed and received the reward for informing where his master had hidden himself (Liv. Ep. 77).—4. A Roman prætor, despatched to Cāpūa (65 B. C.), to take possession of that place, lest it should fall into the hands of the rebels under Cātilina. The senate invested him with a discretionary power, to levy such forces as the exigency of the occasion and the magnitude of the danger might, in his opinion, require (Sal. Cat. 30).

Sēxtus Pōmpeius, Sēxti Pōmpeii, m. the younger son of Pōmpeius the Great, survived the battle of Mūnda, Munda, and continued for a considerable time in Hispānia, Spain, attended only by a few followers. His spirit remaining unbroken by all the calamities of his family, and disdaining to submit to the power of the usurper, he began to collect forces, and to make preparations for a successful resistance. On the death of Cæsar, he was recalled by the senate, who conferred on him the same power at sea, which his father had formerly enjoyed in consequence of the Gabinian law. The Second Triumvirate, Augustus, Antōnius, and Lēpidus, proscribed him as one of the murderers of Cæsar. Being joined from necessity by a great number, whose names were in the list of the proscribed, and by others who were attached to his father, or approved of his own principles and conduct, he took possession of Sicily, Sicily, carried on a successful war against the Triumviri, and obliged them to grant him peace on very advantageous terms. At the signing of the treaty, Antōnius and Augustus went on board his ship, and supped with him. One of his captains, Mena, Mesias, or Menadōrus, advised him to put both his guests to death; but, possessing his father's greatness, he spurned the perfidious proposal. He might have often subdued his enemies, had he improved the advantages gained by his bravery. In the Sicilian Sea, he acted the part of a pirate, and dishonoured his father's memory, by following the disgraceful profession along the very coasts where it had been crushed, and the race nearly extirpated, by that noble Roman. Lucānus calls him a pirate, and holds him up to infamy, if not to detestation (Phar. vi. 420 seq.). Augustus at last entirely defeated him in a naval engagement near Sicily. He then fled to Antōnius, and afterwards endeavoured to raise new forces, but was killed by Titus, one of Antony's generals, at Milētus in Cāria, after Antōnius had promised to preserve him. Hōrātius calls him, in contempt, Nēpōnis dux (Epod. ix. 7), and he himself wished to be called the son of Nēptūnus (Ap. Bel. Civ. 729).—2. The consular colleague of Sēxtus Apūleius, in the year 14. During their consulship Augustus died, and Tiberius succeeded to the empire. Both consuls were relations of Augustus. Cn. Cālpurnius Piso chose Pōmpeius and other four to defend him, which under different pretexts they all declined. It is probable that he possessed considerable talents as an orator, as Tacitus alludes to a bitter invective of his against M. Lēpidus (Tac. Ann. i. 7 seq.).

Pōmpilius, i. m. a man mentioned by Florus (ii. 17). Here either the author must have been very inaccurate, or the reading is very corrupt, for no person of this name either succeeded Q. Fabius Māximus, or carried on war in Spain against Viriathus. The name bearing the nearest resemblance to it is that of Poppilius, who was not consul the year after Fabius, nor till after the death of Viriathus.—2. A tribune of the people, who joined his colleagues Antistius, and M. Canuleius, in a second prosecution of C. Sémpronius Atratinus q. v., on pretence that he had been defeated by the Volsel, but in reality from spite at his cousin A. Sémpronius Atratinus (Liv. iv. 44).

L. Pōmpilius, L. Pōmpiliū, m. a military tribune, who showed great bravery, when the troops he commanded were surrounded by Persēus, king of Mācēdōniā, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 65).

M. Pōmpilius Andrōnīcus, M. Pōmpiliū Andrōnīcē, m. a native of Syriā, embraced the opinions of the Epicurean sect, and taught grammar at Rome; but indolence disqualified him for the management of a school, on which account he withdrew to Cūma, where he lived in retirement, and wrote much. Poverty obliged him to sell his work on the annals of Ennius, which Orbilius recovered, and published with the author's name (Suet. H. Gram. 8).

Sex. Pōmpilius, Sex. Pōmpiliū, m. chosen in his absence a tribune of the people, in 421 B. C. (Liv. iv. 42).

Pōmpiliā, as. f. a woman from whom Māncinus boasted he had received a valuable present (Mart. iv. 61).

Pōmpilius, l. m. a Roman author, without genius, who wrote books laughed at by Mārtialis (vi. 80).

Pōmpo, onis, m. the father of Nūma Pōmpilius, second king of Rome (Aur. Vic. Vir. II. 3).

Pōmpōniā, as. f. the mother of P. Cōrnēlius Scīpiō Africānus (Sil. Ital. xiii. 615).

Pōmpōniā Græcīnā, Pōmpōniā Græcīnā, f. a woman of illustrious birth, the wife of A. Plautius, who had the honour of an ovation, on his return from Britāniā. She was accused of embracing the rites of a foreign superstition. What Tacitus calls a foreign superstition, modern critics suppose to have been the Christian religion, which the Roman authors at this period, and for a long time after, branded with this appellation. The matter having been referred to her husband, he convened a number of her relations, in whose presence he sat in judgment on his wife, and pronounced her innocent. She lived to a great age, in continual affliction. During forty years, from the death of Jūlia, daughter of Drusus, the victim of Mōsāllina, to the end of her life, she sunk in deep sorrow, always wore mourning. This immoderate grief, far from being imputed to her as a crime, was considered the glory of her character (Tac. Ann. xiii. 32).

Pōmpōnius, l. m. a man mentioned by Hōrātius, and most probably notorious for his dissipation. The pointed, but indirect, sarcasm on his character, is one of the finest satirical strokes which appear in the writings of this poet (Sat. i. 4. 52).—2. A silly poet, whose writings a crowd of Romans admired, not for their merit, but for the excellence of his suppers (Mart. vi. 48).

Pōmpōnius Flācus, Pōmpōniū Flācē, m. a man of a servile spirit, who proposed that days of public thanksgiving should be kept for the death of Lībō Drusus q. v. He obtained the government of Mōsā, and died proprætor of Syriā, in the year 33 (Tac. Ann. ii. 32 seq.). To him Ovidius addresses one of his epistles from Pōntus, requesting his good offices, and those of his brother Græcīnus, with Augustus, in order to procure an alleviation of his sufferings (Epis. Pont. i. 10). The poet calls him Flāccus only, and mentions him again in a subsequent Epistle. Suetonius says that Pōmpōnius was one of the drunken companions of Tibērius (Tib. 42).

Pōmpōnius Lābēo, Pōmpōniū Lābēōnē, m. governor of Mōsā, in the year 26, and, eight years after, he escaped the hand of the executioner, by opening his own veins and bleeding to death. His wife Pāxēa followed his example. No crime is charged against him, and his self-destruction must be attributed to the cruelty of Tibērius, who caused Rome to stream with the blood of eminent citizens, from mere caprice, or innate ferocity (Tac. Ann. iv. 47 seq.).

Pōmpōnius Sēcundus, Pōmpōniū Sēcūndū, m. accused on account of his friendship with Elius Gāllus; but his life was saved, as well as that of P. Vitellius, by the magnanimity of their brothers. This noble Roman, distinguished by the uncommon elegance of his manners, and the splendour of his genius, supported himself in adversity without depression, and survived the emperor Tibērius, under whom he was brought to trial before the senate, in the year 81 (Tac. Ann. vi. 18). See Q. Pōmpōnius.

Pōmpōnius Silvānus, Pōmpōniū Silvānū, m. had governed in Asia, with proconsular authority. On being brought to trial, for improper conduct in the administration, he was acquitted by the emperor Nēro, in the year 58. His safety Tacitus ascribes to his great age, his riches, and having no children, which induced a powerful party to espouse his interest, in expectation of being appointed his heirs. Their services obtained no reward, for he survived them all (Tac. Ann. xiii. 52).

L. Pōmpōnius, L. Pōmpōniū, m. a native of Bōnōniā, was a distinguished writer of farces (Atellāne fabulæ). None of his pieces have reached modern times (Vel. Pat. ii. 99).—2. Held the office of consul with C. Cæcilius, in the year 17. In the consular calendar he has the surname of Flāccus. Tacitus mentions an L. Pōmpōnius, who gained a victory over the Cattians, for which he obtained triumphal honours, in the year 50. Commentators seem to consider the consul and the general the same person, which appears somewhat improbable, unless he had held the consulship, long before the age prescribed by law. The fame of the general, adds that historian, is now eclipsed by the genius of the poet (Tac. Ann. xii. 27 seq.).

L. Pōmpōnius Vēientānus, L. Pōmpōniū Vēientānū, m. a præfect of the allies, who made many predatory excursions in Brutius ager, assembled a tumultuary army, in consequence of his having assumed the appearance of a regular commander, fought a battle with Hānno, and was made prisoner. He had formerly been a farmer of the revenue, and guilty of very shameful practices, infamous both to the state, and to individuals (Liv. xxv. 1 seq.).

M. Pōmpōnius, M. Pōmpōniū, m. a plebeian tribune, elected in 448 B. C. (Liv. iii. 54).—2. A military tribune with consular authority in 394 B. C. (Liv. v. 13).—3. A plebeian tribune, who brought to trial L. Mamilius Imperator, because, that during his dictatorship, he had shown great cruelty, and treated his own son with unmerited severity. To stop the prosecution against his father, the son waited on M. Pömpönius, and compelled him, on pain of death, to take an oath, that he would never hold a meeting of the commons for the purpose of prosecuting his father. Though this oath was obtained by compulsion, the tribune held it obligatory, and desisted from the trial (Liv. vii. 4 seq.).—4. A praetor, in 219 B. C., who said to the people, inquiring about the battle at Treasimönes, "We have been defeated in a great battle." He died in 206 B. C., and was then both augur and décemvir (Liv. xxii. 7 seq.).—5. A plebeian tribune, who opposed the declaration of war against the Rhodians, proposed by M. Juvéntius Thülna, in 169 B. C. The conduct both of Juvéntius and the plebeian tribunes, for M. Antonius joined Pömpönius, was unprecedented, contrary to universal practice, and of the most pernicious tendency (Liv. xlv. 21).—6. The faithful and brave friend of C. Sömpönius Gräcchus, in defence of whose life, his daring and resolute conduct cost him his own (Val. Max. iv. 7).—7. One of Caesar's officers, who had the command of half his fleet, which, when lying at Mössana, Mezzana, Cäsäus, by sending fire-ships among them, burned. Adj. Pömpöniäus, a, um. Pömpöniäna clävis (Cäs. B. C. iii. 101).

M. Pömpönius Märcellus, M. Pömpöni Märcell, m. a Latin grammarian, who appears to have been rigidly minute and accurate with respect to the use of words; he occasionally appeared at the bar, where his verbal criticisms exposed him to ridicule. From an epigram of Asinius Gallus, he must have been in early life a pugilist (Suet. II. Gram. 22).

M. Pömpönius Mätho, M. Pömpöni Mäthönis, m. was appointed master of the horse to L. Vätürus Philo; but they were obliged to abdicate their office, from the discovery of some defect in their appointment. Pömpönius was afterwards created praetor urbänus, and continued in office another year. At the time of his death, in 213 B. C., he was a pontiff (Liv. xxii. 33 seq.).—2. A plebeian tribune in 209 B. C. Two years after, he and Q. Catlus were sent ambassadors to Dölphi, Casoli, carrying with them a golden crown of two hundred pounds' weight, and a representation of the victory over Hädrübal, delineated on one thousand pounds' weight of silver. Afterwards, he obtained the praetorship, with the government of Sicily, but previously ordered to investigate the complaints against Scipio surnamed Africäus. On his command being continued, he was set over the fleet (Liv. xxviii. 10 seq.).

Q. Pömpönius, Q. Pömpöni, m. a plebeian tribune, who was brought to trial, convicted of no crime, yet appointed to pay a fine of ten thousand asses (Liv. v. 29).—2. The brother of Pömpönius Scöcündus, who showed both his resolution and fraternal affection for Scöcündus, by becoming his surety, when arraigned at the bar of the senate, under the emperor Tiberius. Of a restless disposition, he entered into open rebellion, in which he probably acted only a subordinate part, since no Roman author mentions his being at the head of any conspiracy (Tac. Ann. vi. 13 seq.).

Sextus Pömpönius, Söxti Pömpöni, a lieutenant-general under the Roman coast, Tib. Sömpönius, to whom the latter gave twenty ships of war, to protect the territory of Vibo, and the coast of Italy, against the Carthaginian fleets (Liv. xxi. 51).

T. Pömpönius Atticus, T. Pömpöni Attici, m. a Roman knight, and intimate friend of M. Tüllius Cicero, who writes a very great number of letters to him, in which the principal events and occurrences of the period are mentioned. This correspondence forms a very valuable part of Cicero's writings, for the writer takes notice of many minute circumstances and traits of character which could not have been introduced into general history. During the civil wars between C. Märtus and L. Cörnilius Süla Pömpönius retired to Athens, a proof of the cautious prudence, which marked the whole of his conduct. In this manner he avoided the danger of incurring the displeasure of either party, and expended part of his liberal fortune, in acts of magnificence, which endeared him to the Athenians, and alleviated the distress of many Roman citizens. He spoke the Greek language with great fluency, and wrote it with great elegance, on which account he received the surname of Atticus. State preference, in times of so great turbulence, he naturally declined, rightly judging that a private station neither exposed him to enmity, nor disturbed that mental tranquillity, on which he set a great value. The largeness of his fortune kept him free from all obligation, and enabled him to observe a strict neutrality. In diet and dress he observed the same moderation, carefully shunning the extremes of niggardliness and extravagance, of meanness and splendour. Literary pursuits occupied a considerable portion of his time, and some idea of the loss of his writings may be formed, from the character given of them by Cörnilius Nöpos, who has written his biography. M. Vipsänius Agrippa married his daughter Pömpönia, and had by her Vipsänia Agrippina, whom the emperor Tiberius first married, and afterwards unwillingly repudiated, on purpose to marry Julia, daughter of Augustus. By Tiberius she became the mother of Drusus. At the age of seventy-seven, Pömpönius contracted a distemper which he supposed incurable, and, therefore, put an end to his life, by abstaining from food (Cor. Nep. Att. Tac. Ann. ii. 43).

T. Pömpönius Vöjöntänius, T. Pömpöni Vöjöntäni, m. prefect of the Roman allies, who assembled an irregular army, engaged Hännö, a Carthaginian general, and was defeated with great loss. This disaster prevented other states of the Brüttii from returning to the alliance of Rome. He was a farmer of the public taxes, remarkable for his avarice and dishonesty, and on being brought to trial gave bail for his appearance, and afterwards went into banishment, rather than meet the charges preferred against him (Liv. xxv. 1—4). See M. Pöstümus Pörgönsis. C. Pömpönius, C. Pömpöni, m. held the office of praetor, during the consulship of M. Tüllius Cicero, with whom he lived in habits of intimacy and confidence. His experience and merits, as an officer, rendered him useful to the consul, in opposing the measures, and thwarting the designs, of the traitor C^{at}ilina. A body of troops, under the command of C. P^{om}ptinus and his colleague L. Val^{er}ius Fl^{ac}cus, formed an ambuscade at M^{ul}vius Pons, Ponte Molle, seized the Allobrogian deputies and their suite, who proved the conspiracy, and thus freed the commonwealth from danger (Sal. Cat. 45). On the expiration of his consulship, he obtained the government of G^{all}ia, defeated the Allobroges who had revolted, and reduced the country to tranquillity, for which he had the honour of a triumph. His friend C^{ic}ero employed him as his lieutenant-general in the government of Cilicia, where his bravery contributed to the overthrow of the natives of Mount A^{ma}nus (Cic. Att. vi. 3 &c.). His name is sometimes written P^{om}ptinus, P^{om}tinus, and P^{om}tinus.

P^{om}ptine Paludes. See P^{om}ptia.

P^{on}tes Longi, P^{on}tium Longorum, m. the long bridges, a narrow causeway constructed by L. D^{om}itius Ahenobarbus, the grandfather of the emperor N^{er}o, near the town Ham in France. The Editor of the Delphin Tacitus, supposes that it still exists. It stretches a great way betwixt two prodigious marshes, and the country around forms one extensive fen (Tac. Ann. i. 63).

P^{on}teus, dos, m. a competitor in the games exhibited by A^{le}xand^{er}, for the entertainment of Ulysses (Hom. Od. viii. 113).

P^{on}tia, w, f. wife of Drymlo, and daughter of L. P^{om}tinus, who, from pure avarice, poisoned her two sons, and afterwards laid violent hands on herself. In the collection of G^{eo}. Fabricius, an old stone records her epitaph.—2. Daughter of P. P^{et}ronius, whom N^{er}o condemned, on conviction of her being engaged in the conspiracy against his life. On the death of her husband, she cut off her two sons by poison, which being proved, she loaded herself with a large quantity of meat and poison, and having opened her veins, died dancing, which was her favourite amusement.—3. A famous courtesan, who killed her two sons, who were fond of money, that she might give all to her gallant. She afterwards discovered her own crime, and having taken a large meal, opened her veins, and expired. May not different authors have given these three characters of the same person? The name and number of the sons murdered being the same, appears to strengthen that conjecture, although the motives, it must be allowed, not being the same, goes to support the opposite opinion (Juv. Sat. vi. 638). Martialis introduces a similar character under this name (il. 34 &c.).

P^{on}tia Postumia, P^{on}tia Postumia, f. a married woman, whom Octavius S^{ig}itta, a tribune of the Roman people, first polluted, and afterwards murdered. Bribery, having destroyed her innocence, easily prevailed on her to divorce her husband, which she had no sooner done, than she declined marrying her depraved gallant. Disappointment, rage, and jealousy, impelled Octavius to the horrid deed, which banished him from his native country, in the year 59 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 44).

P^{on}tia, arum, e. P^{on}tia, w, f. Ponza, the largest of three or four islands in Sinus P^{om}linus, e. C^{aj}etanus. It was in sight of the the shore. The Romans sent a colony to Ponza in 313 B. C. (Liv. ix. 28). In one of these islands, N^{er}o, a son of G^{er}manicus, was starved to death, by order of Tiberius (Suet. Tib. 54). Inh. P^{on}tiani, orum, m. (Liv. xxvii. 10).

P^{on}ticus, i, m. a poet, celebrated by Ovidius for a heroic poem on the Theban war, which he compares with the writings of H^{om}erus (Trist. iv. 10. 47). To P^{on}ticus, Propertius addresses some of his elegies, and rates his merits as high as Ovidius (i. 7 &c.).

P^{on}tifex, icis, m. a pontiff or priest, who, among the Romans, superintended and directed the public worship of the gods, in every kind of religious observance or solemnity. Some derive the name from pōssē facere, because the priest had the power of performing sacrifices, and all acts of religion; others a pōntē faciēdo, because the wooden bridge over the Tevere was first erected and kept in repair by the priests. The latter appears the more natural and simple account of the term, and adopted both by V^{arro} and D^{ion}ysius of H^{alic}arnassus. N^{uma} first appointed the P^{on}tifex, and gave him a written copy of the regulations respecting the sacred rites; with what victims, on what days, in what temples each rite should be performed, and whence the money was to be furnished for defraying the expenses. To him that king subjected every religious observance, public and private, on purpose that the people, whenever occasion required, might apply to him for direction, that no irregularities might take place in the worship of the gods, either by neglecting the rites of their native country, or by adopting the rites of foreign nations. It was the duty of the P^{on}tifex, to determine all matters respecting the invocation of the celestial gods, funeral solemnities, the worship of the infernal deities, and the expiation of prodigies which appeared either by lightning, or by other phenomena. The powers of the first pontiff, appear to have been nearly the same with those afterwards possessed by the P^{on}tifex M^{ax}imus. Livius mentions only one (l. 20), and does not add the adjective, M^{ax}imus, before il. 24. The pontiffs were four in number, in 302 B. C.; and other four were added, who, by the law of C^u. and Q. Og^ulnius, were chosen from the commons (Liv. x. 6). A distinction afterwards existed, dividing them into M^{aj}ores and Mⁱⁿores, of which the cause and grounds are not certainly known. To the number already mentioned, S^{ulla} added seven, and some have conjectured that these were denominated Mⁱⁿores, a supposition without authority. Mⁱⁿores could not denote the plebeian pontiffs, since half the number might be chosen from that class of the community, centuries before M^{aj}ores and Mⁱⁿores occur in Roman history. Besides the P^{on}tifex M^{ax}imus, in 222 B. C., was a plebeian (Liv. Ep. 18). The whole pontiffs formed what was called the Collegium. When cases occurred, not mentioned in the regulations of N^{uma}, the college of priests had a discretionary power to prescribe or order, as to them appeared just and suitable. They had the right of supplying deficiencies in their own number, and, for a long period, the state does not appear to have interfered with their rights, but the tribunes of the people encroached on their prerogatives, rendered an appeal from their decision to the people competent, and transferred the power of electing new members, from the college to the commons of Rome. When anarchy embroiled the state, the despot of the day restored that original privilege to the college, or took it from them, as caprice or interest dictated. To enumerate instances is unnecessary. Pontifex Maximus, the sovereign pontiff, was at the head of the college of priests, and supreme judge in all matters of religion. From the dignity and power possessed by the sovereign pontiff, the office was an object of high ambition among the Romans, and filled only by patricians, until 254 B. C., when T. Coruncanius, a plebeian, was elected. He exercised a jurisdiction over all the other priests and ministers of religion, which the duties of his office rendered necessary; because it was his business to see that the religious rites were performed, both at the proper time, and in the proper manner. On all great or important occasions, he attended in person, such as dedications of temples, vowing of games by magistrates, either to procure success to any undertaking, or to appease the wrath of the gods, when the state laboured under any calamity, or dreaded the displeasure of their offended deities. The calendar naturally fell under the charge of the college of priests, in which were entered Dies fasti et nefasti. For a long time, the pontiffs kept these days secret from the common people; but, afterwards, Cn. Flavius published them (Liv. ix. 46). This register contained the names of the principal magistrates, and probably a number of circumstances connected with the government of the state, and the situation of affairs. To this college it belonged, likewise, to judge in all cases respecting marriage. The pontiffs wore a brocaded robe with a border of purple, and a woollen cap of a conical form. The Pontifex Maximus resided in a house belonging to the public, and held his office for life. When the people wished to deprive Lepidus of the pontificate, and bestow it on Augustus, he refused it, because it was contrary to the custom of their ancestors (Ap. Bel. Civ. 746). With the college the Pontifex could pronounce a capital sentence in particular cases. When the judgment of the college differed from his opinion, no statute or enactment bound him to adhere or submit to it. The law restricted the residence of the Pontifex Maximus to Italy, and P. Licinius Crassus, when consul, was the first in that office, who went beyond these limits, when he marched against Aristonous, reputed son of Eumenes, king of Asia (Liv. Ep. 59). The law likewise prohibited his touching a dead person, by which act he was polluted, and thereby rendered unfit for the solemn duties of his office. Both the restrictions and the decrees of the Pontifex Maximus might be removed, or reversed, by an appeal to the people. In the later ages of the republic, the Ultimum ius, in every instance, appears to have lain with the commons. Pontificatus, us, m. the office of Pontifex. Pontificatus, the office of sovereign pontiff (Tac. Hist. ii. 91). Adj. Pontificialis, is, e, et, Pontificius, a, um. Pontificialis honos, the honour of sovereign pontiff (Ov. Fast. iii. 420). Pontificium jus (Liv. xl. 29).

T. Pontificius, T. Pontificius, m. a plebeian tribune, who made a proposal for an Agrarian law in 480 B. C., but without success (Liv. ii. 44).

Pontilius, i. m. a man of inelegant manners, for which Martialis censures him (v. 67).—2. A poet whose writings Martialis despises (vii. 2).

C. Pontilius, C. Pontilius, m. a Roman who held the praetorship in 64 B. C. He subdued the Allobroges, who had rebelled (Liv. Ep. 103).

Pontius Aufidius, Pontius Aufidius, m. a Roman knight, who put his own daughter to death for violation of chastity, although she had been enticed by her prodigiosa, whom he likewise deprived of life (Val. Max. vi. 1).

Pontius Cominius, Pontius Cominius, m. a spirited Roman youth, who undertook to carry the opinion of the army and Romans at Veii, that Camillus should be nominal dictator, to the senate in the capitol, then besieged by the Gauls. He floated himself down the Tiber on cork, landed on the point of the shore nearest the capitol, clambered up the rock where it was very steep, on that account neglected by the enemy's guards, and delivered his message to the magistracy. After receiving the decree of the senate, that Camillus should be recalled from banishment, at the Comitia Curiata, and named dictator by the order of the people, he returned to Veii. The law passed, without opposition from the commons, and Camillus was, in his absence, appointed dictator, 389 B. C. (Liv. v. 46).

Pontius Frégellius, Pontius Frégellius, m. a man who held a criminal intercourse with Allobroges, for which he was expelled the Roman senate, in the year 37 (Tac. Ann. vi. 45).

Pontius Pilatus, Pontius Pilatus, m. the procurator, or governor of Judea, at the time when the Redeemer suffered death by crucifixion (Tac. Ann. xv. 44). His name occurs frequently in the New Testament.

C. Pontius, C. Pontius, m. (called by Ennius, Pontius Tellesinus, x. 17), a general of the Samnites, both a great warrior and an able commander. By a dexterous stratagem, he decoyed the Roman army into the Forks of Caudium; but he did not show the same political knowledge, when the enemy were wholly in his power. Had he followed the eminent advice first given by his father, he would probably have secured the friendship of the Roman people, or had he adopted the second, he must have weakened the strength of that nation for years after that time. But he did neither. He formed a treaty, for which the consuls, lieutenant-generals, quaestors, and military tribunes, only were sureties, and sent the army under the yoke, unarmed and half naked. The Romans returned home, overwhelmed with shame, but burning with resentment, and had soon an opportunity of obliterating the disgrace, by obliging the Samnites to submit to the same ignominy. According to some authors, C. Pontius was one of that number (Liv. ix. 1—15).—2. A general of the Samnites, whom Q. Fabius Gurgus, the consul, led in his triumph, and afterwards beheaded (Liv. Ep. 11).—3. A Roman consul in the year 37. He had for his colleague Cn. Acerronius Proculus (Tac. Ann. vi. 45). In the consular calendar, he has the surname of Nigrinus.

C. Pōntius Telēsīnus, C. Pōnti Telēsini, m. a companion of C. Mārius (Jūnior), with whom he attempted to escape from Praenestē, when it was besieged by Q. Lūcretius Ofella, a commander of Sulla. Finding their escape impossible, they rushed against each other with drawn swords, and C. Pōntius Telēsīnus fell. C. Mārius was only wounded, but he prevailed on his slave to kill him, in 84 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 88). He probably received the surname of Telēsīnus from Telēsia, a city of the Sāmmites (Vel. Pat. ii. 16).

Pōntōnūs, i, m. the cupbearer at the court of Alcibiades (Hom. Od. vii. 182).

Pōntus, i, f. a country of considerable extent in Natolia, bounded on the N. by Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea; on the E. by Armenia; on the S. by Cappadocia; and on the W. by Gallatia and Paphlagonia. The kingdom of Pōntus attained its highest celebrity and power under Mithridates q. v. Cn. Pompeius reduced it to the form of a province, in 67 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 102). Pōntus was the name of several other countries besides the one above described. Adj. Pōnticus, a, um. Pōnticum Mārē, the Black Sea. But this expression, though found in Livius, Tacitus, and others, is not of frequent occurrence; and should not be adopted by the young scholar. Pōntica pinus, a pine tree of Pōntus (Hor. Od. i. 14. 11), which was reckoned the best for ship-building, and the inhabitants excelled in naval architecture. Pōnticus stans, the Black Sea (Catal. iv. 9). Pōntica medicamina, the Pontic antidotes (against poison), i. e. those of Mithridates (Juv. Sat. vi. 661). Pōnticunus, the Strait of Constantinople (Tac. Ann. ii. 54).

Popa, m, m. the person who, at a sacrifice, led the victim to the altar. The clothes of these attendants were tucked up, and they were naked to the waist (Suet. Cal. 82).

Q. Pōpēdius Silo, Q. Pōpēdi Silōnis, m. the commander of the Mārsi in the Social war, killed by Q. Cæcilius Mētellus Pius (Aur. Vic. Vir. II. 63).

C. Pōpillius, C. Pōpilli, m. surnamed Sābellus, a Roman horseman of great bravery, who, in consequence of a wound, was left in the camp, when the Istri took possession of it, in 180 B. C. More of the enemy fell by his hand, than by that of any other of his countrymen, notwithstanding of his wound which rendered him lame (Liv. xli. 4).

C. Pōpillius Lænas, C. Pōpilli Lænātis, m. was elected consul in 175 B. C. with P. Ælius Ligus, who both opposed the will of the senate, and refused to go to their province Ligūria, until the tribunes of the people threatened them with a fine. Neither performed any thing memorable. At a future period, he was sent, with Cn. Octavius, an ambassador to the Grecian states, carrying a decree of the senate, which prohibited all the Roman magistrates from demanding any thing for the war, unless ordered by the senate. This resolution freed the allies from many capricious and oppressive exactions. On an embassy to terminate the war between Antiochus, king of Syria, and Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, Pōpillius refused to shake hands with that monarch, but gave him some tablets, desiring him first to read them, which he did, and then replied, he would consult his friends. Of great austerity and sternness of conduct, Pōpillius drew a circle round Antiochus with the rod which he had in his hand, and said, "Before you go out of that circle, give me an answer, which I can report to the Roman people." Struck with the boldness of the order, Antiochus promised obedience to the will of the senate, and the ambassadors concluded an agreement between the two kingdoms, on a firmer basis than had been previously obtained. The success of this mission rescued Egypt from the grasp of Antiochus, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xli. 9). Vellēus Patērculus calls him Mārcus (i. 10). —2. A legionary soldier, who requested M. Antōnius to appoint him to pursue and butcher M. Tullius Cicero, after his name had appeared among the proscribed, in 45 B. C. On obtaining permission, he exultingly executed the detestable office, although he had been indebted to the eloquence of the orator, for the preservation of his own life, when accused of the crime of parricide (Val. Max. v. 3). By some authors he is called Hērēnulus.

M. Pōpillius, M. Pōpilli, m. one of the five ambassadors sent by the Roman senate, to the Ætolians, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xli. 25).

M. Pōpillius Lænas, M. Pōpilli Lænātis, m. held the consulship at Rome, with Cn. Mānlius Cāpitōlinus Impēriōsus, in 358 B. C., procured sentence against C. Licinius Cālvus, for violating his own law, and conquered the Tiburtes. He afterwards obtained the same office thrice, and gained a victory over the Gauls, for which he had the honour of a triumph, in 349 B. C. His countrymen conferred the consulship on him for a fourth time, and with that appointment his public honours terminated (Liv. vii. 12—26). —2. A Roman consul in 316 B. C. (Liv. ix. 21).

—3. An eminent Roman, who, after acting as a commissioner for settling a colony at Lātium, in 182 B. C., obtained the praetorship three years after, and the consulship in 175 B. C. Ligūria became his province, when he defeated the Stāgellātes, and acted with great cruelty to those who surrendered unconditionally, trusting to his lenity. The senate disapproved of his injustice and severity; ordered those whom he had sold for slaves, to be ransomed, their property restored, and himself to quit the province as soon as possible. The ferocity of his temper refused obedience to the order of the senate, whose indignation he provoked by his outrageous conduct before them, and boasting of the great number of the Stāgellātes whom he had killed in a former engagement. By an evasive artifice, he escaped from the punishment threatened by the tribunes of the people, and yet did not comply with either their order, or that of the senate. In the capacity of a military tribune, he accompanied the consul Q. Mārcius Philippus to Macēdōnia in 171 B. C. (Liv. xl. 43—xliv. 1). Adj. Pōpillius, a, um. Pōpillia familia (Liv. xlii. 22). —4. A Roman consul in 141 B. C., defeated by the Nūmāntini who put his whole army to flight. The peace which he concluded with them, the senate refused to ratify (Liv. Ep. 55).

P. Pōpillius, P. Pōpilli, m. (Lænas) a Roman, sent ambassador to Syphax, with rich presents, in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 4). —2. A triumvir for planting a Latin colony, in the ground offered by the Pisani, in 182 B. C. (Liv. xl. 43). —3. Consul with P. Rūpilius Népos, about 133 B. C. In their consulship, the friends of Tib. Sēmprōnīus Grācchus, were treated with great severity (Vel. Pat. ii. 7). Valērius Maximus says, the senate ordered them to be punished mōre majōrum (iv. 7).

T. Pōpillius, T. Pōpilli, m. a lieutenant-general, who fought with great bravery at Cāpua, when the Campanians had the assistance of Hannibal and his army, in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 6).

Pōppæa Sābīna, Pōppæa Sābīnae, f. daughter of Pōppæus Sābinus, who married T. Ollius. She was uncommonly beautiful, but having fallen under the displeasure of Mēssālina, the terror of a jail forced her to a violent death. Her uncommon beauty could not compensate for the personal impurity, with which Tacitus has charged her (Ann. xi. 2 seq.).—2. Who took her name from her maternal grandfather, was the daughter of T. Ollius, and married to Rūfus Crispinus, a Roman knight, by whom she had one son. She possessed every accomplishment, says Tacitus, except a virtuous mind. She had singular personal beauty, great wealth, high nobility of birth, powerful talents, and fascinating affability. In her dress, she appeared modest, but lived lasciviously, disregarding reputation, and making no difference between her husband and her gallants. Her beauty captivated Otho, who completed his crime by adding marriage to adultery. To procure additional interest, he exerted himself in attaching Néro to the person of his wife, a stratagem which soon succeeded, and the emperor appointed him governor of Lūsītānia, Portugal, that he might the more freely enjoy the company of Pōppæa. Néro, having divorced his first wife on pretence of barrenness, married her, and, after she had born him a daughter, whom he called Claudia Augusta, and gave her the same surname, he treated her with cruelty, and occasioned her death by a kick when pregnant. Her body was not burned according to the Roman custom, but embalmed, and buried in the tomb of the Jūlii. Divine honours were decreed her, when Néro wilfully absented himself, nor did he afterwards attend her funeral. Otho replaced her statues, after they had been thrown down. Pōppæanum, i. n. an ointment invented by Pōppæa Sābīna, to preserve her beauty to which she paid every attention. For the same purpose, she was said to have kept a great number of asses, and bathed daily in their milk (Juv. Sat. vi. 461).

Pōppæus Silvānus, Pōppæi Silvāni, m. a man of consular rank, who was governor of Dalmātia, in the year 69. He possessed no military talents. In the hour of danger, instead of vigorous exertion, he trifled time away in words. Annius Bāssus, an officer under him, governed the troops by his skill and advice, directing the commander-in-chief himself, and in some degree lessening his character and usefulness (Tac. Hist. ii. 86 seq.).

Pōppæus Vōpiscus, Pōppæi Vōpisci, m. the colleague of Virgīnius Rūfus, in the consulship. Otho appointed them, and they continued in office during part of the year 69; other ten were consuls during that year (Tac. Hist. i. 77).

C. Pōppæus Sābinus, C. Pōppæi Sābini,

m. governed the province of Mædia, at the same time with those of Mæcēdōnia and Achāia, and obtained triumphal honours for his victory over the Thracians. He was a man of mean birth, but, through the partiality of the emperors, he obtained the consulship, in the year 8, and the honours already mentioned. He held the government of considerable provinces for four and twenty years, not for any extraordinary talents, but because he had a capacity for ordinary business, and nothing more. It may be mentioned, that Tibērius never changed either his commanders or governors, on which account many of them held their offices during life (Tac. Ann. i. 80 seq.).

Pōpūlōniā, æ, f. vs. Pōpūlōnium, i. n. a town of Etrūria, Tuscany, near the ruins of which was built Plūmbinūm, Piombino, in a high rugged promontory. In the time of Strābo, it was nearly deserted, retaining only the temples and a few houses. Inh. Pōpūlōnienses, ium, m. (Liv. xxxviii. 45). Adj. Pōpūlōnius, a, um. Pōpūlōniæ aquæ.

Pōrāta, indec. n. the Pruth, a river of Scythia, to which the natives gave this name. By the Greeks it was called Pyretos. It runs through Moldavia, and empties itself into the Danube (Herod. iv. 48).

Pōrcia, æ, f. daughter of M. Pōrcius Cato, married first to Bibūlus, and, after his death, to M. Jūnius Brūtus, who divorced his former wife, although of unsullied character, for no other reason, than to accomplish this union. The greatest friend of that noble Roman, cannot attempt to justify an action, pregnant with the greatest mischief both to morals and society. In her conduct she exhibited great fortitude, constancy, and affection. These qualities induced Brūtus to communicate to her the design which he and others had formed, against the life of C. Jūlius Cæsar. The rigid virtue and stern patriotism, imbibed from the conversation and instructions of her father, necessarily led her to approve of the measure, although her conjugal tenderness excited strong apprehensions with respect to the result, and the safety of her husband. After his death, she resolved on self-destruction, and when her friends, after they had in vain attempted to dissuade her from her fatal resolution, had removed every lethal weapon beyond her reach, she swallowed burning coals and expired. Mārullus has written a beautiful epigram in praise of her fortitude, in which he mentions the manner of her death (i. 43). Some have questioned this statement, thinking she died before her husband, and Plūtar-chus seems to doubt its truth (Vit. Brut.).

Pōrcius, a, um. Pōrcia gens, a plebeian clan at Rome, originally from Fūsculum, Frascati (Tac. Ann. xi. 24). Pōrcia lex, a law passed by P. Pōrcius Læna, to secure the persons of the citizens against stripes or capital punishment (Liv. x. 9).

Pōrcius, i, m. a notorious rake, whose name occurs both in the writings of Cātullus (xlvii. 1), and in those of Hōrātius (Sat. ii. 8. 23).

Pōrcius Cato, Pōrcii Cātōnis, m. a Roman of prætorian rank, who entered into a conspiracy against Titius Sābinus, in the year 28 (Tac. Ann. iv. 68).

Pōrcius Septiminius, Pōrcii Septimīni, m. governor of Rhætia, in the year 68. He remained firm to Vitellius (Tac. Hist. iii. 5).

C. Porcius Cato, C. Porcii Catonis, m. grandson of M. Porcius Cato, by his son M. Porcius Cato Licinianus, and nephew of the younger Africanus, by his sister Emilia, was elected consul at Rome, with M. Atilius Balbus, in 116 B. C. The Scordisci in Thracia defeated him, and, from the expression used by Eutropius, it may be inferred, that great disgrace attached to the consul (iv. 24).—2. A tribune of the Roman people, who persisted so long in his opposition to the holding of the elections, that the senate went into mourning. He was said to have been bribed to that conduct by Cn. Pompeius Magnus, and M. Licinius Crassus, in 58 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 105).

L. Porcius Cato, L. Porcii Catonis, m. held the consulship with Cn. Pompeius Strabo, father of Cn. Pompeius Magnus, in 91 B. C. He defeated the Marsi in the preceding year, and, after his election, he had been frequently successful against that nation, but in storming their camp he lost his life, and that event gave the victory to the enemy (Liv. Ep. 74 seq.). Eutropius calls him Porcius Cato (v. 3). Plinius mentions that he dispersed the Tuscans (iii. 18).

L. Porcius Licinus, L. Porcii Licini, m. distinguished himself as a lieutenant-general, at the siege of Capua, afterwards was appointed a plebeian edile, in 207 B. C. He was elected praetor, when the lots gave him the province of Gallia. Here he obtained information, that Hasdrubal was on his march over the Alps, and that eight thousand Ligurians were in arms, ready to join him, which he communicated to the senate. In harassing the enemy, after he had entered Italy, and in impeding his progress, Porcius displayed both activity and courage (Liv. xxvi. 6 seq.).—2. Held the office of praetor, and the government of Sardinia, in 195 B. C., and enjoyed the office of consul nine years after (Liv. xxxiv. 54 seq.).—3. Son of the former, who dedicated a temple to Venus Erycina, in 183 B. C., which had been vowed by his father, when consul, during the Ligurian war (Liv. xl. 34).—4. Appointed to conduct a fleet of thirty-eight ships of five banks of oars to Brundisium, Brindisi, in 174 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 27).

M. Porcius Cato, M. Porcii Catonis, m. an eminent Roman of plebeian rank, whose original surname was Priscus, and who obtained that of Cato, i. e. Catus, in consequence of his uncommon knowledge. Under Scipio Africanus I. he held the office of quaestor in 206 B. C., four years after was elected a plebeian edile, and next year praetor. He was a man of great purity and unsullied integrity, but in many things rigidly severe. To him the allies were indebted, for removing or restricting the contributions which they paid for maintaining the praetors. In 197 B. C., he was raised to the dignity of the consulship, with L. Valerius Flaccus, when Spain became his province. Before he set out for that country, he argued in the senate against the repeal of Oppia lex, which prohibited luxury and extravagance on the part of women. The bravery, activity, and military skill which he displayed in Spain, raised the character of the Roman arms in that country, and procured him the honour of a triumph. Over the troops he did not exercise greater strictness than over himself. In spareness of diet, watching and labour, he vied with the meanest soldier, and had no particular distinction in the army, except the honour of commanding. After his triumph, he dedicated a temple to Maiden Victory (Victoria virgo). In the army of M. Atilius Glabrio, he held the rank of a lieutenant-general, dislodged the Aetoli, who had taken possession of Cilli-dromos, and was despatched to Rome, with the news of the victory gained over Antiochus, king of Syria, and his Grecian allies, at Thermopylae. With so great speed did he travel, that he reached Rome on the fifth day. To such high esteem had he risen in the opinion of his countrymen, that the opposition of the nobility did not prevent his obtaining the censorship, an office which he discharged with such severity, as gave rise to numerous animosities, which embittered the remainder of his life. Some of his speeches against the expelled, indicate a virtuous but stern mind, which allowed of no excuse for the slightest deviation from perfect rectitude. That the punishments in some instances exceeded the offence, cannot be denied, and to this circumstance may be referred his being often designed the Censor. In advanced life, he became an ardent student of Grecian literature, in direct opposition to the opinions which he held in early life, for he maintained that it would prove the destruction of Rome, by corrupting the youth. Against Scipio Africanus I., he supported the charge of receiving a bribe from Antiochus to procure advantageous terms of peace, and his impeachment of his brother Asiaticus for the same offence, procured sentence against him. In proof of his rooted enmity to the Carthaginians, it is only necessary to state, that he was said to end every speech with this expression, "Hoc amplius puto, Carthaginem esse delendam." He wrote on various subjects, but his most important work appears to have been on the ancient history of his countrymen, which he called Origines, now lost. The only composition of this author now extant, is a treatise on husbandry, "De re rustica." Livius has drawn his character at great length. Much respecting this stern moralist may be found in the writings of Cicero, Quintilianus, Plutarchus, Philus, A. Gellius, and Macrobius. His name frequently appears in the writings of Horatius (Liv. xxix. 23—Ep. 49).—2. Son of the former, who married the daughter of L. Aemilius Paullus, in whose army he fought against Perses, king of Macedonia, and died when praetor. In consequence of his poverty, Cato celebrated his funeral at a very small expense (Liv. Ep. 48).—3. Surnamed Ufencensis, on account of his death at Utica, was the great-grandson of Cato the censor. His parents died when he was very young, and he was educated in the house of his mother's brother, Livius Drusus. Even in infancy he displayed the virtues which afterwards adorned his riper years. He had an innate hatred of despotism. At the age of fourteen, he requested from his preceptor a sword to stab the tyrant Sulla. Of his firmness and intrepidity Valerius Maximus gives a striking instance, when he was just a boy, as well as of his detestation of oppression (iii. 1). He adopted the tenets of the Stoics, and was one of the most rigid of the sect. He could neither be encoined by flattery, nor intimidated by threats; whatever he was convinced was virtuous and right, he pursued with undeviating steadiness, regardless of the difficulties which he might have to encounter, or of the dangers to which he might be exposed. He exerted himself to stem the torrent of Roman luxury and corruption. Because purple was the dress of the noble and wealthy citizens, he wore black. He often appeared in public barefooted, and always travelled on foot. In whatever office he was employed, he never failed to reform its abuses, and restore its ancient regulations. So great was his love of truth, that the veracity of Cato became proverbial. To the qualities of a virtuous man, and the rectitude of a stern patriot, Cato added the intrepidity of a brave soldier, and the abilities of an able general. In all the campaigns in which he served, he acquitted himself most honourably. In the war with the pirates, he had the command of a fleet at the entrance into Pröpöntis, the Sea of Marmora (Flor. iii. 6). He was so great a favourite of the army, that his removal from any command was considered by the soldiers, who were warmly attached to him, as a public calamity. Appianus says, that in consequence of his oratory, he was called the Roman Demosthenes (Bel. Hisp. 276). Cicero had his constant and vigorous support. Through him chiefly, in opposition to Caesar, the accomplices of Cätlina were capitally punished. Of that able general, Cato appears to have been early apprehensive. He keenly opposed the decree which gave him the province of Gallia, France, for five years; and, on the formation of the first triumvirate, he foretold all the calamities with which that infamous combination would overwhelm the state. When Caesar passed the Rubicon, Cato joined Pömpöius, who intrusted him with some important commands. He was present at the battle of Phärsälla, the plain of Pharsa, after which he took the command of the Coreyean fleet, and collected all the troops he could, to join Pömpöius in Egypt. Being informed by Sextus, Pompey's youngest son, of his father's death, he went to Cyrenä, the capital of Cyrenäica, Kairoi, which opened its gates to receive him. He afterwards traversed the deserts of Libyā, and joined himself to Scipio; but refused to take the command of the army, of which he is said to have repented. He had accepted the government of Utica, to prevent that general, at the suggestion of Juba, from putting the inhabitants to death. In this city, hearing that Caesar had both defeated Scipio and taken his camp, he killed himself, that he might not fall into the hands of the conqueror. Florus informs us that he had spent some part of the night in reading Pläto on the immortality of the soul, and after taking a short sleep gave himself several stabs in the breast. His medical attendants sewed up the wounds, but they had no sooner quitted his apartment than he tore them open again, from which burst forth so great a quantity of blood, that his dying hands remained in the wounds (iv. 2). Cato invictus devicta morte (Mam. iv. 87). Stricti Cätönes (Manil. v. 106). Vitium Cätönis, drinking (Mart. ii. 89). Dürus Cato, severe Cato; in reference to his gravity and strictness, particularly in the censorship (Juv. Sat. xi. 90). Adj. Cätönlünus, a, um. Cätönlünus mas-tis (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 10). Cätönlünus lingua, a tongue like that of Cato, i. e. a tongue pretending to the rigid virtue of Cato but applied to a very different and detestable purpose (Mart. ix. 28).

M. Pörcius Laeca, M. Pörcii Laeca, a tribune of the people, who, in the year 18 B. C., carried a law prohibiting magistrates from punishing a Roman citizen with death, and substituting, in place of capital punishment, banishment and confiscation of goods. Condemned citizens had the right of appeal to the people by Lex Valeria, which took away the power of scourging, and consequently deprivation of life. Respecting the extent of these laws, considerable uncertainty prevails, since even citizens of Rome, when in the army, were not exempted from these punishments, and it seems doubtful whether citizens of Lätium ever enjoyed their benefit (Sol. Jug. 69). Adj. Pörcius, a, um. Pörcia lex, the law above described (Sol. Cat. 51).—2. A descendant of the former, and one of the accomplices of the traitor Cätlina, who, in the dead of night, convened the ringleaders, immediately before the consul debated the whole confederacy (Sol. Cat. 17, 27).

P. Pörcius Laeca, P. Pörcii Laeca, a, um, a plebeian tribune, and prevented L. Mälius Acidinus from entering Rome in triumph, in 201 B. C. Three years after, triumphal epulönes were first created at Rome, of which he was one, and next year he was raised to the pretorship, when the lots assigned to him Pison (Liv. xxxii. 7 seq.).

Pöris, m, the first man in the name of the Äolätes, who married Archa, by whom he had many children, and, after his death, Thöoxena her sister, q. r., became his wife (Liv. xl. 4).

Pörfhyrion, önis, m, a giant of prodigious size (Hor. Od. iii. 4. 54). He made an attack on Hércules and Jüno. On offering violence to the latter, Jüpiter struck him with lightning, and Hércules transfixed him with his arrows (Apol. i. 6).

Pörrima, e, f, called also Antövärtä, and Prösa, was, according to Ovidius, the sister or companion of Cärmëntä, mother of Evänder (Fast. i. 633); but A. Gellus makes both Prösa and her sister Pörrivärtä, Cärmëntes, and considers them as goddesses who presided over childbirth (xvi. 16).

Pörsäna, v. Pörsäna, m, (Lar. v. Lar. Pörsäna, Laris Pörsäna), m, was king of Clüstum, Chiugi, one of the most wealthy states of Etrüria, Tuscan, on Clänis, the Chiana, a branch of Tiber, the Tevere. He espoused the cause of Tarquinius Süpöribus, and the celebrity of his name, added to the power of the state, struck terror into the Roman senate, lest the commons, influenced by fear, should refuse to fight, and should submit to slavery. By conciliatory measures and exemption from taxes, the harmony of the republic was completely preserved; and the name of king held in abhorrence both by patricians and plebeians, during a long period of severe suffering, which ensued in consequence of the blockade and famine. Pörsäna, by a sudden assault, took Jänne-lum, Monte Giminculo, but his further progress was checked by cutting down Pöns Süblicitus, Ponte Sublicio. The monarch then changed his plan from an assault to a blockade, and the city being distressed by a scarcity of provisions, he expected would fall into his hands. The bravery of C. Mucius q. v., who made a resolute but unsuccessful attack on his life, and the discovery of a conspiracy of three hundred of his fellow-citizens for the same purpose, induced him to conclude a peace with the Romans, on condition that the lands taken from the Veientes should be restored to them, and that he should receive hostages. A practice was transmitted from that period to the days of Livius, at public sales it was always proclaimed, "that the goods of Porsena were selling," which that historian considers very inconsistent with the peaceful manner in which that king departed from the Roman territories. His opinion is, that Porsena made a present of the provisions in his camp, in consequence of the city being reduced to the last extremity by famine, and that the senate called the articles which were exposed to sale, the goods of Porsena, lest the populace should have plundered the camp, like the property of an enemy, so that the phrase was expressive of gratitude for the gift, not an action of the king's property, which was never in the power of the Roman people. He appears to have been a man of great generosity, and on the failure of his second application to the Romans, for the restoration of the Tarquins, he declared, that he would not mention that subject again, that the Tarquins should not remain in his dominions, in order to remove all cause of difference between him and the Romans, with whom he wished to live in terms of friendship. This declaration was followed by his sending home all the hostages, who were in his possession, and giving back the lands belonging to the Veientes, of which the Romans had been deprived by the treaty at Janiculum, Monte Gianicolo (Liv. ii. 9—15). Etrusca manus minuit Porsena, the Tuscan army threatening Porsena; of Porsena who threatened the destruction of the Roman city and state (Hor. Epod. xvi. 4). See Porthoon.

Porthœus, ëos, m. king of Pleuron and Cælydon. He had three sons, Agrius, Melas, and Cenoüs (Hom. Il. xiv. 115 seq.).

Porthœus, ëos, m. a ferryman. Töter Porthœus, the hideous ferryman, i. e. Chæron (Juv. Sat. iii. 286).

Portospaña, m. f. Torpe, a town of Cærmünia (Amm. Mar. xlii. 6).

Pörtinus, i. m. a name given by the Romans to Méléerta q. v. after his death, whom the Greeks called Pálemón q. v. Pörtünäla, i. m. a festival in honour of the god Pörtinus (Var. Ling. Lat. v. 3).

Pörus, i. m. an Indian king, distinguished for his uncommon size, superior strength, and undaunted resolution. Alexander the Great conquered his kingdom and person, but not his spirit, which remained unbroken, and undepressed, by his losses both as a father, and a prince. The stately dignity of Pörus procured the esteem of Alexander, who restored his kingdom, and he repaid that generous act by inviolate fidelity to his benefactor. To the conquest of this king, Claudius alludes (xvii. 32; xxxix. 19), and Justinus (xli. 8). See Abisirta.

Pösides, i. m. a freedman of the emperor

Claudius, whom Suetonius calls an ennuch, and adds, that he was the greatest favourite of that monarch, and received from him hüta püra, in his triumph over the Britons (Suet. Claud. 28). Adj. Pösidiänu, a. um. Pösidiäna balnä, hot baths at Bala, erected at a prodigious expense, to which Jüvenälis alludes (Sat. xiv. 91).

Pösidëum, i. m. a promontory of Pällénë, in Mæcëdönia (Liv. xlii. 14).—2. A town in the confines of Cilicia and Syria (Herod. iii. 91).

Pösidippus, i. m. a Greek, who obtained distinction as a writer of comedy, on the death of Mënünder (Gel. ii. 23).

Pösidönia, m. f. See Pastum.

Pösthümia, m. f. a woman whose name appears in the writings of Cätüllus. He describes her as addicted to intemperance (xxvii. 8).

Pösthümus, i. m. a man mentioned by Cätüllus, of whom nothing is known (lxvii. 35).

Pösthümus, i. m. a man of very obscure birth, who rose to a very high rank in the Roman army, and was by the emperor Vålëriänu appointed counsellor to his son Gällënu, when he sent him to oppose the Germans in Gällia, France. Well skilled in the art of war, Gällënu, by the direction of Pösthümus, gained some important victories over the Germans or Franks, and secured the tranquillity of that country, by the joint influence of arms and negotiation. At a future period, he left his eldest son Vålëriänu Caesar in Gällia, under Silvänus, and the army under the command of Pösthümus. By the most criminal means, Pösthümus put both the governor and his prince to death, and caused himself to be proclaimed Augustus. The government which he obtained by iniquity, he administered with justice, rendered the people happy at home, and secure from enemies abroad. Even his personal virtues added to his power, by commanding the esteem and confidence of the neighbouring nations, and they supported him against the emperor Gällënu, who twice attacked him in vain. Not only Gällia, but Spain, and Britain acknowledged his sovereignty, and, after sheathing the sword, he enjoyed uninterrupted authority for three years. At the end of that time, the army mutinied, because he prohibited them from plundering Mögüntiäcum, Mentz, which had risen in rebellion, and killed both him and his son, in the year 267. On this youth, who bore the same name, he had bestowed the titles of Caesar, and Augustus. His early death prevented the full development of character, although he is said to have excelled in eloquence, and probably in other accomplishments, were his history fully known. According to Eutröpius, Pösthümus reigned ten years (ix. 9).

Pöstvërta, m. f. sister of Pörrima. A. Gellius makes these sisters Cærmëntes, and considers them as the goddesses of childbirth. They had altars at Rome, and appear to have been worshipped by mothers, to procure easy and natural births. Their names are derived from their office (Gel. xvi. 16). Ovidius regards these goddesses as the sisters or companions of Cærmënta, endowed with the gift of prophecy, whence their name (Fast. l. 638).

Pöstümia, m. f. a vestal virgin, accused of impurity, but acquitted (Liv. iv. 44).—

2. Wife of Servius Sulpicius, corrupted by Julius Caesar (Suet. Jul. Cas. 50).

Pōstūmīana Cāstra. See Cāstra.

Pōstūmīa, s. f. a rich woman, probably a noted character when the Roman Epigrammatist wrote, but her name now only is known (Mart. xii. 49).

A. Pōstūmīus, A. Pōstūmī, m. a Roman, appointed dictator in 499 B. C., and gained a decisive victory over the Latin confederacy commanded by Octavius Mamilius, son-in-law of Tarquinius Superbus, for which he had the honour of a triumph. In that engagement Mamilius fell. Pōstūmīus vowed a temple to Ceres, Liber, and Libera (Proserpina), which, fifteen years after, his son, being appointed a decemvir for that purpose, dedicated. He and T. Virginius were elected consuls, in 496 B. C. (Liv. ii. 19–21. Tac. Ann. ii. 49). In the consular calendar he is called A. Pōstūmīus Albus Rēgillēnsis. —2. A consul with C. Lutatius Catulus in 244 B. C., whom Caelius Metellus, pontifex maximus, would not suffer to depart from the city, because he was Flāmen of Mars (Liv. Ep. 19). In the consular calendar he is called A. Pōstūmīus Albinus. —3. A military tribune, who compelled the Ligurians to submission, by cutting down their vineyards, and burning their corn, in 182 B. C. (Liv. xl. 41).

A. Pōstūmīus Albinus, A. Pōstūmī Albinus, m. was consul in 244 B. C., and had for his colleague C. Lutatius Catulus (Liv. xxiii. 43). —2. Surnamed Lūscus, after holding the offices of curule edile and praetor, obtained the consulship with C. Calpurnius Piso, in 182 B. C. He carried on a successful war against the Ligurians, burned their corn, and cut down their vineyards, and compelled them to give up their arms. Six years after, he and Q. Fulvius Flaccus were created censors, an office which they exercised with considerable severity. Livius mentions his being sent an ambassador into Crēta, Candia, and afterwards into Mācedōnia (xxxix. 7–xiv. 17). —3. A Roman in the army of Paulus Aemilius, to whose charge that general committed Persēus and his elder son Philippos, in 170 B. C. At this period there were two of this name, who may be easily mistaken for each other, in different parts of Livius. This Pōstūmīus occurs first xxxviii. 23, then xlii. 32, and in xlv. 4, 28. —4. Consul with L. Licinius Lucullus, in 153 B. C. The tribunes of the people imprisoned both consuls, because they refused to exempt some of their friends from warfare (Liv. Ep. 48). Pōstūmīus wrote a Roman history in Greek (Gel. xi. 8). —5. Brother of Sp. Pōstūmīus Albinus, consul, who had obtained by lot Nūmīdia, Algiers, for his province, 112 B. C. Having spent the time without any decisive engagement, or concluding a peace with Jūgūrtha, he left Aulus with the rank of praetor to command in his stead, on his setting out for Rome at the approach of the elections. Solicitous to terminate the war, or to obtain money from the king, by the terror of his arms, A. Pōstūmīus marched his troops from their winter quarters, in the month of January, and in very tempestuous weather, unexpectedly appeared before the town Sathul, where that prince had deposited his treasures. Jūgūrtha soon perceiving his vanity, and his ignorance of war, bribed part of his army, and decoyed him into a measure which put the whole Roman army in the power of the king. Instead of putting them to the sword, he allowed them to depart, after they had passed under the yoke, on the express condition that they should quit Nūmīdia in ten days. A. Pōstūmīus Albinus preferred these terms to the only other alternative, instant death, and concluded a treaty upon the spot in such terms as Jūgūrtha chose to dictate (Sal. Jug. 35–39). The senate refused to ratify this treaty (Liv. Ep. 64). This historian calls him lieutenant-general, not proprætor, the term applied by Sallustius. —6. A lieutenant-general, who commanded the fleet, and was killed by his own army, in consequence of his having been suspected, or convicted, of treason, in 91 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 75).

A. Pōstūmīus Albus, A. Pōstūmī Albus, m. consul with Sp. Furius Fusus, in 464 B. C. He took full vengeance on the Æqui for their success against his colleague, whom they had nearly overpowered, having wounded himself and killed his brother, a lieutenant-general in his army. Græchus Caelius, the Æquan commanders, treated Pōstūmīus and the other two ambassadors, sent to his nation by the senate, with contempt, desiring them to deliver their message to an oak, which overhung his tent (Liv. iii. 4 seq.).

A. Pōstūmīus Rēgillēnsis, A. Pōstūmī Rēgillēnsis, m. appointed a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, in 396 B. C. L. Julius Iulus and he attacked the Tarquinenses, returning from their depredations on the Roman territory, heavily laden with spoil, slew great numbers of them, took their baggage, and recovered the produce of their lands. He was again elected to the same office, in 380 B. C. (Liv. v. 16 seq.).

A. Pōstūmīus Tūbērtus, A. Pōstūmī Tūbērti, m. a noble Roman, master of the horse to Māmercus Aemilius, in 433 B. C., and, afterwards, named dictator by his own son-in-law T. Quinctius Cincinnatus Pēnus. He was a man of very great strictness in command, of undaunted courage, and possessed excellent military talents, which he displayed in his dictatorship against the Æqui and Volsci, over whom he gained a signal victory, for which he had the honour of a triumph (Ov. Fast. vi. 720 seq.). After taking their camp, he sold all the prisoners, with the exception of the senators. Some historians have thrown a shade over his dictatorship, by relating that he beheaded his son after a successful achievement, because he left his post without orders, tempted by a favourable opportunity of fighting to advantage. Livius discredits this story, and gives his reasons for withholding his assent, which appear satisfactory. Before Pōstūmīus set out to that war, he vowed to celebrate the great games (Liv. iv. 23–29).

C. Pōstūmīus, C. Pōstūmī, m. a military tribune in the army of L. Aemilius Paulus, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 6).

L. Pōstūmīus, L. Pōstūmī, m. a Roman of consular rank, condemned for employing the soldiers in cultivating his own lands, at the time he commanded the army (Liv. Ep. 11). —2. A Roman praetor, defeated by the Gauls (Liv. Ep. 23). —3. A Roman praetor, who, with the colony at Nōla, fell under the power of the Sămnites by whom he was killed (Liv. Ep. 73).

L. Pōstūmīus Albīnus, L. Pōstūmī Albīni, m. a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, in 388 B. C. (Liv. vi. 1).—2. Obtained the office of consul, in 236 B. C., with Sp. Cārvilius Māximus, next with Cn. Fūlvius Cēntūmālus, in 231 B. C., and afterwards with Tib. Sēmprōnius Grāchus, in 217 B. C., in which year he died, and M. Clāudius Mārcellus was substituted in his room, but afterwards resigned, that there might not be two plebeian consuls at the same time, and Q. Fābīus Māximus, surnamed Cūncatōr, was elected. From the loss of the second deced of Līvius, we know little of the history of Pōstūmīus, except that he was twice pretor, until his third consulship, to which he was appointed, when absent in the government of Gaul. In that country both he and his army were destroyed. The Gauls cut the trees of an extensive wood, called Litāna, through which he attempted to march, on each side of the road, in such a manner, that they stood when untouched, but on being pushed with the slightest force, they fell. They posted themselves at the farthest of the trees so cut, and as soon as the Roman army had wholly entered the wood, they overturned the tree standing next them, which, falling on those before, brought them down, and in this manner crushed an army of twenty-five thousand men, a very few only escaping, whom the enemy intercepted on their way to a bridge over a river, of which they had previously taken possession. There Pōstūmīus fell, fighting with great bravery, that he might not be taken. The Boii cut off his head, carried it to one of their most sacred temples, took out the brains, enshased the skull with gold, and used it as a consecrated vessel, out of which they made libations on high festivals, and the priests of the temple drank from it. The whole booty fell into the hands of the enemy (Liv. xxii. 35 seq.).—3. Elected pretor 182 B. C., and obtained the south of Spain for his province. For his success over the Lusitani, and other inhabitants of that country, he had the honour of a triumph, in 180 B. C. Five years after, he was elected consul with M. Pōpillius Lāenas. Treated, as he considered, with neglect by the Prānēstini, he discovered unjustifiable resentment against that people, when sent thither by the senate, to ascertain the lands which belonged to the public, by ordering the magistrates to come out to meet him, and to provide lodgings at the public expense. To those demands wholly unprecedented, the Prānēstini tamely submitted, and, following his iniquitous example, subsequent magistrates made similar exactions, to the great inconvenience and expense of the allies. He was one of the three ambassadors sent in 173 B. C., to settle the difference between Māsīnissa and the Carthaginians. His name afterwards occurs in the writings of Līvius, when sent on missions, which showed either his personal respectability, or political influence amongst his countrymen (Liv. xl. 35 seq.).—4. A flāmen of Mārs, probably of little distinction, since the historian Līvius mentions only his appointment (Liv. 15).

L. Pōstūmīus Mēgellus, L. Pōstūmī Mēgelli, m. was elected consul in 306 B. C., gained a victory over the Sămnites, in consequence of which he returned to Rome in triumph. In 297 B. C., Līvius records his having the command of troops in the Vatican territory, and calls him proprator. In his second consulship, he built and dedicated a temple to Victory, with the money arising from fines exacted at the time he was curule edile. From the Sămnites he took several cities, marched his army into Etruria, Tuscan, gained some victories, on that account he demanded a triumph, which the senate refused, and he declared before the house, that he would triumph in right of his consulship. Accordingly, on the third day after that declaration, supported by three of the tribunes, in opposition to the vote of the other seven, and against the resolution of the senate, he triumphed, and the people paid every honour to the day. He appears to be the person against whom M. Cāntius, a tribune of the people, commenced a prosecution, which Pōstūmīus evaded, by being appointed a lieutenant-general (Liv. ix. 44 seq.).—2. An interrex and consul (Liv. xxvii. 6).

L. Pōstūmīus Rēgillēnsis, L. Pōstūmī Rēgillēnsis, m. a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, in 380 B. C. (Liv. vi. 22).

L. Pōstūmīus Tēmpsānus, L. Pōstūmī Tēmpsāni, m. a Roman praetor in 187 B. C., obtained Tārentum for his province, instituted an inquiry into the conduct of a conspiracy of shepherds, who infested with robberies the roads in Apulia and public pastures, sentenced to death about seven thousand of them, some of whom fled, and many of them were punished. He prosecuted to a termination the inquiries respecting the Bacchanals, many of whom did not appear on being summoned, others forfeited their bail, and skulked in that district of Italy. Some he doomed to punishment, and others he sent to Rome, who were all thrown into prison by the praetor P. Cōrnēlius Cēthēgus (Liv. xxxix. 23—41).

L. Pōstūmīus, L. Pōstūmī, m. surnamed Tēmpsānus, a quaestor in the Roman army, killed by the Boii in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 47).

M. Pōstūmīus, M. Pōstūmī, m. one of the four military tribunes with consular authority, in 425 B. C. At Veii, he, and other two Romans commanded the army, and exhibited an instance of injurious effects upon military operations, by each forming a plan of his own, which he endeavoured to carry into effect, in opposition to the other two. The success of the enemy induced their countrymen to create a dictator. For his conduct at Veii, he was brought to trial, and condemned to pay a fine of ten thousand asses of brass (Liv. iv. 31, 41).—2. Another of the same name, elected to the same office, in 402 B. C. (Liv. v. 1).

M. Pōstūmīus Albīnus, M. Pōstūmī Albīni, m. a military tribune with consular authority in 402 B. C. (Liv. v. 1).

M. Pōstūmīus Pŷrgēnsis, M. Pōstūmī Pŷrgēnsis, m. a farmer of the taxes, who had not an equal in the state for fraud and avarice, except T. Pōmpōnius Vējētānus, who had been taken prisoner by Hānno, inconsiderately engaged in ravaging lands in Lūcānia. These two contracted for supplies to the army, pretended losses at sea when there were none, and persisted in the frauds.

lent practice, until it was discovered by M. Otacilius, praetor, who communicated the particulars to the senate. On being brought to trial in 214 B. C., it was proposed, that a heavy fine should be paid by Pömpönius; but a commotion rendered it necessary to dissolve the assembly, when the fine was dropped, and a criminal prosecution afterwards commenced. Pöstümius gave bail for his appearance, which he forfeited, by going into exile, on which the commons passed an order, that, if he did not appear before a given day, his goods should be confiscated, and himself banished (Liv. xxv. 3, 4).

M. Pöstümius Rëgillënsis, M. Pöstümi Rëgillënsis, m. elected a military tribune with consular authority in 413 B. C., and conducted with success a war against the Æqui. He entered into a contest with his countrymen, provoked the tribunes of the people, and excited the indignation of the army to such a degree, that he was overwhelmed with stones by his own troops (Liv. iv. 49 seq.).

P. Pöstümius, P. Pöstümi, m. appointed consul in 505 B. C., and afterwards in 503 B. C. In his first consulship, he and his colleague M. Väterius triumphed over the Sabines. In con. cal. he is surnamed Tübërtus (Liv. ii. 16).—2. A noble Roman, one of the three ambassadors sent to Asia, and several of the Greek islands, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 45).

Sp. Pöstümius, Sp. Pöstümi, m. a military tribune with consular authority in 393 B. C., who, in conjunction with C. Æmilius, defeated the Æqui, but afterwards, having separated from his colleague, he acted incautiously, and exposed his troops to a defeat, from which, however, he recovered, and destroyed the army of the enemy (Liv. v. 26—28).

Sp. Pöstümius Albinus, Sp. Pöstümi Albinus, m. (Livius suppresses his surname), held the office of consul twice with T. Väterius Cälvinus, first in 333 B. C., and next in 321 B. C. They were superseded by a dictator in their former consulship, from the Sänmites being reported to be making preparations for war. Pöstümius held the censorship with Q. Pübilius Philo, in 332 B. C. In their second consulship, they marched an army against the Sänmites, and, by a stratagem of C. Pöntius, entered the Forks of Claudium, where, being completely at the mercy of the enemy, they purchased their lives by the ignominy of passing under the yoke, half-clothed and unarmed. The senate refused to ratify the treaty, and to preserve the public faith, Pöstümius proposed, that those, who pledged themselves for the fulfilment of the agreement, should be delivered up to the enemy. The disinterestedness of the suggestion raised his character among his countrymen, who admired the bravery of the soldier, whilst they pitied the situation of the man. The senate approved of his patriotism, and delivered up the consuls, lieutenant-generals, questors, and military tribunes to the enemy, who refused to accept them, and they returned unhurt to the Roman camp, having, says Livius, certainly acquitted their own faith, and, perhaps, also that of the state (Liv. viii. 16 seq.). Eutropius mentions the disgraceful treaty with the Sänmites, and adds, that both the senate and people refused to confirm it (ii. 9).—2. Was elected praetor in 192 B. C., and obtained first the jurisdiction of the citizens, and, soon after, also that of the foreigners. In 188 B. C., Q. Märcius Philippus and he obtained the consulship, and to Pöstümius, P. Æbütiüs disclosed the crimes committed by the Bacchanals. The consul then examined Hispälä Fecënlä q. v., who, from affection to P. Æbütiüs, discovered the secrets of that horrible association, which the activity and energy of the consul suppressed. He held the office of augur at the time of his death, which happened in 182 B. C., and P. Cörnëlius Scipio, son of Africänus, succeeded him in that office (Liv. xxxvii. 41 seq.).—3. Elected praetor in 185 B. C., and obtained Sicillia, Sicily, for his province (Liv. xxxix. 45).—4. Was elected consul with M. Minücius Rūfus (112 B. C.), and in the allotment of the provinces, he obtained Nümidiä, Algiers, and his colleague, Mäcëdönlä. At that time, a fierce contention existed at Rome; part, bribed by Jägürthä, exerted themselves in his behalf, and part, enraged at his iniquitous conduct, struggled hard to bring him to the punishment which his crimes had deserved. Pöstümius did all in his power to augment the violence of the parties, in order to obtain the sole direction of the war. With this view, he prevailed on Mässivä q. v. to petition the senate for the kingdom of Nümidiä, and Jägürthä's murder of that prince excited such odium against him, that war became inevitable. Pöstümius accordingly made haste to renew hostilities in Africa, and, having secured the necessary supplies of money and troops, sailed for that country. The time of the elections approached, before which he trusted to terminate the war, either by a decisive battle, or by some other means. Jägürthä, on the other hand, looked to delay for safety, and therefore at one time proposed an immediate surrender, at another, broke off all conference; sometimes pretending fear, he did before the Roman army, then suddenly wheeling round made a furious charge. Thus by desultory warfare, and well feigned anxiety for negotiation, he baffled the consul who, at last, was obliged to leave the army to his brother A. Pöstümius Albinus, and depart for Rome to attend the elections. Here, from having done nothing in Africa, his conduct was severely censured, and it was even alleged that he acted in concert with the king, and that the war was protracted by corruption, rather than by inactivity. The disgraceful treaty which his brother concluded, rendered him apprehensive of personal danger, on which account he laid the matter before the senate, who declared the treaty invalid; because it neither had their consent nor that of the people. Meantime he collected auxiliaries, and did every thing in his power to have the necessary preparations in forwardness; but the tribunes would not allow the forces to embark for Africa, and therefore he set out himself in a few days, to resume the command of the army. On landing, he found the troops in winter quarters in the Roman province, unfitted for service by idleness, insubordination, and cowardice. In place of retrieving the lost reputation of his brother, by marching directly against Jägürthä, which he anxiously wished, he felt himself obliged, by the state of the army, to remain inactive. In this condition he resigned it to Q. Cecilius Metellus, who superseded him in that command. He was afterwards arraigned on the Mamillian law, and condemned, although M. Æmilius Scaurus, one of the commissioners appointed to investigate the conduct of certain Romans in regard to Jugurtha, made every effort to free him from punishment (Sul. Jug. 35-44).

Sp. Postūmī Albus, Sp. Postūmī Albi, m. elected consul in 466 B. C., and sent with other commissioners to collect the laws of Greece, in 454 B. C. Nine years after, he commanded the centre of the Roman army in an engagement with the Volsi and Æqui, when a complete victory was gained over the enemy (Liv. iii. 2-70).—2. A military tribune with consular authority in 431 B. C., during which year, he and his colleagues carried a law, that no person, on applying for an office, should whiten his garment. This trivial enactment kindled a hot contention between the two orders of the state. Next year, he was a lieutenant-general under the dictator A. Postūmī Tūbērtus (Liv. iv. 25 seq.).

Sp. Postūmī Rēgillēnsis, Sp. Postūmī Rēgillēnsis, m. appointed censor in 379 B. C., but he died soon after he had entered on the business of his office, and the law not allowing to substitute a colleague, the other censor C. Sulpicius Cāmērinus abdicated (Liv. vi. 27).

Postūmus, i, m. a friend of Prōpērtius, the husband of Ælia Galla, to whom that poet addresses an elegy (iii. 12). Nothing of his character or history is certainly known, except what is mentioned by Prōpērtius, and Horātius (Od. ii. 14). He appears to have been wealthy, but niggardly, and his anxious solicitude about futurity to have prevented him from enjoying present comforts and advantages. Some suppose his name to have been Jūlius Flōrus, to whom Horātius addresses several of his epistles. This, however, is doubtful, and there is no certainty that the Postūmus of Prōpērtius is the same with the Postūmus of Horātius, or that of the latter being positively identified with Jūlius Flōrus.—2. A man to whom Mārtiālis addresses several epigrams (ii. 10).

Postūmus Cōminius, Postūmī Cōminī, m. (Surnamed, in con. cal., Aurūncus), was elected consul, first with T. Lārtius, in 501 B. C., and, afterwards, with Sp. Cāsius in 493 B. C. (Liv. ii. 18, 33).

Pōtēntia. See Pōllēntia.

Pōthīnus, i, m. an eunuch, who was tutor to Pōthēmeus, during his minority. He, together with Achillas and Thēōdōtus, advised that prince to invite Cn. Pōmpēius, after the battle of Phārsālia, to his palace and murder him, 50 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 112). See Pōmpēius. Caesar, having afterwards, at Alexāndria, detected this eunuch in a clandestine correspondence with Achillas, caused him to be put to death. Lūcānus says, he should have lost his life by crucifixion, burning, or by exposure to wild beasts (Phar. x. 515). Pōthīnus Pōthīnus (Mart. v. 70).

Pōtidēa, m, f. Pinacē, a town of Mācēdōnia, which Artābāzus was unable to take by storm (Herod. viii. 126 seq.). It was afterwards called Cāssāndrēa q. v.

Pōtidāmīa, m, f. a fort of Ætōlia (according to Stephānus, and Thūcýdides, a city), from which the men fled to the woods and mountains, on the approach of Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia, in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 8).

Pōtītī, orum (Sing. Pōtītus, i), m. a very ancient, and one of the most celebrated families in Lātium, whom Hērclēs appointed his priests. They were instructed in the rites of that worship by Evānder. The Pinārii q. v. were associated with them in that office, but appear to have been inferior to the Pōtītī. How many years the Pōtītī continued to discharge their office in person, ancient history has not informed us; but it appears from Līvius, that, in 311 B. C., they instructed some of the public servants in the rites of that solemnity, with the intention of delegating to them that office, that twelve branches of the Pōtītī, in which were thirty youths, all died within the year, and that the name of the family became extinct (Liv. i. 7 seq. Virg. Æn. viii. 269).

Pōtītus, i, m. a surname of the Valerian clan. See Vālētus.

Pōtīnā, arum, f. Taki, a city of Bēōtia, according to Strābo, and of Māgnēsia, according to Plīnius, remarkable for a breed of horses. Pōtīnās, ādis, f. of Pōtīnā, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Pōtīnādes quadrigæ, the four horse chariots of Pōtīnā, i. e. the four mares which drew the chariot of Glaucus. By them he was torn in pieces, for which different reasons have been assigned; that he fed them on human flesh, and that when they were hungry they ate himself, that he kept them from horses in order to render them more spirited, and that Vēnus, enraged at this conduct, infuriated them so, that they tore him limb from limb. Pōtīnādes equæ, the mares of Glaucus (Ov. Ib. 555). Adj. Pōtīnācus, a, um.

Præfēctus, i, m. he who is set over, or has the charge of, any thing, a commander, a governor, an overseer, an inspector, a prefect. In the Roman government, the holders of numerous offices were known under the general name of Præfēcti. The principal were—1. Præfēctus arārū, prefect of the treasury, appointed by the emperor Nēro, in the year 56, in consequence of Obāltronēus Sābinus, quaestor of the treasury, unmercifully harassing the poor, and selling their effects by auction. Augustus allowed the senate to choose the prefects of the treasury, and that body selected them by lot from the list of pretors. Chance regulating the election, could not fail to have a bad effect, and the lot fell too often on men unqualified for the employment. Claudius restored the quaestors, whom, with the view of encouraging to act with vigour and propriety, he promised to raise to the higher magistracies by his own authority, without the necessity of their soliciting the votes of the people. This plan failed from the inexperience of the quaestors, as it was the first civil office which a man could by the Roman law undertake. For this reason Nēro chose men of praetorian rank and of tried ability (Tac. Ann. xiii. 28, 29).—2. Præfēctus anōnæ, held a general cognizance over all kinds of provisions, particularly grain. On importation, he judged of its quality, and even regulated the price, consequently, he exercised the authority possessed by magistrates in Britain, of regulating the assize of bread.—3. Præfectus classis, the commander or admiral of a fleet.—4. Præfectus fabrum, the commander of the engineers.—5. Præfectus navis, the master or captain of a ship.—6. Præfectus prætorii, v. prætorio, the commander of the prætorian cohorts or body guards. There were two officers holding this title, both of equestrian rank. Besides the lifeguards, they had the command of all the cohorts throughout Italy.—7. Præfectus remigum, the commander of the rowers.—8. Præfectus sociorum, often contracted Socium, an officer in the Roman army, who commanded a cohort of the Roman allies, not the whole allies (Liv. xxv. 1).—9. Præfectus urbis, v. urbi, the governor of Rome, possessed great power, and frequently retained the office for a number of years. At first the nomination belonged to the kings, afterwards to the consuls, during whose absence, he had the whole charge of the city. After the institution of prætors, the prefect of the city appears to have been only appointed occasionally, and chiefly for the purpose of celebrating the Latin holidays. Under the emperors it became a perpetual office, and the præfectus urbis, who was always chosen from the first families, might in point of authority be considered the second person in the state, or deputy of the emperor. He exercised almost the whole duties of the prætors and ediles, wore the insignia of the former; but his jurisdiction was much more extended, comprehending not only the city, but an hundred miles around it (Liv. l. 59 seq. Tac. Ann. iv. 36 seq.).—10. Præfectus vigilum, the superintendent of the nightwatch. This body of men consisted of seven cohorts, which were stationed in proper places throughout Rome, to prevent wilful fire-raising, theft, robbery, and housebreaking. Augustus first established the nightwatch. Præfectus was a common title of the governors of countries, and provinces. Præpositus occurs in Roman history, nearly with the same sense as Præfectus. Of both, numerous instances are met with in classical authors, who give any account of Roman history during the reign of the emperors. Præfectura, æ, f. the office of a prefect.

Præneste, is, n. v. Prænëstis, is, f. Palastrina (Cluverius), Palastrina (D'Anville), a city of Latiun, about twenty-four miles southeast of Rome; built, according to Virgil, by Cæcilius. It stood on a mountain, whence Virgil has Altum Præneste; Horatius, Frigidum Præneste; and Statius, Sacrum Præneste, from its having a famous temple to Fortune, which gave out oracular responses. Inh. Prænëstini, orum (Sing. Prænëstinus, i), m. After being several times defeated by Roman commanders, and deprived of part of their territory, they became subject to Rome, and showed their fidelity to their conquerors, by vigorously opposing Hannibal, who, at last, compelled them to submission; but only on honourable terms. Adj. Prænëstinus, a, um. Prænëstinus rëczasus (Gel. xi. 3). Prænëstina dëa, Fortune (Ov. Fast. vi. 22). Prænëstina söröres, two statues of Fortune, very like each other (Stat. Syl. l. 3. 80).

Præsidæ, arum, m. an Indian nation, conquered by Alexander the Great. Curtius calls them Pärhëstii, and they, with the Adrëstæ and Gëstëant, are supposed to have lived near the rivers Hëdräotis, the Adä, and Hyphäsia, the Caül, or, Beyah (Jut. xii. 8).

Priësti, orum, m. See Adrëstæ.

Prætor, öris, m. a Prætor. In the early ages of the Roman state, this term is supposed by some to have been a general appellation of all the Roman magistrates, afterwards the general of the army; and even the emperors were ambitious to include it among their other titles. It was the original name of the consuls, of whom there were two, of royal authority (Cic. Leg. iii. 3). Prætor Maximus, the Dictator (Liv. vii. 3). But the word, in its proper signification, denoted a Roman judge, who administered justice both among his fellow-citizens, and also among the foreigners who resided in Rome. In dignity the prætor ranked next to the consul, and in the early ages of the state, after holding the consulship or censorship, it appears to have been not unusual to elect to the prætorship, as P. Sëmprönius Söphus, consul in 303 B. C., prætor in 298 B. C. (Liv. ii. 45: x. 21); Appius Claudius, prætor, the year after his consulship (Liv. x. 22). The questors and ediles might be summoned by private persons, before the prætor, who had a jurisdiction over them (Gel. xiii. 13). The prætor had power to alter laws, repeal them, and enact new ones at pleasure. The appointment of this office necessarily resulted from the increase of consular business, and the state being constantly engaged in war. It took place in 365 B. C., the curule edileship at the same time. Sp. Förius Cämillus, son of Marcus, was the first prætor (Liv. vii. 1). It is surprising that the consuls could, for so long a period as 389 years from their first establishment, continue to preside at courts of justice. Patricians only could, for the first 29 years, be nominated prætors, but at that time a law passed, admitting plebeians to that dignity. Q. Pöblius Philo was the first plebeian elected prætor, an honour which he obtained in 336 B. C. (Liv. viii. 15). As the city continued to increase, it became necessary to appoint another prætor, which gave rise to the distinction Prætor Urbänus, and Prætor Pëgrinüs. The former was esteemed the more honourable, as he decided solely in suits between Roman citizens, and it belonged to him to discharge certain parts of the duty of consuls, when war required their absence from Rome; the latter administered justice only between foreigners, or between Romans and foreigners. To determine which of these offices, each should fill, immediately after their election, they had recourse to the lots. When out of Rome, the consuls seem to have addressed their letters on state business, to the prætor urbänus, at least he read them to the senate (Liv. xxxii. 31 et al.) See M. Sörgius Silus. When one died, another was not always substituted in his room, as in the case of P. Cörnellius Cëthëgus, prætor pëgrinüs, who, by a decree of the senate, held both offices after the demise of C. Dëcimöus Fläyus, prætor urbänus (Liv. xxxix. 38 seq.). Or one might be appointed to both, as was Sp. Pöstümus Albinus, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 50). Before the prætors entered on office, they solemnly swore to the impartial administration tion of justice, and to a rigid observance of the laws. Each then published, both by a herald, and by fixing up in writing in the most public places, the principles on which they would, for that year, determine the causes that came before them, which was called Edictum. The laws at first did not bind them to abide by the mode followed by their predecessors. They might adopt the whole, or a part, or none, as they chose. Favour, or enmity, frequently induced them to change their rule of decision, even in the course of the year, which the senate, by a decree in the year 167 B. C., prohibited ever afterwards. This gave consistency to their judgments, and from that time their decisions formed an important object of study with the lawyers. The prætors wore the Toga Prætexta, and two lictors with the fusces preceded them within the walls of Rome. Without the city, the number was increased to six. When administering justice, the prætor sat in a Sella Cærulea, placed on a wooden floor raised to a considerable height, and so large as to admit his Assessores, or legal advisers. The advocates, jury, witnesses, and audience sat on lower benches. The recorders, who took notes of the proceedings, and entered his decision into a register, necessarily had their seats near him. The servants of the court, who summoned persons to appear before him, and proclaimed the 3d, 6th, and 9th, hours of the day, most probably stood at no great distance from the judge. Formal trials only took place in cases of importance. In matters of little value, he gave judgment at any time, and in any place, as best suited his convenience. The prætor sat in a conspicuous place at the Roman games, and gave the signal for the chariots starting (Liv. viii. 40). In later times, prætors were appointed to govern the countries which had submitted to the Romans. Hence the number varied; but does not appear to have often exceeded eighteen, except under the Triumviri, when there were 67 prætors. Of these, two only remained in Rome, the rest, after determining their provinces by lot, immediately left the city to take command of them. Sylla enacted that no one should be prætor, who had not been quaestor, nor consul, who had not been prætor, nor hold the same office again, before ten years had elapsed (Ap. Bel. Civ. 413). Like the other magistracies, the prætorship continued to sink in power and dignity after the extinction of liberty, until it was finally abolished under the emperor Justinian. Prætura, a, f, the office of prætor, the prætorship. Prætorium, i, n, the place where the prætor sat in judgment at Rome. It also frequently denoted a place without the city, where the prætorian cohorts were lodged. In provinces, it signified the house or palace of the governor, who most commonly had the title of prætor. The name naturally resulted from his administering justice in his own house, and also from having a prætorian cohort, which he kept there for the safety of his person, as well as for the dignity of his office. St. Paul has used Prætorium (Phillip. i. 13), to denote the imperial palace at Rome, and our translators have with propriety adopted that term to convey the Apostle's meaning. In a camp, Prætorium signified the general's tent. Like the residence of a provincial governor, it had the name from his deciding there such matters as came before him, and from his being surrounded with his body guards. Adj. Prætorius, Prætōriānus, et, Prætōritius, a, um. Vir Prætorius, a man of prætorian dignity, a man who had been prætor. Prætoria cohors, a prætorian cohort; a body of lifeguards. Prætoria insignia, prætorian ornaments (Tac. Ann. xii. 53). Prætoria porta, the gate of a camp behind the general's tent. Prætoria nāvis, the admiral's ship, or the flag ship. Prætōriāni milites (Eutrop. viii. 16). Præprætor, ōris, m, sapius. Pro prætorē, a pro prætor, which title at first denoted a prætor whose authority was continued to him after the legal term of its expiry. Afterwards, it was frequently used to signify a person whom the general of an army had left to command it in his absence. The last and most common sense in which the appellation occurs in classic authors, conveys the idea of a man sent to govern a province with the authority of a prætor. Subprætor, ōris, m, an officer acting under a prætor.

Prætūti, orum, m, a people of Picenum, a district of Italia, Italy. Adj. Prætūtianus, et, Prætūtius, a, um. Prætūtianus ager, v. Prætūtiana regio, the country of the Prætūtii, which Hannibal desolated, after the battle at Trasimēnus, the Lake of Perugia (Liv. xxii. 9. Plin. i. 361). Prætūtia pūbes (Sil. Ital. xv. 568).

Præmncē, es, f, a mountain in Arcadia, which produced excellent grapes. Adj. Præmncus, a, um. Præmncum cinum, wine which neither lost its strength nor excellence by being long kept, but rather improved in quality (Hom. Il. xi. 638).

Præslæ, arum, f, a place on the continent of Attica, at which twenty barks of the Issei joined the Roman fleet under L. Apustius, in 202 B. C., who was then in junction with Attalus, king of Asia (Liv. xxxi. 45).

Præslas, a, m, a lake near mount Pængæus, in which the people of that district drove large piles into the ground, on which they built houses, and formed a communication with the shore by means of a narrow bridge (Herod. v. 16).

Præsutagus, i, m, a king of the Icenii, who, during a long reign, had accumulated great wealth, which he left to his two daughters, and to the Roman empire, in equal shares, expecting by this act of policy to secure the tranquillity of his kingdom and family. The event, in place of fulfilling his expectation, was in direct opposition to it. The centurions ravaged his dominions, the slaves pillaged his house, his wife, Boadicea q. v., was disgraced by stripes, and his daughters violated. This act of cruelty, rapine, and flagrant immorality, excited the Icenians to revolt (Tac. Ann. xiv. 31).

Præxidāmas, antis, m, the paternal grandfather of Alcimidas, who gained the prize for wrestling at the Nemean games (Pind. Nem. vi. 27—29).

Præxitéles, is, m, a native of Cnidus, who excelled as a statuary both in brass and marble. From Propertius, he appears to have been more celebrated for his marble than his brazen statues. The expression of the poet, which is very beautiful, shows that he considered Parian marble only worthy of the workmanship of this artist (Il. 8. 16). Several of his most remarkable statues are mentioned by Pausanias and Plineus.

Praxō, ūs, f. a woman, considered the wealthiest and most powerful person at Delphi, in 174 B. C. Persēs, king of Mæcedonia, was acquainted with Praxō, and wrote a letter to her, which he gave to the assassin whom he had hired to murder Eumēnes (Liv. xlii. 15 seq.).

Præclāni, orum, m. a people of Aquitania, who are supposed to have lived at the foot of Pyrænai Mōtes, the Pyrenees, near Mārē Cantabricum, the Bay of Biscay (Cæs. B. G. iii. 27).

Præxæpes, is, m. a herald of Cāmbyēs (Herod. iii. 30 seq.), called by Jūstinus, Cōmētes q. v.—2. Son of Aspathlēs, one of the commanders of the naval forces of Xērxes (Herod. vii. 97).

Prīamus, i, m. a son of Lāomēdon and Strīymō, the last of the Trojan kings. His original name was Pōdārceēs, but in consequence of his being ransomed from Hērēclēs, according to some, by his sister Hēsīōnē, he was called Prīamus. He first married Arisba, whom he divorced, and afterwards Hēcūba, according to some, the daughter of Cisseūs, king of Thrācia, Romania; but, according to Hōmērus and Ovidius, of Dymas, a Phrygian prince. The former poet states, that, by Hēcūba, Prīamus had nineteen children, and Cicero makes the number only two less, but Apollōdorus reduces it to fourteen, of whom he gives the names. By his other wives, he narrates, he had forty children, and records their names. According to this author, Prīamus was the father of fifty-four children (iii. 12). After the greater part of his sons had fallen in defence of their native city, he was impiously murdered by Pȳrrhus, the son of Achilles, at the altar of Jūpter, during the night in which Troy was taken by the Greeks. Prīamides, u. m. a son of Prīamus. Prīamidae, arum, m. sons or descendants of Prīamus (Ov. Met. xiii. 482). Prīamēis, eīdos, f. a daughter of Prīamus. Adj. Prīamēlus, a, um. Prīamēla virgo, Cāssandra (Virg. Æn. ii. 403). Prīamēla sceptrā, the sceptre of Prīamus (Virg. Æn. vii. 252).

Prīāpos, i, f. Carabōa, a town on Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, so called from Prīāpos being worshipped there, or, according to others, from being founded by that god (Plin. i. 623).—2. An island near Phōnie (Plin. i. 620).

Prīāpus, i, m. a son of Bācchus and Vēnus, was the god of gardens. He was chiefly worshipped at Lāmpsacus, Lampskue, on Hēllēspōntis, the Dardanelles, hence Ovidius calls him Deus Hēllēspōnti (Fast. vi. 341), and Deus Hēllēspōntiācus (Fast. i. 440). His rites, like his life, were most licentious, and many of his statues were formed seemingly on purpose to outrage delicacy. The Romans appear to have considered him as the god and protector of gardens, rather than of impurity. Hence neither his rites nor statues were so disgusting and offensive in Italy, as on the shores of the Dardanelles. Adj. Prīāpētus, et, Prīāpinus, a, um.

Prīaticus, a, um. Prīaticus cāmpus, a plain in Thrācia, mentioned by Līvius (xxxviii. 41).

Prīēnē, es, f. Polatea, Samsou, or, Kalessi, a town of Iōnia, between which and Miletus, Mæander, the Meander, falls into a bay of the Archipelago (Liv. xxxviii. 13). Inh. Prīēnēsēs, ium, m. (Val. Max. i. 5).

Prīmipīlus, seldom; Prīmōpīlus, i, m. the centurion of the first century of the first manipule of the Triārii, consequently the first centurion of the legion. He had authority over all the other centurions, gave the word of command in exercise, and in battles, by order of the tribunes, had the charge of Aquila, the eagle, or principal standard of the legion, and, in point of dignity, he ranked with the Equites. The pay of the Prīmipīlus must have been considerable, but the precise sum is not known. On resigning this station, which was esteemed highly honorable, he had the title of Prīmipīlarius. Besides Prīmipīlus, this officer had other appellations, as Prīmū Centūrio, Prīmū Pilus, Prīmī Ordinis Centūrio, Prīmī Pilī Centūrio, Prīmū Centūriōnum, Dux Lēgiōnis, Aquilæ præst, &c.

Prion, ōnis, m. a Getan, the commander of some Scythians in the war against the Argonauts, and fell by the hand of Iāson (Val. Flacc. vi. 619).

Priscilla, æ, f. the wife of Abascāntius, in whose death Stātius writes an epistle of condolence to her husband (Syl. v. l. 3).

Priscillus, i, m. an acquaintance of the poet Mārtialis, whom he jeers, for having remembered an invitation given during drink (Mart. i. 28).

Priscus, i, m. a man to whom Mārtialis inscribes an epigram recommended neither by its wit nor elegance (l. 113).

Priscus Tērentiūs, Prisci Tērentii, m. a noble Roman, to whom Mārtialis dedicates the 12th book of his epigrams. The poet mentions him both as his friend and patron (xii. 4).

Pristis, is, f. the name of a ship (Virg. Æn. v. 154).

Privernum, i, n. Piperno, an ancient town of the Volsi, on Amāsēnus, the Toppa (Virg. Æn. xi. 540). Inh. Privērnātēs, ium, (Sing. Privērnās, ātis), m. the Privērnians, were conquered by the Romans, and after they had revolted, were again subdued, the walls of their city levelled, and their lands wholly divided among the commons of Rome. Through the interest of C. Plantius, they obtained the freedom of the state, in 328 B. C. (Liv. viii. 19 seq.). Adj. Privērnās, as, ātis. Privērnās ager, the territory of the Privērnātēs (Cic. Agr. ii. 25).

Privērnus, i, m. a Rutulian, whom Cāpy killed (Virg. Æn. ix. 576).

Prōba, æ, f. the mother of Prōbīnus and Olybrius, who held a high rank among Roman matrons for dignity of birth, great learning, and spotless integrity (Claud. l. 92).

Prōbīnus, i, m. a son of Prōbus and Prōba, who held the office of consul with his brother Olybrius in the year 395. On the consulship of these two brothers, Claudianus writes a laudatory poem of considerable length (i. 29).

Prōbus, i, m. whose full name was M. Aurelius Prōbus, rose by his merits, first to the rank of commander-in-chief, and afterwards to the sovereignty of the Roman empire. His military valour induced Valēriānus to appoint him tribune before the usual age; and of that action he had no reason to repent. By saving the life of Valērius Flaccus, a relation of the emperor, he obtained a civic crown, and his many excellent qualities procured him the highest respect from all, who esteemed moral virtues, or military talents. When the unanimous acclamations of the Roman citizens had proclaimed Tācītus emperor, that venerable old man declined the honour, and recommended Prōbus to their choice. This most honourable testimony did not change the opinion of his countrymen, but on the death of Tācītus the army in the east, of which Prōbus was commander-in-chief, invested him with the purple, and the senate acquiesced in the appointment. The new emperor both confirmed and enlarged the rights of that body, by placing it almost on its original footing. His success in war proved the superiority of his talents, which the reader regrets to find, in some instances, tarnished with acts of the greatest cruelty. He punished the murderers of Aurēlianus and Tācītus, restored tranquillity to every part of his dominions, and had made preparations for taking vengeance on the Persians, for their ignominious treatment of Valēriānus, when his troops mutinied at Sirmium, Alt Schabaz, his native city, and killed him in the year 282; because he had set them to drain the marshes in the neighbourhood. The provinces reaped a permanent advantage by his repelling the act of Dōmitiānus, which prohibited the planting of vines; and to him may be attributed the vines of Spain, Fetnet, and Hungary. Few emperors who filled the throne of the Cæsars, can be compared to Prōbus, either as a man, or a soldier. His successor, Cārus, both avenged his death, and ranked him among the gods.—2. Father of Prōbinus and Oljbrinus. He married Prōba whose cultivated mind and moral purity probably contributed much to the celebrity of his sons. Claudīanus has commended him for his generosity, and his liberal fortune enabled him to gratify his favourite inclination (l. 32 seq.).

Prōcas, v. Prōca, a, m. one of the Alban kings, who reigned twenty-three years. He was, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, the fourteenth in descent from Ēneas, and father of Amūlius, consequently great-grandfather of Rōmulus (Virg. Ēn. vi. 767).

Prōchēta, v. Prōchēte, es, f. Procheta, an island off the coast of Cāmpānia, Campagna, near the bay of Naples, which had that name from a nurse of Ēneas buried there. It is about six miles in circumference, and about four miles distant from Inārimē, Ēnāria, v. Pithēcūsa, Iachia. The shore towards the west is low, but rises gradually to the east. Virgilius calls it Alta, probably in reference to the promontory which is of considerable height (Ēn. ix. 715), and from its rocky coasts Stātius calls it Aspera (Syl. ii. 2. 76). Plinius states that it was thrown up by an earthquake, and that it had its name not from the nurse of Ēneas, but from its having been cast up by Ēnāria (l. 237 seq.). Strābo seems to have been of the same opinion with respect to the formation of this island (356).

Prōcles, is, m. a king of Lācēdæmon, son of Aristōdēmus and Argia, and twin-brother of Eurysthēnes. They lived in perpetual contention, and the animosities which subsisted between the brothers were perpetuated by their descendants, who long sat on the throne of Spārta (Cor. Nep. Ages. 1 seq.).

Prōcne, es, f. a daughter of Pāndion, king of Athens, by Zēuxippē, who was married to Tērēus, king of Thrācia. To punish the wickedness and cruelty of her husband, with regard to her sister Philōmēla, she killed their son Itys, and served him up to his father. When Tērēus asked for his son, she exultingly declared, that he was eating his flesh, and, to convince him, Philōmēla threw his head on the table. Transported with rage, and stimulated by revenge, he drew his sword, and would have plunged it into the heart of both sisters; but they were all instantly changed into birds; Tērēus into a hoopoe, Prōcne into a swallow, Philōmēla into a nightingale, and Itys into a pheasant (Ov. Met. vi. 428 seq.).

Prōcōnēsus, v. Prōcōnēssus, i, f. Marmora, a rocky island, of barren appearance, in Prōpōntis, which has its modern name from quarries of coarse, greyish marble, of which, says Walpole, it exports a great quantity. Hobhouse, on the contrary, asserts, that these quarries are now unwrought, and that two or three adjacent uninhabited rocks with Marmora are sometimes called the Isles of Marmora. This island is about thirty miles in circumference, and gives name to the sea anciently called Prōpōntis, now the Sea of Marmara. Strābo mentions the excellence of its marble, and Plinius informs us that Eliphōnēsus, Neūris, and Prōcōnēsus were different names of the same island (l. 630). Is. Prōcōnēsil, orum, m. Adj. Prōcōnēsilus, a, um. Prōcōnēsia uncilla (Plin. ii. 23). Prōcōnēsiū marmor (Plin. v. 283).

Prōcōnsul, ūlis, m. a proconsul, a person invested with consular authority for the government of a conquered country. The consuls, at the expiry of their office, were generally appointed proconsuls, and soon after quitted the city to take charge of their province. Their powers, though subject to the will of the senate, and authority of the people, were very extensive. They had the appointment of the taxes and of the contributions imposed on the country, and it cannot be denied, that avarice and rapacity too often trampled on the principles of justice and humanity. To the honour of the senate it must be mentioned, that they frequently punished acts both of extortion and cruelty. These crimes, however, were generally very flagrant before they became subject of prosecution. See Consules. Prōcōnsulātus, ūs, m. the office of proconsul, which continued only for one year. Adj. Prōcōnsulāris, is, e, of, or belonging to, a proconsul, or the proconsulship, proconsular. Excōnsul, ūlis, m. a person who has been consul, but out of office. Classic authors seldom use this term.

Procōpius, i, m. at first a writer, afterwards he entered the army, and commanded the forces of Jūlianus, who bestowed the purple upon him. After the death of that emperor, he assumed the imperial authority in the east, but his own men gave him up to Valēns, by whom he was beheaded (Aur. Vic. Ep. 46. Ann. Mar. xvii. 14).

Prōcris, is, v. idos, acc. im, v. in, voc. i, f. a daughter of Erēthēus, king of Athens (Hýginus says, of Pāndion), who married Cēphālus, king of Thessaly, son of Delon. They were united by strong mutual attachment, and the fidelity of Cēphālus made him refuse the request of Aurōra, wife of Tithōnus. The latter alleged, that the conduct of Prōcris was not distinguished by the same purity, and suggested a trial, which proved the truth of his declaration. She then fled to Cræta, Candia, and wished to attach herself to the nymphs of Diāna, but that goddess rejected her, because she was not a virgin. Moved with compassion on learning her fate, Diāna gave her an unerring arrow and a dog, Laelaps, which no wild beast could escape, and desired her to go and contend in hunting with Cēphālus. She did so, and having refused to part with either the dog or the arrow, for which Cēphālus had offered a very great price, she at last made herself known to him, and he became reconciled to her. Suspicious of Aurōra, she followed him to the hunting, and one day having concealed herself in a bush, was killed by her husband, who supposed he was shooting at a wild beast (Hyg. 189. Ov. Met. vii. 694 seq.).

Prōcrustes, m., a son of Nēptūnus, a man of horrible cruelty, who placed on a bed the travellers who fell into his hands, and, if their length exceeded that of the bed, he cut off the projecting part, and, if shorter, placed anvils under their feet and beat them out, till they equalled the extremity of the bed. Thēsēus delivered the country from this savage, by putting him to death (Hyg. 38). Pausanias says his original name was Pōlypēmon (l. 38).

Prōcūla, æ. f. a woman who deserted her husband, in consequence of extravagance on his part, or rather penuriousness on hers (Mart. x. 41).

C. Prōcūlius, C. Prōcūli, m. a Roman knight, who stood high in the favour of Augustus, from whom he procured a pardon for his brothers L. Licinius Vārro Mūrēna and M. Tērēntius Vārro Mūrēna, who had joined Cn. Pōmpeius. He shared his part of his paternal fortune with them whose property had been confiscated in the civil war. Hōrātius celebrates these acts of generosity and fraternal affection (Od. ii. 2. 5). His sister Tērēntia was married to Mēcēnas. He appears from Jūvēnalis to have been a patron of learned men (Sat. vii. 94).—2. A Roman of infamous character (Juv. Sat. i. 40).

Prōcūlina, æ. f. a woman whom Mārtiālīs charges with immoral conduct (vi. 22).

Prōcūlus, i. m. a freedman and principal favourite of the emperor Augustus, who put him to death, for criminal intercourse with other men's wives (Suet. Aug. 67).—2. A native of Albēnga in Ligūria, who inherited from his parents a strong inclination to robbery, by which he acquired great riches. In the Roman army his courage rendered him conspicuous; but he does not appear to have possessed the necessary requisites of an able commander; since he did not rise higher than a tribune. The people of Lugdūnum, Lyons, induced him to revolt against the emperor Prōbus, whose displeasure he had probably incurred, by his excessive debauchery. The rebellion soon spread over France, Spain, and Britain; notwithstanding the number of the insurgents, Prōbus defeated him, on which he sought for refuge among the Franks who, although he pretended to be descended from them, delivered him up to the emperor, by whom he was put to death, about the year 280 (Eutrop. ix. 17).

Prōcūlus Jūlius, Prōcūli Jūlii, m. a Roman of great respectability, who, to mitigate the grief of the commons, at the loss of the king, and their displeasure at the senate, declared that Rōmulus descended from heaven, and gave him a message to the state, that was the will of the gods, that Rome should be the capital of the world, and, therefore, the Romans should cultivate the art of war (Liv. i. 16).

Prōcūlus Scribōnius, Prōcūli Scribē, a. the brother of Rīfūs Scribōnius, who was not more distinguished by the splendour of their fortunes, than by their affection for each other. Both at the same time rose to high stations of authority, one on the upper, and the other on the lower Rhine. They discharged the duties of their office with the strictest integrity, and an ardent zeal for the public good. The perfect harmony in which they lived, Pactius Africiānus, their secret enemy, converted into a conspiracy against the state. Their fame as military commanders, and the favour of the German armies, by the careful misrepresentation of the infamous Pactius, became, in the eyes of the emperor Nēro, means to overturn the government. Under pretence of doing them honour, the emperor invited them to Greece, where they no sooner appeared, than they saw themselves state prisoners, and every opportunity of vindicating themselves being denied, they escaped an ignominious death by opening their veins, and expiring together. Tācītus calls them Scribōnii (Ann. xiii. 48 seq.).

C. Prōcūlus, C. Prōcūli, m. a man to whom Mārtiālīs made a present of his book. From the poet he appears to have been possessed of great riches (l. 71). On his recovery to health, after his life had been despaired of, Mārtiālīs writes another epigram (l. 37).

Prōcyon, ōnis. m. the less dogstar, which has its name from rising before Sirius, the dogstar, hence called by the Latin Anticānis.

Prōdictātor, ōris. m. a predictor, one who exercised the authority, and performed the duties, of a dictator. Q. Pābius Māximus was created predictor, after the battle at Trāsīmēnus, in 219 B. C. The one consul had been killed in that action, and the other being at a great distance, the dread of the late disaster so alarmed the citizens, that they could not endure the delay which would ensue before the surviving consul, who alone had the right of nominating a dictator, could communicate his choice to the senate, and therefore recourse was had to creating a predictor by a vote of the people (Liv. xxii. 8, 31).

Prōerna, æ. f. a town of Thessaly, recovered, along with the forts around it, by M. Acilius Glābrio, the Roman consul, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 14).

Prōtides, um. f. one of the Theban gates, at which Hypēus had the command, in the war against the Argives (Stat. Th. viii. 335).

Prōtus, i. m. a son of Abas, king of Argos, and Ocālēa (Hōmērus), v. Ocālēa (Apollōdōrus), and twin-brother of Acrisius, with whom he is said to have quarrelled before their birth. After long contention for the sovereignty, Prōtus obtained Tiryns, a city of Argolis, with a small extent of the circumjacent country. He married Sthēnōbea, v. Sthēnēbea, by Hōmērus called Antea, or, Antiōpē, daughter of Iōbātes, king of Lýcia, who, conceiving a violent attachment to Bellerophon, and that youth having refused compliance with her unlawful inclinations, accused him to her husband of attempting personal violence, which he believed, hence Hektor calls him crēdulus (Od. iii. 7. 13). According to Ovidius (Met. v. 238), Prometheus expelled his brother Acrisius by force of arms from Argos, and took possession of his kingdom. Perseus, his nephew, after the conquest of the Gorgons, returned to his native city, and avenged the injustice which Prometheus had done his grandfather, by showing him the head of Medusa, which turned him into stone. Hómērus has given his history (Il. vi. 157 seq.). Prometheus, um, f. the daughters of Prometheus; Lysippe, Iphinoë, and Iphianassa (others say their number exceeded three), who, having preferred their beauty to that of Juno, were, by the enraged goddess, struck with madness, and imagined that they were cows. To this Virgilius alludes (B. vi. 48). Mēlampus cured their insanity (Ov. Met. xv. 326), chiefly by means of hellebore, of which the black kind was from him called Mēlāmpōdion (Plin. iv. 390). On Hymettus, Trelo-couni, Citharon, Elatias, Hēlicon, Zagara, and perhaps over all that range of mountains, hellebore continues to grow.

Prōmachus, i, m. a Boeotian, son of Alēgēnor, hence called Alēgēnōrides, wounded by Acamas, with a spear (Hom. Il. xiv. 476—503).

Prōmēthēus, ēos, m. son of Iāpētus and Clēmēnē, was the brother of Atlas and Epimēthēus, and husband of Asia. Ovidius represents him as having formed a man of clay, and he is said to have stolen fire from the chariot of the sun to animate him (Met. i. 82). Hyginus states, that he brought it in the herb ferula, and taught men how to preserve it by covering it with ashes, of which they formerly were ignorant. For this, Mērcūrius, at the command of Jūpiter, bound him with iron chains to mount Caucasus, and placed an eagle to eat his heart, which grew as much during the night as that bird devoured during the day. Apollōdōrus says, that Vēlcānus chained him to that mountain, and that the eagle ate his liver, not his heart, as related by Hyginus. After thirty years, Hērēclēs was sent to kill the eagle and set Prōmēthēus free, in consequence of an advice which Prōmēthēus, on condition that he should be released from his chains and punishment, had promised to give Jūpiter, respecting Thētis, the goddess of the sea. Apōllo prevailed on Jūpiter to terminate his sufferings, an office which that god assigned to Hērēclēs, during the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. iv. 75 seq.). He obtained, by permission of Jūpiter, immortality in place of Chiron. The fable of his having made a man of clay, Lactāntius explains, by stating that he was the first who made a statue of man, which he did of soft clay. That author derives the name from apocryphus, providentia, and it has been added, that he was an eminent teacher of philosophy, by which the fiction of the eagle eating his heart, the form of the bird, and other circumstances may be explained. The poets sometimes use Prōmēthēus to denote a potter (Mart. xiv. 182). Prōmēthides, ē, m. a patronymic of Deucalion, a son of Prōmēthēus (Ov. Met.

i. 390). Adj. Prōmēthēus, a, um. Prōmēthēa jūga, the ridges or summits of Caucasus, from Prōmēthēus having been chained to that mountain; hence also Prōmēthēa rūpes, Prōmēthēi scōpuli, &c.

Prōmōlus, i, m. a man in the army of Aeneas, whom Turnus killed (Virg. Aen. ix. 574).

Promōna, ē, f. Derris, a town of Dalmatia, taken by Augustus (Ap. Bel. Illyr.).

Prōmōtus, i, m. a noble commander under the emperor Thēodōsius, who lost his life by the treachery and wickedness of Rufinus. Claudianus alludes to him under the name of Dux socius (iii. 317 seq.).

Prōpērtius. See Sextus Aurēlius Prōpērtius.

Prōpērtius Cēler, Prōpērtii Cēleris, m. a man of praetorian family, who, on account of his indigence, wished to resign his rank as a senator. The emperor, Tiberius, on inquiry, finding that his poverty was hereditary, and not the result of luxury or dissipation, made him a large present, by which he was enabled to continue a member of the senate (Tac. Ann. i. 75).

Prōphāsia, is, f. daughter of Epimēthēus (Pin. Pyth. v. 36).

Prophthasia, ē, f. Zarang, or, Dooshak, a town of Drāngiāna (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Prōpētides, um, f. women of Cyprus, who denied that Vēnus was a goddess, for which she punished them, first, by enormous lasciviousness, and afterwards transformed them into stone. According to tradition, the Prōpētides were the first women who debased themselves by prostitution (Ov. Met. x. 221—242).

Prōpōntis, idis, f. the Sea of Marmora, which had this name in ancient times from its being before, previous to the entrance into Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, and in modern times from Prōcōnēsus, Marmora, q. v., on account of its quarries of marble, of which it exports a great quantity. It is about 123 miles in length, and 48 in breadth. Fauces orcle Prōpōntidis, the jaws of narrow Prōpōntis, i. e. Thracius Bosphorus, the Strait of Constantinople (Manil. iv. 614). Adj. Prōpōntiācus, a, um. Prōpōntiāca aqua (Prop. iii. 22. 2).

Prōprator. See Prator.

Prōrēus, ēos, m. the person who has the charge or management of the prova (prōra) of a ship, whence the name (Ov. Met. iii. 634). Some think, that from the name of the office, Ovidius has formed a proper name, and in this manner explain the line above referred to.

Prōscrīpina, ē, f. a daughter of Cēres, the goddess of grain, and Jūpiter, whom Pluto carried away, whilst gathering flowers in the plains of Enna, Castro Giovanni, in Sicily, Sicily (on Aetna, with Vēnus, Dīana and Minērvā (Hyg. 146). Apollānus says, on the fertile plains near the river Strýmon, Bel. Civ. 650). Ovidius, in the fourth book of the Fasti, states that the Sun informed Cēres that her daughter was married to Pluto, and that Jūpiter sent down Mērcūrius to the Infernal Regions, to learn if she had eaten any thing there, and that he reported she had eaten three pomegranates. But in the fifth book of the Metamorphoses, the same Poet states, that the Grecian river Alphēus, the Roufia, when gliding under ground below the sea from Pelōponnēsus, the Morea, to Prōxēnus, i. m. a nobleman of Hŷpāta, of whose party were eighty persons of distinction, all condemned to banishment. On the public faith being pledged to them through Hippōlēmus, they returned, and were put to death as soon as they entered the gates, in 176 B. C. When the cause of the two parties was pleaded before the Roman ambassadors, Prōxēnus, in argument and oratory, far surpassed his fellow-citizens of the opposite party, and, a few days after, he was poisoned by his wife Orthōbūla, who was only banished for that act of murder (Liv. xli. 25).

Prūsia. See Cius.

Prūsia, c. Prūsias, m. a king of Bithŷnia, from whom Philippus expected some ships in 210 B. C., when he went to support the Achaei against the confederacy formed by the Aetōli, and at whose suggestion he made an inroad into the dominions of Attālus, king of Asia, in the absence of that prince, who had joined the Romans. From Antiochus, king of Syria, and the Romans soliciting his alliance at the same time, his power must have been considerable. Through the influence of L. and P. Cōrnēllus Scipio, aided by the remonstrance of C. Lāvius Salinator, the Roman ambassador at his court, Prūsias did not enter into a treaty with Antiochus, and, after the defeat of that monarch, he admitted into his dominions Hannibal, whom he, afterwards, betrayed to T. Quinctius Flāminius. To prevent his falling into the hands of the Romans, the noble Carthaginian ended his life by poison. In 168 B. C., Prūsias went with a great retinue to Rome, carrying with him his son Nicōmēdes, whom he recommended to the protection of the senate. Here he acted with the greatest meanness and servility, stating, that he had undertaken the journey to see the deities who inhabited Rome, to congratulate the nation on the conquest of Pērseus, king of Mācēdōnia, and Gēntius, king of Illyricum, to beg permission to sacrifice in the capitol, and at Praenestē, Palastrina, in fulfilment of a vow, which he had made for the success of the Roman people, and to solicit a renewal of the treaty of alliance, which was granted, from his being supported by the officers, who had commanded armies in Mācēdōnia. To his request for obtaining possession of the land formerly belonging to Antiochus, and now possessed by the Gauls, the senate replied, that it would be given to him, if it had really been under the dominion of Antiochus, and no other nation had a claim to it. At Rome he was treated with the greatest respect, had lodgings at the public expense for himself and retinue, and the use of twenty ships of war, until he came to the fleet given him as a present. He declined the gift offered to himself, but allowed his son to accept of the one sent to him by the senate. Pōlybius says, that he acted in a manner most unworthy of a king, wore the cap of liberty on his head, calling himself a free slave of the Romans, kissed the threshold of the senatehouse, called the senators his tutelary gods, and used other expressions more dishonourable to himself than honourable to his hearers. His own son Nicōmēdes, with the assistance of Attālos, king of Pērgāmus, murdered him. He was a man addicted to all vices of the very lowest kind. Besides Nicōmēdes, he had another son, who, in place of teeth in the upper jaw, had one continued bone (Liv. xxvii. 30—Ep. 50). Adj. Prūsīacus, a. um. Prūsīaca ora, the dominions of Prūsias (Sil. Ital. xlii. 888).

Prŷmneus, ēs. m. a competitor in the games exhibited by Alcinoüs (Hom. Od. vii. 112).

Prŷtānēum, i. n. the room of state where the senators met at Athens. It was sacred to Vēsta, and in it resided the presiding officers elected by the senators, who were called Prŷtānēs. To them, whoever had any thing to communicate respecting the state repaired (Herod. i. 146). In the Prŷtānēum were brought up and maintained at the public expense, all to whom the state lay under any obligations, if they were not otherwise sufficiently provided for.

Prŷtānis, is. acc. im. v. in. m. a companion of Sārpēdon, king of Lŷcia, who was killed by Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiii. 258).

Prŷtānis, is. m. the chief magistrate of the Rhodians, who continued in office only for six months (Liv. xlii. 45).

Psalychidae, c. Psalychiidae, arum. m. a noble family, or clan, in the island Aegina (Plin. Ist. vi. 92).

Psāmāthē, es. f. a daughter of Nērēus and Dōris, who, by Aēacus, king of Aegina, became the mother of Phōeus. When Pēlēus had put Phōeus to death, Psāmāthē sent a wolf, which destroyed his cattle, and killed some of his herdsmen. Instead of attempting to destroy the ferocious animal, Pēlēus, recollecting his crime, supplicated Psāmāthē, who, for some time, disregarded him, but Thētis, at last, prevailed on her to give up her resentment, and she then transformed the wolf into a stone (Ov. Met. xi. 398 seq.). Pindārus writes Psāmāthēa (Nem. v. 23).

Psāmāthē, es. f. a fountain in Boōtŷlia. Undāōna Psāmāthē (Val. Flacc. i. 364).

Psāmmēnitus, i. m. a king of Egypt, whom Cāmbŷses conquered in battle and took prisoner at Pelusium. The Persian monarch spared his life, a favour for which Psāmmēnitus does not seem to have been grateful, as he soon revolted, was forced to drink bull's blood, and immediately expired (Herod. iii. 10 seq.).

Psāmmētichus, i. m. son of Nēcus, an Egyptian, who, after various calamities, obtained the government of the whole country, by the assistance of the Ionians and Carians, to whom he assigned lands in his own dominions. After a siege of twenty-nine years, he took Azōtus. On purpose to ascertain what nation was most ancient, as the Phrygians disputed that honour with the Egyptians, he gave two infants to be brought up by his own shepherd, and forbade a single word to be spoken in their hearing. At the end of two years, as the shepherd entered the place where they had been brought up on goat's milk, they pronounced the word "Bēcos." On inquiry at different nations, he found it was the Phrygian word for breast, on which account he allowed the Phrygians to be the most ancient nation (Herod. ii. 2).

Psaphō, rectius, Sāppho, ōnis. m. son of Hāsdrūbal, and brother of Hannibal and Hāsdrūbal (Just. xix. 2).

Psauis, idis. m. a Sicilian, whose victories in the chariot-race Pindārus has celebrated (Ol. iv. and v.).

Polus, idem, f. (Deu, a drop of dew), one of Diana's attendants (Ov. Met. iii. 172).

Pseudopercus. See Pseudophilippus.

Pseudophilippus, i. m. a name given to Andronicus c. v., because he had assumed the name of Philippus (Liv. Ep. 59).—2. Another of this name is mentioned by Livius. He claimed the crown of Macedonia, and was cut off with his army by L. Trémellius, quaestor, in 146 B. C. (Ep. 53). Eutropius calls him Pseudopercus, because he pretended to be the son of Percus, the last king of that country (iv. 15).

Pollis, ia, m. a river which falls into Pontus Euxinus, the Black Sea, to the east of Thracia Bosphorus, the Strait of Constantinople.

Pöphis, idis (idis, Stat.), f. a city of Arcadia, distinguished for strength and singularity of site, at the foot of Erymanthus, so called from Pöphis, son of Lycion, who founded it, or, from Pöphis, a daughter of Eryx (Ov. Met. v. 607). According to Pölybius, it was in the very centre of Peloponnesus, the Moræa. Cæsar Pöphis (Stat. Th. iv. 296). Isa. Pöphidii, orum, m.—2. A city of Acarnania.—3. Another of Achæa.—4. Acroteria, at which was the Acropolis of Zacynthus, Zante.

Psylli, orum (Sing. Psyllus, i.), m. a nation of Africa, to the south of Syrtis Major, the Gulf of Zadic, whose bodies possessed the power of resisting or ejecting the poison of serpents, and they cured the bites of these noxious animals in others, by sucking the wound. Sollinus attributes this quality to a soundness of frame, incapable of being corrupted (27). Plinius says, they had their name from their king Psyllus, that their bodies had, from nature, a quality fatal to serpents, by the smell of which, they lulled them asleep. The Nāsmōnes almost extirpated this people, and took possession of their settlements (Plin. ii. 7), but Hērōdōtus says they were overwhelmed under mountains of sands by Auster, against whom they had gone to make war; because they had suffered severely from a long drought, when the wind was in the south (iv. 173). Lucianus shortly mentions the character of this people (Phar. ix. 911).

Psylla, a, f. Psylla, orum, n. a small barren island in the Archipelago, to the north of Chios. It had a good harbour (Hom. Od. iii. 171).

Psytalea, a, f. a barren island between Attica and Silamis (Herod. viii. 76).

Ptelœum, e. Ptelœon, i., n. et, Ptelœos, i., f. Ptelos, a seaport town of Thessaly, on Sinus Pélægicus, the Gulf of Volo, at which Antiochus, king of Syria, landed in 194 B. C., when he invaded Europe, and made war against the Romans. Here he was met by Eurylochus, Magnētarches, and the Magnesian nobles from Dēmētrias, Volo. The Roman consul P. Licinius Crassus found it deserted in 173 B. C., and levelled it with the ground (Liv. xxxv. 43 seq.).

Pterelas, a, m. a Theban killed by Tydeus, at the very commencement of hostilities between the Thebans and Argives (Stat. Th. vii. 632).

Pterelas, es, m. (Fluer), one of Actæon's dogs; pedibus utilis, swift-footed (Ov. Met. 212).

Psēria, a, f. a town of Cappadocia (Herod. i. 76).

Psölemæus, i. m. surnamed Söter (i. e. preserver), a title given him by the Rhodiums for the assistance which he afforded them against Dēmētrius, was son of Lagus and Arinöe. Pausanias makes Psölemæus a son of Philippus, king of Macedonia, and adds that Arinöe was pregnant with him at the time she was married to Lagus. From being brought up at court, he naturally became an intimate of Alexander the Great, under whom he served as a general in the Asiatic expedition, and distinguished himself, both by personal bravery, and military knowledge. Justinus maintains, that Alexander raised him from being a common soldier, on account of his valour (xliii. 4). In the division of the kingdom after the death of that conqueror, Psölemæus obtained Egypt, and the adjoining countries, of which he enlarged the boundaries by force of arms, and governed with mildness, wisdom, and justice. These qualities gained him the esteem of the people whose interest and happiness is promoted, and, by these means, secured his throne to himself, and his descendants. To neighbouring and even distant nations under unstable or oppressive governments, his administration must have appeared desirable, and coming under his dominion considered cause of joy, not of regret. To his character as a sovereign, rather than to the force of his arms may, perhaps, be attributed the great extent of his kingdom, at the time of his death. Phœnicia, part of Arabia, Libya, Æthiopia, Cœle-Syria, Cilicia, Caria, Lycia, Cyprus, and the Cyclades acknowledged the sovereignty of Psölemæus, and submitted to his laws. Love of literature, and the encouragement which he gave to men of learning, formed remarkable features in the character of this monarch, who laid the foundation of the Alexandrian Library, which, during the reign of his descendants, became one of the most distinguished in the ancient world. Modern times have to lament the loss of his history of Alexander the Great, which he composed with great elegance, and a strict regard to truth. He died in the eighty-fourth year of his age, and thirtieth of his reign, about 283 B. C. Cornelius Nepos mentions a report, that he was killed by his own son (Reg. 3), and alludes to him (Eam. 3).—2. Son of the former, surnamed Cæraunus, who killed Söleucus, was the elder brother of Psölemæus Philadelpus (Cor. Nep. Reg. 3). Justinus has related his murder of Lysimachus, the husband of his sister Arinöe, his acquisition of the kingdom of Macedonia in 280 B. C., and his marriage with that sister, whose sons he deprived of life, in violation of a most solemn oath, and then banished herself. The reader feels satisfied, after the enumeration of his crimes, to learn that he was cut off by a violent death, having reigned three years (xvii. 2: xxiv. 6).—3. Son of Pörrhus, king of Epirus, whom his father left guardian of the kingdom at the age of fifteen, when he sailed to Italy against the Romans, in 283 B. C. He conquered Antigonus Gonatas, and lost his life at Sparta, with the bravest part of his army (Just. xviii. 1—xxv. 4).—4. Son of Alexander, king of Epirus, by his sister, Olympias, and grandson of Pörrhus, who succeeded to the kingdom of Epirus in 219 B. C., on the death of his brother Pýrrhus (Just. xxviii. 1-3).—5. Son of Ptolémæus Sôter, whom he succeeded in the throne, and in derision, received the surname of Philādēphus, because he had killed two of his brothers. The truth of history requires that the account of Pausanias be mentioned, who states, that these brothers attempted to lay snares for him, and to seize on part of his kingdom, on which account he caused them to be put to death. He married Arsinoë, his own sister, which the Egyptian, but not the Macedonian laws permitted (Paus. i. 8). The remainder of his reign furnishes numerous proofs of a strong judgment, of great political knowledge, and an ardent love of literature. In consequence of the Romans having driven Pýrrhus from Italia, Italy, and conquered the Tarentini, Ptolémæus solicited an alliance with them, into which they readily entered. He followed out his father's plans, among which may be enumerated the watchtower on the island Pháros, the library at Alēxandria, and making that town the mart of the world. To form a communication between the countries of the east and Europe, he built Bérénice and Myos-Homios on Sinus Arabicus, the Red Sea, from which goods were carried on camels across to Coptos on the Nile, and brought down that river in ships. Numerous advantages resulted from this trade, which he protected by a powerful fleet in the Mediterranean, by another in the Red Sea, and by land forces. Historians mention, that he both esteemed and patronised Callimæchus, Lycophron, Thēocritus and Euclid. He died in the sixty-third year of his age, and thirty-eighth of his reign, about 245 B. C. Besides Arsinoë, he had another wife of the same name, daughter of Lysimachus, by whom he had two sons and a daughter.—6. Surnamed Evērgētes, succeeded his father Ptolémæus Philādēphus, and made war on Antiochus, king of Syria, whom he would have conquered, had not an insurrection in Egypt, recalled him from the banks of Tigris, the Dejiluh, to which his victories had carried him. The conquest of so extensive a tract loaded his army with immense spoils, and he recovered all the statues of the Egyptian gods which Cambyses had carried into Syria, on which account he obtained the surname Evērgētes. His military reputation secured him against foreign aggression, so that he passed the remainder of his life in tranquillity and peace, patronising men of genius, and administering justice with impartiality. He died after a reign of twenty-five years in 221 B. C. To him Eutrôpius refers (iii. 1).—7. Surnamed Philôpator, son of the former, ascended the throne of Egypt, about 220 B. C. Some maintain that he received the ironical surname of Philôpator, because he had cut off his father and mother by poison, and it cannot be denied, that the numerous acts of cruelty which disgraced the early part of his reign, tend to confirm that assertion. Success attended his arms against Antiochus, king of Syria; but he did not improve his victories, nor did they raise his reputation as a monarch, because he was addicted to every species of extravagance, and debauchery. He married his sister Clēôpâtra, and according to the Egyptian custom, they appear to have been considered joint-sovereigns. With him the Romans renewed the treaty of alliance in 212 B. C., and sent him a purple gown and vest; to the queen an ivory chair, an embroidered gown, and purple robe. Dissipation exhausted his constitution, and he died in 203 B. C., after a reign of seventeen years (Liv. xxvii. 4-30).—8. Surnamed Epiphānes, or the illustrious, son of the former, was only four years old when his father died. He married Clēôpâtra, a daughter of Antiochus, king of Syria, remained steadfast in alliance with the Romans during the second Punic war, for which he had the thanks of the senate, and he, afterwards, offered them auxiliaries, money, and grain for the war against the Ætolli, and Antiochus. They did not accept either the thousand pounds' weight of gold, or the twenty thousand pounds' weight of silver, or the troops at the head of which he had proposed to march. Philippus, king of Macedônia, and Antiochus had agreed to divide the wealth of the Egyptian king between themselves; if he knew of this fact, it was natural for him to afford the Romans every assistance in his power, since he was unable alone to make war against these united sovereigns. His friendship with the Romans was attended with numerous advantages. In particular, it protected him for a considerable time against conspiracies of his own subjects, whose hatred he had incurred by his cruelties, and detestation, by his vices. After a reign of twenty-four years, he died by poison administered by some of the supreme officers of his own court, in 179 B. C. (Just. xxxi. 1. Liv. xxxi. 2 seq.).—9. An inhabitant, or native of Tēlmessus q. v., whose lands the Roman senate exempted, at the time they gave the whole of Lycia to the Rhôdii, in 191 B. C., except this town and its fort (Liv. xxxvii. 56).—10. Surnamed, in derision, Philômētor, on account of his hatred to his mother, Clēôpâtra, was the son of Ptolémæus Epiphānes, whom he succeeded, in the sixth year of his age. During his minority, his mother conducted the administration, and, after her death, an eunuch acted as tutor for the young king. A dispute respecting the right of succession arose between him and a younger brother, whom Clēôpâtra, his sister, supported, as Antiochus, king of Syria, did him. The Syrian monarch soon overran Egypt, on pretence of supporting the right of Philômētor; but, in reality, to secure the kingdom for himself, which the young king perceived, and, therefore, entered into a reconciliation with his brother and sister. The Romans compelled Antiochus to quit the country, and, afterwards, restored Philômētor to the throne, when he had been dispossessed by his younger brother, to whom he then gave Cýrēne, Caren, in 160 B. C. He was killed by a wound in the head, received in battle in 144 B. C., while supporting the interest of Dēmétrius, king of Syria, who had married his daughter Clēôpâtra. His medical attendants seem to have attempted trepanning, or something like it (Liv. xlv. 19 seq. Eutrôp. iv. 6).—11. Surnamed Evērgētes II., or Phýscos, so called according to Valérius Máximus, from the accumulation of his vices (ix. 1), brother of the former, then king of Cýrenē, succeeded to the crown of Egypt on the death of Philómētor, whose son he murdered, and whose widow he married (Just. xxxviii. 8). Detested by his subjects on account of his cruelty, they burned his palace, on which he fled to Cýprus, and they bestowed the crown on his sister Clēōpātra, who had been first the wife of his brother Philómētor, who died, when she was espoused to himself. The daughter of his queen he first violated, and afterwards married. Ptolémēus, enraged at his wife's appointment to the crown, murdered in Cýprus the son whom she bore him, and sent his head, hands, and feet to his mother in 132 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 59). Justinus has given a shocking picture both of his person and conduct, which was in the highest degree nefarious and savage (xxxviii. 8: xxxix. 3).—12. Surnamed Lathýrus, c. Lathýrus, was banished and persecuted by his mother, who compelled him to separate from his wife Sēlēnē, after she had born him two sons. On the expulsion of his younger brother Alēxānder, who had killed his mother Clēōpātra, Ptolémēus Lathýrus ascended the throne, in 119 B. C., and reigned forty-four years (Just. xxxix. 4 seq.).—13. Surnamed Apion, either from the Egyptian god Apis, or from leanness, as, according to Justinus, he was the natural son of Ptolémēus Evergētes, or Phýscon; i. e. fat; others say of Philómētor. At his death in 98 B. C., he left Cýrenē to the Roman people, and the senate decreed, that it should be free (Liv. Ep. 70).—14. Surnamed Aulētes, from his fondness of playing on the flute, a king of Egypt, who seems to have possessed none of those qualifications necessary for government. He quarrelled with his people, fled privately to Rome, and, pretending he had been expelled by his subjects, begged the senate to restore him to the throne. The Alexandrians, supposing him dead, had put the sceptre into the hand of his daughter Bērēniēc. But on learning their king had gone to Italy, they sent an hundred ambassadors, to state the truth, and justify their conduct, to the people of Rome. The greater part of these deputies, Ptolémēus cut off by assassination or poison; and the rest, intimidated by threats, or gained over by bribery, neither laid the subject of their embassy before the senate, nor discovered the murder of their companions. The Romans being dissuaded by an oracle, supposed fictitious, from restoring the exiled monarch to his throne, he applied to Gábinius, governor of Syria, who, tempted by the bribe of 10,000 talents, undertook the war, brought it to a successful termination, and set the crown of Egypt on his head. He put to death his daughter Bērēniēc, and her husband Archēlaüs was slain in battle. Ptolémēus lived four years after his restoration, died 51 B. C., and left his kingdom to his son Ptolémēus, and daughter Clēōpātra, whom he had appointed by his will to marry, and reign as joint-sovereigns. Ptolémāis, idis, f. Clēōpātra, a daughter of Ptolémēus. Adj. Ptolémēas, a, um, of Ptolemy, or, Egypt, Egyptian.—15. A son of Ptolémēus Aulētes, surnamed Nóvus Diōngéius, who, during his minority, was under the care of Póthius, an eunuch, Achilles, commander of the forces, and Thēódōtus of Chios, Scio, his preceptor. They, in name of the king, deprived Clēōpātra of her share in the government. She raised troops in Syria and Judæa, advanced against Alexandria, to maintain her right by force of arms; but through Caesar, was appointed queen of Egypt. Ptolémēus, after his defeat, fled with all who were in the same boat, dived in attempting to cross the Nile.—16. A son of Jūba, king of Mauritania, who aided the Romans against Tācfarinas, for which the senators of Rome presented him with an ivory sceptre and a painted robe, the most gift to kings, which they sent by a number of their own body, with instructions to style him "king, ally, and friend of the Roman people" (Tac. Ann. iv. 23 seq.).—17. An astrologer, or pretender to supernatural knowledge, who informed Gálba, that he would rise to the imperial dignity, and formed the treasonable plan, by which his prediction was fulfilled (Tac. Hist. i. 21, 22). An illustrious geographer and astronomer, was born at Ptolémāis, a town of Egypt, and flourished at Alexandria, under the emperors Adrianus, and the Antonini. According to his opinion, the earth was placed in the centre, around which the heavenly bodies revolved. In explaining the diversity of their motions, he displayed great ingenuity, and accounted for the whole by cycles and epicycles (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).—18. Son of king Jūba, and cousin to the emperor Caligula, by whom he was put to death (Suet. Cal. 26).

Ptolémāis, idis, f. anciently Alēx. c. Acra, now Acra, a city of Syria, so called from Ptolémēus, king of Egypt, who either founded or enlarged it. The port of Acra is the bay on that coast. The Bay of Acra, or Gothia, is nearly 7 miles in width, and perhaps 4 miles in length. The sweep is nearly semicircular, the sounding in general 100 fathoms, and the holding ground on the south side, near the village of Catfa, excellent. The possession of this town enables whoever holds it, to keep the inhabitants of the country in subjection, as far as Jerusalem. Rice, the principal article of food there, is raised wholly by this port. Acra was the theatre of the holy war for near 200 years. It has been stated, that the origin of the ornamented Gothic architecture, may be observed in some of its ancient buildings. The modern city is famous for a noble defence made by a few British soldiers and seamen under Sir Sidney Smith (May 1799), against the French army, commanded by Buonaparte, who, though greatly superior in numbers, were compelled most disgracefully to raise the siege, and march back into Egypt.—21. Ptolémāis, a city of Pentápolis, to the west of Cýrenē. Eutrōpius describes it as a town of great distinction (vi. 11).

Públiā, is, f. a woman of noble rank in Rome, who was tried and executed, for poisoning her husband, Póstūmūus Athēniū consul, in 153 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 48).—22. Públicus, i, m. a freedman, who was exceedingly like Cn. Pómpēius Māgnus, as well also Vibius, who was freedborn (Plin. ii. 25. Val. Max. ix. 14).—23. Públicus Māllēolus, Públicus Māllēolus, m. a man, who, for having killed his mother, was the first who was thrown into the sea, sewed up in a sack, 103 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 68).

C. Pūblius Bibbūlus, C. Pūblici Bibbūli, m. a tribune of the people, the enemy of M. Claudius Marcellus, who brought heavy charges both against that eminent Roman, and the whole nobility, in 211 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 21).

L. Pūblius, L. Pūblici, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who, with his brother M. Pūblius, dedicated a temple to Flora, near that of Bacchus, Proserpina and Ceres, during their edileship. It had probably fallen into decay, since Tiberius dedicated that temple in the year 17. Adj. Pūblius, a, um. Pūblius clivus, a rock or steep declivity of the Aventine hill, which the two brothers L. and M. Pūblius, during their edileship, obtained for the public to build houses upon. The buildings erected on it were burned to the ground, in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 26). Of the improvements made upon Pūblius clivus, Ovidius has given a neat description (Fast. v. 288 seq.).

L. Pūblius Bibbūlus, L. Pūblici Bibbūli, m. a military tribune of the second legion, who does not appear to have been a man of great merit (Liv. xxii. 53).

M. Pūblius, M. Pūblici, m. a Roman who held the office of edile of the people, with his brother L. Pūblius q. v. (Tac. Ann. ii. 49).

Pūblius, a, um. Pūbilia gens, a plebeian clan at Rome. Pūbilia tribus (Liv. vii. 15).

C. Pūblius, C. Pūblici, m. a Roman youth, who surrendered his person to be confined for a debt due by his father. From the cruel treatment which he experienced from L. Pāpirius q. v., the Romans passed a law in 325 B. C., that in future, the goods of the debtor, not his person should be answerable. Previously to this time, the creditor appears to have had the power of scourging, for Pūblius exhibited his body to the public, deeply marked with the rods (Liv. viii. 28).

L. Pūblius Volsus, L. Pūblici Volsi, m. a patrician, who was elected a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, in 399 B. C. (Liv. v. 12).

Q. Pūblius, Q. Pūblici, m. a plebeian tribune, who, to secure the tranquillity of the state, proposed that M. Mānlius q. v. should be brought to trial, in which measure he had the concurrence of his colleague M. Mānlius. The speech which Livius has put into the mouths of these plebeians, is honourable to their candour, judgment, and patriotism (Liv. vi. 19 seq.).—2. A quinquēvir, appointed in 351 B. C., to pay off the debts with which individuals were oppressed. Livius has recorded the names of the whole five commissioners, in consequence of the fidelity and diligence with which they discharged that difficult and invidious duty. From their paying out the money, their fellow-citizens called them bankers (mēnsūrī) (Liv. vii. 21).

Q. Pūblius Philō, Q. Pūblici Philōnis, m. consul in 338 B. C., when he had the honour of a triumph, for having compelled the Latins to submission. His colleague, Tib. Emilius Māmercinus, claimed the same honour, without having gained a victory, and, exasperated by the refusal of the senate, he inveighed against the patricians, in the most violent harangues. Pūblius being a plebeian, took no pains to prevent him, for which reason, to put an end to their consulship, the senate ordered a dictator to be created, and Emilius named his colleague. Whilst he held this office, Pūblius passed three laws, which were very advantageous to the commons, but injurious to the patricians.

1. That the decrees of the commons should bind all the Romans. 2. That the senators should approve of the laws passed at the Cōmissa Centuriata, before the votes were taken. 3. That one of the censors should necessarily be elected from the commons, since both consuls might be of that order. It is easy to see, that these enactments transferred almost the whole power of the state from the patricians to the plebeians. Pūblius was the first plebeian praetor. After being master of the horse to L. Emilius Māmercinus, he obtained the censorship in 332 B. C., when two new tribes, Mācia and Scāptia, were constituted. In his second consulship, he conquered the Pālapōltāni. To obtain the credit of this victory, he was continued in command another year, and was the first to whom a prolongation of military authority had ever been granted, and the first also who triumphed after the expiry of his office. His fellow-citizens raised him a third time to the consulship, and he entered on his office the very day he was elected. Success still attended him, particularly in Apulia. After he had been consul for the fourth time, and had performed many eminent services, both at home and abroad, he was accused of disaffection to the state by the nobles, but was acquitted (Liv. viii. 12 seq.).

T. Pūblius, T. Pūblici, m. elected an augur in 302 B. C., when the number of augurs was increased from four to nine, the additional five to be plebeians (Liv. x. 9).

Vōlēro Pūblius, Vōlēronis Pūblici, m. a plebeian, whom, for his refusing to enlist, the consuls ordered to be stript, on which he appealed to the public. The lictor sent for that purpose, was repelled by the great strength of Pūblius, who, with the assistance of the mob, compelled the whole lictors to take refuge in the senatehouse. At next election, in 473 B. C., he was chosen a plebeian tribune, when he proposed a law, transferring the appointment of the tribunes of the people to the Cōmissa Tribūta, a measure which the patricians opposed, as it deprived them of using the votes of their dependants, in favour of the persons, whom they preferred. Although ultimately unsuccessful, the resistance of the patricians prevented the law from passing till the following year, during which Pūblius continued in office (Liv. ii. 55).—2. A military tribune with consular power, in 398 B. C., the year in which the Lectisternium was first introduced at Rome (Liv. v. 13).

Pūblius, i, m. the praenomen assumed by a slave, on obtaining his liberty, which Persius uses as the name of any one who had thus become a citizen of Rome (Sat. v. 74).—2. A man, probably an acquaintance or intimate of Mārci, on whose pup, named Iua, that poet writes an epigram (i. 110). If he be the person mentioned in ii. 57, the poet and he must have been on an intimate footing. There can be no doubt, that he is the man whose name occurs vii. 86.—3. A native of Syria, who wrote farces. Like many of his countrymen, he was a slave, but fortunately fell into the hands of a gentle master, who set him free. His genius procured him the esteem and patronage of many powerful Romans, among whom was C. Julius Caesar. He flourished about 40 B. C. The elegance of his poetry, of which A. Gellius has transmitted a few lines, has been much praised. Almost the whole of his writings are lost (Gel. xvii. 14).

Q. Publilius, Q. Publilius, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who, with his colleague M. Manlius, brought M. Manlius Capitolinus to trial for aspiring at the regal power. The charge was found proved, and Manlius was thrown from the Tarpeian rock, in 383 B. C. (Liv. vi. 19 seq.).

Pudicitia, ae, f. (Patricia), patrician chastity, to which a temple was erected in Forum Boarium. It was unlawful for any one to touch the statue of chastity, unless the matron who had been only once married. Virgilia q. v., consecrated a temple to Pudicitia Plebeia (Liv. x. 23).

Pugio, onis, f. a sword or dagger. The Roman emperors wore it, as the badge of their possessing the power over the life and death of the citizens (Tac. Hist. iii. 68).

Pulchri Promontorium. See Mercuri Promontorium.

T. Pullo, T. Pullo, m. a Roman centurion of distinguished valour, who, to decide a dispute with L. Varenus, respecting superiority of courage, rushed forth from the camp, when attacked by the Nervii, and displayed great bravery without the fortifications. Nor was his rival for military fame inferior to him, either in fortitude or generosity (Ces. B. G. v. 44). See Varenus.

Puppius. See M. Claudius Puppius Maximus.

Pupinensis, is, e. Pupinensis ager, in which P. Decius, the Roman consul, sat down in 309 B. C., in order to protect Rome against the Umbri, who threatened to besiege it (Liv. ix. 41).

Cn. Pupius, Cn. Pupius, m. a Roman appointed a duumvir for building a temple to Concord (Liv. xxii. 33).

L. Pupius, L. Pupius, m. after holding the edileship, was elected praetor, and obtained Apulia for his province, in 185 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 39 seq.).—2. A partisan of Pompey, the first centurion of a legion, who was taken at Igurium, Gubio, a town of Umbria, and brought to Caesar (Ces. B. C. i. 13).

Puteoli, orum, m. Pouzzola, a town of Campania, Campagna, built by the Greeks, who called it Diacearchia. According to Festus and Varro, the Romans gave it this name from the number of wells (putei), or from the smell of the hot springs, some of which contain sulphur in solution. Q. Fabius Maximus, consul, fortified Puteoli, by order of the senate, in 217 B. C., and next year Hannibal attempted to take it, without success. In revenge for this failure, he desolated the territory of Neapolis, Naples, as he retreated. About this time, Puteoli began to be frequented as a place of trade. Livius records a large embarkation at Puteoli, under C. Claudius Nero, a proof that it was a town of some note, and had a good harbour (Liv. xxiv. 7 seq.).

Inh. Puteolani, orum (Sing. Puteolanus, i, m. From their being Latins, and enrolled as a Roman colony, they claimed the privileges of Roman citizens, which the senate refused, in 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 42). Adj. Puteolanus, a, um. Puteolanus ager (Plin. i. 240). Puteolanus pul-vis (Senec. Nat. Quaes. iii. 20). Puteolans mare (Gel. vii. 8). Puteolans stans (Sot. Aug. 98).

Pylae, ae, f. Kitron, or, Kitro, a town in Peloponnesus, a district of Macedonia, on the Thracian coast, the Gulf of Salonica. It was afterwards called Kitron, whence the modern name. Here Cassander killed Olympias (Just. xiv. 6). At no great distance from this town, L. Emilius Paulus, consul, conquered Perses, king of Macedonia, in 178 B. C., and soon after, having surrendered, the Roman commander gave it up to be plundered by the soldiery (Liv. xlv. 6 seq.). Inh. Pylaei, orum, m.

Pygela, ae, f. Figela, a seaport town of Ionia, so called, because the associates of Agamemnon, labouring under the curse of the gods, staid there, or because it was full of runaways. Into this harbour Pygelaus put, 191 B. C., before he carried into effect his treacherous plan against Phönix, who commanded the fleet of the Rhodii (Liv. xxxvii. 11).

Pygmaei, orum, m. a race of people of very diminutive size, not exceeding a foot and a half in height; a fiction probably derived from their name (πυγμαί, cubitus); but Plinius says their height did not exceed six inches. The ancients represented them as perpetually at war with the cranes, and, although they believed its truth, yet it cannot be considered in any other light than that of a fable, originating in ignorance, or the imagination of a poet. Plinius places the Pygmies in Thracia, Romania (i. 441), at Antiochia, in Syria (i. 598), at the marshes where the Nile rises (i. 741), in India (ii. 13), where Aristoteles says they lived in caves. Homerus, Pseudo-Mela and Strabo, fix their residence in Ethiopia, and others, in Scythia. Adj. Pygmaeus, a, um. Pygmaeus gens (Plin. ii. 41). Pygmaei miter, Gerane (Ov. Met. vi. 50).

Pygmalion, onis, m. son of Belus, king of Tyros, Sor. He murdered Sichaeus, who was the maternal uncle and the husband of his sister Elissa, better known in history by the name of Dido, on purpose to obtain possession of his wealth. Elissa, shocked at the cruelty of her brother, and fearing the result of his rapacity, put the greater part of her husband's property on board ships, touched at Cyprus, where she admitted a number of women, as wives to those who accompanied her, then proceeding westward, sailed along the African coast, till she had doubled Haemum promontorium, Cape Bon, when she entered the bay on the west of that promontory, and founded the city Carthage. Enraged at her carrying off the wealth of Sichaeus, Pygmalion prepared to pursue her, but desisted at the entreaty of his mother, and the threats of the gods, who declared, by an inspired prophet, that he would not escape with impunity, if he prevented the foundation of a city to be celebrated over the whole world. Adj. Pygmalioneus, a, um. Pygmalionea terra, the lands of Pygmalion, i. e. Phoenicia (Sil. Ital. i. 21). Pygmalionea gens, the Phoenicians (Sil. Ital. vi. 532).—2. A famous statuery, a native of Cyprus, who detested women. He made a most beautiful statue, resembling a virgin, of white ivory, with which he fell violently in love. Venus animated this figure, and Pygmalion married her. By her he had a son whom he called Pāphus, who was the founder of Pāphos, Baffa, q. v. (Ov. Met. x. 243-297).

Pylades, is, m. son of Strōphius and Astōchēa, sister of Agāmēmon. Educated with his cousin Orēstes, he formed a friendship with him, so remarkable for its strength, sincerity, and ardour, that it became proverbial, and has been celebrated by Greeks and Romans, both in prose and verse. When Orēstes q. v. sailed for Taurica Chersōnēsus, the Crimca, from which he brought the statue of Dīana, and procured the deliverance of his sister, Pylades accompanied him in that enterprise, and, for his meritorious services, he gave him his sister Elēctra in marriage, by whom he had two sons, Mēdon and Strōphius. Adj. Pylādēs, a, um. Pylādēs amicitia, sincere friendship.—2. A comedian at Rome, who, by order of the emperor Augustus, was banished from Italy, because he had turned the eyes of the audience on a spectator, by whom he had been hissed (Suet. Aug. 45).

Pyle, arum, f. See Thermopylae. Adj. Pylaeus, a, um. Pylaeum concilium (Liv. xxxi. 32).

Pylēmēus, is, m. a king of the Pāphlāgōnes, who lost his life at Troy by Mēnelāus (Hom. Il. v. 578). Cōrnēlius Nēpos inaccurately says, that Pylēmēus was killed by Pātrocclus (Dat. 2).—2. A son of Mithridates, whom his father appointed king of Pāphlāgōnia, and, in derision of the order of the Roman senate, gave him this name, because it had been the common appellation of the Pāphlāgonian kings (Just. xxxvii. 4).

Pylēus, i, m. one of the commanders of the Trojan Pelasgians (Hom. Il. ii. 842).

Pylartes, æ, e, is, m. a noble Trojan, wounded by Ajax Telāmōnius, at the time he rescued Ulysses, and killed by Pātrocclus (Hom. Il. xi. 489 seq.).

Pylēnē, es, f. a town of Ætōlia, on Sinus Cōrinthiacus, the Gulf of Lepanto, mentioned by Hōmērus (Il. ii. 639). Strābo informs us, that the Æolēnses transferred its site to a more elevated situation, and changed its name to Prōscythium. Scōpilōsa Pylēnē (Stat. Th. iv. 182).

Pylēon, i, a. a town either of Thēssālīa, or on the confines of that country (Liv. xlii. 42).

Pylon, ōnis, m. a man in the Trojan army, killed by the centaur Pōlypetes (Hom. Il. xii. 187).

Pylus, e, Pylus, i, f. Navarin, or, Nabarin, a maritime city of Mēssēnia, a country on the west coast of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morae, opposite the island Sphactēria, which rendered the harbour secure from storms. Pylas, king of Mēgāra, having killed his uncle, Bias, left his kingdom to his son-in-law, Pandion, carried with him part of his subjects, and built this city from him called Pylus. This prince does not seem to have possessed it long, for Nēleus, with a number of the Pēlāsi from Iōleus, carried it by storm, on which he fled to Elis, and built another city of the same name. Under Nēleus and his son Nestor, Pylus rose to eminence and power. Agamēmon promised to give Pylus with other gifts to Achilles, if he returned to the Trojan war (Hom. Il. ix. 153 seq.). Nabarin is now a very inconsiderable place, containing only about sixty houses, inhabited by Greeks. There were three towns of this name, one in Elis, another in Arcādīa, and a third in Mēssēnia; each of them claims the honour of giving birth to Nestor. Hōmērus seems to have considered the one in Elis as the birthplace of Nestor (Il. v. 545). Dodwell says, that there were two in Elis, which have wholly disappeared, and their situation cannot be identified. Adj. Pylus, a, um, of Pylus, of Nestor, &c. Pylus sēnex, Nestor. Pylia avi mēta, the bounds of Nestor's life, i. e. of the longest life (Stat. Syl. v. 3. 255). Terna secula Pylia fāma, the three centuries of Nestor's celebrated age (Tib. iv. l. 112). Pylus rex, Nestor (Juv. Sat. x. 245).

Pyra, æ, f. the spot on mount Cēta, on which the body of Hērclēs was burned; whence probably the name (πύρ, rogius). M. Acilius Glābrio, consul, sacrificed there to Hērclēs in 193 B. C., as he went from Hērclēa Trachīnia to Naupactus, Lepanto (Liv. xxxvi. 50).

Pyræmon, ōnis, m. one of the Cyclops (Virg. Æn. viii. 425). Nudus Pyræmon (Val. Flacc. i. 583).

Pyræmos, i, m. a centaur killed by Cæneus in the battle with the Lapithæ, at the marriage of Pirithōus (Ov. Met. xii. 460).

Pyræchmes, is, m. a brave man, who commanded the Pæones, from Amydon, in the Trojan war, and fell by the weapon of Pātrocclus (Hom. Il. xvi. 287-292).

Pyrællis, idis, f. a woman of the most abandoned character (Suet. Cal. 36).

Pyræmus, i, m. a Babylonian youth, whose story is beautifully told by Ovidius (Met. iv. 55-166). Adj. Pyræmus, a, um. Pyræmēa arbor, the mulberry tree, the fruit of which, according to Ovidius, became black, by the blood of Pyræmus being sprinkled at its root. Before that event, the mulberry was white as snow.

Pyræmus, i, m. the Ghihoun, or, Jeihan, a river in the eastern part of Cilicia, which running southward, falls into the Mediterranean Sea (Tac. Ann. ii. 68).

Pyræsus, i, m. a man in the Trojan army, wounded by Ajax Telāmōnius, at the time he rescued Ulysses (Hom. Il. xi. 489 seq.).

Pyræneus, i, m. sup. Mōntes Pyrænei, and with the poets Pyrēnē, es, f. the Pyrenees or Pyrenian Mountains, extend from the Mediterranean to the Bay of Biscay, a distance of about 294 miles, and separate Gāllia, France, from Hispānia, Spain. They are very steep, of difficult access, and only passable at five places: 1st, From Languedoc to Catalonia; 2d, From Comminge into Arrogon; 3d, At Toraffa; 4th, At Maya and Pampeluna in Navarre; and 5th, At Sebastian in Biscay, which of all the roads across these mountains, is reckoned the easiest. In ancient authors, two etymologies of Pyræneus occur, neither of which is, perhaps, quite satisfactory. The one generally admitted by the poets is, that Pyrēnē, a daughter of Bēbryx, a king in the south of Hispānia, Spain, to avoid the fury of her father, provoked at her being pregnant to Hērclēs, fled to the northern part of that country, and passed the remainder of her days on these mountains, which retain her name. The other derives the appellation from the Greek word denoting fire; in consequence of the shepherds having set on fire the wood which covered these rugged eminences. The wonderful effects said to have been produced by that conflagration, being evidently fabulous, do not deserve to be related. That the story of Pýrēō is a fiction, hardly admits of doubt; and although the other event actually happened, it scarcely accounts for the natives adopting a name from a language spoken by a distant, and most probably, at that time, an unknown people. If, however, the latter be true, the appellation must be, comparatively speaking, but of modern date. From the former, the poets sometimes use Pýrēō to denote this chain of mountains. The burning of a forest on the eastern extremity of the Pyrenees, discovered a rich silver mine. In ancient times, the Tārbēlli g. v. possessed part of these mountains; hence Tibullus, Tārbēlla Pýrēō (xvii. 9). Pýrēō fera mater Gallorum, from the warlike disposition of the inhabitants (Sil. Ital. xvii. 641). Adj. Pýrēneus, a, um. Pýrēneus saltus (Cor. Nep. Hann. 3). Pýrēneum jugum (Flor. ii. 17).

Pýrēō, es, f. a town near the sources of the Danube (Herod. ii. 33).

Pýrēneus, ēi, v. Pýrēneus, i, m. a king of Thracia, Romania, who sheltered the muses during a shower of rain, and afterwards offered them violence. Upon this they raised themselves into the air, and he, having attempted to fly after them, fell from the top of his house, and was killed on the spot (Ov. Met. v. 274 seq.).

Pýres, is, m. a man in the Trojan army, killed by Pátroclus, clad in the armour of Achilles (Hom. Il. xvi. 416).

Pýrētus, i, m. a centaur whom Pérýphas overcame, in the battle with the Lápitae at the marriage of Pirithōus (Ov. Met. xii. 449).

Pýrētus, i, m. See Pōrāta.

Pýrgi, orum, m. an ancient town of Etruria, on the sea-coast, hence Martialis, Littōrēi Pýrgi (xii. 2). Cerēs, Ceretēri, the lands on Minio, the Mignone, Pýrgi and Grāviscae, sent three hundred men to Æneas (Virg. Æn. x. 184). Inh. Pýrgēnses, ium, m. claimed an exemption from sea service, in 193 B. C., which the Roman senate refused (Liv. xxxvi. 3).

Pýrgō, ūs, f. a nurse of the sons of Prīamus (Virg. Æn. v. 645).

Pýrgos, i, f. Pyrgo, a town of Elis, with a port which is called Pyrgois, distant from it between four and five miles.—2. A fort of the Elēi, taken by Philippos, king of Macedōnia, in 210 B. C., after he had been defeated by the combined forces of the Romans, Ætoli and Elēi, with four thousand country people, who had fled there for safety, and twenty thousand cattle (Liv. xxvii. 32).

Pýrphlēgēthōn, ōntis, m. (i. e. burning with fire), one of the infernal rivers, which runs into Achēron (Hom. Od. x. 513).

Pýrrius, i, m. an inhabitant of Cyzicus, Chizico, and father of Bienor. The merits of the son surpassed those of the father (Val. Flacc. iii. 112).

Pýrrois, v. Pýrrois, ēntis, m. one of the horses of the sun. The name is derived from a Greek word signifying fire (Ov. Met. ii. 153).

Pyroses, is, m. a Persian word denoting a conqueror, hence soldiers were called Pirositæ (Amm. Mar. xix. 2).

Pýrrha, v, f. a daughter of Epimēthēs and Pāndōra, was the wife of her cousin Dēucālōn. Some time after their marriage the general deluge happened, from which they alone of all the human race escaped, in a boat or ship, which is said to have been on Parnāsus, Liakura. The rest were drowned, on the waters rising higher than the tops of the mountains, to which, in expectation of saving their lives, they had fled. From her father, Pýrrha was called Epimēthidos, f. See Diluctum. Adj. Pýrrhæus, um. Pýrrhæa saxa, the stones of Pýrrha, i. e. the stones thrown by Pýrrha (Stat. Th. viii. 305).

Pýrrha, v, f. a town of Phōcis (Plat. 410).—2. A city of Māgñēsia, a district of Thessaly (Plin. i. 430). Pýrrhides, m, f. the muses (Ov. Ep. Her. xv. 15).—3. A town of Eubœa, Negropont (Plin. i. 434).—4. Another, of Caria (Plin. i. 528).—5. Another, in Lycia (Plin. i. 562).—6. Another, near Pālūs Mæotis, the Sea of Azoph, which had been destroyed by the sea, before the time at which Plinius wrote (i. 229).—7. Aherona, a town in Lesbos, Mityleni (Plin. i. 622).—8. A village in Liguria.—9. v. Pýrrhē, an island in S. nus Cērāmicus (Plin. i. 618).

Pýrrhēum, i, n. a place in Ambracia (Liv. xxxviii. 5).

Pýrrhia, v, f. the name of a servant in a comedy written by Titinius, represented a drunkensome and thievish (Hor. Ep. i. 13. 14).

Pýrrhias, v, m. prator of the Ætoli in 210 B. C., who was twice defeated at Lamia by Philippos, king of Macedōnia (Liv. xxvii. 30).

Pýrrho, ōnis, m. a Grecian philosopher, son of Plistarchus, was born at Elis, and after attending different philosophers in his own country, travelled to India, and conversed with the Māgi. Universal doubt formed the essence of his philosophy, hence that state of mind was, from him, called Pyrrhonism, and his followers were denominated sceptics, because they inquired and examined into things, but formed no resolutions. Diōgēnes Lāërtius has given a minute account of this philosopher. Adj. Pýrrhōnius, a, um. Pýrrhōniū philosophi, the followers of Pýrrho (Gel. xi. 5).

Pýrrhus, i, m. the son of Achilles, and Dēidāmia, daughter of Lycōmēdes, king of Scyros, Skyro. He was also called Neōptōlēmus (new soldier), either from his joining his countrymen in the last year of the Trojan war, or from his being very young. Cālchas, the soothsayer, declared, that Troy could not be taken without him, on which Ulysseas and Phoenix were commissioned to go to Thēssalia, Thessaly, or, Scyros, Skyro, and bring him to the Grecian camp. At Troy, he displayed his father's valour and cruelty. In wisdom and oratory, he was only surpassed by Nēstor and Ulysseas. On his return to Greece, he settled in Epirus, Lower Albania, and from him the inhabitants were first called Pýrrhides, afterwards Epirōtæ. From the temple of Jupiter in Dōdōna, he carried off Lanassa, grand-daughter of Hērclēs, by whom he had eight children. As soon as they were grown up, he gave some of the daughters in marriage to the neighbouring princes, by whose affinity he acquired great additional strength, and he conferred on Hélēnos the kingdom of the Chæones, and Andrômachê, Hector's widow. Soon after, Orestes, son of Agamêmnon, treacherously killed him at the altar of Apollo, at Delphi, Cæstri (Just. xvii. 3); as he himself had done the venerable Priamus, at that of Jupiter (Paus. iv. 17). Æacides, m. Pÿrrhus, from his being the great-grandson of Æacus (Virg. Æn. iii. 296). —2. Son of Æacides and Phthia, a descendant of Hæcülê by his father, and of Achilles by his mother. In infancy he owed his safety to the faithfulness of his father's servants, by whom he was rescued from the enemies of his parent, and carried to Glaucias, king of Illyriûm. By this monarch, Pÿrrhus was educated, and, at the age of fourteen, placed on the throne of Epirus. Five years after, Nêoptolêmus, who had deposed his father, seized the crown during the absence of Pÿrrhus at the nuptials of a daughter of Glaucias, and it was not until the young king had married Antigônê, daughter of Ptolêmaeus Cêraunus, king of Egypt, that he acquired forces sufficient for meeting the usurper in the field. Either considering the event doubtful, or unwilling to shed the blood of his subjects, Pÿrrhus terminated the quarrel, by admitting Nêoptolêmus to a share of the government. Jealousy, or love of dominion, soon prompted him to put Nêoptolêmus to death, and, not long after, he rendered himself master of Mæcêdônia, which he retained only for a short time. Amidst his schemes of ambition, the Târêntini solicited his assistance against the Romans, and accordingly, leaving the kingdom to his son Ptolêmaeus only fifteen years of age, he set sail with his two sons, Alexander and Hêlênus, for the Italian coast. For this expedition, Ptolêmaeus, king of Egypt, gave him five thousand foot, four thousand horse, and fifty elephants, for a period not exceeding two years. To Antiôchus he applied for money, and to Antigônus for ships, of which the greater part were sunk in a storm, and he with difficulty himself escaped. After reforming the dissolute manners of the luxurious Târêntini, and establishing rigid discipline among their troops, he advanced against the Romans, and gained a victory by means of his elephants. Supposing the defeated enemy would readily accept of any terms of peace, he sent Cinêas q. v. to negotiate a treaty with them; but they refused his terms, and the description which his ambassador gave of their manners and character, afforded little hope of ultimate success. The valour of both armies in next engagement, produced a dreadful carnage, without decisive superiority on either side. The Romans soon looked on the elephants without apprehension, and by throwing torches at their faces, not only rendered them ungovernable, but drove them back on their own troops, which they threw into confusion, and contributed to their defeat. Pÿrrhus, either from love of novelty, or a conviction that he was unable to conquer the Romans, quitted Italy, passed over to Sicily, Sicily, and attacked the Carthaginians, who then tyrannised over the greater part of that island. Success at first rendered him popular, but afterwards losing the favour of the Sicilians, he returned to Italy, where twenty thousand Romans defeated his army of four times that number. Dispirited at this disgraceful inferiority, he set sail for Epirus, where he regained his military character by conquering Mæcêdônia. Sparta baffled his best efforts, and he then marched against Argos, into which he introduced his troops during the night, and was killed, in 274 B. C., by a tile which a woman threw at his head from the wall, when he was on the point of transfixing her son in his own defence. On the spot where he fell, the Argives built a temple to Cêres, by command of the oracle (Paus. i. 13). His son Alexander married his own sister Olymphas, by whom he had Pÿrrhus and Ptolêmaeus (Just. xxviii. 1). In military talents few equalled Pÿrrhus, to whose experience and sagacity Hännibal bore honourable testimony. He wrote a number of books on the best method of encamping (of which Liviûs and Plûtarchus make him the inventor), and of training an army. The Romans extolled his valour and skill in war; he, in return, commended their courage and magnanimity. "Before the triumph over this monarch, you saw," says Florus, "nothing but the cattle of the Volsci, the flocks of the Sâbini, the chariots of the Gauls, or broken arms of the Sâmnites; but now, if you looked at the prisoners, there passed before you the Mólôssi, Thessali, Mæcêdônes, Brüttii, Apûli, and Lucani; if at the pomp, you beheld gold, purple, statues, pictures, and all the finery of the Târêntini" (i. 18). Pÿrrhus made Alexander the Great his model, and endeavoured to surpass him in the qualifications of a general. To strengthen his interest, and promote his plans of ambition, he married a number of wives. Fêrôx Pÿrrhus (Luc. Phar. i. 30). Æacides Pÿrrhus (Claud. xxvi. 125). Pÿrrhus ultor Pÿrrhi per bella (Manil. i. 784). Liviûs does not mention this Pâpirius. —3. Grandson of the former, and son of Alexander by his own sister Olymphas, was king of Epirus, and died in 219 B. C. (Just. xxviii. 1-3).

Pÿthâgôras, m. a celebrated philosopher of antiquity, son of Dêmâriatus, a wealthy merchant of Sâmos (Just. xx. 4); of Mnêsarchus (Diog. in vit. Herod. iv. 95); who, after gaining the prize for wrestling at the Olympic Games, acquiring uncommon celebrity for his proficiency in the elegant arts, and commanding universal esteem by the rectitude of his conduct, travelled over many parts of Asia in quest of knowledge, visited Egypt, and afterwards returned to his native island. Disgusted with its government, probably from its being at that time monarchical, he went over to Itâlia, Italy, and kept a school at Crôto, Cotrone. He imposed on his scholars, silence for the first five years. After that period, they were allowed to converse with him. The doctrine of the Metempsychôsis, or transmigration of souls, he probably learned from the Egyptians. With the philosophers of Egypt, that conviction was connected with a state of rewards and punishments; but, with Pÿthâgôras, it was a mere physical event, wholly independent of all moral considerations. In proof of the reality of the transmigration of souls, he pretended that he distinctly remembered the different bodies which his soul had inhabited, previously to its animating that of Pÿthâgôras. He recollected being first Æthâlides, and then Euphôrbus, the son of Pánthōus. To prove this false assertion, he went to Argos, and, in the temple of Juno, pointed out the shield, with which he had fought in the Trojan war, hanging amidst many others of the same form (Ov. Met. xv. 160). He next became Hermótimus, a fisherman, and last of all Pýthágōras. To prohibit his followers from killing animals and eating their flesh, was a natural consequence of his belief in the Metempsychōsis. Pýthágōras forbade the use of leguminous food, because beans produce wind, and this kind of grain excites laxity. Gellius has given some interesting particulars respecting his mode of teaching (i. 9 seq.). The world is indebted to Pýthágōras for the first correct notion of the Solar system, which was, after the lapse of many centuries, revived and maintained by Copernicus, illustrated by Kepler, and finally demonstrated by Newton. Besides the seven notes of music, he made many important discoveries in arithmetic, geometry, and philosophy. The time and manner of his death are uncertain. According to the consular calendars, he died in 507 B. C. Livius only says, that he taught about Mētipōntum, &c., in the reign of Sērvius Tūlius (i. 18). Justinus informs us that he died at Mētipōntum, that his house was made a temple, and himself worshipped as a god (xx. 4). Pýthágōra successor (Mart. ix. 48). Pýthágōrēi, et Pýthágōrici, orum, m. the followers of Pýthágōras (Cic. and Plin.). Adj. Pýthágōreus, e. Pýthágōrēus, et Pýthágōricus, a, um. Pýthágōrēā sōmula, Pythagorean dreams. Ennius was said to have dreamed, that the soul of Pýthágōras had passed into his body, to which this expression refers (Hor. Epis. ii. 1. 52). Pýthágōrici libri, books, i. e. doctrine, or philosophy of Pýthágōras (Plin. iii. 83). Antias Valērius says, they were found in the coffin of Nūma Pompilius, an assertion which Livius calls a lie, since Nūma lived an hundred years before the philosopher came into Italy (Liv. xl. 29).—2. Son-in-law of Nābis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, and brother of that monarch's wife. When Argos was in the possession of the Lacedæmonians, Pýthágōras had the command, and his bravery convinced the Roman general T. Quinctius Flāminius, that it could not be taken without being greatly injured. His valuable services enabled the king to defend Lacedæmon, against the Roman army commanded by Quinctius in person. Afterwards, Nābis sued for a truce, which he obtained through the agency of Pýthágōras in 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 25—40).—3. A pathic, whom the emperor

Nēro, personating a woman, married as his husband, with all the usual formalities (Tac. Ann. xv. 37).

Pýthēas, æ, m. a nation of Ægina, son of Lampon who gained the prize at Pāncrātium at Nēmēa (Pin. Nem. ii. 5).

Pýthias, æ, m. a character in the play of Mēnāder and Tērēntius (Hor. Art. Poet. 238).—2. The intimate friend of Dāmon q. v.

Pýthium, i, n. a town of Mācēdōnia (Liv. xlii. 53). See Azōrus and Dōliche.—2. A town in Crēta, Candia, where Apōllo was worshipped, as also in Mācēdōnia, hence the name (Steph.).

Pýtho, ōnis, m. a nobleman of Mācēdōnia, whose son Onēsīmus q. v. was obliged to flee his country, on account of his attachment to the Romans, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 16).

Pýthon, ōnis, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, at whose death he received the colonies in India (Just. xiii. 4).

Pýthon, ōnis, acc. a, m. a huge serpent, which is said to have sprung from the mud and stagnant waters after the deluge. It was killed by Apōllo, who appointed the Pythian games (Pýthia, orum, n. Ov. Met. i. 447), to commemorate his victory. Pýthia, æ, f. a priestess of Apōllo, at Delphi, who sat upon a seat called oraculum (cōrtina, by the Latins), whence she proclaimed the oracles, for which reason Apōllo was called Cōrtinipōtens. Pýthia was sometimes killed by the Mephitic vapours, to which she was subjected when receiving the influence of the god, probably carbonic acid gas. Pýthius, i, m. a surname of Apōllo. Adj. Pýthius, et Pýthicus, a, um, relating to Apōllo; oracular. Pýthius axis, the district of Apōllo, i. e. the region of Parnāsus (Claud. xvi. 16). Pýthica vox, a response of the Delphian oracle (Liv. i. 56). Pýthica sortes, the Delphian oracle (Liv. v. 23).

Pýthon, ōnis, m. a ship belonging to the Carthaginians or Sicilians, which the Roman consul Mārcellus burned in an engagement near the coast of Sicily, during the second Punic war. Undiq̃ueq̃ue Pýthon (Sil. Ital. xiv. 572).

Pýxagāthos, i, m. a name given by Māctiālis to Achillas, after he had received from Gābinia, a fortune sufficient to entitle him to rank as a Roman knight. From the epigram as well as from this word, Achillas appears to have been an eminent boxer (vii. 56), and the epigram to have been suggested by Hōmērus (Il. iii. 237).

Quādi, orum, m. the Quadians, a German nation, who inhabited Moravia and part of Austria. When Tacitus wrote, the Quadians possessed some eminence of character, both on account of their number and bravery (Mor. Ger. 42). Ammianus Mārcellinus describes them as a people of little consequence, a proof of their having sunk in power and respectability from the time of the former historian (xxix. 15).

Quādrburgium, i, n. Schenkenschanz; a city of Germany, near the place where the Rhine divides into two streams (Amm. Mar. xviii. 2).

Quæstor, ōris, m. a quaestor, one of the Roman magistrates. The institution of this office may be referred to a very remote period in the history of Rome. At first, there were only two quaestors, to whom was intrusted the care of the treasury. It likewise formed part of their duty, to receive and expend the public money, and to exact payment of the finer which the people had imposed. They prosecuted individuals accused of treason, in the performance of which duty they are first mentioned by Livius (ii. 41), and they punished those who were condemned as guilty of that crime. In point of dignity, their office was inferior to that of praetor, being the first step of preferment, which entitled the holder to admission into the senate. Like the other important offices in the Roman state, patricians only for a considerable time were eligible to the quaestorship. In 418 B. C., however, the number of quaestors was doubled, and it became at the same time legal for plebeians to aspire at this dignity. The city quaestors continued to discharge the same duties as formerly, and the two newly-elected accompanied the consuls to their provinces, where they took care that provisions and pay were furnished to the army, kept the money deposited by the soldiers, exacted the taxes and tribute of the empire, and sold the spoils taken in war. The former were called Quaestores Urbani, the latter Quaestores Provinciales, or Militares. The number of quaestors continued the same till 270 B. C., when other four were added. Sulla afterwards increased the number to twenty, and Julius Caesar to forty. During the reign of the emperors, the changes in regard to the quaestors became so frequent, as to render even their enumeration impossible. Quaestura, q. f. the office of quaestor; the quaestorship. Proquaestor, q. f. one appointed by the governor, in room of a provincial quaestor. Adj. Quaestorius, a, um, of, or belonging to, a quaestor. Quaestorium fori, the quaestor's tent in the camp, also the place in the province where his accounts were kept.

Quercens, entis, m. a Rutullan, who, with Aequicolaus, Tmarus, and Haemon, rushed into the city of Lavinus, on the opening of a gate by Pandarus and Bitias, and the whole either fled or lost their lives in the threshold (Virg. En. ix. 684).—2. A son of Crista, who, with his father and four of his brothers, fell at the battle of Cannae by the hand of Hannibal (Sil. Ital. x. 131).

Quercetulanus, a, um. Quercetulanus mons, one of the hills on which Rome stood, which had this name from being covered with oaks; afterwards called Caelius, from Coelus Vibenna, a chief of the Etrurians, who brought assistance to the Romans under the monarchy, and had that hill assigned for the residence of himself and countrymen; but by which of the kings is uncertain (Tac. Ann. iv. 65).

Quinctianus, i, m. an intimate friend of Martialis (l. 53 seq.).

Quinctil, orum, m. a Roman clan, originally from Alba, whom Tullus Hostilius, the third king of Rome, admitted into the senate, when he demolished their city, and removed the inhabitants to the Coelian mount (Liv. i. 36). Adj. Quinctius, a, um. Quinctia gens (Liv. iii. 12).

Quinctilianus, i, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who reported to the senate an account of a book of the Sibyl, under the emperor Tiberius (Tac. Ann. vi. 12). See Calpurnius Gallus.

Quinctilius Varus, Quinctili Vari, m. the common friend of Virgilius and Horatius, whose death the latter laments, in an ode adressed to the former (l. 24). The poet endeavours to diminish the grief of his friend, by the most soothing strains of affectionate sympathy, and, having hinted at the impropriety of unavailing regret, gradually directs his mind to the absolute necessity of submitting to the decrees of fate. Varus is probably the same person whom Horatius extols as an able critic, who gave his opinion without disguise, and, if not followed, ceased to speak on the subject (Art. Poet. 438).—2. Son of P. Quinctilius Varus and Claudia Pulchra. He married Sulla, daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina. Domitius Afer and P. Dolabella accused him in the year 27, with the view of obtaining his large possessions, but the senate put off the cause, until the emperor, then absent, should return to Rome, and this delay proved the safety of Quinctilius (Tac. Ann. iv. 66).

Cn. Quinctilius, Cn. Quinctili, m. a Roman patrician, who was created dictator in 331 B. C., for the purpose of driving a nail, an expiation which had formerly calmed the distracted minds of the public, and it was hoped would have the same effect at that period, when so many matrons had been detected in preparing and administering poison (Liv. viii. 18).

M. Quinctilius Varus, M. Quinctili Vari, m. elected a military tribune, with consular power, in 402 B. C. That year the military tribunes were increased to eight (Liv. v. 1).—2. Son of P. Quinctilius Varus, a youth of great spirit, who led on the cavalry in an engagement with Mago, in 205 B. C. The victory would have been complete on the side of the Romans, had not the Carthaginian general brought up his elephants, at the smell, sight, and snorting of which, the horses took fright (Liv. xxx. 18).

P. Quinctilius Varus, P. Quinctili Vari, m. elected a praetor in 205 B. C., and obtained Ariminum with two legions. In the territory of the Insures Galli, he defeated Mago, the Carthaginian general, wounded himself, and killed five thousand of his men (Liv. xxix. 38 seq.).—2. A Flamen of Mars, who died in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 18).—3. Elected praetor in 168 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 44). From the subsequent book of this historian being lost, nothing more of this man's history is known.—4. Son of Sextus Quinctilius Varus, who, after the defeat of his party, killed himself. Velleius Paterculus says, he was descended from a family more noble than illustrious, a man of a mild disposition, of peaceful habits, sluggish both in body and mind, more accustomed to the idleness of the camp than to active warfare. Sŕia gave evidence of his love of money, as he plundered that country, for he poor entered it rich, and he rich left it poor. He next obtained the government of Germany, and possessed none of the qualities fitted to command so numerous, restless, and warlike a people; but, incurring their hatred and contempt, fell with his whole army into a snare, contrived by two of their generals, who cut off his whole army, consisting of three legions, and about the same number of auxiliaries. Finding it impossible to escape, after being wounded, he stabbed himself, showing, as Paterculus says, that he had more courage for meeting death, than engaging in battle (ii. 117—120). Florus mentions that after his body had been buried, the Germans dug it up, having previously mutilated it in the most barbarous manner (iv. 12). He married Claudia Pulchra, by whom he had Quinctilius Varus q. v. Adj. Variānus, a. um. Variāna clades, the destruction of Varus and his army (Suet. Aug. 23). Roman authors frequently mention this disaster (Tac. Ann. i. 10). Variānus exercitus (Tac. Ann. ii. 7). Variāna cades (Suet. Aug. 49).

Sextus Quinctilius Varus, Sexti Quinctilii Vari, m. was elected consul in 453 B. C., a year of tranquillity with the tribunes of the people, but of great mortality both in the city and country. Quinctilius and four of the plebeian tribunes died (Liv. iii. 32).—2. Son of P. Quinctilius Varus, consul in 13 B. C., a quaestor of senatorian rank, who was at Corfinium, St. Perino, at the time the gates of that city were opened to Caesar. Having obtained his liberty from that general, he went to Africa, and was in the army of Attius Varus, when Cúrio brought from Sicily the forces which had revolted to Caesar, at the town above-mentioned. Sextus Quinctilius Varus attempted to seduce them from Cúrio, but without success. After the battle of Philippi, he killed himself (Cass. B. C. i. 23 seq.).

T. Quinctilius Varus, T. Quinctilii Vari, m. a lieutenant-general of considerable merit under C. Cálpurnius praetor in Spain, in 187 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 31).

Quinctius, a. um. Quinctia gens, a Roman clan, originally from Alba (Liv. iii. 12).

Quinctius Atticus, Quinctii Attici, m. a Roman who, with Alfenus Cæcina, held the consulship for the two last months of the year 69. The haughty style of his edicts, injurious to Vitellius, and favourable to Vespasianus, exposed Quinctius to the hatred of the soldiers, who made him prisoner. The emperor sheltered him from the fury of the populace, who demanded his life, considering himself bound in gratitude, to protect a man who voluntarily avowed that he himself had set the capitol on fire, and by that confession, or well-timed lie, says Tacitus, exonerated the Vitellian party from the guilt of the destructive conflagration (Hist. iii. 73–75).

Quinctius Cértus, Quinctii Certi, m. a Roman knight, whom Décimus Páccius, governor of Corsica, put to death because he objected to declaring in favour of Vitellius, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. ii. 16).

Quinctius Crispinus, Quinctii Crispini, m. a criminal intimate of Júlia, daughter of Augustus (Vel. Pat. ii. 100).

C. Quinctius Cincinnátus, C. Quinctii Cincinnāti, m. a noble Roman, elected a military tribune with consular authority in 376 B. C. (Liv. vi. 32).

C. Quinctius Flámininus, C. Quinctii Fláminii, m. elected praetor, in 179 B. C., and to his lot fell the foreign jurisdiction (Liv. xli. 8).

Décus Quinctius, Décii Quinctii, m. a man of obscure birth, but of great military fame, acquired by many brave actions, commanded a Roman fleet of twenty ships stationed at Rhégium, Reggio, in 212 B. C. In an engagement with the Tarentine fleet, Nico Perco drove a spear through his body, on which he fell lifeless into the sea (Liv. xxvi. 39).

Kæso Quinctius, Kæsonis Quinctii, m. a youth of great resolution, of high birth, of uncommon size, and prodigious strength, to which qualities, “the gift of the gods,” says Livius, he added many warlike accomplishments. With undaunted intrepidity, he alone withstood the attacks of the tribunes of the people, and the whole fury of the populace, when the former attempted to pass the law of Tércéntillus, in 461 B. C. These plebeian magistrates, convinced that so law could be carried, whilst he was alive, appointed a day for his trial, resisting the entreaties of almost all the eminent men of the state, in his favour. This intercession induced his prosecutors to accept of bail, instead of putting him in prison, and it is the first instance, on record, of a forfeited bail being applied to the use of the state. On the night preceding his trial, he went into voluntary banishment among the Etrúsci, a punishment which the tribunes deemed unsatisfactory, and therefore exacted the bail with such severity, that they reduced to poverty his father L. Quinctius Cincinnátus q. v. (Liv. iii. 11–13).

Kæso Quinctius Flámininus, Kæsonis Quinctii Fláminii, m. appointed a démurvir, to contract for the building of a temple to Concord at Rome, in 219 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 33).

L. Quinctius, L. Quinctii, m. a military tribune, who commanded a detachment, which was to seize on the part of Palæpólis possessed by the Sámmites, in 325 B. C. (Liv. viii. 25).—2. A Roman opposed by Lúcius (Sal. Frag.).

L. Quinctius Cápitolinus, L. Quinctii Cápitolini, m. a military tribune with consular authority, in 384 B. C., in the same year nominated master of the horse by A. Córnelius Cássus (Liv. vi. 11).

L. Quinctius, L. Quinctii, m. surnamed Cincinnátus, because he twisted his hair into circles, or curls (in cincinnos), was the father of Kæso Quinctius, and reduced to poverty by the tribunes exacting, with the utmost severity, the bail for his sons. After his property was sold, he lived, for a long time, in an obscure village beyond Tiber, the Tremit. On Minúcius, the consul, with his army being besieged by the Æqui, Quinctius was nominated dictator, in 458 B. C., two years after he had been consul, and the deputies sent by the senate to inform him of his appointment, found him employed in making a ditch, or ploughing his small farm of four acres, afterwards called Præta Quinctia. Mutual salutations having passed, he was requested to take his gown which he had hid, his wife Racilia bring out, and which, after wiping off the sweat and dust, he put on. The deputies then congratulated him on the dictatorship, and informed him of the alarming condition of the army. Government had prepared a vessel for him, and on his landing at the other side, he was first met by his three sons, then by his other relations and friends, and afterwards by the greater part of the patricians. Before daylight next morning, he repaired to the forum and named L. Tárquilius, a patrician, master of the horse. Attended by him, he went to the assembly of the people, proclaimed a cessation of civil business, ordered the shops to be shut throughout the city, forbade every one to attend to private affairs, and ordered all, who were of the military age, to muster under arms in Campus Martius before sunset, with prepared victuals for five days, and twelve palisades each. Those who were rendered unfit for service by age, he ordered to dress victuals for the soldiers who lived near them, while they were procuring arms and palisades. His command being punctually obeyed, he set out at the head of the legions, and the master of the horse at the head of the cavalry, both in order of battle. At midnight they arrived at Algidum. Aglio. He soon encompassed the camp of the enemy by a trench. The Abqui, finding themselves attacked on both sides, sued for peace. The dictator ordered their general and other leaders to be brought to him in chains. The army he sent under the yoke, as an acknowledgment that their nation was conquered. He degraded the consul L. Minucius, by obliging him to lay aside the title of consul and take that of Magister, and to his army he allowed no part of the spoil of the enemy's camp. Notwithstanding that affront, the army of Minucius voted him a golden crown of a pound weight, and at his departure saluted him as their Patron. The senate commanded, that Quinctius should enter Rome in triumph, without altering the form of his march. The generals of the enemy were led before his chariot; the military ensigns adorned the procession, and the army, loaded with spoil, followed the dictator. After sixteen days, he resigned the dictatorship, which he would have done sooner, had it not been on account of the trial of M. Volsenius, by whose false evidence his son Kasso had been forced from his native country. He was a candidate for the second triumvirate, but the intrigue of Appius Claudius prevented his appointment. On all occasions, he showed his moderation, aversion to cruelty, and to violence. He was appointed dictator after his eightieth year, by P. Quinctius Barbatus Capitollinus, to crush the ambitious designs of Sp. Maelius. In his address to the people before his resignation of that office, he justified Abilia Servilius, in weighing against the traitor Sp. Maelius, and ordered his house to be levelled, his effects to be sold, and the produce to be deposited in the public treasury (Liv. iii. 12—iv. 15). Florus calls him simply L. Quinctius (iv. 11). Adf. Quinctius, a. ut. Quinctia pata (Liv. iii. 29).—2. Son of the former, who, says Livius, was worthy of his father. Besides being once master of the horse, he was thrice elected a military tribune with consular power (Liv. iv. 16—44).—3. Elected a military tribune with consular power in 385 B. C., and, at the recommendation of M. Furius Camillus, one of his colleagues, raised an army to guard the city, out of those who were exempted from service, and those who were above the military age, in consequence of the state being engaged in a war with the Etrurians. During the second time he held that office, in conjunction with Servius Sulpicius, he recovered Tusculum, Erasedit from the enemy (Liv. vi. 6—43).

L. Quinctius Capitollinus, L. Quincti Capitollini, m. a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority in 384 B. C. (Liv. vi. 11).

L. Quinctius Crispinus, L. Quincti Crispini, m. elected praetor in 185 B. C., and obtained the north of Spain for his province, where he joined his troops with C. Calpurnius Piso, whom the Lusitani and Celtiberi defeated; but they were afterwards completely overthrown, and unable to face the Romans. For this success, Quinctius had the honour of a triumph. He was appointed a commissioner for planting colonies at Mutina, Moesa, and Parma, Parma, in 185 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 6—55).

L. Quinctius Flamininus, L. Quincti Flaminii, m. created an augur on the death of P. Furius Philus, in 216 B. C. He died in 172 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 2—xliii. 11).—2. After being curule edile in 203 B. C., he next year was chosen praetor, and appointed to command the fleet in Mare Aegeum, the Archipelago, where he was joined by Attalus, king of Asia. These naval officers acted with great energy, annoyed the enemy, took a number of towns, and spread a general alarm along the coast. The valuable services of Quinctius retained him in the command of the fleet, until a treaty was concluded with Philippos, king of Macedonia. In 194 B. C., after a keen contest, he obtained the consulship with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, when they both proceeded to the north of Italy, desolating the countries through which they went. In particular, Quinctius ravaged the district of the Ugures, obtained a great quantity of spoil, took many prisoners, and recovered several of the Romans, who had been in the hands of the enemy. M. Porcius Cato and L. Valerius Flaccus, consuls, expelled him from the senate, in 186 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 4 seq.), for an act of wanton cruelty, recorded by Valerius Maximus (ii. 9).

Q. Quinctius, Q. Quincti, m. a military tribune with consular power, elected in 308 B. C. (Liv. vi. 36).

Q. Quinctius Cincinnatus, Q. Quincti Cincinnati, m. elected a military tribune with consular power, first in 414 B. C., and a second time, in 404 B. C. (Liv. iv. 49—61).

T. Quinctius, T. Quincti, m. elected a military tribune with consular power, in 367 B. C. (Liv. vi. 38).—2. A man of patrician rank, who had been obliged to discontinue the profession of arms, in which he had obtained great fame, in consequence of his being rendered lame by a wound in the foot. A body of soldiers, who had mystified, plundered the Alban territory, and inclosed their camp with a rampart, under the hill of Alba Longa, compelled him to become their leader, in 344 B. C. At his recommendation, they submitted to the dictator M. Valerius Corvus (Liv. vii. 39—41).—3. One of the three commissioners for conducting a colony to Cales, and dividing the lands, in 333 B. C. (Liv. viii. 16).—4. A propraetor appointed to have the command at Farcentum, Farcento, in 206 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 13).

T. Quinctius, T. Quincti, m. surnamed Barbatus Capitollinus, a noble Roman, who was six times consul, first in 471 B. C., when he acted the part of a prudent magistrate in soothing the populace, enraged at the patricians, for which he had the thanks of the senate. Between him and the troops a mutual contest seemed to exist, who should excel in acts of civility and kindness. Naturally of a mild disposition, the severity and harshness of his colleague Appius Claudius Sabinus, led him to indulge in humour, rather than irritate, and provoke, the populace, and the soldiery. In war he displayed both activity and skill, by which he benefited the state, and secured the esteem of his countrymen. An enemy to injustice, he defended Keso Quinctius, and attacked Volscius, by whose evidence that noble youth had been condemned. Notwithstanding his great popularity, he failed in his canvass for the decemvirate. Wherever his talents could benefit the state, there he appeared; whether in office or a private person. The enemy dreaded his bravery, and the Romans esteemed his worth. Love of country, respect for justice, hatred of cruelty, and fearless intrepidity formed the prominent features in his character. His influence with the people was always employed in behalf of the persecuted, nor did he ever prostitute his talents to support a faction, or encourage rivalry among his fellow-citizens. All his speeches had a direct tendency to allay contention, and to promote the tranquillity of the state (Liv. ii. 56 seq.).—2. Son of the former, appointed consul, 421 B. C., with Númerius Fabius Vibulānus, and afterwards a military tribune with consular authority, in 404 B. C. (Liv. iv. 43, 61).

T. Quinctius Cāpitōlinus, T. Quinctii Cāpitōlini, m. was appointed a military tribune with consular power, in 394 B. C., and nominated master of the horse by A. Cōrnēlius Cōssus, in the same year. The dictator, who had been created in consequence of the Volsci having taken up arms, completely defeated them in the first engagement, in which Quinctius commanded the cavalry, and discharged the duty of a brave and active officer (Liv. vi. 11—13).

T. Quinctius Cincinnātus, T. Quinctii Cincinnāti, m. (surnamed Pēnnus), son of L. Quinctius Cincinnātus, was made consul in 431 B. C., with C. Jūlius Mēto, with whom he violently contended, and both opposed the senate, refusing to name a dictator against the Æqui and Volsi, until compelled by a decree of the tribunes of the people, when Quinctius, to whom it had fallen by lot, to which they had recourse from their disagreeing in this also, named his own father-in-law, A. Pōstūmius Tūbērtus. During the war, Quinctius showed great spirit, judgment, and bravery, as a lieutenant-general under the dictator. In 428 B. C. he obtained the consulship for the second time, and two years after, was appointed a military tribune with consular power. C. Fūrius, M. Pōstūmius, and Quinctius, on enlisting soldiers, marched to Vēii, where their disagreement gave advantages to the enemy, who gained a victory over the Romans. Māmērcus Æmilius was then nominated dictator, under whom Quinctius displayed the same military qualities which had rendered him eminent, when commanded by the last dictator. To his gallantry under these commanders he owed his acquittal, when brought to trial for the loss of the battle at Vēii. Respect for the memory of his father, and the intercession of T. Quinctius Bārbātus Cāpitōlinus, had great influence with the people, and contributed to procure a favourable sentence (Liv. iv. 26—41).—2. (Surnamed Prænēstīnus), a noble Roman, who was twice elected a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, first in 387 B. C., and a third time in 383 B. C. Four years after, the Prænēstīni took up arms against the Romans, on which he was created dictator, marched directly against the enemy, whom he conquered at Allia, plundered their camp, and afterwards took eight of their towns. This brave warrior carried Vēlitrē by storm; Prænēstē then capitulated, whence he received the surname of Prænēstīnus. Thus by one pitched battle, he took from the enemy two camps, and nine towns, after which he returned in triumph to Rome, carrying with him from Prænēstē a statue of Jūpiter Iaphrator, which he dedicated in the temple between the recesses of Jūpiter and Minērvā, with a tablet fixed under it, on which was this inscription: "Jūpiter and all the gods granted this, that T. Quinctius, dictator, should take nine towns." On the twentieth day after his appointment, he resigned the dictatorship (Liv. vi. 4—29).

T. Quinctius Crispinus, T. Quinctii Crispini, m. after commanding the fleet, under M. Claudius Mārcellus, and holding the praetorship, when Cāpua became his province, was elected consul with the same Claudius, in 210 B. C. The senate decreed Italy a province to both. Quinctius had formed the design of besieging Lōeri, but the approach of Hannibal induced him to relinquish that plan, and join his colleague in Apūlia, where they both fell into one of Hannibal's ambuscades, in which Claudius was killed, and Quinctius severely wounded. The body and ring of Claudius being in the possession of the enemy, Quinctius suspected, that he would practise deception by means of it, sent notice to the neighbouring states, which put them on their guard, and by this precaution prevented the Sālāpitāni from being deceived into a surrender by Hannibal. The senate, on being informed of his colleague's death, sent, at his own request, men of prudence, with whom he could converse on public matters. Unable to go to Rome to hold the elections, he nominated a dictator, and, towards the end of the year, he died of his wounds, according to some in Cāmpānia, and, according to others, at Tārēntum, Taranto. Both consuls died this year (210 B. C.), without any memorable engagement, a circumstance which had not occurred in any preceding war (Liv. xxiv. 39 seq.). To him Silius Italicus refers (xv. 345 seq.).—2. An intimate friend of Bādus, a Campanian, who challenged him to single combat, in 214 B. C. See Bādus.

T. Quinctius Flāminius, T. Quinctii Flāminii, m. a Roman of great distinction, whose name first occurs in Livius among the triumviri, appointed for completing the number of colonists at Vēnūsia, Venosa, in 202 B. C. M. Fūlvius and M. Cūrius, tribunes of the people, opposed him in his canvass for the consulship, in 200 B. C., because he had only held the office of quaestor, and they maintained, that the edileship and quaestorship were despised, in consequence of the nobles passing over the intermediate offices, and rising, at once, from the lowest to the highest. The matter coming before the senate, a decree to this effect was passed, that, when a man stood candidate for an office, which by the laws he was entitled to hold, the people had the right of choosing whom they pleased. In this decision, the plebeian tribunes acquiesced, and Quinctius obtained the consulship with Sextus Ælius Pætus, that year; Macedonia became his province by lot. Having expiated the prodigies, which had been reported, and completed the levies by men of approved courage, chiefly from Spain or Africa, he set out for Greece, and, by forced marches, reached the Roman camp. Although the position of Philippus, from its strength and difficulty of access, appeared impregnable, Quinctius resolved to make an attack, but waited a favourable opportunity. After the hostile armies had looked at each other for forty days, a herdsman of Chæropus, prince of the Epirôtæ, offered to conduct the Roman army by a safe road, to a place over the head of the Macedonian king. On the third day, the troops, under this guide, attacked Philippus from the heights in the rear, whilst the consul charged him in the front. This onset soon put Philippus to flight. His army must have been wholly cut off, had not the Roman infantry been encumbered with the weight of their armour, and the cavalry impeded by the narrowness of the passes. From these causes, the loss on the part of Philippus did not exceed two thousand men. Quinctius then entered Thessaly without opposition, took Phalœra, which he plundered and burned; Métropôlia and Pieria then surrendered. Philippus encamped at Tēmpē, Tēmbi, which the bravery of the Macedonians defended against the vigorous efforts and continued perseverance of the Romans. Obligated at last to raise the siege, Quinctius pitched on Anticyra, a town of Phœcis, on Sinus Ambracius, the Gulf of Lepanto, as affording the best lodgings to the legions during winter, of which he obtained possession with little difficulty. Ambrysus, and afterwards Hympholis, surrendered, but Daulis he carried by stratagem. The allies of Rome, aided by L. Quinctius, the consul's brother, prevailed on the Achai to join them, and of this acquisition the siege of Corinth was the immediate consequence. Quinctius was continued in command, through L. Opplius and Q. Fuluius, tribunes of the people, who alleged, that recalling the commanders annually was an unnecessary protraction of the war. The senate assented, for the fact could not be denied, and sent strong reinforcements both of land and sea forces to Quinctius. At the request of Philippus, a conference between him and the Roman general took place, without producing any beneficial consequence, for the king, with the concurrence of Quinctius, sent ambassadors to the senate, and the senate referred the matter wholly to Quinctius, who refused to receive any embassy from Philippus, unless announcing the retreat of his forces from Greece. Quinctius procured a cessation of arms with Nabis, tyrant of the Lacedæmonians, formed an alliance with the Boeoti, and, after various movements, brought Philippus to a general engagement at Cynœcephalæ, where the bravery of his troops, and the excellence of his tactics, gained a splendid victory over that monarch, who immediately desired peace, which Quinctius granted, on condition that he should give his son Dēmétrius and some of his friends as hostages, and pay two hundred talents. The senate ratified this treaty. Quinctius then caused it to be proclaimed at the Isthmian games, that the Roman people and T. Quinctius Flamininus their general, having conquered the Macedonians and Philippus their king, ordered the Corinthii, Phœcenses, Lœcœnes, Magnètes, Thessalii, Perthœbii, Achai, Phthiotes and the island Eubœa, to be free and independent, and to enjoy their own laws, in 198 B. C. This measure rendered Quinctius very popular among the Greeks, who scarcely believed their ears, when they heard the freedom of their states declared. That gallant general gave it as his opinion, that every part of Greece ought to be free, a sentiment which raised his character above that of a mere soldier, or selfish Roman; but the ten commissioners, joined with him in the pacification, entertained opinions more consonant with the practice of their countrymen, and thereby thwarted his plans, which would have exalted the Romans both in the estimation of surrounding nations, and of posterity. In the victory which he gained over Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, he displayed great moderation, judgment, and bravery. The senate decreed a supplication of three days, for the successful termination of that war. Having spent the winter at Elatæa, the head quarters of the Roman army, in reversing the arbitrary changes introduced into the different states of Greece, by Philippus, he went early in spring to Corinth, whither he had summoned a general convention, assigned reasons for his various plans, recommended harmony among themselves, and exhorted them to guard and protect the liberty which they had now obtained. His speech, which was heard with tears of gratitude and joy, deeply impressed the hearts of that ingenious and polished people. At his request, the Greeks readily agreed to seek out, and ransom the Romans whom Hannibal had sold, and were then living amongst them, because their countrymen would not ransom them. In Achæia they appear to have been no fewer than fourteen hundred. What the numbers were in the other districts of Greece, history does not state. The war in Greece having been brought to a termination, Quinctius began to march his troops across the country, embarked at Oricum; Rio, landed at Brundisium, Brindisi, and from that town the captured effects formed a train almost as long as that of the troops. The senate decreed him a triumph, which continued for three days, during which he exhibited an immense quantity of armour, brazen and marble statues, of which he had taken more from Philippus than from the states of Greece, a prodigious quantity of gold and silver in coin, plate, and bullion, golden crowns, the gifts of the states, Dēmétrius, a son of Philippus, Arinênes, son of Nabis, besides many noble prisoners. Before the senate, he recommended the measures which his own mind had approved in Greece. In consequence of his popularity, the senate sent him ambassador, with other three, to that country, in 194 B. C., to prevent the states joining with the Ætoli and Antiochus, king of Syria, against the Romans. In his diplomatic capacity, he displayed the same neutrality, equity, justice, and interest in the tranquillity of Greece, which had marked his conduct, when he commanded the Roman forces there against Philippus. In 191 B. C., he was elected censor with M. Claudius Mærceilius, in preference to several very powerful candidates, and they discharged the duties of that office with great mildness. The feeling heart recoiled with grief, from the last mission to which the senate appointed this illustrious Roman. Prusias, king of Bithynia, had incurred the displeasure of the Romans, both by making war on their ally Eumenes, king of Asia, and by affording protection to Hannibal, the inveterate enemy of their state. Although Livius attempts to shade the conduct of his countrymen in persecuting this unrivalled general, yet there can be no doubt that his death was the chief object of the embassy. To gratify the revenge of the Romans, whose displeasure he dreaded, Prusias beset with armed men every outlet from the residence of Hannibal, who, finding escape impracticable, after slightly hinting at the meanness and degeneracy of the Romans, who envied a man of seventy, the remainder of his days, and imploring on the head of Prusias the wrath of the gods, the avengers of violated hospitality, he drank a cup of poison, and expired. Quintus headed the troops which encompassed the fort of Hannibal, and his return to Rome removed all uneasy apprehension from the minds of his countrymen, which could arise from the plans of the veteran Carthaginian, without considering the indelible stain which that execrable action affixed to their national character, and the degradation to which they had subjected Quintus; a gallant general, by assigning to him the work of an assassin (Liv. xxxi. 49 seq.). 2. Celebrated games in honour of his father, which lasted four days, in 175 B. C. He, C. Licinius Nerva, and M. Cæcilius Metellus conducted home the son and other hostages of Cotys, king of Thræcia, in 169 B. C. Next year he was appointed an augur, in room of C. Claudius (Liv. xli. 28 seq.). 3. Elected consul in 125 B. C., with L. Cæcilius Metellus Balcæricus. By order of the senate, Carthage was rebuilt that year, and a colony of Roman citizens established there (Eutrop. iv. 21).

T. Quintus Hirpinus, T. Quintus Hirpinus, m. a Roman, to whom Horatius addresses two poems (Od. ii. 11. Ep. i. 16). In the former, the poet dissuades him from the study of politics, and recommends the pursuit of pleasure. It is probable, from his surname, that he was descended from the Hirpini, a people bordering on the Samnites, since none of the Quinctian clan had the surname of Hirpinus. Nothing of his character is known, except what may be collected from these two poems of the Venusian bard.

T. Quinctus Pænnus Cæpitollinus Crispinus, T. Quinctus Pænnus Cæpitollinus Crispinus, m. a Roman, who was appointed dictator in 360 B. C., and Ser. Cornélius Maluginensis, master of the horse, in consequence of a war with the people of Tibur, Tivoli; Livius rather thinks of a war with the Gauls, which seems probable, since he marched against that nation at the third stone on the Salarian road; but no general engagement ensued, because of the Gauls quitting their camp, as soon as their champion had been killed by T. Mælius, son of L. Mælius Imperatorius. Next year, Quinctus Servilius Ahalla, dictator, nominated T. Quinctus Pænnus, master of the horse. Six years after, he obtained the consulship with M. Fabius Ambustus (3). Livius, in one place, calls him T. Quinctus Pænnus, and in others, simply T. Quinctus. Cæpitollinus Nepos writes T. Quinctus Cæpitollinus (Frag.). Appointed to the command of an army in 350 B. C., he marched against the Falisci, who did not meet him in the field, and, therefore, he desolated their country, which compelled them to sue for peace. He is probably the man whom M. Furius Camillus appointed master of the horse, in 348 B. C., although some appear to consider them different persons (Liv. vii. 9-22).

Quinctus, i. m. a man to whom Milius addresses several of his epigrams (Sil. ii. 11 &c.).

Quintia, æ. f. a beautiful girl mentioned by Cæcilius, who denies that she possessed all the requisites of a perfect beauty, since she wanted elegance and wit (lxxxvi.).

Quintilla, æ. f. a woman beloved by Cæcilius, who lamented her early death in an elegy now lost (Catul. xxvi. 6). Propertius calls her Mæra, probably from her having died young (ii. 34. 90).

Quintilla, æ. f. a woman of immoral conduct (Juv. Sat. vii. 75).

Quintillus, i. m. brother of the emperor M. Aurélius Claudius, commonly called Claudius Secundus, whom he succeeded, but reigned only seventeen days. Eutropius ascribes to him the qualities of remarkable moderation and uncommon politeness, and considers him at least equal, if not superior, to his brother (ix. 12).

Quintus, i. m. an acquaintance of Cæcilius, to whom he addresses one of his poems (lxxxii.).

Quintus, i. m. a common prænomen among the Romans.

Quirinialis, is, m. a bachelor of irregular habits (Mart. i. 85).

Quirinus, i. m. a Roman killed by Vögesus, in the first battle with Hannibal, on his arrival in Italy, as he made an attack against the Carthaginian general (Sil. Ital. iv. 192).

P. Quirinus, P. Quirinus, m. the husband of Emilia Lepida, who attempted to impose on him a supposititious child. Acts of atrocity were added to the accusation, and, after she had been repudiated, he persecuted her with inveterate resentment. The conduct of the husband excited commiseration in behalf of the wife, though both infamous and guilty, and provoked against him the execration of the public. Old and childless, but possessed of great wealth, he had formed this connexion probably from motives of ambition, or in hope of offspring; and, instead of respect from the rank of his wife, or children to inherit his property, her immoral conduct aggravated his disappointment, and embittered his advanced years (Tac. Ann. iii. 22).

Quirinus, i. m. the name of Rômulus, after his deification (Flor. i. 1), derived perhaps from Quis, a spear, or from Cæres (Liv. i. 13), iam, f. the capital of the Sabines, a people of Itàlia, Italy, to the E. of Rome. The barbarous age in which he was born, and the national vanity of the Romans, who boasted of their high descent, render the early part of his history somewhat uncertain and fabulous. According to ancient authors, he was the son of Rhēa Sŷlvā (sometimes called Ilia, from whom Ovidius calls him Iliades), a vestal virgin, the daughter of Nūmītor, king of Alba Lōnga, and the twin-brother of Rēmus, hence, Jūno calls him her grandson (Hor. Od. iii. 3. 31), and adds the epithet Invictum, hated, i. e. hatred towards her grandson. This princess, to extenuate her guilt (see Vesta), and to give dignity to her sons, declared Mars the god of war was their father. Amūlius, who had dispossessed his brother Nūmītor, killed his sons, and made his daughter Rhēa a vestal, to secure the crown to himself and his descendants, ordered his niece to be burned alive, and her infants thrown into Tiber, the Tevere. The river at that time being swelled above its banks, the persons appointed to execute this cruel mandate, could not reach the main current. The cradle or trough, in which the twins were exposed, floated for some time, and, when the river subsided, was left on dry ground. They were afterwards suckled by a wolf, until found by Faustūlus, the king's shepherd, who carried them to his house, where they were brought up as his children. Their juvenile years were spent in the humble employment of feeding cattle. After they were grown up, Rēmus being taken prisoner by the servants of Amūlius, Faustūlus, anxious to preserve the captive, disclosed to Rōmūlus the truth respecting their birth. He, with the assistance of a few daring and resolute young men, killed Amūlius, delivered his brother, and restored their grandfather to the throne. After this event, the two formed a design of building a city on the hills where they had spent the early part of their life. From its being unknown which of the two was the elder, they had recourse to augury, to decide which of them should have the honour of founding and governing the new city. To Rēmus appeared six, and to Rōmūlus twelve, ravens. The former claimed the sovereignty from the priority of his omen, and the latter, from the number of the birds. Each being saluted king by his own party, a battle ensued, in which Rēmus was killed. Others say, that he fell by the hand of Rōmūlus, because he had in contempt leaped over the wall which the latter was building. The measures which Rōmūlus adopted to increase the number of his subjects, the plans which he formed for the government of the city, and the laws which he enacted, discover a surprising degree of political knowledge, considering the rude and illiterate age in which he lived. His military talents were perhaps still more remarkable. He conquered every nation which declared war against him, by which means he both extended his territories, and added to his subjects. The Sabines and Romans, having for a considerable time fought with great ferocity, and victory inclining to neither side, at last ceased, and Tātius, their king, was admitted joint-sovereign of Rome with Rōmūlus. After the death of that monarch, the latter again found himself sole master of the city. But, from that period, his prosperity seems to have rendered him insolent and tyrannical. When employed in reviewing his army, the senators, taking advantage of a storm which suddenly arose, tore him in pieces, and reported to the people that he had been translated to heaven. The credulous Romans believed this fictitious story, deemed their founder worthy of divine honours, and, accordingly, ranked him among their gods, under the title of Quirinus, as they did also Hērŷlia his wife (Ov. Met. xiv. 830). He reigned thirty-seven years, and was more a favourite with the populace than with the senators; but was most of all beloved by his soldiers. Such was the effect of his military bravery, that the state enjoyed uninterrupted peace for forty years (Liv. i. 15 seq.). Ausōnius Quirinus (Mart. x. 26). Quirīnālia, ium, n. festivals in honour of Quirinus, or Rōmūlus. Quirites, um, v. ium (Sing. Quiris, itis), m. the Romans, or the Sabines. Adj. Quirīnālis, is, e, et, Quirinus, Quirīnānus, v. Quirīnānus, a, um, of Cūres, of the Sabines, or of the Roman. Quirīnālis lituus, the augur's staff of Rōmūlus, i. e. an augur's staff, like that which Rōmūlus afterwards used, and which, from his skill in augury, he generally carried. This staff, Cicero informs us, was kept with great care by the Sāllī, and when their temple was burned, it was found uninjured (Divin. l. 17. Virg. Æn. vii. 187). Quirīnālis mōns, Monte Cavallo, one of the mountains on which Rome stood, and was added to the city by Sērŷlus Tūllius. It had this name from a temple of Rōmūlus, or Quirinus, which stood upon it, or from the Sabines settling there, who had quitted Cūres. Porta Quirīnālis, a gate of Rome, through which the citizens passed to this mountain. Quirinus pater, Rōmūlus (Virg. Æn. vi. 860). Ade. Equirīnē, swearing by Quirinus.

R

Rābānnē, arum, m. rect. Nābānnē q. v. Rābīrius, i, m. an epic poet, of whose writings a single sentence only has been transmitted. Ovidius mentions him as a man of eloquence and genius (Ep. Pont. iv. 16. 5). —2. A distinguished architect, who flourished during the reign of Trajānus, to whom he built a palace at Rome, the ruins of which now only remain. Mārtiālis writes two epigrams, in the one of which he praises his professional skill, and in the other his filial affection (vii. 55; x. 71).

Rābīrius Pōstūmus, Rābīrii Pōstūmi, m.

a Roman prosecuted for treason, merely on account of his having attended Ptolēmæus to Egypt, for the purpose of securing payment of a debt (Suet. Claud. 16). Perhaps he was the same with C. Rābīrius q. v. Adj. Rābīriānus, a, um. C. Rābīrius, C. Rābīrii, m. a man whom C. Jūlius Cæsar brought to trial for treason, because through his agency the senate had restrained the seditious tribuneship of L. Sātūrnīnus. Cæsar was by the lots appointed one of his judges, and his violent anxiety to procure a conviction was the means of the acquittal of the arraigned (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 12). Cleéro, who mentions that Rābīrius was accused by Lābīrius of the murder of Sātūrinus, defended him (Pls. 2 seq.).

M. Rābīrius, M. Rābīrii, m. a Roman, who was appointed one of the second dēcēvīri (Liv. iii. 35).

Rācīlia, æ, f. wife of L. Quinctius Cincinnātus (Liv. iii. 26).

M. Rācīus, M. Rācīi, m. an ambassador sent from Rome to Marseilles, with deputies from that town, on Hasdrubal's marching into Italy (Liv. xxvii. 36).—2. Prætor in 172 B. C. The senate ordered him to call to Rome all the senators from every part of Italy, unless their absence was on account of public business, and it was resolved, that such as were in Rome should not go farther than one mile from the city. This measure resulted from the unfavourable accounts received respecting the Roman forces in Mācēdōnia (Liv. xliii. 11).

Rāetia, v. Rhetia, æ, f. a district of the Alps, to the west of Noricum, east of Hēlvētia, and south of Vindelicia. Inh. Rhetii, orum, m. a brave people, as were most of the natives of that range of mountains. Plinius states, that they were supposed to be of Tuscan descent, and were expelled by the Gauls while under the command of Rhetus q. v., from whom their name was derived (i. 376). This is also recorded by Justinus, from whom it appears, that there were more than one nation or tribe of this name (xx. 5). They were conquered by Tib. Nēro and Drūsus, the stepsons of Augustus, in 17 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 136). Adj. Rheticus, a, um. Rhetica vitis, the Rhetian vine, which produced an excellent wine commended both by Plinius (iii. 117), and Virgilius (G. ii. 96).

Ramises. See Rhames.

L. Rāmmīus, L. Rāmmīi, m. of Bründisium, a man of the first distinction in that town, who used to entertain the Roman commanders, and ambassadors of foreign princes, particularly of kings, on which account he became known to Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia. That prince wrote him a letter, which induced L. Rāmmīus to visit the sovereign of Macedon, who treated him with great kindness, and, at last, stated his object, which was to poison such of the Roman commanders as he should direct by letter. With that view, he supplied him with poison which would be certain in its effects, and would leave no symptom, by which it could afterwards be detected. To save his own life, L. Rāmmīus assented to the king's request, but went immediately to C. Valērius, ambassador, to whom he disclosed the affair, and whom he accompanied to Rome. The consequence of this information of L. Rāmmīus, added to that of Eunēses, was a more immediate declaration of war against Pērsēs (Liv. xlii. 17, 18).

Rāmmēses, v. Rāmmes, ium, m. the first century of Roman equites, so called from Rōmūlus (Liv. i. 13. 36). Celsi Rāmmes, the exalted knights (Hor. Art. Poet. 342).

Raphia, æ, f. a town of Phēniēia, at which Antiochus, king of Syria, solemnized the marriage of his daughter with Ptōlēmæus, king of Egypt, in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 13).

Rāpo, ōnis, m. a man in the army of Tānus, who killed Pārthēnius and Orses (Virg. Æn. x. 748).

Raudius, i, m. an extensive plain of Vēnētia, between Vērōna and Vercellē (Flor. iii. 3. Liv. Ep. 68), famous for the victory gained thereby C. Mārius over the Tōmāni and Cimbri (Vel. Pat. ii. 12).

Rāvēnna, æ, f. Ravenna, a town of Gāllia Cisālpina, at the mouth of Utis, the Monte, with a very large harbour, which was repaired by Augustus, who kept a fleet there. It is celebrated from being, for some time, the seat of the western empire, but is now an inconsiderable town. Rāvēnna was, according to Hērōdōtus, built by Thessalians. It stood on a peninsula, was of difficult access by land, and so ill supplied with good water, that Mārtiālis says, it sold higher than wine (iii. 56). The marshes, which separate it from the continent, served as a natural fortification, and added to its strength. Pepin, king of France, took it from the Lombards, and gave it to the Pope. It was built entirely of wood, and intersected by canals through which the water flowed, consequently the communication between the different parts of the town was either by bridges or boats. It was very healthy although in a marsh, which Strābo attributes to the flux of the tide, adding, that the marsh caused the rapid growth and great fertility of the vines, but that they died at the end of the fourth or fifth year. Charlemagne removed some of the columns of marble and granite to Aix-la-chapelle. It still retains vestiges of its former grandeur. In the time of Augustus, the fleet which protected the Gulf of Venice, was stationed at Rāvēnna, which is now about five English miles from the sea. It was then a place of great strength, from being surrounded with marshes to the extent of many miles, and only connected with the land by an artificial causeway. The rivers at the mouth of the Po, are now confined by embankments, and the country cultivated and populous. Pōlūdōsa Rāvēnna (Sil. Ital. vii. 601). Rāvēnnātes, um (Sing. Rāvēnnās, ātis, m. Adj. Rāvēnnās, as, as; ātis. Rāvēnnātes rāna (Mart. iii. 93). Rāvēnnās clāssis (Tac. Hist. ii. 100).

Rāvidus, i, m. a rival of Cātūllus, to whom that poet addresses Carm. xl.

Rāvōla, æ, m. a wretch of the most impure habits (Juv. Sat. ix. 4).

Raurāci, orum, m. a people of Gāllia France, on the N. extremity of mount Jura. The chief town was, from its inhabitants, called Raurācum, afterwards Augusta Raurācorum, Augst, an inconsiderable village near the modern town of Basil. At the latter place the Rhine, after running for many miles nearly due W., takes a northern direction, and separates Gērmānia, Germany, from Gāllia, France. Adj. Raurācus, a, um. Raurācus ager (Amm. Mar.).

Rēātē, is, n. Rieti, a town of the Sabines on Nār, the Nera, one of the eastern branches of Tiber, the Tevere. Inh. Rēātīni, orum (Sing. Rēātīnus, i), m. promised soldiers to P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africanus (207 B. C.), when the senate allowed him to enlist volunteers for the African war (Liv. xxviii. 45). Adj. Rēātīnus, a, um. Rēātīnus ager (Plin. i. 241).

Rēbilus. See Cānīnus.

Roca, as, m. the charioteer of Castor (Just. xlii. 3).

Recarānus, i, m. a Greek of prodigious size and strength, on which account he was called Hērēcles. When he fed his cattle on the banks of Albūla, the Tevere, Cācus, called a servant of Evānder by Aurēlius Victor, stole a part, but Evānder restored him his property, and acknowledged his divinity (Aur. Vic. Or. 6). Livius gives a very different account.

Rēcūpērātor, ōris, m. a judge appointed to determine a private cause, and by whose decision the lawful owner recovers (rēcūpērat) what is his. P. Cornēlius Scipio Africānus appointed three rēcūpērātōres to examine and declare whether Q. Trēbēllius, or Sēxtius Dīgītus, was entitled to the mural crown at the taking of Cārhāgo Nōva, in 212 B. C. Other instances occur in the history of Livius. At Rome, the praetor nominated the rēcūpērātōres, who seem to have been nearly the same with what we call arbitrators when appointed by a judge, or court (Liv. xxvi. 48 seq.).

Rēgālānus, i, m. one of the usurpers in the reign of the Roman emperor Gāllienus. To him Eutrōpius alludes (ix. 8). The inferior editions read Trēbēllianus.

Rēgillūm, i, n. a town of the Sabines, called by Suetonius Rēgilli (Tib. 1). Inh. Rēgillenses, ium, et, Rēgillāni, orum, m.

Rēgillus, i, m. Lago della Colonna, a lake near Tusculum, at which, after a bloody battle, A. Pōstūmīus, the Roman dictator, gained a brilliant victory over the Latin confederacy commanded by Octāvius Māmillius, son-in-law of Tārquīnius Sūpērbus (Liv. ii. 19 seq.).

Rēgium Lēpidūm, v. Rēgium Lēpidi, n. Regio, a town of Mūtina, Modena, built by Aemilius Lēpidus. Near it the Roman emperor, Otho, put an end to his life (Tac. Hist. ii. 50).

Rēgulus, i, m. a Roman who held the consulship with L. Aelius Scāianus, probably only for a part of the year 31. They disagreed, for which Hātērius Agrippa brought them to trial next year; but Rēgulus escaped punishment (Tac. Ann. v. 11 seq.).

Rēhimēna, e, f. a district to the east of Tigris, the Dejilāh (Amm. Mar. xxv. 7).

Rēman, a Roman fort in Mēsōpōtāmiā. Both it and Būsan appear to have been places of considerable strength (Amm. Mar. xviii. 10).

Rēmēns, ētis, f. a place in Vēiens ager, at which a shower of stones is said to have fallen, in 175 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 2).

Rēmi, orum (Sing. Rēmus, i), m. a people of Gāllia Bēlgica, whose country lay to the N. of Mātrōna, the Marne. Their chief town was Dürōcōrtōrum, afterwards Rēmi, now Rheims. When Caesar had the command in Gaul, the Rēmi were inferior only to the Aedui in dignity (Caes. B. G. vi. 12).

Rēmmylus, i, m. the colleague of M. Livius Drūsus, in the edileship (Aur. Vic. Vir. II. 68).—2. A Roman veteran, again called out to service, who had the custody of Vōnōnes. He put his prisoner to death, from having connived at his escape, and, after his being retaken, rather than to be proved an accomplice, he preferred being an assassin (Tac. Ann. ii. 68).

Q. Rēmmylus Pālemon, Q. Rēmmyli Pālemonis, m. a grammarian of great distinction under the Roman emperors Tiberius and Claudius, of such unreasonable arrogance, that he declared that letters had been born with him, and that they would die with him. He was a native of Vicētia, Vicenza, by birth a slave, who, according to report, first learned the trade of a weaver, and afterwards acquired a knowledge of letters, whilst he attended his master's son to school. Having obtained his freedom, he opened a school at Rome, where he taught with the highest reputation for skill in his art, although infamous for every vice. Both the emperors already mentioned, openly declared, that no person was more improper to be intrusted with the education of children, yet his facility of speech, and his vast store of anecdotes, added to his poetical talents, made him a general favourite. His large income from his school and other sources, he wasted in luxury, of which, and of his irregular conduct, Suetonius has left on record sufficient proof. Perhaps Juvēnalis applies the name to some grammarian at the time he wrote, merely in reference to his transcendent merits in his profession (Sat. vi. 451). To him Mārtialis alludes (ii. 86).

Rēmulus, i, m. one of the Tiburtes (Virg. Aen. ix. 360).—2. A surname of Nūmānus q. v.—3. A Rutulian who was thrown from his horse, which had become restive, in consequence of being wounded under the ear, by Orsilochus (Virg. Aen. xi. 636).—4. An Alban king, a son of Tiberinus, who gave his name to Albūla, afterwards Tiberinus, now the Tevere. This prince was killed in early life, whilst he was imitating thunder, and was succeeded by his brother Acrōta (Ov. Met. xiv. 616—620).

Rēmus, i, m. was a son of Ilia, daughter of Nūmītor, fourteenth king of Alba, in descent from Aenēas, and twin-brother of Rōmulus q. v. Like his brother, he was exposed by order of the king, his grand-uncle, preserved in the same manner, and likewise brought up among shepherds. After the usurper had been killed, and their grandfather restored to the throne, the twin-brothers resolved to found a city on one of the hills, where they had tended cattle. Instead of reigning as joint-sovereigns, since priority of birth could not be ascertained, they had recourse to omens. To Rēmus first appeared six vultures, and soon after, double that number to his brother, on which each claimed the sovereignty, the one from precedence in time, and the other from the greater number of the birds. From a contest in words, they proceeded to acts of violence, in which each was supported by his own party, and, in the skirmish, Rēmus fell. The more generally received opinion is, that he was killed by Rōmulus, for having leaped, in derision, over his wall. Such is the account of Livius, which Propertius seems to have followed (iii. 9. 50), and does not differ very materially from that of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who states, that the contention arose from each of the brothers claiming the sovereignty, but that Rēmus was killed by Celer, who had the charge of building the walls. Aurēlius Victor traces his name to rēmōres, which anciently signified slow or tardy persons (21 seq.). From Ovidius, it supernatural, that the anniversary of the murder was observed as a holiday, and certain expiations were performed, which seem to change that crime of murder on Hamilton, who was said to be haunted by the ghost of his brother. This festival or anniversary was called Linastra, from Lina, changing the R. into L. and was kept during three days in the month of May, which were reckoned very unlucky, and, therefore, no marriage was celebrated, nor the temples of the gods opened, during that time. The practice having become general, over the Roman empire, and not limited solely to these days, is probably the reason why in this country, it was long unusual to marry in May, nor is that custom wholly discontinued at the present day. Antiochus II. from his being buried on that mountain (Prop. l. i. 30). Linastra, v. Linastra, Ann. v. Gensilis in honour of the dead. Linastra, Ann. v. Gensilis, evil spirits, &c.—2. A Rutulian in the army of Turnus, whom Nisus killed (Virg. Æn. l. 338).

Romana, m. f. a town in Oulgent (Ann. Mar. xxi. 3).

Rethel. See Arilla.

Rethinor, lata, m. a companion of Diomedes, who was transformed into a bird (Or. Met. xiv. 304 seq.).

Rethuron, i. m. a part of Ithica, which had this name from a river running into it, from a neighbouring mountain (Hom. Od. l. 186).

Rhēdignā, arum, m. a people of Germany, supposed to have inhabited that part of the country now called Mecklenburg and Lauenburg (Tac. Mor. Ger. 40).

Rex Sacerdotum, v. Rex Sacrificus, or Sacrificulus, king of sacrifices among the Romans, or king in religious matters, was subject to the pontifex maximus, and not allowed to hold any magistracy. The chief pontiff inaugurated him. In 181 B. C., L. Cornēlius Dīlābilla, a naval dūmvir, was chosen king of sacrifices, whom the chief pontiff refused to inaugurate, because he had not previously resigned his commission, and, on his refusal, he was fined. Cornēlius appealed to the people, who ordered him to comply with the requisition of the pontiff, and pay the fine. A peal or two of thunder broke off the transaction, by exciting scruples in the minds of the priests respecting Cornēlius, and they inaugurated another person, king of sacrifices (Liv. ii. 2 seq.). It was the duty of this priest, to perform those rites which had been done under the monarchy by the kings in person, and lest honour should be connected with the title, the Romans made him inferior to the pontifex maximus, and added the diminutive Sacrificulus, most probably in contempt.

Rha, m. m. the Volga, a large river, which takes its rise in European Russia, runs in a southeast direction, for many miles, then due south, passes Astracan, and falls into Mare Caspium, the Caspian Sea, about fifty miles below that city, after a course of nearly seventeen hundred miles. Through an extensive tract, the Volga forms the boundary between Europe and Asia (Ann. Mar. xlii. 8). According to this author, an herb of extraordinary medicinal virtues grew on its banks.

Rhacotis, idis, f. a place near Alēxandria, on which a temple was built, where had formerly been a chapel dedicated to Scips and Isis (Tac. Hist. iv. 81).

Rhādānistus, i. m. son of Figulus and Enripa, was king of Licia. He was born in Caria, Caria, which he gained in early life, and obtained possessions amongst the Cythes. His afterwards extended his dominion over Licia. The accounts, however, both of his personage and residence are distant and contradictory. According to Plin. he appears to have been the first lawyer, as his love of justice procured him the office of one of the judges in the judicial region. Strabo informs us, that he professed to have received his laws from Figulus, and that both the statutes of Rhādānistus and of Nax were in vogue (Strab.).

Rhādānistus, i. m. son of Pharimius, king of Bitunia, who, on arriving at manhood, beheld the protracted life of his father with impatience, and expressed his discontent in a manner which excited alarming suspicions in the mind of his parent. To a graceful form, and great bodily vigour, he added a powerful understanding, which commanded the esteem of the neighbouring states. Trained in the politics of his father, who advised him to displace his uncle Mithridates, king of Armēnia, and seize on the throne, in order to procure his own safety, Rhādānistus repaired to the court of Armēnia, and following his father's advice, had recourse to stratagem, in preference to open force. His uncle received him with great kindness, treated him as his son, and did all in his power to render him happy, believing he had fled from the displeasure of his father, and the tyranny of his step-mother. In return for this kindness, Rhādānistus formed a conspiracy against the crown and life of his benefactor. Pretending a reconciliation, he returned to his father's court, obtained a considerable force, and then invaded Armēnia. Celius Pōllio, bribed by Rhādānistus, prevailed on Mithridates to surrender to his nephew, who smothered him under a load of clothes, and massacred his children, because they bewailed their father's death. The Armenians expelled him, and, after again obtaining possession of the country, they obliged him to consult his safety by flight. His wife and he escaped by the swiftness of their horses; but she, being far advanced in pregnancy, became unable to proceed on their journey, and, at her earnest request, he plunged his sword into her heart, and threw her body into Araxes, that it might not fall into the hands of the enemy. Rhādānistus proceeded to his father's house, who afterwards put him to death, on suspicion of treason (Tac. Ann. xii. 44 seq.).

Rhetia. See Ratia.

Rhetus, i. m. a Tuscan, who put himself at the head of a number of his countrymen, on their being expelled from their settlements by the Gauls, and took possession of a part of the Alps. The colony took the name of their leader. See Ratia.

Rhāmēlus, i. m. a commander of the Scythians, who joined the Colchians in the war between that nation, and the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 529).

Rhāmnes, ētis, m. a Rutulian king and augur, who was a great favourite of Turnus, whose interest he adopted. He fell by the hand of Nisus (Virg. Æn. ix. 325). Ovidius calls him Rūtulus Rhāmnēs (lb. 631).

Rhāmnēs, ium, m. See Ramneus.

Rhāmnūs, ūtis, f. Vrao Castro (Wal.), Tauro Castro, or, Hebræo Castro (Hob.), a village of Attica, now in ruins, where was a famous temple of Nēmēsis, the remains of which are still visible. Of the town no part remains; but the walls, which were exceedingly well built, have not entirely disappeared. It stood on a round rocky hill, of which the sea washed two thirds of its circumference, and a broad ravine separated it from the hills.

Wood partly conceals the fragments of marble, which lie scattered over the surface of the ground on which Rhāmnūs once stood. Rhāmnūs, idis, f. of Rhāmnūs &c. (Ov. Met. xiv. 694), applied chiefly to Nēmēsis q. v. Adj. Rhāmnūsus, a, um. Rhāmnūsia virgo, Nēmēsis (Cat. lxiv. 396). She is often called Rhāmnūsia q. v.

Rhāmnūsia, æ, f. a surname of Nēmēsis (indignation), the daughter of Jūpiter and Necessity, or, according to others, of Nox alone, one of the infernal deities, whose office it was to punish every kind of wickedness. The ancients represented her with wings, to indicate the rapidity with which vengeance overtakes crimes. She was chiefly worshipped at Rhāmnūs in Attica, whence this name (Ov. Met. iii. 406). Adj. Rhāmnūsus, a, um.

Rhāmpsinītus, i, m. a king of Egypt, whose treasures were plundered by two brothers. It was reported, that he alive descended into what the Greeks called the Infernal regions, and played at dice with Ceres, and that he sometimes gained and sometimes lost (Herod. ii. 121 seq.).

Rhāmsēs, is, m. a king of Egypt, who, according to Plinius, reigned during the Trojan war (v. 295). To him Tacitus alludes (Ann. ii. 60). There can be little doubt, that this and the preceding article refer to the same person. The name is variously written.

Rhānis, idos, f. one of Diana's attendants (Ov. Met. iii. 171).

Rhāpsōdi, orum, m. a class of Greeks, corresponding, in most particulars, to the British Bards, or Minstrels. Those of the higher orders went from country to country, and city to city, singing their own compositions. Another class only recited the poems of others. Different derivations are given of the term, some referring it to the verb ῥάπτω, to compose, and ῥάψω, a song; others to ῥάπτω, a rod, or branch, and ῥάψω; the first denoted an author who wrote poems; the latter, a singer, or reciter, who held a branch of laurel in his hand, and only repeated the writings of some distinguished poet (Herod. v. 67).

Rhāscypōlis, is, m. a native of Thrācia. Romania, was an officer of great merit, and, in the Civil war, commanded the Macedonian troops which joined Pompey. In the war between Brutus and Octavius, Rhāscypōlis attached himself to the former, and his brother Rāscus embraced the interest of Octavius, as he had formerly done that of Cæsar (Cæs. B. C. iii. 4).

Rhēa Silvīa. See Ita.

Rhēbas, æ, v. Rhēbānus, i, m. the Rheca, a river in the vicinity of Thrācia Bosphorus, the Strait of Constantinople, of which little is certainly known. Lōnginquus Rhēbas (Val. Flacc. iv. 698). This river must not be confounded with Rhēsus q. v. a river of the Troad, which had its source in mount Ida.

Rhēdōnēs, um, m. a people of Gāllia Cēltica. The Rhēdōnēs were one of those nations reckoned inter Armōricas ciuitates (Cæs. B. G. iii. 34 seq.).

L. Rhēginus, L. Rhēgini, m. a tribune of the people, who showed uncommon friendship to Q. Sērvilius Cæpio, after he had been defeated by the Cimbri. The account of that matter which Vālerius Maximus gives, in different parts of his writings, is contradictory, consequently unworthy of particular notice (iv. 7).

Rhēgium, i, n. Reggio, a town nearly in the southern extremity of Itālia, Italy, founded by a colony from Chālcis, Egripo, under Antimnēstus (Strab. 370). The Greeks gave it this name, from an opinion that Sicily had been broken from it (Just. iv. 1). Tuh. Rhēgini, orum (Sing. Rhēginus, i), m. the Rhēgians (Just. iv. 3). Adj. Rhēginus, a, um. Rhēgina littora (Sil. Ital. xlii. 94).

Rhēnē, æ, f. an island in the Archipelago, near Dēlos (Herod. vi. 97).

Rhēnus, i, m. the Rhine, a celebrated river of Europe, rises from three springs in the Alps, one in St. Bernard, another in St. Barnabas, and the third in Crispell, in the country of the Grisons, passes Lacus Brigantinus, v. Lacus Venetus, the Lake of Constance, afterwards through Acronius, Lake Inferior, or, Lake of Zell, and continues to run nearly W. until it reaches Basil, when, taking a northern direction, it becomes the boundary between Gāllia, France, and Gērmānia, Germany, then between the latter country and Bēlgium, the Netherlands. At Schenck, or, Schenken Schans, the Rhine sends off its left-hand branch, Vāhālis, the Wahal, or, the Waal, and, after running a few miles farther north, it divides into two streams, of which the one to the right hand had the name of Flēvus, the Yssel, and the other that of Hēllum, the Leck. Lacus Flēvo, the Zuyder Zee, was so called from Flēvus, the Yssel, spreading into that sea or lake, before its waters are lost in Océānus Gērmānicus, the German Sea. The Yssel and the Leck, or the Wahal, with the Gērmān Sea, formed Bātāvia, rather, Insula Bātāvorum, the United Provinces, or, Holland. The course of the Rhine may be estimated at 600 miles. Pliny calls that part of the Atlantic Ocean which is to the N. of the mouths of the river, Sēptentrionalis Océānus. Trans Rhēnum, beyond the Rhine, &c. on the eastern side of the Rhine. Dōmito Rhēno, having subdued the Rhine, &c. having conquered the Germans who lived on the Rhine (Mart. ii. 2). Bicornis Rhēnus, the two-horned Rhine, i. e. Vāhālis, the Waal, and Rhēnus afterwards Hēllum, the Leck, the two streams by which the Rhine poured its waters into the German Sea, in the days of Virgilius, before Drusus formed Flēvus, the Yssel, by an artificial cut (Virg. Æd. viii. 727). Nympharum pater amantissimæ Rhēnæ (Mart. x. 7). Cornua Rhēni, the horns of the Rhine, i. e. the streams into which it branches (Claud. viii. 620). Rhēnus, i, m. an inhabitant of the Rhine, a German. Ingēntes Rhēni, Germans of great stature (Pers. Sat. vi. 47). Adj. Rhēnānus, a. um. Rhēnāna mānus, a German army (Mart. ix. 36). Trānsrhēnānus, a. um. of the other side of the Rhine.—2. The Reno, a small river of Italia, Italy, which rises in Apenninus, the Apennines, and falls into the most southern channel of Pādus, the Po. In a little island formed by the Reno, about two miles from Bōnōnia, Bologna, Octāvius, M. Antonius, and M. Emilius Lēpidus met, and entered into that infamous compact, called the SECOND TRIUMVIRATE. This inconsiderable stream, which Silius Itālicus calls pārens Rhēnus (viii. 399), must not be confounded with the river described in the preceding article.

Rheomithres, is, m. a nobleman in the army of Dārius, who was killed in the battle of Issus (Curt. iii. 11).

Rhēscūpōris, idis, m. brother of Rhēmētāles, king of Thrācia. On the death of the latter, the Roman emperor Augūstus gave part of Thrācia to Cōtys, son of the late king, and another part to Rhēscūpōris. The barren places which lay exposed to hostile incursions, were assigned to Rhēscūpōris, who, offended at the more fertile and cultivated parts being allotted to his nephew, made small encroachments on his territories during the lifetime of Augūstus, and invaded the country with a hostile army, on the death of that emperor. Tibērius despatched a centurion to prevent a war between the Thracian kings, and Cōtys immediately disbanded his forces. Rhēscūpōris, by craft, got his nephew into his power, and, in violation of all laws, he first loaded him with irons, and afterwards deprived him of life. Tibērius employed Pōmpōnius Flāccus, governor of Mýsia, to act in the same manner towards Rhēscūpōris as he had done to Cōtys, and having seized his person, to send him prisoner to Rome. Pōmpōnius soon executed his commission, and the widow of Cōtys having proved the guilt of Rhēscūpōris before the senate, he was banished to Alexāndria, in Egypt, and put to death for attempting to make his escape, or for a fictitious crime (Tac. Ann. ii. 64 seq.).

Rhēscus, i, m. brother of Rhēscūpōris q. v. (Ap. Bel. Civ. 639).

Rhēsus, i, m. a king of Thrācia, son of Eīōnēus, who went to join the Trojans, some time after the commencement of the war. The Greeks, who had certain information of his arrival, and of an oracular prediction which declared, that Troy could not be taken by them, if the horses of Rhēsus tasted the fodder of Troy, or drank of Xānthus, or Scāmānder, the Mender, sent Ulýsses and Diōmēdes to intercept him, and prevent either circumstance from taking place. Rhēsus having reached Troy late in the evening, after the gates were shut, was obliged to lodge all night in the plain. Just as Diōmēdes and Ulýsses set out on their expedition, they seized Dōlon q. v., a Trojan, who had been sent by Hēctor to reconnoitre the Grecian camp. Anxious to preserve his life, he readily discovered to them the situation of Troy, the plans of his countrymen, and the tent of Rhēsus. This ensured the success of their enterprise. They killed the Thracian king, fast asleep after the fatigue of his journey, and carried off his horses before they had drunk of Xānthus, or Scāmānder, the Mender, or tasted the grass of the Trojan plain. Strýmōnius Rhēsus, from the Stru- mona being in his dominions (Virg. G. 327).

Rhēsus, i, m. a river of the Troad, which has its source in mount Ida. This river must not be confounded with Rhēias q. v., which runs into Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, although Plinius says that some called it Rhēsus (i. 610 seq.).

Rhēxenor, ōris, m. son of Nansithōas, and brother of Alcēbus (Hom. Od. vii. 63).

Rhēlanus, i, m. a native of Crēta, Cēsā, who flourished during the reign of Pōllēmaus Evērgētes. Of his merits as a poet, scarcely any opinion can be formed; since of his numerous pieces a few fragments only remain. The emperor Tibērius limited the writings of Rhēlanus (Suet. Tib. 70).

Rhidagus, i, m. a river of Hýrcānia, according to Cūrtius, which falls into the Zāberis. In both instances the reading is doubtful (Curt. vi. 4).

Rhigmus, i, m. a Thracian, the distinguished son of Pīreus, killed by Achilles (Hom. Il. xx. 485).

Rhinocolūra, orum, n. El-Arisā, a town on the east of Egypt (Liv. xiv. 11). A line from this town to Arsīnōē, Suez, forms the boundary of Egypt on the east (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Rhion, v. Rhium, i, n. Kleinen Dardanelen, Cape Morca (Leake), or, Kastoli, a strait between Naupactus and Patrae. It seems to form the entrance to Sinos Cōrinthiācus, the Gulf of Lepanto (Liv. xxvii. 29).

—2. Cape Feno, a promontory of Corsica.

Rhipeus, v. Rhipheus, a, um, Rhipsean; Scythian; northern. Rhipsei montes, Kamens, or, Weliki Poyas (i. e. stony or great belts), mountains in Scythia, which Plinius seems to place near Tānāis, the Don (i. 471). Justinus makes them the boundary of that country on the one side (ii. 2).

The Russians, according to some authors, gave these modern names to certain heights considered as the northern boundary between Europe and Asia.

With the inhabitants of the northern parts of Europe and Asia, the Greeks and Romans had no intercourse, and their ignorance of these immense tracts of country, accounts for these mountains which some reckon imaginary.

The whole of the Russian empire is uncommonly flat, containing no mountain of any magnitude. Rhipaea juga, the summits of the Rhipsean mountains (Plin. i. 475).

Rhipseus-Eurus, the Rhipsean, i. e. the northeast wind (Virg. G. iii. 382). Rhipaea arces (Virg. G. i. 240).

Rhipē, es, f. a town of Arcādia (Hom. Il. ii. 606), which sent troops against Troy, and also against Thēbae, Theba (Stat. Th. iv. 286).

Rhipēus, ōis, m. a Trojan who joined Aēneas, the night that Troy was burned (Virg. En. ii. 339).

—2. A commander of the Scythians, killed in the Argonautic expedition, by Cālāis (Val. Flacc. vi. 558).

Rhislāsus, i, m. an inhabitant of Pēllōnē, a town of Achāia, who threatened his son Mēmnon, one of the Dāmlūrgi, who opposed the alliance with the Romans, in 200 B. C., that he would put him to death, with his own hand, if he did not agree.

This threat induced Mēmnon to accede (Liv. xxxii. 22).

Rhium. See Rhion.

Rhizon, ōis, f. Risino, or, Risano, a town of Dalmātia, over which C. Licīnius was appointed governor, in 169 B. C., after the defeat of Gēntius, king of the Illýrī. Inh. Rhizōnīte, arum, m. lived in the inmost bay of Rhizōnīcus Sinus, the Gulf of Cattaro. To them Anicius Gāllus, the Roman prætor, granted, by the authority of the senate, both liberty and exemption from taxes, in 169 B. C., because they had revolted to the Romans when Gēntius was in full power (Liv. xlv. 26). Adj. Rhizōnīcus, a, um. Rhizōnīcus Sinus, the Gulf of Cattaro.

Rhōda, a, f. Roset, a town of Spain, near the Pyrenees, from which the Roman consul M. Pōrcius Cato, drove a garrison of the Spaniards, in 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 8).—2. A town on Rhōdānus, said to have given name to that river; but it had disappeared when Plinius wrote. It was built by a colony of the Rhodians (Plin. i. 309).

Rhōdālus, i, m. a Scythian commander in the war against the Argonauts and Colchians. He was the brother of Sýdon (Val. Flacc. vi. 69).

Rhōdānus, i, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, who fell by the Roman troops under Scipio Africānus, in Spain (Sil. Ital. xv. 722).

Rhōdānus, i, m. the Rhone, a large and rapid river of Europe, which has its source in Mount la Fourche, near St. Gothard, in the canton of Uri, not more than two leagues south from that of Rhēnus, the Rhine, passes Lacus Lēmānus, the Lake of Geneva, when it is of a greenish blue colour, from running over limestone, five leagues below which, it disappears between two rocks, for some hundred feet, under a cover of limestone strata, then emerges, flows with great rapidity in a southern direction, and discharges itself by three mouths into that part of the Mediterranean, formerly called Gāllicus Sinus, the Gulf of Lyons. The largest of these mouths, in the age of Plinius, was called Māssāliotium, the other two were much less, and had the common name of Libýca; although each was also known by a distinct appellation. Hispāniensē ostium, denoted the western, or the one next to Hispānia, Spain, and Mētāpinum, that in the middle. The course of the Rhone is about 400 miles, during which it falls 5400 feet. In Strabo's time, it was navigable a good way up; but its mouths are now so full of rocks, brought down from the mountains by its impetuous current, that no ship can enter them. The Rhone is largest in summer, and is at its greatest height soon after the longest day. This is most probably occasioned, by the heat of the sun melting part of the snow on the Alps, during the summer months. Impiger flūminum Rhōdānus (Flor. iii. 2). Rhōdānītis, idis, f. of the Rhone, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Adj. Rhōdānīcus, a, um.

Rhōdīus, i, m. one of the many rivers descending from mount Ida (Hom. Il. xii. 20).

Rhōdōpa, a, f. a province in Thracia, which probably had its name from the mountain Rhōdōpē (Eutrop. vi. 2).

Rhōdōpē, a, f. Tourjan-dag, a high range of mountains in Thracia, which Strābo considers next to Hæmus in height. According to ancient fable, Rhōdōpē was the daughter of the river Strýmon, and wife of Hæmus, king of Thracia, whom Jupiter transformed into these mountains, which bear their name, because they had thought themselves not inferior to him and Jūno, and had claimed divine honours (Ov. Met. vi. 87 seq.). The river Escus, the Ischa, flows from this mountain (Plin. i. 386). Rhōdōpa, a, f. one of the six provinces of Thracia, which had this name from the mountain (Eutrop. vi. 2).

Adj. Rhōdōpēus, et, Rhōdōpēus, a, um, of Rhōdōpē; of Thracia, Thracian. Rhōdōpēus cultor, an inhabitant of Thrace (Mart. Spec. 3). Rhōdōpēia cōjūx, Prōcē (Stat. Th. v. 121). Rhōdōpēus vātes, Orpheus (Ov. Met. x. 11), called by the same poet, Rhōdōpēus hēros (Met. x. 50). Rhōdōpēia arces, the summits of Rhōdōpē (Virg. G. iv. 461). Rhōdōpēia sūxa (Luc. Phar. vi. 618).

Rhōdos, i, f. daughter of Nēptūnus and Vēnus, beloved by Sol, or Apōllo, to whom she bore seven sons, called from their father Hēliades (Ov. Met. iv. 204).

Rhōdūntia, a, f. one of the highest summits of mount Cēta. At the request of Antiochus, king of Sýria, the Ætol took possession of Rhōdūntia, with the third part of two thousand men, whom Vālērīus Flācus, a Roman lieutenant-general, failed in his attempt to dislodge, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 16 seq.).

Rhōdus, i, f. Rhodes, an island in the Mediterranean Sea, about twenty miles distant from the coast of Dōris, a district in the southwest of Asia Minor, Natolia. Diōdōrus Sicūlus says, it had this name from Rhōdos, the daughter of Nēptūnus and Hālīa, who was the sister of the Tēlchines, from whom it was formerly called Tēlchinis (v. 55). It was known by a number of names, of which Plinius mentions nine (i. 616). The soil of Rhodes is uncommonly fertile, and produces all kinds of delicious fruits. The wines of this island are highly valued. It is subject to the Turks, and, like the other countries under that despotic government, is but thinly peopled, and ill cultivated. The colossal statue of Apōllo, seventy cubits high, and esteemed one of the wonders of the world, stood near the entrance to the harbour. The head represented the sun, and one hand held a lighthouse. Chāres, a native of Rhodes, planned this astonishing figure, and spent twelve years in its execution. An earthquake destroyed the work of that ingenious artist, when it had only stood about sixty-six years. The brass of it is said to have loaded nine hundred camels. The capital of Rhodes is of the same name, and was, at one time, a place of considerable trade. Several illustrious men were natives of this city. M. Tullius Cicero, and C. Julius Caesar, among many eminent Romans, studied at Rhodes. Clāra Rhōdos (Hor. Od. i. 7. 1). Inh. Rhōdī, orum (Sing. Rhōdīus, i), et, Rhōdīenses, iun, m. the Rhodians, were distinguished by their learning and politeness, but in the days of Jūvenālis, were inactive and effeminate, hence he calls them unwarlike (Imbellēs Rhōdī, Sat. viii. 113). This was not their character, when the Romans first invaded Greece, and in their war with Antiochus (Liv. xxvii. 80 seq.). They spoke the Doric dialect (Suet. Tib. 56). Adj. Rhōdīus, Rhōdīæus, a, um, et, Rhōdīensis, is, e. Rhōdīa classis (Ov. Met. xii. 574). Rhōdīum opus, the colossal statue of Apōllo (Mart. i. 71). Rhōdīensis cēltas (Gel. vi. 3). Rhebus, i, m. the horse of Mēcēntius q. v. (Virg. Æn. x. 561).

Rhœcus, i, m. a native of Sýmos, son of Phlœus, was an ingenious artist. He and Rhodes, is. m. the first who met natives of Ionia. Their invention formed an important era in the art of anatomy (Paus. x. 38).

Rhodesius, is. m. a Thracian prince, who, in the latter years of his life, reigned over the whole of that country. After his death, Rhodesius gave part of the kingdom to Rhodesius g. m. brother of the deceased monarch, and the rest to Corys g. m.—2. Son of Rhodesius, to whom Rhodesius gave part of the kingdom of Thracia, after the senate had sentenced his father to live at a distance from his native country, and had fixed his residence at Alcinus in Egypt, in the year 19 (Tac. Ann. ii. 64 seq.).

Rhodesius, is. m. a man who had raised his sword over the head of Alexander the Great, at the battle of Grinicus, but Clitus saved that monarch's life, by cutting off the right hand of the assassin, before he gave the blow (Curt. viii. 1).

Rhodesius, is. m. a Rutulian transfixed by Palus (Virg. Aen. x. 589).

Rhodesius, is. m. a man of Troy, Trojan; also Roman. Rhodesius (præmilitarius), En Tepe, a celebrated promontory at the extremity of the Trojan plain. Rhodesius præfatus, the Dardanelles (Ov. Met. xi. 197). Rhodesius litus (Virg. Aen. vi. 505). Rhodesius ora, the shore or coast of the Dardanelles at En Tepe (Virg. Aen. iii. 105). Rhodesius tristes elidit, Trojan ships were launched (Stat. Ach. i. 44). Rhodesius cœsar, Dörj-çê, the Trojan wife of Dörjçus (Virg. Aen. v. 646). Rhodesius regna, the Roman dominions (Sil. Ital. vii. 431). Rhodesius ducor, the Trojan commander, i. e. Æneas (Virg. Aen. xii. 466); Scipio Africanus (Sil. Ital. xvii. 466).

Rhodon, i. m. En Tepe, a promontory washed by Hellespontus, the Dardanelles, commonly written Rhetium g. e.

Rhetus, i. m. an Ethiopian, killed by Percus, at the celebration of his nuptials (Ov. Met. v. 38).—2. A giant mentioned by Hör-çus. Some editions read Rhæcus, but Apollodorus, in whose writings that name occurs, makes him a centaur, not a giant; and all the good MSS. read Rhetus (Od. ii. 19. 23).—3. A combatant in the battle between the centaurs and Læpithæ, at the marriage of Pirithous. After he had killed several of the Læpithæ, he received a wound, and fled from the battle (Ov. Met. xii. 271 seq.). To him Valerius Flaccus alludes (i. 141 seq.).—4. A Rutulian killed by Euryalus (Virg. Aen. ix. 344).—5. The father of Anchémolus (Virg. Aen. x. 388).

Rhombites, is. m. Of this name there were rivers in the country of the Saurömäta, Mälor and Minor, but in modern times they are unknown (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Rhoxolani, orum. m. the Rhoxolani, a people of Sarmäta, who invaded Mæsia about the year 69. The third Roman legion, having surrounded these freebooters, who delighted not in war but in plunder, cut them in pieces almost without resistance, in consequence of their being taken by surprise, and loaded with spoil. They used long swords, which they wielded with both hands, and their chiefs, a coat of mail impenetrable by a stroke, but so unwieldy, that having fallen they could not rise again. Like the Cossacks of modern times, they had excellent horses (Tac. Hist. i. 79).

Rhymnus, i. m. a river of Septia. Rhymnus, is. m. the people who lived on the banks of the Rhymnus (Amm. Mar. xii. 6).

Rhymnus, i. m. the commander of the troops in the army of Himel, sent from Ulcum, Gom. a town of Spia, in the province of Old Castile. They appear to have served on horseback. Their spears were crooked, their helmets fearful, iron being made chiefly of the jaws of wild beasts. In peace, they subsisted either by hunting, or by rapine. Their horses were strong and high-spirited (Sil. Ital. iii. 389).—2. A Sythian commander in the war between that nation and the Argonæ (Val. Flac. vi. 229).

Rhymnus, i. m. the Endreus, Sor. a river of Asia Minor, which, according to Plinius, separated the province of Asia from that of Bithynia. Le Chevalier states, that it is one of the most considerable rivers which flows into Propontis, the Sea of Marmora, and this is probably the reason why Tornesfort confounds it with Grinicus, the Oued (Val. Flac. iii. 35). Adj. Rhymnus, is. m. Rhymnus is. (Orph. 625).

Rhytium, i. m. a well-built town of Crisa, Comis (Hann. ii. 645).

Rigobalum, i. m. Rigob, a town of the Triviri, on Möçla, the Moselle (Tac. Hist. iv. 71).

Rigomagus, i. f. e. Rigomagus, i. m. Rheingogen, a village on the east bank of the Rhine (Amm. Mar. xvi. 3).

Ripheus, is. m. a centaur killed by Thesæus, in the battle with the Læpithæ, at the nuptials of Pirithous (Ov. Met. xii. 362).

Rixamæ, orum. m. a people of Cæltiberia (Mart. iv. 35).

Röbigus, i. m. a god who prevented milder (röbigo), according to popular belief among the Romans (Gel. iv. 6). Ovidius makes Röbigo, inis, f. a goddess (Fast. iv. 811). The Romans thought that dew, suddenly dried up by the solar rays, occasioned milder, an idea which the same poet has expressed in mentioning that fictitious deity. Röbigilla, ium. n. a sacrifice consisting of the entrails of a sheep and of a dog, which the Romans performed to Röbigus, every year, on 24th April, appointed by Numa Pompilius, in the eleventh year of his reign (Plin. iii. 526. Ov. Fast. iv. 907 seq.). Like most other heathen rites, this festival was very impure.

Roemnus, i. m. a river of Persia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). Here some think the reading should be Rhymnus. Rögömäns, is. m. a river of Persia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Röma, is. f. Rome, one of the most celebrated cities of antiquity, stood on the banks of Tiber, the Tevere, which, except Pädus, the Po, is the largest river in Italy, about 15 miles (16,000 paces, Plin.) from the sea. Sallust says, that the Trojans were the builders and first inhabitants of Rome; and Solinus, that the Greeks, after the Trojan war, by the advice of a noble captive, Römæ, founded this city, to which they gave her name. Livy, however, and most of the other historians who have given any account of Rome, inform us, that Römulus, from whom he derives the name, laid the foundation of this city on Möns Palätinus, 20th April, 753 B. C., and surrounded it with a wall, not of stone, for that was the work of Tarracilius Priscus, but whether of wood, brick, or turf is unknown. The latter is probably the most likely conjecture. The streets of Rome were first paved with flint stones, in 176 B. C., by the censors Q. Fulvius Flaccus and A. Postumius Albinus (Liv. xli. 27). From a very small beginning it gradually increased, until its circumference, according to Pliny, was not less than twenty miles. After the lapse of many years, Rome became the capital of Italia, Italy, and, at the commencement of the Christian era, the known world was in subjection to that gigantic power. It was divided into twenty-four regions or wards, had seven great, and thirteen smaller, aqueducts, thirty-seven gates, and six hundred and forty-four towers on the walls. To ascertain its population, when in the height of power, is perhaps impossible; but it did not probably fall much below four millions. The emperor Constantine, in the year 325, transferred the seat of government from Rome to Byzantium, called from him Constantinople, and from that period the magnificence and grandeur of the former began to decline. During the next century, it fell into the possession of the barbarians, who invaded and overran that extensive but feeble empire. In the year 800, Charlemagne gave Rome, with a considerable extent of the circumjacent country, into the hands of the Pope. The power of this city again revived, under a very different form. It became the seat of an Ecclesiastical Tyranny, not much less extended, and still more oppressive than its former domination. The anathemas of the Pope, for some centuries, were more dreadful than the Roman legions had ever been, and his mandates, however iniquitous and despotic, were more slavishly obeyed than the decrees of the emperors, when Rome was in the zenith of its power. The reformation which Martin Luther began in Germany, in the year 1517, was the first attack on the oppressions and usurpations of the popish clergy. Since that period, the empire of superstition has continued to decline. The mandates of the Pope became less awful, and his spiritual jurisdiction was first questioned, and then denied. In proportion as the Protestant religion was embraced, the authority of the Pope was diminished. For a century past, he has been more powerful as a temporal, than as a spiritual prince. The power of the pontiff which Buonaparte had annihilated, and the lands of the church which the rapacity of that usurper had seized, have been restored by the sovereigns of Europe, who united against French conquest and domination. The walls of modern Rome are supposed to contain nearly the same extent of ground as the ancient. Pliny makes the walls of ancient Rome thirteen Roman miles, which included the seven hills; the present are twelve and three-fourths English miles. On the west of the Tevere they are mostly brick, and, at intervals, have projecting towers, of which some are round, and others quadrangular, and enclose a space of about five square English miles, of which only about one square mile and a half is occupied by buildings, the rest is chiefly market gardens. In population, the modern city is greatly inferior to that of ancient Rome. In 1817 the inhabitants amounted to one hundred and fifty-three thousand. The seven hills on which it was first built, can scarcely be distinguished, from the low grounds being almost filled up with the ruins of the ancient streets and houses. The country around it is nearly desert, which renders the air unwholesome, particularly during the summer months, and the neglect of agriculture occasions an immense accumulation of filth in the city. No city in the world, 30 years ago, excelled, or even equalled, Rome, for the multiplicity of fine fountains, noble buildings, curiosities, antiquities, sculptures, statues and paintings. But the French, during the revolutionary war, overran the whole of Italy, and according to their uniform custom, but contrary to the practice of civilized warfare, carried every excellent piece of painting, statuary, and sculpture, which could be removed, to Paris. By the treaty of 1815, these were all to be restored; but whether the lawful owners have recovered the whole, without diminution or injury, has not yet been made public. From Rome being built on seven hills, it was called Urbs Septicollis, from being the seat of universal empire, Caput rerum, urbium princeps, domus, regina, orbis triumphati caput, &c.; and from the Romans being a nation of soldiers, Mavoris urbs. Oppidum, applied to Rome, denoted the ancient part built by Rómulus on Mōns Palātīnus, and was afterwards in the tenth ward of the city (Liv. xlii. 20). Inh. Rōmāni, ōrum (Sing. Rōmānus, i), m. the Romans, were originally from Alba Lōnga, a city of Lātium, built by Ascānus, 1152 B. C. They gradually extended their conquests, first, over the neighbouring states, and then over the whole of Italy. One nation after another submitted to their victorious arms, until no country deserving their notice remained to be added to the empire. The purity of their moral character may, in some degree, be inferred, from no divorce between man and wife taking place in Rome before 234 B. C. Luxury and wickedness, after many ages, destroyed all love of liberty and of their country. An universal corruption of morals was followed by effeminacy and cowardice. The proud Romans, who had long given laws to the nations, sunk in indolence and dissipation, fell at last, after many ineffectual struggles, an easy conquest to the Goths, under Alaricus (Alaric), who overran the whole of Italy, ravaged their territories, pillaged their cities, and gave up their boasted capital (August 24th, 409), to be plundered, for five days, by the savage hordes who fought under his standard. In the early ages of the Roman state, the bodies of the dead were buried, not burned, and that practice was never entirely discontinued (Plin. ii. 91). Barbers first brought to Rome by P. Titinius Mena, 300 B. C. He took them from Sicily (Plin. ii. 107). Before that time, the Romans were unshaven (ib.). Adj. Rōmānus, et, Rōmānicus, a, um. Rōmānēnsis, et, Rōmānlēnsis, is, e, brought or imported to Rome; not of frequent occurrence in classic authors. Rōmānitās, ātis, f. Roman empire. Adv. Rōmānē, according to the Roman manner or custom.

Rōmānus Hispo, Rōmāni Hispōnis, m. a mercenary advocate, who became an informer under Tiberius, into whose favour he wrought himself, and became formidable to the first man of Rome. His example was followed by the whole crew of that description, and thus from beggary and contempt rose to wealth and consequence. Römulus Rhip appears to have been the first who engaged in this detestable trade, by which after having wrought the destruction of others, they almost all fell by their own pernicious arts (Tac. Ann. i. 74 seq.).

Römulus, i. n. a place in the south of Italy, near Castrum, Castel Felice. This word does not occur in the writings of the ancient geographers, and critics differ respecting the true reading of the line of Ovidian (Met. xv. 715).

Römulus Mircillus, Römili Mircilli, m. a Roman centurion in the eighth century before Christ. For attempting to defend the image of Gullus, the soldiers loaded him with stones, and Vitellius hurried him to execution (Tac. Hist. i. 36-38). Adj. Römilian, a. um. Römilia R., respecting the persons allowed to perform sacred rites.

Römulus, T. Römili, m. (surnamed Römulus Vitellianus, in com. cal.), was consul in 455 B. C., and in conjunction with his colleague, gained vast booty by the defeat of the Aequi, in the district of Algidum. The emptiness of the treasury, induced the consuls to sell the spoils, for which the tribunes of the people brought them to trial next year; Römulus was condemned to pay ten thousand asses. This decision did not prevent his being elected one of the discuviri, four years after (Liv. iii. 31 seq.).

Römilia, n. f. a town of Samnium, or of the Hirpini, taken by Q. Fabius Maximus, the Roman consul, and plundered, in 295 B. C. (Liv. x. 17).

Römulus Denter, Römili Dētris, m. the first prefect of Rome. Römulus appointed him to that office, that the city might not be exposed to a state of anarchy during his absence, and invested him with the whole executive authority (Tac. Ann. vi. 11).

Römulus, i. n. See Quirinus.

Römulus Silvius, Römili Silvii, m. an Alban king, son of Agrippa, and father of Aventinus (Liv. i. 3).

Römili milites, light armed soldiers, who, according to Festus and Varro, had this name from deus (a röre), because they skirmished with the enemy, before the legions joined battle, as deus, or small rain, precedes a shower. They appear to have been the same, or nearly the same with the Vélites, some say they were afterwards called Vélites q. e. Livius makes the Hästati commence the battle, but the Vélites might skirmish on the wings, where they seem to have been generally placed (Liv. viii. 8).

Röscillus, i. m. a son of Adrucillus, who had long held the chief sway among the Allobroges. Röscillus and his brother Ægus were men of great bravery, and their services were highly beneficial to Caesar, during his wars in Gallia, France. They afterwards deserted him and joined Pompey, because he had blamed them for fraud, both with respect to the Gallic cavalry under their command, and with respect to the returns which they made to him of the number of their troops (Cæs. B. C. iii. 59).

Röscius Cælius, Röscii Cælii, m. a lieutenant-general of the twentieth Roman legion. Between him and Cælius Trébëllius Mithras, commander of the tenth legion, a quarrel of long continuance was ended with greater bitterness in the year 6. The dissension proved injurious to the discipline of the troops, and Trébëllius found it necessary to consult his safety by flight. Hence, from changing Trébëllius with more confidence to the soldiers, became a focus with the army; and his restless disposition increased their attachment, while it drew the apprehension of his opponent (Is. Hist. i. 60).

Röscius, L. Röscii, m. a Roman consul, put to death by Luc. Tarquin, king of the Volturni, in 457 B. C. (Liv. ii. 17).—2. A lieutenant-general, to whom Cæsar gave the command of the third legion, which he was to march into the territories of the Etrusci (Cæs. B. C. v. 24 seq.).

Röscius Odus, L. Röscii Odici, a. a tribune of the Roman people, who died a law in 455 B. C., that the knights still be separated from the people in the death, by having the first fourteen seats allotted them; to which Höratius alludes (Epi. ix. 16). This law had no reference to the circus, where all ranks of people and a promiscuous intercourse, until the third year of our era, when the senators and knights had a place assigned them, apart from the plebeians. The emperor Claudius first appointed a proper place for the senators. Néro did to the knights (Suet. Claud. 21. Nér. 11). Adj. Röscian, a. um. Röscian the law above referred to (Hor. Epi. i. 62).

Q. Röscius, Q. Röscii, m. a Roman comedian, whom his countrymen admired for his talents, and esteemed for his virtues. The excellence of his acting greatly surpassed what the Romans had not seen, on which account they gave the name of Röscius, to every one of uncommon skill in the histrionic art. To him Höratius alludes, in his epistle to Augustus (ii. l. 85) and calls him doctus, to mark his prior knowledge of the profession. The epistles of this poet, are not simply beautiful and appropriate, but likewise distinctive and characteristic. The line to which reference has already been made, proves the accuracy of this remark. Grævus Æscopus indicates the seriousness with which the tragedian spoke, in order to express grief, by slow and solemn utterance. Quintillianus has expressed the idea of Höratius, with great precision. To Cicero, who was the firm friend and patron of Röscius, we are indebted for recording the chief excellencies of the comedian. The graces of his action, and the inimitable melody of his voice, added to his perfect conception of the character, not only delighted, but enraptured the audience. A very disagreeable squint injured his countenance, and, from the expression of Tæctus, probably affected both eyes; yet the Romans would not allow him to wear a mask, because, by it, they lost some of the finest tones of his voice. One Fannius brought an action against him, respecting his slave, but he was successfully and justly defended by Cicero, in an oration of which the greater part is still extant. In universality of histrionic excellence, Röscius fell short of the late Garrick; the former shone unrivalled in comedy, but does not appear to have had any talent for tragedy; the latter acted tragedy, comedy and farce, with equal success. His features represented every human passion with the same accuracy, so that his countenance became a perfect picture of the character in which he appeared. The muscular conformation of his face suggested to the spectator the ideas intended to be conveyed, perhaps even more powerfully and vividly, than could have been done by words. To both these actors, particularly to the latter, may be applied the words with which Hörätius describes Jūpiter, Nec riget quidquam simile, aut secundum (Tac. Orat. xx). Adj. Rōscīānus, a, um. Rōscīānum judicium (Aur. Vic. Vir. II. 81).

Rōscūs, a, um. Rōsca rūra, beautiful and fertile fields, near Lācus Vellnus, in the territory or district of Rēatē (Virg. Æn. vii. 712).

Rōstus Rēgūlus, Rōsli Rēgūli, m. a man who held the consulship at Rome, for one day, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. iii. 37).

Rōstra, orum, n. a pulpit, or place erected in the Roman forum, from which harangues were delivered. It was adorned with the beaks of the ships, which the Romans took from the Antistes, in 337 B. C.; hence the name. Līvius, by anticipation, uses this name, a hundred years before it received that decoration (iv. 17). See Antium.

Rōthus, i, m. one of the Mārmāridæ, who served in the army of Hānnibal, and fell at the siege of Sāgūntum, Muriedro, by the bravery of Theron (Sil. Ital. ii. 165).

Rōtōmāgus, i, f. Rouen, the capital of the Vellōcāsses, in ancient times, and now of Normandy. It stands on the river Seine, in circumference about seven miles, contains a number of curiosities, among which may be reckoned a bridge of boats over the river just mentioned (Amm. Mar. xv. 11).

Rōvillæ, arum, f. probably a corruption of Bōvillæ q. v. (Aur. Vic. Or. 17).

Rōxāna, æ, v. Rōxānē, es, f. daughter of Oxartes, and wife of Alexander the Great, whom he left pregnant at his death. Cāsānder caused Rōxāna and her son by Alexander, to be put to death (Just. xii. 15 seq.).

Rōxōlāni. See Rhōxōlāni.

Rūbēllius Blāndus, Rūbēlli Blāndi, m. a Roman of consular rank, who moved in the senate, that Lēpida, daughter of Faustus Sūlla, and Pōmpēia, grand-daughter of Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus, should be forbidden the use of fire and water, in the year 20. In the case of Lūtōrius Prīscus q. v., he voted for banishment, when the whole senate, with the exception of Mānus Lēpidus, were of opinion, that he should be put to death. He married Jūlia, daughter of Drūsus and Livia, and grand-daughter of Tiberius, after her separation from Nēro, and this union excited discontent, as his grandfather, a native of Tivoli, never rose above the equestrian rank. Tiberius appointed him and his other three great grandsons-in-law, to estimate the damage done by fire on Mōns Aventinus, Monte Aventino, in the year 36 (Tac. Ann. iii. 33 seq.).

C. Rūbēllius Blāndus, C. Rūbēlli Blāndi, m. son of Rūbēllius Blāndus, and Jūlia, the daughter of Drūsus, grand-daughter of Tiberius, and great grand-daughter of Livia, the wife of Augustus (Juv. Sat. viii. 39). Tācitus, who writes Rūbēllius Plautus, says, he was a man of ancient manners, of rigid austerity, and of great virtue. Remote from danger, he led a recluse life, but from the shade of obscurity, his fame shone forth with brighter lustre. The appearance of a comet, in the minds of the superstitious Romans, indicated a change of government, and they believed Rūbēllius would be the successor of Nēro. The emperor himself, deeply apprehensive of imminent danger, advised Rūbēllius to retire to his patrimonial estate in Asia, and to save his life, Rūbēllius immediately embarked, with his wife Antistia q. v. and a few friends, for that country. Tigēllinus accused him to Nēro, and his father-in-law, L. Antistius Vētus, sent him immediate advice by one of his freedmen, that his life was in danger, and advised him to take up arms in his own defence. This spirited counsel, which would in all probability have saved his life, and secured to him the succession, had no effect on Rūbēllius, who remained inactive, until the assassins from Nēro arrived, who murdered him in the presence of his wife. The wretches carried his head to Rome, and the detested Nēro rejoiced at his death, because he dreaded his virtue, and found himself at liberty to divorce Octavia, and marry Pōppea (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19 seq.).

C. Rūbēllius Gēminus, C. Rūbēlli Gēmini, m. was the colleague of C. Fūfius Gēminus in the consulship. Lāctāntius and others refer the Crucifixion to the year during which they held that office; but the moderns place it four years later, in the nineteenth of the reign of Tiberius, and 33 of our era (Tac. Ann. v. 1).

Rūbicon, v. Rūbico, ōnis, m. the Fiumecino, a river of Italy, formed by the junction of the Pisatello, the Rugone, Rugosa, Rigosa, or, Urgone, which three streams are very small in summer. It was the boundary between Itālia, Italy, and Gāllia Cisalpina, consequently the limit of Caesar's military command. Where these streams meet, there is a bridge, and, about a mile below it, there was a ford on the road from Rāvēnna, to Rimini, which was the direct line of that ambitious conqueror returning from Gāllia, France, when he raised the standard of rebellion against the government of Rome, and the liberty of his countrymen. This circumstance gives a celebrity to the rivalet, to which it, otherwise, had no title. It must be acknowledged, that some degree of uncertainty prevails respecting the stream called by the Romans, Rūbicon. Cluvērius, D'Anville, and others maintain, that it is now the Fiumecino, and their opinion is supported by the inhabitants of Rimini, in whose territory it is. For the same reason, the inhabitants of Cesena assert, that the Pisatello was the ancient Rūbicon, and, in support of their opinion, refer to an inscription on its banks, which can have little weight, since it is now considered spurious. It has been stated that the Luso, which crosses the road three miles east of Savignano, anciently bore the name of Rūbicon. The last merits little notice, since it cannot be doubted, that both the Pisatello and Fiumecino have a much stronger claim to that distinction. Classical travellers of late years, seem unanimously to confirm the opinion of the two eminent geographers above-mentioned. Parvus Rūbicon (Luc. Phar. i. 185). Punicus Rūbicon

(Luc. Phar. l. 214). This epithet may be referred to the colour of the bed or channel in which it flows, and the same idea was perhaps conveyed by the name. Isid. amaral Rübēnis (Claud. xliii. 1).

Rübēnus Lappa, Rübēni Lappa, m. a poor tragic poet mentioned by Juvénalis (Sat. vii. 72).

Rübēria, æ, f. a vestal virgin, on whom the Roman Emperor Néro committed a rape (Suet. Ner. 25).

Rübrius, i, m. a Roman knight of small fortune, accused of violating the divinity of Augustus, by perjury, in the year 13. The emperor Tiberius suppressed the prosecution (Tac. Ann. i. 73).

Rübrius Fäbitus, Rübri Fäbiti, m. a Roman, who fled from Italy, with the intention of seeking security among the Parthians. A centurion found him on the Strait of Messina, and brought him back to Rome, when, on being questioned, he could give no satisfactory reason for so long a journey, yet he lived in safety, from being forgotten rather than forgiven (Tac. Ann. vi. 14).

Rübrius Gallus, Rübri Gallii, m. a Roman who had considerable influence with the army, on the death of Otho, and effected a union between Plävlus Sabinus and Cæcina (Tac. Hist. ii. 51 seq.). To him Juvénalis is supposed to allude, but without evidence at all approaching to certainty (Sat. iv. 105).

L. Rübrius, L. Rübrii, m. a Roman of senatorian dignity, who was taken prisoner along with many others at Corfinium, Perino (Cæs. B. C. i. 23).

Rübrum Märe, the Red Sea, or, Arabian Gulf, forms the natural division betwixt Asia and Africa, hence the moderns almost universally consider it the eastern boundary of Africa. Some of the ancients bounded Africa on the east by the Nile, and a few, who divided the old continent only into two parts, considered Africa part of Europe. From the Strait of Babilmandeb (i. e. the gate of lamentation: Fauces Märis Rübri) to the Isthmus of Suez, the two extremities of this inland sea, the distance is reckoned at fourteen hundred and seventy miles. The breadth is nowhere very considerable. It terminates in two unequal branches, that to the west greatly exceeding, both in length and breadth, the one to the east. Livius calls Märe Rübrum the utmost boundary of the earth, and as he mentions it after India, it is evident he could not understand by it the Arabian Gulf, because the conquests of Alexander to which he refers, were greatly farther east, and must have meant what is now called the Indian Ocean (xlv. 9). The Latin expression, which is a literal translation of the Greek, seems frequently used in a very enlarged sense, comprehending the ocean which washes the southern coast of Asia, at least as far as it was known to the ancients. Much ingenuity has been displayed, in attempting to account for this appellation red, since neither the sands, nor colour of the waters could give rise to the name. Without enumerating the various conjectures, it may be deemed enough simply to observe, that the eastern shore of the Arabian Gulf was in very remote times inhabited by the Edomites, and Edom, signifying red, it would naturally be called the sea of Edom, not only by that people, but also by the neighbouring nations. The Greeks translated the Jewish or Persian expression literally, in which they are imitated by the Romans. The conjecture that gulf would, following common usage, give that name to the Indian Ocean, which they entered by means of this inlet, is in the same manner as the mountain Atlas gave name to the western ocean, and the river Siberia on the eastern extremity of Europe Russia does to that extensive tract of land which occupies a great part of northern Asia.

Rüdine, arum, f. a town of Cilicia, distinguished by being the birthplace of the poet Ennius, of which no vestige now remains. Some moderns have in vain attempted to identify it with a town or village near the site of this ancient town. Conjecture, unsupported by evidence, merits neither aid nor regard. Rüdine veteris (Str. lib. vi. 396). Isid. Rüdini, orum (Sicg. Rüdini, i), m. Aff. Rüdinius, a, um. Rüdini (picta) ait (Auson. cccxlix. 17).

Rüfa, æ, f. an infamous woman, a mistress of Bönonta, Bologna (Catal. lx. 1).

Rüffrium, i, n. v. Rüffra, arum, f. Rüffra, a Tera di Bari, a town of Campania, on the confines of Samnium, taken by the Roman consuls from the Samnites, in 423 B. C. (Liv. viii. 25). Isid. Rübrii, arum, a.

Rüfilla, æ, f. a diminutive from Rüf (Suet. Aug. 69).

Rüfillus, i, m. a man whom Höratius censures, for being highly perfumed, which the Romans reckoned scandalous (Sat. i. 2. 27).

Rüfinus, i, m. a friend of Ovidius, who wrote the poet after his banishment, and, on return, the unhappy exile expresses his gratitude and sense of the favour, in one of his letters from the shores of the Black Sea (Ep. Pont. i. 3).—2. A man, who, on the death of Theodosius, aided his son Arcadius in the government of the east, and endeavoured to place himself on a level with that prince, if not to dethrone him. He fell in that rebellion, by the troops under Arcadius, who appears to have decoyed, not conquered him. Claudianus writes some bitter invectives against this ambitious minister, or rather presumptuous rebel (iii. seq.).—3. A man of great wealth, whom Martialis advises to check his pride (iii. 31).—4. A commander in Gaul, who embraced the interest of Vindex, for which the soldiers of Vitellius demanded his execution, and that ambitious commander did not attempt to resist their inclination (Tac. Hist. ii. 94).

Rüfio, onis, m. son of a freedman of C. Julius Caesar, to whom he left the care and command of three legions at Alexandria (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 76).

Rüfius Crispinus, Rüfii Crispini, m. commanded the pretorian guards, and seized Asiaticus at Bais, whom he brought in chains to Rome. On the death of two Roman knights named Pëtra, Crispinus received fifteen thousand sesterces and pretorian honours. Agrippina prevailed with the emperor, to remove him from the command of the pretorian guards, in consequence of his engagements to Missälina, and attachment to her children. He married Pöppæa Sëbina, by whom he had a son called by his own name, but Otho, afterwards emperor, first debauched and then married her. In consequence of his marriage with that unprincipled woman, Rūfius Crispinus was brought to trial under the hollow pretext of a conspiracy, and sent into banishment to Sardinia, where he died by his own hand (Tac. Ann. xi. 1 seq.).—2. The son of the former, whom Nēro, says Suetonius, caused to be thrown into the sea, because it had been reported, that among his playfellows, he acted the part of a general or an emperor (Suet. Ner. 35).

Rūfrā. See Rūffriū.

Rūtūlī, v. Rūtūllī, orum, m. military tribunes appointed by the consuls. They had this name from Rūtūllus Rūfius, who passed a law for that purpose (Liv. vii. 5).

Rūtūlus, i. m. a man of vicious conduct, whom Cātūllus holds up to derision (lix).

Rūfius, i. m. a rhetorician of great celebrity, who was the rival of Cicero, and charged that orator with writing barbarous Latin, like an Allobrogian. Some consider that Jūvénālis has two characters in view; and others but one (Sat. vii. 213 seq.).—2. A man ridiculed by Cātūllus for his dirtiness and offensive smell (lxix).—3. A false friend exposed by Cātūllus (lxvii). It is uncertain whether he is the same with the former, or with M. Cæcilius Rūfius, the celebrated orator of that period.—4. A friend of Mārtiālis, whose name frequently occurs in his writings (i. 107, &c.).

Rūfius Hēlvius, Rūfī Hēlvī, m. a common soldier, whom Aprōnīus rewarded with a spear and collar, because he had saved the life of a Roman citizen, in the year 20 (Tac. Ann. iii. 21).

Rūfius Scribōnīus, Rūfī Scribōnī, m. brother of Prōcūlus Scribōnīus q. v. Their mutual esteem and brotherly affection rendered them remarkable, no less than their riches, talents, nobility, and virtue. Pācētus Africānus, by artful misrepresentation, converted their virtues into crimes, and they sought protection from an ignominious death, by opening their own veins, and expiring together (Tac. Hist. iv. 41).

M. Rūfius, M. Rūfī, m. a questor, who attached himself to Cæsar during the civil war, and had the command of 12 ships at Aquilāria (Cæs. B. C. ii. 23).

Rūgī, orum, m. the Rugians, a German nation, who lived on the shores of the Baltic Sea. The island Rugen, and the town of Rugenwald, have perpetuated their name (Tac. Mor. Ger. 43).

Rūllus, i. m. a man who killed Völūnx in the battle of Trāslmēnus, the Lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 260).—2. A son of Māntua, and brother of Nōrbānus. He killed Archēmōrus in Africa, at the battle of Zāma (Sil. Ital. xvii. 426). Perhaps this is the same with the former.

P. Rūpilius, P. Rūpīlī, m. (surnamed in con. cal. Lūpus) a Roman who held the consulship in 134 B. C., and terminated the war with the fugitives in Sicily (Liv. Ep. 59).

Rūscīno, ōnis, f. Rosciana, a town of France, about two miles from Perpignan, destroyed by the Normans, of which scarcely a vestige remains. Here Hannibal was met by the petty princes of Gallia, who, captivated with his presents, cheerfully conducted his troops through their territories (Liv. xxi. 24). Adj. Rūscīnōnēnsis, is, e. Rūscīnōnēnsis comitatus, Roussillon.—2. A port of Africa, sometimes written Rūsūcūron q. v.

Rūscus Cæpio, Rūscī Cæpiōnis, m. a Roman senator of great wealth, who had, by his will, bound his heir, to give a certain sum annually to each senator at their first meeting, but the Emperor Dōmītiānus annulled the deed (Suet. Dom. 9).

Rūsēllæ, arum, f. Roselle, a town of Etruria, taken by the Roman consul, L. Pōstūmus Mēgellus, in 296 B. C. (Liv. x. 37). Inh. Rūsēllāni, orum, m. (Liv. xxviii. 45). Adj. Rūsēllānus, a, um. Rūsēllānus ager (Liv. x. 4).

Rūso, ōnis, m. a Roman family, celebrated by Mārtiālis for their affability and politeness. The reading is doubtful, some editions having Drūsōnes (v. 29).

Rūspīna, æ, f. perhaps Susa, a maritime town of Byzācium, a district of Africa. It stands a little to the south of Adrumētum (Plin. i. 335. Sil. Ital. iii. 260).

Rūsūcūron, ōnis, m. Carbona, a port of Africa, near Tūnes, where the Carthaginians passed a night in 205 B. C., on their way from Carthage, to attack the fleet of P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus at Utica. This delay probably prevented the destruction of the Roman army (Liv. xxx. 10).

Rūtēni, orum, m. a people of Gallia, on Tārnīs, the Tarne; their country is now called Rouergue (Cæs. B. G. i. 45 seq.). Flāvi Rūtēni, red haired Rūtēni (Luc. Phar. i. 402).

Rūtīlius Gāllicus, Rūtīlī Gāllicī, m. a friend of the poet Stāfīus, whom he congratulates on recovering from a lingering disease. He appears to have been of a very ancient and honourable family, several of whom had borne the office of consul. He was prefect of Rome under the Emperor Dōmītiānus, hence Jūvénālis, Custos Gāllicus urbis (Sat. xiii. 157), and Stāfīus, Mitis cūstodia intrépida Roma (Syl. i. 4. 16).

Rūtīlius Lūpus, Rūtīlī Lūpī, m. a lieutenant-general of Pōmpēius in Achāia, a district of Greece, who, to secure that province, resolved to fortify the Isthmus of Corinth (Cæs. B. C. iii. 55).

P. Rūtīlius, P. Rūtīlī, m. a tribune of the people, who brought the censors to trial, in 171 B. C. In return, the censors united in degrading him from his tribe, and disfranchising him (Liv. xliii. 16 seq.).

P. Rūtīlius Cālvis, P. Rūtīlī Cālvi, m. a Roman who held the office of prætor, in 168 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 44).

P. Rūtīlius Lūpus, P. Rūtīlī Lūpī, m. a Roman who held the consulship with L. Jūlius Cæsar, in 92 B. C. He was killed in an engagement with the Mārī, Pēlignī and Picēntes, but his lieutenant-general, C. Mārius, fought them with better success. Lūcilius accuses him of impiety, and disregarding an oath (Sat. i. 4), which Hōrātiū quotes, as justifying satirists in exposing vice, and holding up to abhorrence the perpetrators by name (Sat. ii. 1. 68). Pērsius supports the opinion of Hōrātiū (Sat. i. 115).

P. Rūtīlius Rūfius, P. Rūtīlī Rūfī, m. a lieutenant-general under the consul Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus in Africa. He held the consulship with Cn. Mānlius Māxīmus (107 B. C.), some time after which, he was lieutenant-general under Q. Mūciū Scævōla, when he attempted to protect the people of Asia from the oppression of the revenue farmers, and fell under the displeasure of the equestrian order.

trian order, who had the charge of matters of that kind, and brought him to trial. Disregarding both the want of evidence, and his unsullied reputation before his impeachment, his judges condemned him for extortion, and sentenced him to banishment, in 96 B. C. He retired to Smýrna (Liv. Ep. 70). His inflexible justice, and incorruptible integrity necessarily provoked the hatred of the vicious and profligate. Velleius Paterculus asserts, that he was a man, the very best not only of his own time, but of any age. Nor did moral excellence alone constitute the whole of his character. He had an uncommon knowledge of the military art, which enabled him to introduce many improvements into the Roman discipline. What to moderns may seem incredible, the Romans did not train their soldiers in the art of attack and defence, until Rutilius instructed them. In his banishment, he devoted his time to philosophy and literary pursuits; and practised the principles of the Stoics, which he had learned under Pānætiūs, in seeking happiness in the command of the passions, in bearing misfortunes with firmness, and in the exercise of virtue. He resisted the urgent solicitude of L. Cōrnēlius Silla at the head of the state, to quit the place of his retreat, and return to Rome. His love of literature fitted him for retirement, and the loss of his writings must ever be regretted. He was an able lawyer, a faithful historian, and an orator, whose eloquence Cicero mentions with respect. He passed a law, that no house in Rome should exceed seventy feet in height, Trājanus afterwards limited the height to sixty feet (Suet. Aug. 89). He wrote in Greek the history of his own times, the war against Hannibal, the siege of Numāntia, at which he fought, and the war in Numidia. The last work high commendation for its impartiality. In addition to these works may be mentioned his own biography, which Tacitus commends observations on the Greek philosophers, and orations on several topics. Velleius Paterculus observed, that Rutilius had a just claim to the surname of Felix than Silla, the former having obtained it by the integrity of his life, and the latter by the infamy of his arms.

Sp. Rutilius Crassus, Sp. Rutilius Crassus, a Roman elected a tribune of the soldiers, with consular power, in 416 B. C. (Liv. ii. 47).

Rūtība, m., a famous gladiator (Zon. Sat. ii. 7. 96).

Rūtība, m., the Rotta, a river of Liguria (Plin. i. 318). Cānus Rūtība (Liv. Phar. ii. 422).

Rūtīli, ornu (Sing. Rūtīlus, is), a people of Lātium, who were reckoned the most ancient nation of Italy. Ancient geographers have left no accurate description of the territory possessed by the Rūtīli. When Ænēas came to that country, Daunus was their king. Turnus, the only son of that prince, who had been previously betrothed to Lavinia, opposed her marriage with the Trojan, and endeavoured to support his claim by force of arms. See Turnus. Ardia afterwards Ardēa, was their chief city.

Rūtīlus, i., a Roman who had numerous flocks of sheep. He was killed by Cānus in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xv. 768).

Rūtīpius, arum, f. Richborough, a town in Cāntium, Kent, near which the Romans found excellent oysters. Adj. Rūtīpius, a., um. Rūtīpius fūndum (māris), the bottom of the sea at Richborough (Juv. Sat. ii. 141).

Saansan (L. e. king of kings), m. an appellation of the Persian monarchs (Amm. Mar. xix. 2).

Sāba, is, f. a district of Arābia Felix, on the Red Sea (Plin. iii. 23). From Stēphānus it appears to have been a place of considerable distinction, and others consider it the same with Sābo. Sābae, arum, f. As-sab, a city and port on the Red Sea. Inh. Sābaei, orum (Sing. Sābaeus, i.), m. were reckoned effeminate by the Romans, hence mōles Sābaei (Virg. G. i. 57); but mild and tractable (Claud. viii. 305). Adj. Sābaeus, a., um, Sābaean, Arabian. Sābaea mēsis, an Arabian crop (Claud. xxi. 58). Sābaei lūci, groves of the frankincense tree (Claud. x. 210). Sābaeum tus, Sābaean frankincense, which was reckoned to be of the very finest quality by the ancients. Virgilius seems to have thought, that frankincense was only found in Arābia, Solus est tūda virga Sābaei (G. ii. 117), in which opinion he is followed by Plinius. The Mimosa Nilotica, or Aca-cia Vera produces frankincense, and vast quantities are gathered from trees growing near to the northern bay of the Red Sea, at the foot of the mountain Sinai. It was called Tus or Thus by the dealers in Egypt, from Thur or Thor, the name of a harbour in that bay, and thereby distinguished from the gum Arabic, which comes from Soc.

Sabāces, is, m. a governor of Egypt, who commanded a powerful force in the army of Darius, at the battle of Issus, where he was killed with the Phrygian governors Atisus and Rhēomithres (Curt. iii. 11).

Sabāco, ōis, m. a king of Ethiopia, who overran Egypt, with a powerful army, and afterwards returned to his own country, at the end of fifty years, in consequence of a dream (Herod. ii. 137 seq.).

Sabāria, e. f. Stein Am Anger, a town of Pannōnia (Amm. Mar. xxx. 5).

Sābāta, orum, n. Vadi, a town at the foot of the Alps, on the Italian side, two hundred and sixty stadia from Gēnūa, Genoa. Strabo makes the Alps commence at Sābāta, and the Apennines at Genoa. Adj. Sābātian, et, Sābātianus, a., um. Sābātian vāda, e. stigma, Savona (Cluv.). Vadi (D'Anv.) (Sil. Ital. viii. 490). Sābātiana trībūs (Liv. vi. 5).—2. Sābātha, et, Sabōta, the capital of the Atramiūm in Arābia (Plin. i. 726 seq.).

Sābātus, i., m. the Sabato, a river of Italy, which rises in the country of the Hirpini and falls into Vultūrnus. Sābātini, orum, m. the people who lived on the banks of that river (Liv. xxvi. 33). Some have supposed, fines which the people had imposed. They prosecuted individuals accused of treason, in the performance of which duty they are first mentioned by Livius (ii. 41), and they punished those who were condemned as guilty of that crime. In point of dignity, their office was inferior to that of prætor, being the first step of preferment, which entitled the holder to admission into the senate. Like the other important offices in the Roman state, patricians only for a considerable time were eligible to the quaestorship. In 418 B. C., however, the number of quaestors was doubled, and it became at the same time legal for plebeians to aspire at this dignity. The city quaestors continued to discharge the same duties as formerly, and the two newly-elected accompanied the consuls to their provinces, where they took care that provisions and pay were furnished to the army, kept the money deposited by the soldiers, exacted the taxes and tribute of the empire, and sold the spoils taken in war. The former were called Quæstōres Urbāni, the latter Quæstōres Provinciāles, or, Militāres. The number of quaestors continued the same till 270 B. C., when other four were added. Silla afterwards increased the number to twenty, and Julius Cæsar to forty. During the reign of the emperors, the changes in regard to the quaestors became so frequent, as to render even their enumeration impossible. Quæstūra, n. f. the office of quaestor; the quaestorship. Proquaestor, ōris, m. one appointed by the governor, in room of a provincial quaestor. Adj. Quæstōriās, a, um, of, or belonging to, a quaestor. Quæstōrium forūm, the quaestor's tent in the camp, also the place in the province where his accounts were kept.

Quærens, ēntis, m. a Rutulian, who, with Æquicōlus, Imārus, and Hæmon, rushed into the city of Lætinus, on the opening of a gate by Pandarus and Bitias, and the whole either died or lost their lives in the threshold (Virg. Æn. ix. 684).—2. A son of Crista, who, with his father and four of his brothers, fell at the battle of Cannæ by the hand of Hannibal (Sil. Ital. x. 151).

Quæretulanus, a, um. Quæretulanus mōns, one of the hills on which Rome stood, which had this name from being covered with oaks; afterwards called Cælius, from Coles Vibenna, a chief of the Etrurians, who brought assistance to the Romans under the monarchy, and had that hill assigned for the residence of himself and countrymen; but by which of the kings is uncertain (Tac. Ann. iv. 65).

Quinctianus, i, m. an intimate friend of Martialis (l. 53 seq.).

Quinctii, orum, m. a Roman clan, originally from Alba, whom Tullus Hostilius, the third king of Rome, admitted into the senate, when he demolished their city, and removed the inhabitants to the Cælian mount (Liv. i. 33). Adj. Quinctius, a, um. Quinctia gēns (Liv. iii. 12).

Quinctilianus, i, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who reported to the senate an account of a book of the Sibyl, under the emperor Tiberius (Tac. Ann. vi. 12). See Cæcilius Gallus.

Quinctilius Vārus, Quinctili Vārī, m. the common friend of Virgilius and Hōrātius, whose death the latter laments, in an ode adressed to the former (l. 24). The poet endeavours to diminish the grief of his friend, by the most soothing strains of affectionate sympathy, and, having hinted at the impropriety of unavailing regret, gradually directs his mind to the absolute necessity of submitting to the decrees of fate. Vārus is probably the same person whom Hōrātius extols as an able critic, who gave his opinion without disguise, and, if not followed, ceased to speak on the subject (Art. Poet. 438).—2. Son of P. Quinctilius Vārus and Claudia Pūlchra. He married Sūlla, daughter of Germānicus and Agrippina. Dōmitius Afer and P. Dōlabēlla accused him in the year 27, with the view of obtaining his large possessions, but the senate put off the cause, until the emperor, then absent, should return to Rome, and this delay proved the safety of Quinctilius (Tac. Ann. iv. 66).

Cn. Quinctilius, Cn. Quinctili, m. a Roman patrician, who was created dictator in 331 B. C., for the purpose of driving a nail, an expiation which had formerly calmed the distracted minds of the public, and it was hoped would have the same effect at that period, when so many matrons had been detected in preparing and administering poison (Liv. viii. 18).

M. Quinctilius Vārus, M. Quinctili Vārī, m. elected a military tribune, with consular power, in 402 B. C. That year the military tribunes were increased to eight (Liv. v. 1).—2. Son of P. Quinctilius Vārus, a youth of great spirit, who led on the cavalry in an engagement with Māgo, in 205 B. C. The victory would have been complete on the side of the Romans, had not the Carthaginian general brought up his elephants, at the smell, sight, and snorting of which, the horses took fright (Liv. xxx. 18).

P. Quinctilius Vārus, P. Quinctili Vārī, m. elected a prætor in 205 B. C., and obtained Ariminum with two legions. In the territory of the Insūbres Gālī, he defeated Māgo, the Carthaginian general, wounded himself, and killed five thousand of his men (Liv. xxix. 38 seq.).—2. A Flamen of Mars, who died in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 18).—3. Elected prætor in 168 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 44). From the subsequent book of this historian being lost, nothing more of this man's history is known.—4. Son of Sextus Quinctilius Vārus, who, after the defeat of his party, killed himself. Velleius Patērculus says, he was descended from a family more noble than illustrious, a man of a mild disposition, of peaceful habits, sluggish both in body and mind, more accustomed to the idleness of the camp than to active warfare. Syria gave evidence of his love of money, as he plundered that country, for he poor entered it rich, and he rich left it poor. He next obtained the government of Germany, and possessed none of the qualities fitted to command so numerous, restless, and warlike a people; but, incurring their hatred and contempt, fell with his whole army into a snare, contrived by two of their generals, who cut off his whole army, consisting of three legions, and about the same number of auxiliaries. Finding it impossible to escape, after being wounded, he stabbed himself, showing, as Patērculus says, that he had more courage for meeting death, than engaging in battle (l. 117—120). Flōrus mentions that after his body had been buried, the Germans dug it up, having previously mutilated it in the most barbarous manner (iv. 12). He married Claudia Pulchra, by whom he had Quinctilius Vārus q. v. Adj. Vāriānus, a. um. Vāriāna clādes, the destruction of Vārus and his army (Suet. Aug. 23). Roman authors frequently mention this disaster (Tac. Ann. i. 10). Vāriānus exercitus (Tac. Ann. ii. 7). Vāriāna cades (Suet. Aug. 49).

Sēxtus Quinctilius Vārus, Sēxti Quinctilii Vāri, m. was elected consul in 453 B. C., a year of tranquillity with the tribunes of the people, but of great mortality both in the city and country. Quinctillius and four of the plebeian tribunes died (Liv. iii. 32).—2. Son of P. Quinctilius Vārus, consul in 13 B. C., a quæstor of senatorian rank, who was at Corfinium, St. Perino, at the time the gates of that city were opened to Cæsar. Having obtained his liberty from that general, he went to Africa, and was in the army of Attius Vārus, when Cūrio brought from Sicily the forces which had revolted to Cæsar, at the town above-mentioned. Sēxtus Quinctilius Vārus attempted to seduce them from Cūrio, but without success. After the battle of Philippi, he killed himself (Cass. B. C. i. 23 seq.).

T. Quinctilius Vārus, T. Quinctilii Vāri, m. a lieutenant-general of considerable merit under C. Cālpurnius prætor in Spain, in 187 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 31).

Quinctilius, a. um. Quinctilia gens, a Roman clan, originally from Alba (Liv. iii. 12).

Quinctius Atticus, Quinctii Attici, m. a Roman who, with Albius Cæcina, held the consulship for the two last months of the year 69. The haughty style of his edicts, injurious to Vitellius, and favourable to Vespasianus, exposed Quinctius to the hatred of the soldiers, who made him prisoner. The emperor sheltered him from the fury of the populace, who demanded his life, considering himself bound in gratitude, to protect a man who voluntarily avowed that he himself had set the capitol on fire, and by that confession, or well-timed lie, says Tacitus, exonerated the Vitellian party from the guilt of the destructive conflagration (Hist. iii. 73–75).

Quinctius Cértus, Quinctii Cérti, m. a Roman knight, whom Dēcimus Pācārius, governor of Corsica, put to death because he objected to declaring in favour of Vitellius, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. ii. 16).

Quinctius Crispinus, Quinctii Crispini, m. a criminal intimate of Jūlia, daughter of Augustus (Vel. Pat. ii. 100).

C. Quinctius Cincinnātus, C. Quinctii Cincinnāti, m. a noble Roman, elected a military tribune with consular authority in 376 B. C. (Liv. vi. 32).

C. Quinctius Flāminius, C. Quinctii Flāminii, m. elected prætor, in 179 B. C., and to his lot fell the foreign jurisdiction (Liv. xli. 8).

Dēcus Quinctius, Dēcii Quinctii, m. a man of obscure birth, but of great military fame, acquired by many brave actions, commanded a Roman fleet of twenty ships stationed at Rhēgium, Reggio, in 212 B. C. In an engagement with the Tarentine fleet, Nico Perco drove a spear through his body, on which he fell lifeless into the sea (Liv. xxvi. 39).

Kæso Quinctius, Kæsōis Quinctii, a youth of great resolution, of high rank, of uncommon size, and prodigious strength to which qualities, "the gift of the gods," says Livius, he added many warlike accomplishments. With undaunted intrepidity, he alone withstood the attacks of the tribunes of the people, and the whole fury of the populace, when the former attempted to put the law of Tērēntillus, in 461 B. C. Two plebeian magistrates, convinced that he could be carried, whilst he was alive, appointed a day for his trial, resisting the entreaties of almost all the eminent men of the state in his favour. This intercession induced his prosecutors to accept of bail, instead of putting him in prison, and it is the first instance, on record, of a forfeited bail being applied to the use of the state. On the night preceding his trial, he went into voluntary banishment among the Etruscans, a punishment which the tribunes deemed satisfactory, and therefore exacted the bail with such severity, that they reduced to poverty his father L. Quinctius Cincinnātus (Liv. iii. 11–13).

Kæso Quinctius Flāminius, Kæsōis Quinctii Flāminii, m. appointed a dictator, to contract for the building of a temple to Concord at Rome, in 219 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 33).

L. Quinctius, L. Quinctii, m. a military tribune, who commanded a detachment, which was to seize on the part of Pāpēsius possessed by the Sāmmites, in 225 B. C. (Liv. viii. 25).—2. A Roman opposed by Lūcullus (Sal. Frag.).

L. Quinctius Cāpitōlinus, L. Quinctii Cāpitōlini, m. a military tribune with consular authority, in 384 B. C., in the same year nominated master of the horse by Cōrnēlius Cōssus (Liv. vi. 11).

L. Quinctius, L. Quinctii, m. surnamed Cincinnātus, because he twisted his hair into circles, or curls (in cincinnos), was the father of Kæso Quinctius, and reduced to poverty by the tribunes exacting, with the utmost severity, the bail for his son. After his property was sold, he lived, for a long time, in an obscure village beyond Tiber, the Terracina. On Minūcius, the consul, with his army being besieged by the Æqui, Quinctius was nominated dictator, in 458 B. C., two years after he had been consul, and the deputies sent by the senate to inform him of his appointment, found him employed in making a ditch, or ploughing his small farm of few acres, afterwards called Præla—Quinctia. Mutual salutations having passed, he was requested to take his gown which he had his wife Rællia bring out, and which, after wiping off the sweat and dust, he put on. The deputies then congratulated him on the dictatorship, and informed him of the alarming condition of the army. Government had prepared a vessel for him, and on his landing at the other side, he was first met by his three sons, then by his other relations and friends, and afterwards by the greater part of the patricians. Before daylight next morning, he repaired to the forum and named L. Tāquītius, a patrician, master of the horse. Attended by him, he went to the assembly of the people, proclaimed a cessation of civil business, ordered the shops to be shut throughout the city, forbade every one to adherence to the Romans, when Hannibal besieged their town. Reduced to the utmost extremity by famine, and perceiving that resistance was vain, they suddenly kindled in the forum a fire, in which they destroyed both public and private property, and then precipitated themselves into the flames. Hannibal ordered all the survivors, capable of bearing arms, to be put to the sword, and the other prisoners to become the property of his soldiers. Eight years after, Cn. and P. Cœnilius Scipio retook Sāgūntum, which they restored to its ancient inhabitants. For their deliverance from the slavery of the Carthaginians, they sent ambassadors to thank the senate, and to present a golden bowl to Jupiter in the capitol. These ambassadors were treated with the utmost respect by the senate, which granted all their requests, and ordered the towns through which they passed, to treat them in a most friendly manner. At a subsequent period, the Sāgūntini sent to Rome Carthaginian ambassadors, who had come to hire troops with two hundred and fifty pounds' weight of gold, and eight hundred of silver; the senate returned the gold and silver to the Sāgūntini, and threw the Carthaginians into prison. Adj. Sāgūntinus, a, um. Sāgūntina lāgēna, a Saguntine pot. (Juv. Sat. v. 29). The Sāgūntini excelled in making earthenware (Plin. v. 244. Mart. viii. 6). Sāgūntinus ignis (Flor. ii. 6).

Sāis, is, f. Sa el Hagar, a town of Egypt. Inh. Sāitāni, orum, m. Adj. Sāitānus, et, Sāitēus, a, um. Sāitēum ostium, one of the mouths of the Nile (Herod. ii. 17).

Sāla, æ, f. a town of Sāmōthrācia, near which the fleet of Xērxes arrived, and the ships were ranged in order, at the time when that monarch was drawing up his troops in the plain of Dāriscus in 480 B. C. (Herod. vii. 59).

Sāla, æ, m. the Sanle, a river of Franconia, one of the branches of Albia, the Elbe. It had this name from the quantities of salt made on its banks, by throwing the water of the river on a burning pile of wood (Tac. Ann. xiii. 37). Inh. Sālī, orum (Sing. Sālūs, i), m. a people who lived on the banks of this river. Sālūs jam cōlat rāra (Claud. xxi. 222).—2. The Isael, which Drusus connected with Rhēnus, the Rhine, by means of an artificial cut.

Sālāmis, e. Sālāmin, inis, et, Sālāminus, æ, f. Coloura, an island in Sinus Sārōnicus, the Gulf of Egina, so called from its modern capital, which has this appellation from the form of its harbour, resembling a round cake made at Athens, known by this name. It is about twenty-five miles in circumference, the greater part uncultivated, and not naturally fertile. It is distant two stadia from the coast of Attica, has but one river Bocarus, the Tokolias, and is inhabited only by Greeks, who retain the kindness and hospitality of their ancestors. Its ancient capital, which bore the same name, stood on the shore, of which the walls were four miles in circumference, but no vestiges now remain.

—2. Famagosta, a city of Cyprus, built by Tēucer, son of Tēlamon, king of Sālāmis, Coloura, and so called from his native island. Hērāclitus call this Ambigua Sālāmis, because there being two cities of that name, when either was mentioned, it would be necessary to add some discriminating word to prevent ambiguity (Od. i. 7. 29); and Lūcānus calls the other Vēra Sālāmis (Phar. iii. 183), as does also Mānilius (v. 50). Inh. Sālāminii, orum, m. (Plin. ii. 105). Adj. Sālāminius, et, Sālāminiacus, a, um. Sālāminium frētum (Just. ii. 12). Sālāmitæ (Insulæ), islands opposite, or near Famagosta (Plin. i. 615). Sālāminiacæ trōpææ, the victory at Sālāmis, Coloura (Sil. Ital. xiv. 282). Sālāminiacum mārē, the sea near Sālāmis, Coloura (Luc. Phar. v. 109).

Sālūnus, i, m. a man to whom Ovidius addresses one of his epistles from Pōntus (ii. 5).

Sālāpīa, æ, f. Salpe, a town of Apūlia, now in ruins. Hannibal came to this place in 216 B. C., on his return from Tārēntum, Taranto. Here he collected corn from the lands of Hērāclæa and Mētāpōntum, and sent out his troops to plunder the territories of the Sālētīni, and the neighbouring parts of Apūlia. At Sālāpīa, Salpe, the Carthaginians, who had been taken prisoners at Arpi, joined Hannibal in 215 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 20). Inh. Sālāpītāni, orum (Sing. Sālāpītānus, i), e. Sālāpīni, orum, m. part of whom were friendly to Hannibal, but at last joined the Romans. Adj. Sālāpīnus, a, um. Sālāpīna pātus, the Canal of St. Antonio (Luc. Phar. v. 377).

Sālārīus, a, um. Sālārīa rīa, a road leading from Rome to the country of the Sabines, and had its name, according to Fēstus, a sālē, which the Sabines carried along it from Ostia at the mouth of Tiber, the Tevere (Liv. i. 33 seq.).

Sālāsī, orum, m. a people of the Alps, through whose country Hannibal would have marched, according to Līvius, had he crossed either Peninus, or Crēmōnis Jūgum, Appius Claudius, the Roman consul, subdued them in 146 B. C., but they appear to have regained their liberty, since Līvius mentions them again as subjected to the government of Rome, about 25 B. C. (Ep. 53 seq.). The latter conquest happened in the reign of Augustus, when the Roman state appears to have been in a more flourishing condition, than at any former or succeeding period (Eutrop. vii. 9).

Sālēcā, v. Sālērā, æ, f. a town of Africa, about fifteen miles from the Roman camp, which was then five miles from Utica, in which Hānno had his head quarters, in 206 B. C. From it Māsīnēsa enticed him to come out to battle, in which that general fell (Liv. xxix. 34).

Sālētānus. See Sālētānus.

Sālētūs Bāssus, Sālētī Bāssī, m. an excellent poet, depressed by poverty, hence Juvēnalis calls him thīn, insinuating, that he had not enough of food (Sat. vii. 80). Tacitus gives him the character of an excellent man, as well as a poet of eminence, adding, he has the god (Apōllō) within him. This historian makes frequent allusion to his poverty; but mentions a present from the emperor Vēspāsīanus of fifty thousand sesterces (Orat. 5—9).

Sālērnum, i, n. Salerno, an inland town of Picēnum, says Plīnius, but Eustace thinks, that its position is unchanged. It stands in the centre and bosom of the bay, at the foot of a fine ridge of well cultivated hills. The inn is almost on the beach.

Here a colony of Roman citizens was planted in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 45). Adj. Sālernitānus, a, um. Sālernitāna rēgio, the district of Sālernum (Val. Max. vi. 8).

Sālētānus, i, m. the husband of Sēcūndilla, on whose death Mārtiālis wrote him an epigram, not lamenting his bereavement, but envying her large fortune which she had bequeathed to him. Some editions read Sālētānus (ii. 65).

Sālgancūs, eos, f. a town of Bēōtīa, at which Antiōchus, king of Sýria, pitched his camp, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 46). This town is mentioned in other chapters of the same book.

Sālīcē, es, f. a town of Scythia, near Tōmī (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 7).—2. The name given by the natives to Tāprōbānē q. v.

Sālīcēnus Clēmēns, Sālīcēni Clēmētis, m. a Roman senator, who called Jūnius Gāllio, the brother of the philosopher Sēneca, enemy and parricide, and continued a bitter invective against him, until checked by the unanimous voice of the whole assembly. In this appearance of zeal for the public good, Sālīcēnus only gratified personal animosity (Tac. Ann. xv. 73).

Sālīi, orum, (Sing. Sālīus, i), m. priests of Mārs Grādīvus, who were twelve in number, and appointed by Nōma Pōmpilius, who gave them, as a badge of distinction, a flowered tunic, and a brazen covering for the breast, which they wore over the tunic. He made it part of their duty to carry the celestial arms (Ancilla), and to go through the town singing hymns, with leaping and solemn dancing. This monarch selected the Sālīi from the patricians, and chose only such young men as were eminently distinguished by personal beauty and elegance. Virgilius refers the institution of this priesthood to Hērclēs, adding, that they bound their temples with branches of poplar (Æn. viii. 285). They had their temple, and performed their sacred rites on Pālātium, hence, they were sometimes called Pālātīni, and the twelve vowed by Tūllus Hōstīlius had theirs on Cōllīnus, and were called Agonāles, or Cōllīni. During that festival, the Roman army did not march. They were afterwards called Franci (Amm. Mar. xvii. 8). Adj. Sālīāris, is, e. Sālīāres dapes, the dishes, or feasts of the Sālīi, i. e. sumptuous, or costly dishes (Hor. Od. i. 37. 2). Sālīārē cārmen, originally confined to the praises of the gods, afterwards men became ambitious of having their names included in it, which formed a kind of apotheosis. Tiberius honoured the memory of Gērmānīcūs, by ordering the insertion of his character into that poem (Tac. Ann. ii. 83).

Sālīso, v. Sālētō, ōnis, f. Seltz, a town of Germany, on the Rhine, eleven miles distant from Tābērnū.

Sālīus, i, m. a native of Arcādia, who was one of the competitors in the foot-race, which he lost by a trick of Nīsus (Virg. Æn. v. 298 seq.).—2. A man in the army of Tūr-nus, who killed Thrōnīus, and was himself killed by Nēalces (Virg. Æn. x. 753).

Sālīentīa, ōe, f. a city of the Mēssāpīi. Inh. Sālīentīni, orum, m. a people who inhabited, not only that city, but the southeast extremity of Itālia, Italy. They became the enemies of the Romans in 308 B. C., when L. Vōlūmīnus, consul, was sent against that district, who defeated them in every engagement, took several of their towns by force, and obtained a great quantity of booty. They afterwards took up arms, and the Romans gained another victory over them, in which they were allowed to surrender (Liv. ix. 42). Adj. Sālīentīnus, a, um. Sālīentīnus ager, the territory of the Sālīentīni, which was plundered by Hānnībal in consequence of their fidelity to the Romans, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 20). Sālīentīnum, sive, Iapygium, prōmōntōriūm, Cape de Leuca (Plin. i. 355). Sālīentīnus rēx (Eutrop. viii. 9).

Sālūstius Lūcūllus, Sālūstii Lūcūlli, m. a lieutenant-general in Britain, whom the emperor Dōmītiānus destroyed, because he had allowed lances of a new form to be called by his name (Suet. Dom. 10).

Sālūvīi, v. Sālvi, v. Sālvi, orum, et, Sālviēs, um (Liv. xxi. 26), m. a Gallic nation, who lived on the east of Rhōdānus, the Rhine, near the mouth of that river. It is probably from an expression of Livius, that they occupied part of the Alps. At what time they settled there is unknown, but it must have been previous to the arrival of the Phocæans who built Marseilles, since they attempted to prevent their building that city. On being overpowered, they crossed into Italy, and took possession of lands near the Lævi Ligūres who inhabited the banks of Tīcīnus, the Ticino. Like many of the other Gallic tribes, they willingly joined the Carthagīniāns, from aversion to their more powerful neighbours the Romans, and were at last subdued in 124 B. C. by C. Sēxtus Cālvinus, præconsul, who founded a colony called from his name, and from the abundance of hot and cold springs called Aquæ Sēxtiæ, Aix (Liv. v. 34 seq.).

Sālmācis, Idīs, f. a nymph whose body united with that of Hērmaphrōdītēs, and was changed into a fountain in Cāria, which retains her name, hence Sātīus calls it fons dōlōsus (Syl. i. 5. 20). This spring is said to have rendered men who drank of it effeminate. According to Sēxtus Pōmpēius, the boys and girls washing promiscuously in this stream gave rise to the fiction, and the poets transferred the vices of the natives to the waters of this spring. In its vicinity stood the temples of Mērcūrius and Vēnus, in Greek Hērmes and Aphrōdītēs, whose names united form Hērmaphrōdītēs q. v., and this circumstance would give currency to the fable which it likewise serves to explain (Ov. Met. iv. 306 seq.).

Sālmōnēus, eos, m. son of Ædōlus and Enārētta, was brother of Ædōlus and Sīsypus. The latter sought his destruction, in consequence of their enmity to each other, and the oracle of Apōllō informed Sīsypus, how he might accomplish his murderous intention, but Tūrō q. v., daughter of Sālmōnēus, took means to prevent it. Jūpiter enraged at the impiety of Sālmōnēus, who claimed divine honours and attempted to imitate the thunder and lightning of that god, struck him dead by a thunderbolt. Of the madness, impiety, and punishment of Sālmōnēus, Virgilius has given an admirable description (Æn. vi. 585 seq.), as has also Mānilius (v. 91 seq.). Sālmōnis, Idīs, f. a patronymic of Tūrō, daughter of Sālmōnēus (Ov. Amor. iii. 6. 45. Val. Flacc. v. 479); applied also to nouns feminine.

Sälmydëssus, i. f. Midya, a seaport town of Thräcia, on the Black Sea (Herod. iv. 93).

Sälo, önis, m. the Xalon, a branch of Ibërus, the Ebro. From Märtälis it appears to have been a shallow, but rapid, stream. Iron and steel seem to have been fabricated on its banks. Near this river that poet was born, hence he has Patrius Sälo (x. 96).

Sälöna, æ, v. Sälöna, arum, f. a maritime town of Illyricum. The emperor Dioclesian was a native of Dälmatia, and retired to Sälöna after he resigned the purple, built a magnificent palace, occupying a space of about nine English acres, of which no vestiges now remain, spent the remainder of his life in peace and tranquillity, and died in the year 313. A small village near the site of Sälöna, preserves the name. Spalatra stands near the place which once was occupied by this ancient city (Cæs. B. C. iii. 8 seq.). Qua märis Hädräci longas fecit unda Sälönas (Luc. Phar. iv. 404).

Sälöniua, æ, f. wife of Alënus Cæcina g. v. (Tac. Hist. ii. 20).—2. Wife of Attälus, king of the Germani.

C. Sälönlus, C. Sälönli, m. one of the three Roman commissioners appointed to settle a colony at Tëmpera in 196 B. C., and afterwards one of ten for dividing large tracts of land in Ligüria and the north of Italy, amongst Roman and Latin colonists (Liv. xxxiv. 45 seq.).

P. Sälönlus, P. Sälönli, m. a Roman who held the office of a military tribune and of first centurion, almost every year, alternately. The army in a state of rebellion, prevailed on the senate to pass a law, that no man who had been a tribune of the soldiers should afterwards be a centurion. From opposing their licentious and mutinous conduct, he had incurred the resentment of the soldiers, which they took this opportunity of manifesting (Liv. vii. 41).

Q. Sälönlus Särra, Q. Sälönli Särræ, m. was elected prætor, and obtained the government of Särdinia, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 20).

Sälpinätes, ium, m. a people of Etrüria, who joined the Völsinæenses, on which the Romans marched against them and plundered their country, in 390 B. C. (Liv. v. 31 seq.). Adj. Sälpinas, us, as; ätis. Sälpinas ager (Liv. v. 32).

Sälpüga, æ, f. a kind of poisonous ant, mentioned by Plinius, unknown in Italy (iv. 696). This word is very differently written (Luc. Phar. ix. 837).

Sälvidiënus Orfitus, Sälvidiëni Orfiti, m. was put to death by the emperor Nëro, for letting three shops belonging to his house near the forum, for the accommodation of the deputies of some states (Suet. Ner. 37).—2. One killed by order of the emperor Dömiliänus, although in exile, under pretence of his attempting an insurrection (Suet. Dom. 10).

Q. Sälvidiënus Rüfus, Q. Sälvidiëni Rüfi, m. a lieutenant-general of Augüstus, defeated in a naval engagement by Sëxtus Pömpeius, son of Cn. Pömpeius Mägrus, in 44 B. C. Two years after, he endeavoured to promote a conspiracy against Augüstus, which M. Antönius discovered, and being convicted he killed himself (Liv. Ep. 127). The account given by Suetönius is somewhat different (Oct. 66).

Sälvius Cöccëänus, Sälvi Cöccëäni, m. a brother's son of the Roman emperor Otho, who bewailed the fate of his uncle. For observing his birthday, the emperor Dömiliänus condemned him to death (Suet. Dom. 10).

Sälvius Jülüänus, Sälvi Jülüäni, m. an eminent lawyer, who, at the command of the emperor Jülüänus, composed a perpetual edict, from which, at no future period, were the judges allowed to deviate. This important reformation in the administration of justice reflects great credit on the emperor who suggested, and on the civilian who formed it (Eutrop. viii. 17).—2. Grandson of the former, who likewise excelled in a knowledge of the law. On the death of Përtinäx, he seized on the government, was defeated by Sëvërus near Ponte Molle, and slain in the palace, after a reign of seven months. Herodiänus says, he lost his life by order of the senate, in which he is supported by Spärtiänus, and opposed both by Eutröpius (viii. 17), and by Aurëlius Victor, who calls him Didius Jülüänus, or, as in some editions, Didius Sälvius Jülüänus (de Cæs. 19). The last author confounds him in one or two particulars with the subject of the former article, who, according to some authors, was only his maternal great-grandfather.

L. Sälvius Otho, L. Sälvi Othönis, m. was elected consul with Faustus Cörnëlius Sülla, in the year 52. His father had not risen above the rank of prætor, and his wife appears to have been of inferior descent. In countenance he bore a strong resemblance to the emperor Tiberius, by whom he was greatly beloved (Suet. Oth. 1). He was the father of the emperor M. Sälvius Otho (Tac. Ann. xii. 52). In con. cal. he is surnamed Titiänus.—2. Surnamed Titiänus, son of the former, and brother of the emperor Otho. They held the consulship, part of the year 69. During the short reign of his brother, Titiänus had the government of Rome, and the command of the army. The imperial honours seemed vested in him. His rashness brought on the decisive engagement at Bëdriäcum, Caneto, where Vitëllius obtained a complete victory. The conqueror, on succeeding Otho, spared the life of Titiänus. From Täcitus we learn, that avarice formed a prominent feature in his character, and that, when præconsul of Asia, he readily connived at any iniquitous scheme, on condition he obtained a part of the plunder (Tac. Hist. i. 75 seq.).

M. Sälvius Otho, M. Sälvi Othönis, m. was the son of L. Sälvius Otho, a Roman knight, and of Albia Tërëntia, a woman of noble birth. Otho was born on 28th April, in the year 70. In very early youth he was wild and riotous, for which his father frequently scourged him severely. To his dress and appearance he paid the utmost attention, and was not only finical, but effeminate, hence Möllis Otho (Mart. vi. 32). In order to procure an introduction to Nëro, he pretended to be in love with a freedwoman, who held some office in the palace, although she was very old and nearly decrepid. Through her he obtained the notice of the emperor, with whom, from similarity of dispositions, he soon became a principal favourite. In this manner, he obtained a knowledge of all the emperor's secrets, who intrusted to him Poppæa Sabinæ, after he had taken her from her husband. To her Otho conceived so strong an attachment, that he could not bear the rivalry of Néro, and refused to give her up. On the marriage being dissolved, he received an appointment in Lusitania, Portugal, that he might be at a distance from Rome, which was in fact a kind of banishment, and at that period not uncommon. As quaestor he governed that province for ten years, with singular moderation and disinterestedness. In revenge for this treatment, he joined Galla in his design against Néro, and took every opportunity of making friends, that he might, at last, succeed to the empire. Having ingratiated himself with the body guards of Galla, after his accession to the imperial dignity, and having been disappointed in the hopes of his adopting him, he formed a plan for assassinating that monarch, which the body guards executed, and saluted him with the title of emperor. The senate received his appointment without resistance, and do not seem to have taken a decided part either with or against him. In the mean time, the armies in Germany swore allegiance to Vitellius, and the two rivals, after some unsuccessful attempts, on the part of Otho, to procure reconciliation, met in the north of Italy to decide it by the sword. In the first three engagements, Otho had the advantage, but in the last, at Bedriacum, Caneto, Vitellius, by a stratagem, gained a complete victory, soon after which, Otho laid violent hands on himself. During his whole life, Otho expressed the utmost abhorrence at civil wars, and to this aversion some attribute the slight resistance which he made against the troops of his rival. Many of his soldiers followed his example, and whilst the community wondered at a death so unsuitable to his life, they extolled his merits when he was consigned to the grave, although they detested him while living (Suet. Oth.). To Otho, Juvénalis uniformly appears hostile, and it cannot be denied that his vices, to say nothing of his ingratitude, treachery, and effeminacy, justly excited the hatred of the satirist. That poet introduces Otho as a very vicious character (Sat. ii. 99). Est summi ducis, it is the part of a very great general, i. e. of Otho (Juv. Sat. ii. 104). Adj. Othoniānus, a, um. Othoniānus exercitus (Tac. Hist. ii. 45).

Sālūs, ūtis, f. health, or the goddess of health, to whom C. Jūnius Bōbūlcus vowed a temple in the war with the Sāmmites, in 307 B. C., which he dedicated four years after, when dictator (Liv. ix. 43 seq.).

Sālŭi, orum, e. Sālŭes, um, m. See Sālŭitŭi.

Sāmāria, ō, f. a maritime district of Canaan. The capital had the same name (Plin. i. 566). Inh. Sāmāritæ, arum, m. (Tac. Ann. xii. 54).

Sāmārōbrŭva, ō, f. Amiens, a town of Gallia Belgica, on the south bank of the river Sāmāra, the Somme. It was afterwards called Ambianum, from its inhabitants; hence the present name (Cæs. B. G. v. 24 seq.).

Sāmŭlos, i, m. a mountain of Sŷria, mentioned only by Tacitus. It occurs only once in the writings of this historian, and from the vague manner in which it is introduced, nothing certain respecting it can be determined. Here Hērŭclēs received divine honours, and, according to ancient fable, inspired the dreams of his priests, chief, if not solely, respecting the tract where gem would be found (Tac. Ann. xii. 13).

Sāmŭs, es, e. Sāma, ō, et, Sāmos, i, f. was, according to Strābo, an ancient name of Cēphālŭnia, which others make a town and district of that island (Liv. xxxviii. 30). Supposing this opinion to be correct, it probably stood on a rocky peninsula, now called Asdi-Samo. It appears to have been a place of great strength. Pīnīus (l. 46) and Pōmponīus Mēla (ii. 7) make it a different island from Cēphālŭnia, Cephale. If the isthmus which connects Asdi-Samo with Cēphālŭnia, is at times overflowed by the sea, it will reconcile the difference of opinion existing amongst these ancient geographers. Inh. Sāmŭi, orum, m. by which the Greeks distinguished them from the inhabitants of Sāmos, an island off the coast of Iōnīa, whom they called Sāmī (Liv. xxxviii. 25 seq. 1.—2. An island off the coast of Ephesus. See Sāmos.—3. Another, off the coast of Thrācia, afterwards called Sāmōthrācia q. v.).

Sāmŭs, i, m. a man killed by Cālŭs in the battle at Zīma (Sil. Ital. xvii. 425). 2. A Roman knight of considerable distinction, who hired Sūllŭs with a prodigious fee, and, finding that he had betrayed his cause, went to the house of that perfidious orator, and fell upon his own sword, in the year 47 (Tac. Ann. xi. 5).

Sāmŭnŭm, i, a. an inland district of Italia, bordering on the northwest part of Apūllia. Inh. Sāmŭnŭtes, ium (Sic. Sāmŭs, itis, Liv. viii. 23), m. originally from Greece (Just. xx. 1). Adj. Sāmŭnŭs, i, ō, gen. itis, et, Sāmŭnŭteus, a, um. Sāmŭnŭ ager, the territory of the Sāmŭnŭtes (Liv. xxxi. 4). Sāmŭnŭteum bellum (Ann. Mar. xxx. 8. Aur. Vic. II. Vir. 26).

Sāmos, i, f. Sāmos, an island in Mīrī Egēum, the Archipelago, on the coast of Asia Minor, Natolia, opposite to Ephesus, Aiosoluc, about 32 miles long, and 22 broad. Greek authors, in general, make it about 87 miles in circumference. It is very elevated, and serves as a kind of landmark for the whole Archipelago. The channel which separates it from Natolia, is so narrow, that one person may hear another speak across it. Sāmos is very fertile, and all its productions, according to Strābo, were excellent, except wine. Its earthen ware, of which the Sāmŭians were considered the inventors, was highly valued. This island, according to Virgilius (Æn. i. 16), was a favourite residence of Jūno, which some supposed to be the birthplace of that goddess. In Sāmos there was a cognominal town (Herod. i. 142). The present population is about twelve thousand. Inh. Sāmŭi, orum, m. who appear to have been an ingenious and active people, felt every kind of tyranny. Their government was first monarchical, then oligarchical, and afterwards democratical. At one time they were oppressed by the Persians, and at another, by the Grecian states. Ovidius perhaps alludes to these changes (Met. xv. 61), rather than to any acts of tyranny or oppression of the monarch Pōlycrātes q. v., under whom Pīthāgōras passed the early part of his life. Adj. Sāmŭus, a, ō.

Sāmlus vir, P̄ythāgōras (Ov. Met. xv. 60).
Sāmla terra (Liv. xxxvii. 10).

Sāmōsāta, ae, v. Sāmōsātē, arum, f. Sēmīsat, the capital of Cōmāgēnē, stood on the Euphrātes. Here Lūcīanus was born. Inh. Sāmōsātēsēs, ium, v. Sāmōsātēni, orum, m. (Amm. Mar. xiv. 8).

Sāmōthracē, es, v. Sāmōthracīa, ae, f. Samothraki, an island in the Archipelago, off the coast of Thrācia, Romania. It had this name from being peopled by a colony from Thrācia, to which it formerly belonged, who were joined by Samians, who had been driven from their island by the Ephesians. Plinius makes its circumference thirty-two Roman miles, and says, that its ancient name was Dārdāniā, which is likewise stated by Strābo, Pausānias and others. Saōcē, Monte Nettano, the only mountain in the island of any note, rises to the height of ten thousand paces, and round the whole coast there is a great want of harbours (Plin. i. 462). The whole island was sacred from the worship of the Cabīri, and was consequently a general resort of the wretched, on which account Lūcīetius has Ferrēa Sāmōthracīa, i. e. ferrēi anūli nōmīnē Sāmōthracīa insigniti (vi. 1042). Inh. Sāmōthracēs, um (Sing. Sāmōthracē, acis), m. Plī Sāmōthracēs, religious Samothracians, from their being almost wholly given up to the worship of the gods (Stat. Ach. ii. 158). The rites of heathen worship, some suppose to have originated with the Samothracians, which receives some countenance from Pausānias, who states, that Cēres instructed the Cabīri, v. Cabīri. Adj. Sāmōthracīus, et, Sāmōthracīus, a, um. Sāmōthracīum finum, the temple of Samothraki (App. 213).

Sanacharibus, i, m. king of Arābia and Assyria, invaded Egypt, where he suffered a severe disaster, from not having paid due reverence to the gods. The circumstances mentioned by Hērōdōtus, are an imperfect and garbled account of what is related in the Scriptures, and also misapplied, for instead of Egypt, he should have said Jerusalem (ii. 141).

Sāncīa, ae, f. sister of Cōnsidius Prōcīlus, on whose execution, she was banished from Rome, in the year 32 (Tac. Ann. vi. 18).

Sāncīo, ōnis, f. Seckingen, a town of Germany, on the right bank of the Rhine, opposite the territory of the Raurāci (Amm. Mar. xxi. 3).

Sāncīus Erārium, Sāncīōris Erārii, n. See Erārium.

Sāncīa, ae, m. a miser and glutton ridiculed by Mārīallus (vii. 19).—2. A poet, whose writings were recommended neither by their excellence nor harmony (Mart. xi. 3).

Sāncūs, i, m. a man from whom the Sabines believed themselves descended, and, on that account, worshipped as a god. They also called him Fīdīus and Sēmo (Ov. Fast. vi. 214, Sil. Ital. viii. 420).

Sāndan, ānis, m. an Ethiopian of high rank and great wealth, said by some to have been a son of Hērōcles, and to have founded Tārsus (Amm. Mar. xiv. 8).

Sāndrōcōtus, i, m. a man of low parentage, in the army of Alexander the Great, by whom he was ordered to be put to death, and was indebted to his swiftness for the preservation of his life. After the death of that monarch, he collected forces, excited the Indians to revolt, and killed the prefects of Alexander. Sēlēucus entered into a treaty with him, a proof of his great power, and then marched to the war against Antigōnus. Jūstinus says he reigned over India, and turned the liberty from the Grecian oppression into slavery (xv. 4).

Sāngārius, i, m. v. Sāngārium, i, n. the Sakaria, a river of Phrygia, which takes its rise in the mountain Adōrēus (Liv. xxxviii. 18. Plin. i. 627, 648). See Sāgāria.

Sānquīnus Māximus, Sānquīnī Māxīmī, m. a man of consular rank, who entreated the senators not to multiply the cares of the emperor Thērius, when a member of the senate proposed bringing a particular business forward first day he was in court. He died in Lower Germany, when he had the command of the legions, in the year 47 (Tac. Ann. vi. 4 seq.).

Sāntōnes, um, rar. Sāntōni, orum (Sing. Sāntōnus, i, Luc. Phar. i. 422), m. a people of Gāllia Cēltica, to the north of the river Cārāntōnus, the Charente. Their chief town was Mēdiolānum, afterwards Sāntōnes, now Saintes, and their country Saintonge (Ces. B. G. i. 10 seq.). Adj. Sāntōnicus, a, um. Sāntōnicus Océānus, the Bay of Biscay (Tib. i. 7. 10). Sāntōnicus cucullus, the Santonie cowl (Juv. Sat. viii. 145). The Romans derived the use of cowls, or hoods, from the Sāntōnes, and they appear to have covered the head and face when necessary, hence used for a disguise (ib. vi. 329).

Sāpēi, orum, m. a people of Thrācia, Romania (Ov. Fast. i. 389), called also Sinte and Sall (Strab. 667).

Sāpāudīa, ae, f. a tract of land on the east side of Rhōdānus, the Rhone, south of Lācus Lemānus, the Lake of Geneva, now the duchy of Savoy. The modern is evidently derived from the ancient name, which is first mentioned by Ammīānus Mārcellīnus (xv. 11).

Sāphārus, i, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, killed in close fight by Q. Fābius Māximus, dictator, at the time he surrounded the troops of Hānūibal, and that general had encircled the army under M. Minūcius Rūfus, joint dictator with Fābius (Sil. Ital. vii. 604).

Sāpīres, um, m. a people probably neighbours to the Thārenī q. v. (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8). Considerable difference of opinion exists in regard to this word, mentioned by Ammīānus. It is not improbable the Sāpīres are the same with the Sāspīres, noticed by Hērōdōtus (i. 110 seq.).

Sāpis, is, m. the Savio, a river in the north of Italy, which falls into the Gulf of Venice (Luc. Phar. ii. 406). Adj. Sāpīnius, a, um. Sāpīnia tribus (Liv. xxxi. 2).

Sāponīa, ae, v. Sāponīæ, arum, f. a town of Pānnōnia, near the junction of Drāvus, the Drave, with Dānūbius, the Danube (Amm. Mar. xxviii. 1).

Sāpor, ōris, m. a son of Artāxēxes, king of Persia, acquired great renown by his success against the Romans, and by restoring the kingdom to the natives. Like Hānūibal, he appears to have entertained the greatest hatred against the Romans, and continued to annoy them during almost the whole of his reign. No sooner had he ascended the throne,

(Luc. Phar. i. 214). This epithet may be referred to the colour of the bed or channel in which it flows, and the same idea was perhaps conveyed by the name. Incola anani Rubicōnis (Claud. xliii. 1).

Rūbrēnus Lāppa, Rūbrēni Lāppos, m. a poor tragic poet mentioned by Jūvenālis (Sat. vii. 72).

Rūbria, a, f. a vestal virgin, on whom the Roman Emperor Nēro committed a rape (Suet. Ner. 28).

Rūbrius, i, m. a Roman knight of small fortune, accused of violating the divinity of Augustus, by perjury, in the year 15. The emperor Tiberius suppressed the prosecution (Tac. Ann. i. 73).

Rūbrius Fābātus, Rūbrii Fābātī, m. a Roman, who fled from Italy, with the intention of seeking security among the Parthians. A centurion found him on the Strait of Messina, and brought him back to Rome, when, on being questioned, he could give no satisfactory reason for so long a journey, yet he lived in safety, from being forgotten rather than forgiven (Tac. Ann. vi. 14).

Rūbrius Gāllus, Rūbrii Gālli, m. a Roman who had considerable influence with the army, on the death of Otho, and effected a union between Flāvius Sabinus and Caelina (Tac. Hist. ii. 51 seq.). To him Jūvenālis is supposed to allude, but without evidence at all approaching to certainty (Sat. iv. 105).

L. Rūbrius, L. Rūbrii, m. a Roman of senatorian dignity, who was taken prisoner along with many others at Corfinium, Perino (Cass. B. C. i. 23).

Rūbrum Mārē, the Red Sea, or, Arabian Gulf, forms the natural division betwixt Asia and Africa, hence the moderns almost universally consider it the eastern boundary of Africa. Some of the ancients bounded Africa on the east by the Nile, and a few, who divided the old continent only into two parts, considered Africa part of Europe. From the Strait of Babilmandeb (i. e. the gate of lamentation: Fauces Māris Rūbri) to the Isthmus of Suez, the two extremities of this inland sea, the distance is reckoned at fourteen hundred and seventy miles. The breadth is nowhere very considerable. It terminates in two unequal branches, that to the west greatly exceeding, both in length and breadth, the one to the east. Livius calls Mārē Rūbrum the utmost boundary of the earth, and as he mentions it after India, it is evident he could not understand by it the Arabian Gulf, because the conquests of Alexander to which he refers, were greatly farther east, and must have meant what is now called the Indian Ocean (xlv. 9). The Latin expression, which is a literal translation of the Greek, seems frequently used in a very enlarged sense, comprehending the ocean which washes the southern coast of Asia, at least as far as it was known to the ancients. Much ingenuity has been displayed, in attempting to account for this appellation red, since neither the sands, nor colour of the waters could give rise to the name. Without enumerating the various conjectures, it may be deemed enough simply to observe, that the eastern shore of the Arabian Gulf was in very remote times inhabited by the Edomites, and Edom, signifying red, it would naturally be called the sea of Edom, not only by that people, but also by the neighbouring nations. The Greeks translated the Jewish or Phœnician expression literally, in which they were imitated by the Romans. The navigators of that gulf would, following common analogy, give that name to the Indian Ocean, which they entered by means of this inland sea, in the same manner as the mountain Atlas gives name to the western ocean, and the village Siberia on the eastern extremity of European Russia does to that extensive tract of land which occupies a great part of northern Asia.

Rūdiā, arum, f. a town of Cālābria, distinguished by being the birthplace of the poet Ennius, of which no vestige now remains. Some moderns have in vain attempted to identify it with a town or village near the site of this ancient town. Conjecture, unsupported by evidence, merits neither belief nor regard. Rūdiā vēstāte (Sil. Ital. xii. 396). Inh. Rūdiī, orum (Sino. Rūdius, i), m. Adj. Rūdius, a, um. Rūdius (pōta) ait (Auson. cccxlix. 17).

Rūfa, a, f. an infamous woman, a native of Bōnōnia, Bologna (Catal. lx. 1).

Rūfrius, i, n. c. Rūfras, arum, f. Rēve, in Terra di Bari, a town of Cāmpānia, on the confines of Samnium, taken by the Roman consuls from the Samnites, in 325 B. C. (Liv. viii. 25). Inh. Rūfreni, orum, m.

Rūfilla, a, f. a diminutive from Rūfa (Suet. Aug. 69).

Rūfillus, i, m. a man whom Hōrātius censures, for being highly perfumed, which the Romans reckoned scandalous (Sat. i. 2. 27).

Rūfinus, i, m. a friend of Ovidius, who wrote the poet after his banishment, and, in return, the unhappy exile expresses his gratitude and sense of the favour, in one of his letters from the shores of the Black Sea (Ep. Pont. i. 3).—2. A man, who, on the death of Thēōdōsius, aided his son Arcādīus in the government of the east, and endeavoured to place himself on a level with that prince, if not to dethrone him. He fell in that rebellion, by the troops under Arcādīus, who appears to have decoyed, not conquered him. Claudianus writes some bitter invectives against this ambitious minister, or rather presumptuous rebel (iii. seq.).—3. A man of great wealth, whom Mārtiālis advises to check his pride (iii. 31).—4. A commander in Gaul, who embraced the interest of Vindex, for which the soldiers of Vitellius demanded his execution; and that ambitious commander did not attempt to resist their inclination (Tac. Hist. ii. 94).

Rūfio, ōnis, m. son of a freedman of C. Jūlius Cēsār, to whom he left the care and command of three legions at Alexandria (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 76).

Rūfius Crispinus, Rūfii Crispini, m. commanded the prætorian guards, and seized Asiaticus at Baia, whom he brought in chains to Rome. On the death of two Roman knights named Pētra, Crispinus received fifteen thousand sesterces and prætorian honours. Agrippina prevailed with the emperor, to remove him from the command of the prætorian guards, in consequence of his engagements to Messālina, and attachment to her children. He married Pōppēa Sābina, by whom he had a son called by his own name, but Otho, afterwards emperor, first debauched and then married her. In consequence of his marriages with that unprincipled woman, Rūfius Crispinus was brought to trial under the hollow pretext of a conspiracy, and sent into banishment to Sardinia, where he died by his own hand (Tac. Ann. xi. 1 seq.).—2. The son of the former, whom Nēro, says Suetonius, caused to be thrown into the sea, because it had been reported, that among his playfellows, he acted the part of a general or an emperor (Suet. Ner. [35]).

Rūfræ. See Rūffrius.

Rūtūli, v. Rūtūli, orum, m. military tribunes appointed by the consuls. They had this name from Rūtūlius Rūfus, who passed a law for that purpose (Liv. vii. 5).

Rūfūlus, i, m. a man of vicious conduct, whom Cātūllus holds up to derision (lix).

Rūfūs, i, m. a rhetorician of great celebrity, who was the rival of Cicero, and charged that orator with writing barbarous Latin, like an Allobrogian. Some consider that Jūvenālis has two characters in view; and others but one (Sat. vii. 213 seq.).—2. A man ridiculed by Cātūllus for his dirtiness and offensive smell (lxix).—3. A false friend exposed by Cātūllus (lxvii). It is uncertain whether he is the same with the former, or with M. Cæcilius Rūfūs, the celebrated orator of that period.—4. A friend of Mārtiālis, whose name frequently occurs in his writings (i. 107, &c.).

Rūfūs Hēlvius, Rūfī Hēlvī, m. a common soldier, whom Apronius rewarded with a spear and collar, because he had saved the life of a Roman citizen, in the year 20 (Tac. Ann. iii. 21).

Rūfūs Scribōnius, Rūfī Scribōnī, m. brother of Præcūlus Scribōnius q. v. Their mutual esteem and brotherly affection rendered them remarkable, no less than their riches, talents, nobility, and virtue. Pācūlus Africānus, by artful misrepresentation, converted their virtues into crimes, and they sought protection from an ignominious death, by opening their own veins, and expiring together (Tac. Hist. iv. 41).

M. Rūfūs, M. Rūfī, m. a quæstor, who attached himself to Cæsar during the civil war, and had the command of 12 ships at Aquilāria (Cæs. B. C. ii. 23).

Rūgī, orum, m. the Rugians, a German nation, who lived on the shores of the Baltic Sea. The island Rugen, and the town of Rugenwald, have perpetuated their name (Tac. Mor. Ger. 43).

Rūllus, i, m. a man who killed Völūx in the battle of Trāsimēnus, the Lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 260).—2. A son of Māntōa, and brother of Nōrbānus. He killed Archēmorūs in Africa, at the battle of Zāma (Sil. Ital. xvii. 426). Perhaps this is the same with the former.

P. Rūpilius, P. Rūpīli, m. (surnamed in con. cal. Lūpus) a Roman who held the consulship in 134 B. C., and terminated the war with the fugitives in Sicily (Liv. Ep. 59).

Rūsēno, ōnis, f. Rosciliona, a town of France, about two miles from Perpignan, destroyed by the Normans, of which scarcely a vestige remains. Here Hannibal was met by the petty princes of Gallia, who, captivated with his presents, cheerfully conducted his troops through their territories (Liv. xxi. 24). Adj. Rūsēnōnēnsis, is, e. Rūsēnōnēnsis comitatus, Rousillon.—2. A port of Africa, sometimes written Rūsūcūron q. v.

Rūsēus Cæpio, Rūsēi Cæpiōnis, m. a Roman senator of great wealth, who had, by his will, bound his heir, to give a certain sum annually to each senator at their first meeting, but the Emperor Dōmītiānus annulled the deed (Suet. Dom. 9).

Rūsēllæ, arum, f. Roselle, a town of Etruria, taken by the Roman consul, L. Pōstūmius Mēgellus, in 296 B. C. (Liv. x. 37). Inh. Rūsēllāni, orum, m. (Liv. xxviii. 45). Adj. Rūsēllānus, a, um. Rūsēllānus ager (Liv. x. 4).

Rūsō, ōnis, m. a Roman family, celebrated by Mārtiālis for their affability and politeness. The reading is doubtful, some editions having Drūsōnes (v. 29).

Rūsina, æ, f. perhaps Susa, a maritime town of Byzāciūm, a district of Africa. It stands a little to the south of Adrumētum (Plin. i. 335. Sil. Ital. iii. 260).

Rūsūcūron, ōnis, m. Carbona, a port of Africa, near Tūnes, where the Carthaginians passed a night in 205 B. C., on their way from Carthage, to attack the fleet of P. Cōrnēlius Scīpiō Africānus at Utica. This delay probably prevented the destruction of the Roman army (Liv. xxx. 10).

Rūtēni, orum, m. a people of Gallia, on Tārnis, the Turne; their country is now called Rouergue (Cæs. B. G. i. 45 seq.). Flāvi Rūtēni, red haired Rūtēni (Luc. Phar. i. 402).

Rūtīlius Gāllicus, Rūtīli Gāllici, m. a friend of the poet Stātius, whom he congratulates on recovering from a lingering disease. He appears to have been of a very ancient and honourable family, several of whom had borne the office of consul. He was prefect of Rome under the Emperor Dōmītiānus, hence Jūvenālis, Custos Gāllicus urbis (Sat. xlii. 157), and Stātius, Mitis custodia intrépide Rōmæ (Syl. i. 4. 16).

Rūtīlius Lūpus, Rūtīli Lūpi, m. a lieutenant-general of Pōmpēius in Achāia, a district of Greece, who, to secure that province, resolved to fortify the Isthmus of Corinth (Cæs. B. C. iii. 55).

P. Rūtīlius, P. Rūtīli, m. a tribune of the people, who brought the censors to trial, in 171 B. C. In return, the censors united in degrading him from his tribe, and disfranchising him (Liv. xliii. 16 seq.).

P. Rūtīlius Cālvis, P. Rūtīli Cālvi, m. a Roman who held the office of prætor, in 168 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 44).

P. Rūtīlius Lūpus, P. Rūtīli Lūpi, m. a Roman who held the consulship with L. Jūlius Cæsar, in 92 B. C. He was killed in an engagement with the Mārsi, Pēligni and Picēntes, but his lieutenant-general, C. Mārius, fought them with better success. Lūcilius accuses him of impiety, and disregarding an oath (Sat. i. 4), which Hōrātius quotes, as justifying satirists in exposing vice, and holding up to abhorrence the perpetrators by name (Sat. ii. 1. 68). Pērsius supports the opinion of Hōrātius (Sat. i. 115).

P. Rūtīlius Rūfūs, P. Rūtīli Rūfī, m. a lieutenant-general under the consul Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus in Africa. He held the consulship with Cn. Mānlius Māximus (107 B. C.), some time after which, he was lieutenant-general under Q. Mūcius Scævōla, when he attempted to protect the people of Asia from the oppression of the revenue farmers, and fell under the displeasure of the eque-trian order, who had the charge of matters of that kind, and brought him to trial. Disregarding both the want of evidence, and his unsullied reputation before this impeachment, his judges condemned him for extortion, and sentenced him to banishment, in 96 B. C. He retired to Smyrna (Liv. Ep. 70). His inflexible justice, and incorruptible integrity necessarily provoked the hatred of the vicious and profligate. Vice ever holds virtue in abhorrence. Velleius Paterculus asserts, that he was a man, the very best not only of his own time, but of any age. Nor did moral excellence alone constitute the whole of his character. He had an uncommon knowledge of the military art, which enabled him to introduce many improvements into the Roman discipline. What to moderns may seem incredible, the Romans did not train their soldiers in the art of attack and defence, until Rutilius instructed them. In his banishment, he devoted his time to philosophy and literary pursuits; and practised the principles of the Stoics, which he had learned under Pānetius, in seeking happiness in the command of the passions, in bearing misfortunes with firmness, and in the exercise of virtue. He resisted the urgent solicitude of L. Cornēlius Sūlla at the head of the state, to quit the place of his retreat, and return to Rome. His love of literature fitted him for retirement, and the loss of his writings must ever be regretted. He was an able lawyer, a faithful historian, and an orator, whose eloquence Cicero mentions with respect. He passed a law, that no house in Rome should exceed seventy feet in height, Trājanus afterwards limited the height to sixty feet (Suet. Aug. 89). He wrote in Greek the history of his own times, the war against Hannibal, the siege of Nūmāntia, at which he fought, and the war in Nūmīdia. The last merited high commendation for its impartiality. In addition to these works may be mentioned his own biography, which Tacitus commends, observations on the Greek philosophers, and orations on several topics. Vāllērius Māximus observed, that Rūtilius had a juster claim to the surname of Felix than Sūlla, the former having obtained it by the integrity of his life, and the latter by the injustice of his arms.

Sp. Rūtilius Crāssus, Sp. Rūtilii Crāsi, m. a Roman elected a tribune of the soldiers, with consular power, in 416 B. C. (Liv. ii. 47).

Rūtūba, m. m. a famous gladiator (Her. Sat. ii. 7. 96).

Rūtūba, m. m. the Rotta, a river of Li-gūria (Plin. i. 318). Cārus Rūtūba (Luc. Phar. ii. 422).

Rūtūli, orum (Sing. Rūtūlus, i), m. i. people of Lātium, who were reckoned the most ancient nation of Italy. Ancient geographers have left no accurate description of the territory possessed by the Rūtūli. When Aeneas came to that country, Daunus was their king. Turnus, the only son of that prince, who had been previously betrothed to Lavinia, opposed her marriage with the noble Trojan, and endeavoured to support his claim by force of arms. See Turnus. Ardia, afterwards Ardea, was their chief city.

Rūtūlus, i, m. a Roman who had numerous flocks of sheep. He was killed by Cānthus in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xv. 700).

Rūtūpiæ, orum, f. Richborough, a town in Cāntium, Kent, near which the Romans found excellent oysters. Adj. Rūtūpinus, a, um. Rūtūpium fūndum (māris), the bottom of the sea at Richborough (Juv. Sat. i. 141).

Saansan (i. e. king of kings), m. an appellation of the Persian monarchs (Amm. Mar. xix. 2).

Sāba, m, f. a district of Arābia Fēlix, on the Red Sea (Plin. iii. 23). From Stē-phānus it appears to have been a place of considerable distinction, and others consider it the same with Sābo. Sābe, arum, f. As-sab, a city and port on the Red Sea. Inh. Sābei, orum (Sing. Sābeus, i), m. were reckoned effeminate by the Romans, hence mōles Sābei (Virg. G. i. 57); but mild and tractable (Claud. viii. 305). Adj. Sābeus, a, um, Sabæan, Arabian. Sābea mēssa, an Arabian crop (Claud. xxi. 58). Sābei lūci, groves of the frankincense tree (Claud. x. 210). Sābeum tus, Sabæan frankincense, which was reckoned to be of the very finest quality by the ancients. Virgilius seems to have thought, that frankincense was only found in Arābia, Solis est fūrca virga Sābea (G. ii. 117), in which opinion he is followed by Plinius. The Mimosa Nilōtica, or Aca-cia Vera produces frankincense, and vast quantities are gathered from trees growing near to the northern bay of the Red Sea, at the foot of the mountain Sina. It was called Tus or Thus by the dealers in Egypt, from Thur or Thor, the name of a harbour in that bay, and thereby distinguished from the gum Arabic, which comes from Suez.

Sabāces, is, m. a governor of Egypt, who commanded a powerful force in the army of Darius, at the battle of Issus, where he was killed with the Phrygian governors Atiſyes and Rhēdōmīthres (Curt. iii. 11).

Sabāco, ōnis, m. a king of Æthiopia, who overran Egypt, with a powerful army, and afterwards returned to his own country, at the end of fifty years, in consequence of a dream (Herod. ii. 137 seq.).

Sabāria, m, f. Stein Am Anger, a town of Pānnōnia (Amm. Mar. xxx. 5).

Sābāta, orum, n. Vadi, a town at the foot of the Alps, on the Italian side, two hundred and sixty stadia from Gēnua, Genoa. Strabo makes the Alps commence at Sābāta, and the Apennines at Genoa. Adj. Sābātus, e, Sābātinus, a, um. Sābātia vāda, e, stagna, Savona (Cluv.), Vadi (D'Anv.) (Sil. Ital. viii. 490). Sābātina tribus (Liv. vi. 5).—2. Sābātha, et, Sabōta, the capital of the Atrami-tæ, in Arābia (Plin. i. 726 seq.).

Sābātus, i, m. the Sabato, a river of Italy, which rises in the country of the Hirpini and falls into Vultūrnus. Sābātini, orum, m. the people who lived on the banks of that river (Liv. xxvi. 33). Some have supposed, there was a town called Sābātūm on Sābātus; but its situation is unknown, if ever there was such a place.

Sabāzīus, i, m. an epithet applied to Jūpiter, probably from the Greek verb to worship (Val. Max. i. 3).

Sābūra, m, m. a man killed in Spain by Scipio Africānus (Sil. Ital. xv. 441).

Sābēllus, i, m. a man who excelled in throwing the javelin (Sil. Ital. iv. 221).—2. A Roman soldier, killed by Nābis, priest of Jūpiter Ammon (Sil. Ital. xv. 687).—3. A conceited poet, to whom Mārtiālis writes an epigram (vii. 84).—4. A parasite, mentioned by Mārtiālis (ix. 20). Perhaps the poet had in view the same person, only exhibiting a different feature of his character. This remark may apply to the same name in other epigrams of Mārtiālis.

Sābīdīus, i, m. a man whom Mārtiālis disliked, and for which he could assign no reason (i. 33). The poet must have had a different person in his eye when he wrote iii. 17; since a good reason is there assigned for not wishing to meet Sābīdīus.

Sābīnēus, e. Sābīneus, i, m. a rhetorician derided by Mārtiālis (iii. 25).

Sābīni, orum (Stag. Sābīnus, i), m. an ancient people of Italy, on the east of Tiber, the Tevere, and north of Tibur, Tivoli. Silius Italicus and Dionysius of Halicarnassus inform us, that they had this name from Sābus, e. Sābīnus, son of Sāneus, who was their founder, whom Virgilius calls effusator, probably from his being the first who cultivated the vine in Italy (Æn. vii. 179). Some maintain that they were of Spartan descent (Sil. Ital. ii. 8), and others, that they were anciently Umbri (Dion. Hal. ii. 49). Justinus says they were Greeks, without stating from what part of Greece they had come (xx. 1). Pīnīus and others derive their name from the Greek verb to worship, perhaps from their being distinguished by their piety and strictness of morals; hence Sābīnus, both as a noun and adjective, was employed to denote a person of rigid, stern, and severe temper. It appears from Mārtiālis, that the Sabine women painted their faces with a particular preparation (cōrūssa), to render the skin white, and that it melted by the heat of the sun (ii. 41). Adj. Sābīnus, Sābēllus, et, Sābēllēus, a, um. Sābīnus āger, the territory of the Sabines (Liv. xxviii. 45). Sābīna gēns, the Sabines (Ov. Met. xiv. 832). Sābēllus āger, the country of the Sāmnites, because that people accounted themselves of Sabine descent (Liv. viii. 1). Sābēlla pūbes (Virg. G. ii. 167). Sābēllēus aus exacūt dēntes, the Sabine bear whets his teeth, i. e. prepares to fight (Virg. G. iii. 255).

Sābīnus Calvisius, Sābīni Calvisii, m. a Roman accused of treason, and acquitted by the evidence of Jūlius Cēlus in the year 52 (Tac. Ann. vi. 9).

P. Sābīnus, P. Sābīni, m. the prefect of a cohort at Rome, and from that humble station raised to the command of the praetorian guards. The friendship of Vālēns procured him this elevation, and Jūlius Priscus, advanced from a centurion to the same rank, opposed himself in every thing to Sābīnus; yet these two ministers governed the empire. Their friends excited their mutual animosity, and the emperor Vitēllus wavered betwixt them, now inclining towards the one, and now towards the other. Both despised and hated him, and, uncertain of retaining their ill-gotten and precarious power, they seized on the whole wealth of the empire. Distress and poverty found no sympathy in the breasts of these rapacious ministers, whose freedmen, with the low cunning which marks the genius of slavery, concealed their wealth obtained by every kind of unlawful means, and afterwards some of them succeeded to high situations in the imperial family. Vitēllus at last deprived Sābīnus of his command, on account of his friendship with Cæcīna, ordered him to be imprisoned, and appointed Alpēnus Vārus praetorian prefect in his stead, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. ii. 92 seq.).

Q. Sābīnus, Q. Sābīni, m. an officer whom Caesar sent into Achāia with part of his forces (Caes. B. C. iii. 55).

Sābis, is, m. the Sambre, a river of Gallia Belgica, which has its rise in what is now called Picardy, runs N. E., and after passing by Landrecy, Maubridge, Thun, and Charleroy, falls into Mōsa, the Meuse, near Namur (Caes. B. G. ii. 16).

Sābrace, arum, m. a powerful Indian nation, who appear to have had a republican form of government, when Alexander the Great invaded that country, in 327 B. C. (Curt. ix. 8).

Sābrāta, e, m. a Carthaginian soldier, who wounded Tēlon in a naval engagement off Sicily, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 437 seq.). His name appears to have been derived from Sābrāta, a town of Africa Propria.

Sābrāta, e. Sābrātha, as, f. Sabart, one of the three towns in Africa to the east of Sýrtis Minor, the Gulf of Kabez, which afterwards gave name to Tripōlis, Tripoli, now the capital of a district of the same name. The other two were Lēptis, Lebeda, and Cea (Sil. Ital. iii. 256). Inh. Sābrātēnses, ium, m. (Suet. Vesp. 3).

Sābrīna, e, m. the Severn, a river of Britain, which rises in Montgomeryshire, and, running in a southwest direction, falls into the Bristol Channel, after a course of about a hundred and fifty miles. It is navigable as far as Welchpool. P. Ostōrius ran a chain of forts between Sābrīna, the Severn, and Auvōna, the Avon, in the year 50 (Tac. Ann. xli. 31).

Sābūra, m, m. a prefect of Jūba, king of Māuritānia, Mōrocco and Fēz, who contributed to the destruction of Cūrio and his army, but was afterwards defeated near Utica by Silius, and himself killed, about the time Cāto fell in that city by his own hands (Caes. B. C. ii. 38 seq.). Lūcānus says, he was second to the king, and describes the feat practised on Cūrio (Phar. iv. 721 seq.).

Sābus, i, m. an Indian king, whose strongest city, Alexander the Great took, by driving a mine. To his perpetual infamy, he put eighty thousand of the inhabitants to the sword, besides selling a number of the prisoners for slaves (Curt. ix. 8).

Sāce, arum, m. a Scythian nation, whose country lay to the east of Marē Cāspium. Some place them directly north of the sources of Indus. Without towns, or even houses, except one village, they lived in forests and caverns. From ancient history, they appear to have possessed a great tract of country, were powerful in numbers, and repulsed Cýrus, in his attempt to conquer them.

(Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). Sæca appears to have been a general name, at least among the Persians, for the whole Scythians.

Sæcas, m. a name, or rather a nickname, of the philosopher Ammōnūs q. v.

Saccasēna, æ, f. Kasaki, a province on the southern bank of Cŷrus, the Kur.

Saccumum, i, n. a town of Italy, swallowed up by an earthquake, and its site supposed now to be covered by Ciminus Læcus, Lago di Vico, q. v. (Amm. Mar. xvii. 7).

Sæces, v. Sages, æ, m. a man in the army of Tūrnus, who was wounded in the face by an arrow (Virg. Æn. xii. 651).—2. A Moor in Hannibal's army, whom Thëron killed at the siege of Sägūntum, Muriedro (Sil. Ital. ii. 161).—3. One of the Sæca, a very celebrated Scythian nation in Asia, which, according to Plinius, was the general name of the Scythians among the Persians. He adds, that the ancients called the Scythians, Aramæi (l. 678).

Sæcrānī, orum, m. a people of Lātium, the derivation of whose name is doubtful. Some authors refer it to their being descended from a priest of Cŷbēlē, others to their being consecrated to that goddess, and Fæstus, to their being born during Ver Sacrum. They joined Tūrnus against Ænëas. Adj. Sæcrānus, a, um. Sæcrāna actes, the forces of the Sæcrānī (Virg. Æn. vii. 796). The readings here vary; probably the word should be Særrānæ.

M. Sæcrātivir, M. Sæcrātiviri, m. one of Cæsar's officers, a native of Cápua, who was killed at Dŷrrāchium, Durazzo (Cæs. B. C. iii. 71).

Sæcrātor, ōris, m. a man in the army of Tūrnus, who killed Hŷdāspes (Virg. Æn. x. 747).

Sæcipōrtus, i, m. a place between Sīgna and Prænēstē, at which L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla destroyed the army of C. Mārius (Jūnior), consul, in 84 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 87. Flor. iii. 21. Luc. Phar. ii. 134).—2. A place in the bay of Tārēntum, Taranto, about fifteen miles from the city (Liv. xxvi. 39).

Sādāla, æ, n. Sādāles, æ, m. the son of Cōtys, king of Thrācia, Romania, who was sent at the head of five hundred cavalry to Pompey, in the civil war (Cæs. B. C. iii. 4).

L. Sænūs, L. Senli, m. a Roman, who read in the senate a letter which he had received from Fæstus, Fiezola, containing intelligence that C. Mānlius, one of the accomplices of Cātillina, had taken the field at the head of a prodigious force (Sal. Cat. 30).—2. A Roman, who held the consulship for part of the year 30 B. C. Adj. Sænūs, a, um. Senia lex, a law passed during his consulship, for increasing the number of the patricians (Tac. Ann. xi. 25).

Sæpinum, i, n. Sepino, a town of the Sāmīnites, taken in 294 B. C., after a brave resistance, by L. Pāpīrius Cūrsor, the Roman consul, who killed seven thousand four hundred, and took three thousand prisoners. He gave to his soldiers, the spoil, of which there was a great quantity, as the whole wealth of the Sāmīnites was collected into a few cities (Liv. x. 45).

Sætābis, is, f. Xativa, a town of Hispānia, Spain, on the bank of a cognominal river, now called Rio d'Alcoy, which is only an inconsiderable stream. The town was celebrated for the excellent flax which grew in its neighbourhood. Sūpërba Sætābis (Sil. Ital. iii. 374). Inh. Sætābītūnī, orum, a (Plin. i. 304). Adj. Sætābus, a, um. Sætābis sūdāria, towels or handkerchiefs, manufactured at Sætābis (Catul. xii. 14).

Sāga, æ, f. a town of Scŷthia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Sagalāssus, i, f. Sadjahtu, or, Aglaum, a town of Pisidia. Inh. Sagalāssēsēs, ium, m. Adj. Sagalāssēnus, a, um. Sagalāssēnus ager (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Sāgūna, æ, f. a sorceress, an associate of Cāldia. She is mentioned twice in the same character by Hōrātius, and said to have been a freedwoman of Pōmpōnius (Epod. v. 25 seq.).

Sagūnis, is, m. a river of Cārmānia, according to Ammānūs Mārcellīnus (xxiii. 6). It falls into the Persian Gulf.

Sāgārēus, i, m. a river of Cārmānia, according to Ammānūs Mārcellīnus (xxiii. 6).

Sāgāris, is, m. a servant who, with Phēgēs, carried with difficulty to Mūstūm, the weighty coat of mail, which Ænëas gave to him for being second in the naval contest at Sicilia, Scilly (Virg. Æn. v. 263).—2. A man in the army of Ænëas, whom Tūrnus killed (Virg. Æn. ix. 575).

Sāgāris, is, v. Sāngārīus, i, m. the Sakaria, a river of Bithŷnia, which falls into Pōntus Euxīnus, the Black Sea. According to Claudīanus, this river has its rise in Dindŷna, and receives the pure water of Gāllus before it disembogues into the Black Sea (xx. 263). Sāgārītis, idis, f. of Sāgāris, applied to females, or nouns feminine (Ov. Fast. iv. 229). Adj. Sāngārīus, a, um. Sāngārīus puer, Atys (Stat. Syl. iii. 4. 41).

Sāges, is, m. the brother of Agēnor q. v., deprived of life in the Theban war by Hŷpēus (Stat. Th. ix. 270).—2. A man killed in the same war by Amphlārāus (Stat. Th. vii. 714).—3. A nobleman of Cŷzēns, slain by the boy Hŷlas, on the unexpected return of the Argonauts to that city (Val. Flac. iii. 182).

Sāgillūs, i, m. a king of Scŷthia, who sent his son Pausāgōrus to the assistance of the Amazons, at the request of Orithŷa (Just. ii. 4).

Sāgittārīus, i, m. the Archer, the ninth sign of the Zodiac. The centaur Chiron, a native of Thēssālīa, Thessaly, was, after death, converted into this sign; hence Emulorquet arcus (Ov. Met. ii. 81). Mānilius has beautifully expressed this idea; Ita bifrons cōstauri corpore (iv. 230). Sāgittārīus is the boundary of the sun's declination southward.

Sāgūntus, i, f. v. Sāgūntum, i, n. Muriedro, a town of Hispānia, on the south of of Ibērus, the Ebro, about a mile from the coast. In the treaty between the Romans and Carthaginians under Hāndrūbal, Sāgūntum was left free; but Hānnībal attacked and carried it, after a very brave and obstinate resistance, in 220 B. C. According to some writers, it stood a siege of eight months, a statement which Līvius questions. Inh. Sāgūntīnī, orum (Sing. Sāgūntīnus, i), m. came originally from Zūcŷnthus, Zante, and, being joined by some of the Rūtīlī from Ardēa, soon obtained great wealth by their activity in trade, and fidelity in contracts. Of the latter, they gave one of the strongest proofs which ancient history affords, in their adherence to the Romans, when Hännibal besieged their town. Reduced to the utmost extremity by famine, and perceiving that resistance was vain, they suddenly kindled in the forum a fire, in which they destroyed both public and private property, and then precipitated themselves into the flames. Hännibal ordered all the survivors, capable of bearing arms, to be put to the sword, and the other prisoners to become the property of his soldiers. Eight years after, Cn. and P. Cörnilius Scipio retook Säguntum, which they restored to its ancient inhabitants. For their deliverance from the slavery of the Carthaginians, they sent ambassadors to thank the senate, and to present a golden bowl to Jupiter in the capitol. These ambassadors were treated with the utmost respect by the senate, which granted all their requests, and ordered the towns through which they passed, to treat them in a most friendly manner. At a subsequent period, the Säguntini sent to Rome Carthaginian ambassadors, who had come to hire troops with two hundred and fifty pounds' weight of gold, and eight hundred of silver; the senate returned the gold and silver to the Säguntini, and threw the Carthaginians into prison. Adj. Säguntinus, a, um. Säguntina ligura, a Saguntine pot (Juv. Sat. v. 29). The Säguntini excelled in making earthenware (Plin. v. 244. Mart. viii. 6). Säguntinus ignis (Flor. ii. 6).

Säis, is, f. Se el Hagar, a town of Egypt. Inh. Sältani, orum, m. Adj. Sältanus, et, Sältenus, a, um. Sälticum ostium, one of the mouths of the Nile (Herod. ii. 17).

Säla, æ, f. a town of Sämöthracäa, near which the fleet of Xêrxes arrived, and the ships were ranged in order, at the time when that monarch was drawing up his troops in the plain of Döriscus in 480 B. C. (Herod. vii. 59).

Säla, æ, m. the Saale, a river of Franconia, one of the branches of Albia, the Elbe. It had this name from the quantities of salt made on its banks, by throwing the water of the river on a burning pile of wood (Tac. Ann. xiii. 37). Inh. Sälli, orum (Sing. Sällus, i), m. a people who lived on the banks of this river. Sällus jam colat rura (Claud. xxi. 222).—2. The Isael, which Drusus connected with Rhênus, the Rhine, by means of an artificial cut.

Sälämis, e. Sälämin, inis, et, Säläminus, æ, f. Coloura, an island in Sinus Särönicus, the Gulf of Egina, so called from its modern capital, which has this appellation from the form of its harbour, resembling a round cake made at Athens, known by this name. It is about twenty-five miles in circumference, the greater part uncultivated, and not naturally fertile. It is distant two stadia from the coast of Attica, has but one river Bocarus, the Tekohas, and is inhabited only by Greeks, who retain the kindness and hospitality of their ancestors. Its ancient capital, which bore the same name, stood on the shore, of which the walls were four miles in circumference, but no vestiges now remain.

—2. Famagosta, a city of Cyprus, built by Teüeer, son of Telämon, king of Sälämis, Coloura, and so called from his native island. Hörätius call this Ambigua Sälämis, because there being two cities of that name, when either was mentioned, it would be necessary to add some discriminating word to prevent ambiguity (Od. i. 7. 29); and Lücäinus calls the other Vera Sälämis (Phar. iii. 183), as does also Mänilius (v. 50). Inh. Sälämini, orum, m. (Plin. ii. 105). Adj. Säläminius, et, Säläminiacus, a, um. Säläminium frētum (Just. ii. 12). Säläminiae (insulae), islands opposite, or near Famagosta (Plin. i. 615). Säläminiacæ tröpææ, the victory at Sälämis, Coloura (Sil. Ital. xiv. 282). Säläminiæum mārē, the sea near Sälämis, Coloura (Luc. Phar. v. 109).

Sälänus, i, m. a man to whom Ovidius addresses one of his epistles from Pöntus (ii. 5).

Säläpia, æ, f. Salpe, a town of Apülia, now in ruins. Hännibal came to this place in 216 B. C., on his return from Tärëntum, Taranto. Here he collected corn from the lands of Hëräcläa and Mëtäpöntum, and sent out his troops to plunder the territories of the Säläntini, and the neighbouring parts of Apülia. At Säläpia, Salpe, the Carthaginians, who had been taken prisoners at Arpi, joined Hännibal in 215 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 20). Inh. Säläpitäni, orum (Sing. Säläpitänus, i), v. Säläpini, orum, m. part of whom were friendly to Hännibal, but at last joined the Romans. Adj. Säläpinus, a, um. Säläpina pälus, the Canal of St. Antonio (Luc. Phar. v. 377).

Sälärus, a, um. Sälärta via, a road leading from Rome to the country of the Sabines, and had its name, according to Festus, a sälä, which the Sabines carried along it from Ostia at the mouth of Tiber, the Tevere (Liv. i. 33 seq.).

Sälässi, orum, m. a people of the Alps, through whose country Hännibal would have marched, according to Livius, had he crossed either Peninus, or Crëmönis Jügum, Appius Claudius, the Roman consul, subdued them in 146 B. C., but they appear to have regained their liberty, since Livius mentions them again as subjected to the government of Rome, about 25 B. C. (Ep. 53 seq.). The latter conquest happened in the reign of Augustus, when the Roman state appears to have been in a more flourishing condition, than at any former or succeeding period (Eutrop. vii. 9).

Salëca, e. Salëra, æ, f. a town of Africa, about fifteen miles from the Roman camp, which was then five miles from Utica, in which Hännö had his head quarters, in 206 B. C. From it Mäsinässa enticed him to come out to battle, in which that general fell (Liv. xxix. 34).

Sälëänus. See Sälëänus.

Sälëus Bässus, Sälëi Bässii, m. an excellent poet, depressed by poverty, hence Jävënäis calls him thia, insinuating, that he had not enough of food (Sat. vii. 80). Tacitus gives him the character of an excellent man, as well as a poet of eminence, adding, he has the god (Apöllo) within him. This historian makes frequent allusion to his poverty; but mentions a present from the emperor Vëspäsianus of fifty thousand sesterces (Orat. 5—9).

Sälërnum, i, n. Sulerno, an inland town of Picënum, says Plinius, but Eustace thinks, that its position is unchanged. It stands in the centre and bosom of the bay, at the foot of a fine ridge of well cultivated hills. The inn is almost on the beach.

Here a colony of Roman citizens was planted in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 45). Adj. Sālēnūsus, a, um. Sālēnūsus rēgis, the district of Sālēnūsus (Val. Max. vi. 8).

Sālētūsus, i, m. the husband of Sēcūndilla, on whose death Mārtialis wrote him an epigram, not lamenting his bereavement, but envying her large fortune which she had bequeathed to him. Some editions read Sālētūsus (ii. 63).

Sālēnūsus, ōis, f. a town of Bēotiā, at which Antiochus, king of Sýria, pitched his camp, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 46). This town is mentioned in other chapters of the same book.

Sālīcē, es, f. a town of Scythiā, near Tōmi (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 7).—2. The name given by the natives to Tēprōbānē q. v.

Sālīcūsus Clēmēns, Sālīcī Clēmētis, m. a Roman senator, who called Jūnius Gāllus, the brother of the philosopher Sēneca, enemy and parricide, and continued a bitter invective against him, until checked by the unanimous voice of the whole assembly. In this appearance of zeal for the public good, Sālīcūsus only gratified personal animosity (Tac. Ann. xv. 73).

Sālī, ōrum, (Sing. Sālīus, i), m. priests of Mārs Grādīvus, who were twelve in number, and appointed by Nūma Pōmpilius, who gave them, as a badge of distinction, a flowered tunic, and a brazen covering for the breast, which they wore over the tunic. He made it part of their duty to carry the celestial arms (Ancillā), and to go through the town singing hymns, with leaping and solemn dancing. This monarch selected the Sālī from the patricians, and chose only such young men as were eminently distinguished by personal beauty and elegance. Virgilius refers the institution of this priesthood to Hērclēs, adding, that they bound their temples with branches of poplar (Æn. viii. 285). They had their temple, and performed their sacred rites on Pālātium, hence, they were sometimes called Pālātīni, and the twelve vowed by Tāllus Hōstīlius had theirs on Cōllīnus, and were called Agōnālēs, or Cōllīni. During that festival, the Roman army did not march. They were afterwards called Franci (Amm. Mar. xvii. 8). Adj. Sālīārīs, is, e. Sālīārēs dapes, the dishes, or feasts of the Sālī, i. e. sumptuous, or costly dishes (Hor. Od. i. 37. 2). Sālīārē cārmen, originally confined to the praises of the gods, afterwards men became ambitious of having their names included in it, which formed a kind of apotheosis. Tibērius honoured the memory of Gērmānīus, by ordering the insertion of his character into that poem (Tac. Ann. ii. 83).

Sāliso, v. Sālētō, ōis, f. Saltz, a town of Germany, on the Rhine, eleven miles distant from Tābērnæ.

Sālīus, i, m. a native of Arcādīa, who was one of the competitors in the foot-race, which he lost by a trick of Nīsus (Virg. Æn. v. 298 seq.).—2. A man in the army of Tūrus, who killed Thrōnīus, and was himself killed by Nēāles (Virg. Æn. x. 753).

Sālētīnā, æ, f. a city of the Mēssāpiī. Inh. Sālētīnī, ōrum, m. a people who inhabited, not only that city, but the southeast extremity of Itāliā, Italy. They became the enemies of the Romans in 308 B. C., when L. Vōlūmnus, consul, was sent against that district, who defeated them in every engagement, took several of their towns by force, and obtained a great quantity of booty. They afterwards took up arms, and the Romans gained another victory over them, in which they were allowed to surrender (Liv. ix. 42). Adj. Sālētīnūsus, a, um. Sālētīnūsus ager, the territory of the Sālētīnī, which was plundered by Hūmīnāl in consequence of their fidelity to the Romans, in 286 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 20). Sālētīnūsus, ōis, īpīgīus, prēmōntōriūm, Capo de Leuca (Plin. i. 365). Sālētīnūsus rēx (Eutrop. viii. 9).

Sālūstīus Lucūllus, Sālūstī Lūcūllī, c. a lieutenant-general in Britāniā, whom the emperor Dōmītiānus destroyed, because he had allowed lances of a new form to be called by his name (Suet. Dom. 10).

Sālūvī, r. Sālvi, e. Sālvi, ōrum, d. Sālvi, ōrum (Liv. xxi. 26), m. a Gallīcūsus, who lived on the east of Rhōdānus, the Rhine, near the mouth of that river. It is probable from an expression of Livius, that they occupied part of the Alps. At what time they settled there is unknown, but it must have been previous to the arrival of the Phœnīci who built Marseilles, since they attempted to prevent their building that city. On being overpowered, they crossed into Italy, and took possession of lands near the Lævi Liguri who inhabited the banks of Tēnus, the Tisone. Like many of the other Gallīc tribes, they willingly joined the Carthagīniāns, from aversion to their more powerful neighbours the Romans, and were at last subdued in 124 B. C. by C. Sēxtīus Cālvinus, præsul, who founded a colony called from his name, and from the abundance of hot and cold springs called Aquæ Sextiæ, Aix (Liv. v. 34 seq.).

Sālūcīs, īdis, f. a nymph whose tale united with that of Hērmaphrōdītus, and was changed into a fountain in Cārīa, which retains her name, hence Sōtīus calls it fons dōlēns (Syl. i. 5. 20). This spring is said to have rendered men who drank of it effeminate. According to Sēxtus Pōmpēius, the boys and girls washing promiscuously in this stream gave rise to the fiction, and the poets transferred the vices of the natives to the waters of this spring. In its vicinity stood the temples of Mērcūrius and Vēnus, in Greek Hērmes and Aphrōdītē, whose names united form Hērmaphrōdītus q. v., and this circumstance would give currency to the fable which it likewise serves to explain (Ov. Met. iv. 306 seq.).

Sālūmōnēus, ōis, m. son of Æōlus and Enārētta, was brother of Æōlus and Sīsīphus. The latter sought his destruction, in consequence of their enmity to each other, and the oracle of Apōllō informed Sīsīphus, how he might accomplish his murderous intention, but Tūrō q. v., daughter of Sālūmōnēus, took means to prevent it. Jūpiter enraged at the impiety of Sālūmōnēus, who claimed divine honours and attempted to imitate the thunder and lightning of that god, struck him dead by a thunderbolt. Of the madness, impiety, and punishment of Sālūmōnēus, Virgilius has given an admirable description (Æn. vi. 585 seq.), as has also Mānilius (v. 91 seq.). Sālūmōnīs, īdis, f. a patronymic of Tūrō, daughter of Sālūmōnēus (Ov. Amor. iii. 6. 43. Val. Flacc. v. 479); applied also to nouns feminine.

Sälmydēssus, i. f. Midya, a seaport town of Thrācia, on the Black Sea (Herod. iv. 93).

Sālo, ōnis, m. the Xalon, a branch of Ibērus, the Ebro. From Mārtiālis it appears to have been a shallow, but rapid, stream. Iron and steel seem to have been fabricated on its banks. Near this river that poet was born, hence he has Patrius Sālo (x. 96).

Sālōna, ae, f. Sālōnae, arum, f. a maritime town of Illyricum. The emperor Dioclesian was a native of Dalmātia, and retired to Sālōna after he resigned the purple, built a magnificent palace, occupying a space of about nine English acres, of which no vestiges now remain, spent the remainder of his life in peace and tranquillity, and died in the year 313. A small village near the site of Sālōna, preserves the name. Spalatra stands near the place which once was occupied by this ancient city (Ces. B. C. iii. 8 seq.). Qua mōris Hādriaci longas fecit unda Sālōnas (Luc. Phar. iv. 404).

Sālōnina, ae, f. wife of Alīēnus Caeīna q. v. (Tac. Hist. ii. 20).—2. Wife of Attālus, king of the Germans.

C. Sālōnulus, C. Sālōnili, m. one of the three Roman commissioners appointed to settle a colony at Tēmpsa in 196 B. C., and afterwards one of ten for dividing large tracts of land in Ligūria and the north of Italy, amongst Roman and Latin colonists (Liv. xxxiv. 45 seq.).

P. Sālōnulus, P. Sālōnili, m. a Roman who held the office of a military tribune and of first centurion, almost every year, alternately. The army in a state of rebellion, prevailed on the senate to pass a law, that no man who had been a tribune of the soldiers should afterwards be a centurion. From opposing their licentious and mutinous conduct, he had incurred the resentment of the soldiers, which they took this opportunity of manifesting (Liv. vii. 41).

Q. Sālōnulus Sārta, Q. Sālōnili Sārtae, m. was elected praetor, and obtained the government of Sardinia, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 20).

Sālpinātes, ium, m. a people of Etrūria, who joined the Volsinēnses, on which the Romans marched against them and plundered their country, in 590 B. C. (Liv. v. 31 seq.). Adj. Sālpinas, us, as; ātis. Sālpinas ager (Liv. v. 32).

Sālpiāga, ae, f. a kind of poisonous ant, mentioned by Plinius, unknown in Italy (iv. 696). This word is very differently written (Luc. Phar. ix. 837).

Sālvidiēnus Orfītus, Sālvidiēni Orfīti, m. was put to death by the emperor Nēro, for letting three shops belonging to his house near the forum, for the accommodation of the deputies of some states (Suet. Ner. 37).—2. One killed by order of the emperor Dōmītiānus, although in exile, under pretence of his attempting an insurrection (Suet. Dom. 10).

Q. Sālvidiēnus Rūfus, Q. Sālvidiēni Rūfi, m. a lieutenant-general of Augūstus, defeated in a naval engagement by Sextus Pōmpeius, son of Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus, in 44 B. C. Two years after, he endeavoured to promote a conspiracy against Augūstus, which M. Antōnius discovered, and being convicted he killed himself (Liv. Ep. 127). The account given by Suetōnius is somewhat different (Oct. 66).

Sālviūs Cōcēciānus, Sālvi Cōcēciāni, m. a brother's son of the Roman emperor Otho, who bewailed the fate of his uncle. For observing his birthday, the emperor Dōmītiānus condemned him to death (Suet. Dom. 10).

Sālviūs Jūliānus, Sālvi Jūliāni, m. an eminent lawyer, who, at the command of the emperor Jūliānus, composed a perpetual edict, from which, at no future period, were the judges allowed to deviate. This important reformation in the administration of justice reflects great credit on the emperor who suggested, and on the civilian who formed it (Eutrop. viii. 17).—2. Grandson of the former, who likewise excelled in a knowledge of the law. On the death of Pērtināx, he seized on the government, was defeated by Sēvērus near Ponte Molle, and slain in the palace, after a reign of seven months. Herodīānus says, he lost his life by order of the senate, in which he is supported by Spūrtiānus, and opposed both by Eutrōpius (viii. 17), and by Aurelius Victor, who calls him Didius Jūliānus, or, as in some editions, Didius Sālviūs Jūliānus (de Ces. 19). The last author confounds him in one or two particulars with the subject of the former article, who, according to some authors, was only his maternal great-grandfather.

L. Sālviūs Otho, L. Sālvi Othōnis, m. was elected consul with Faustus Cōrnēlius Sūlla, in the year 52. His father had not risen above the rank of praetor, and his wife appears to have been of inferior descent. In countenance he bore a strong resemblance to the emperor Tiberius, by whom he was greatly beloved (Suet. Oth. 1). He was the father of the emperor M. Sālviūs Otho (Tac. Ann. xii. 52). In con. cal. he is surnamed Titūānus.—2. Surnamed Titūānus, son of the former, and brother of the emperor Otho. They held the consulship, part of the year 69. During the short reign of his brother, Titūānus had the government of Rome, and the command of the army. The imperial honours seemed vested in him. His rashness brought on the decisive engagement at Bēbriacum, Caneto, where Vitēllius obtained a complete victory. The conqueror, on succeeding Otho, spared the life of Titūānus. From Tācitus we learn, that avarice formed a prominent feature in his character, and that, when proconsul of Asia, he readily connived at any iniquitous scheme, on condition he obtained a part of the plunder (Tac. Hist. i. 75 seq.).

M. Sālviūs Otho, M. Sālvi Othōnis, m. was the son of L. Sālviūs Otho, a Roman knight, and of Albia Tērēntia, a woman of noble birth. Otho was born on 28th April, in the year 70. In very early youth he was wild and riotous, for which his father frequently scourged him severely. To his dress and appearance he paid the utmost attention, and was not only finical, but effeminate, hence Mūllis Otho (Mart. vi. 32). In order to procure an introduction to Nēro, he pretended to be in love with a freedwoman, who held some office in the palace, although she was very old and nearly decrepid. Through her he obtained the notice of the emperor, with whom, from similarity of dispositions, he soon became a principal favourite. In this manner, he obtained a knowledge of all the emperor's secrets, who intrusted to him Pippa Salina, after he had taken her from her husband. To her Otho conceived as strong an attachment, that he could not bear the thought of Nira, and refused to give her up. On the marriage being dissolved, he received an appointment in Lusitania, Portugal, that he might be at a distance from Rome, which was in fact a kind of banishment, and at that period not uncommon. As quaestor he governed that province for ten years, with singular moderation and disinterestedness. In revenge for this treatment, he joined Gallus in his design against Nira, and took every opportunity of making friends, that he might, at last, succeed to the empire. Having ingratiated himself with the body guards of Gallus, after his accession to the imperial dignity, and having been disappointed in the hopes of his adopting him, he formed a plan for assassinating that monarch, which the body guards executed, and related him with the title of emperor. The senate received his appointment without resistance, and do not seem to have taken a decided part either with or against him. In the mean time, the armies in Germany swore allegiance to Vitellius, and the two rivals, after some unsuccessful attempts, on the part of Otho, to procure reconciliation, met in the north of Italy to decide it by the sword. In the first three engagements, Otho had the advantage, but in the last, at Bedricum, Cassa, Vitellius, by a stratagem, gained a complete victory, soon after which, Otho laid violent hands on himself. During his whole life, Otho expressed the utmost abhorrence at civil wars, and to this aversion some attribute the slight resistance which he made against the troops of his rival. Many of his soldiers followed his example, and whilst the community wondered at a death so unsuitable to his life, they extolled his merits when he was consigned to the grave, although they detested him while living (Suet. Oth.). To Otho, Juvénalis uniformly appears hostile, and it cannot be denied that his vices, to say nothing of his ingratitude, treachery, and effeminacy, justly excited the hatred of the satirist. That poet introduces Otho as a very vicious character (Sat. ii. 99). Est summi dūcia, it is the part of a very great general, i. e. of Otho (Juv. Sat. ii. 104). Adj. Othōlānus, a, um. Othōlānus exercitus (Tac. Hist. ii. 45).

Sālūs, ūtis, f. health, or the goddess of health, to whom C. Junius Bubulcus vowed a temple in the war with the Samnites, in 307 B. C., which he dedicated four years after, when dictator (Liv. ix. 43 seq.).

Sālvi, orum, v. Sālves, um, m. See Sālvi.

Sāmāria, w, f. a maritime district of Canaan. The capital had the same name (Plin. l. 566). Inh. Sāmāritae, arum, m. (Tac. Ann. xii. 54).

Sāmārōbrīva, w, f. Amiens, a town of Gallia Belgica, on the south bank of the river Sāmāra, the Somme. It was afterwards called Ambliangum, from its inhabitants; hence the present name (Ces. B. G. v. 24 seq.).

Sāmūlos, i, m. a mountain of Syria, mentioned only by Tacitus. It occurs only once in the writings of this historian, and from the vague manner in which it is introduced, nothing certain respecting it can be determined. Here Hirculus received his wounds, and, according to ancient fiction, inspired the dreams of his prince, chide, I not solely, suggesting the tract where you would be found (Tac. Ann. xii. 13).

Samol, es, v. Sima, n, et, Simas, i, f. w. according to Strabo, an ancient name of Cephalonia, which others make a town and district of that island (Liv. xxviii. 39). Supposing this opinion to be correct, it probably stood on a rocky peninsula, now called Asol-Soma. It appears to have been a place of great strength. Plinius (l. 46) and Pomponius Mela (ii. 7) make it a different island from Cephalonia, Odyssa. If the isthmus which connects Asol-Soma with Cephalonia, is at times overflowed by the sea, it will reconcile the difference of opinion existing amongst those ancient geographers. Inh. Samai, orum, n. by which the Greeks distinguished them from the inhabitants of Simos, an island off the coast of Ionia, whom they called Sami (Liv. xxviii. 28 seq. 1.—2. An island off the coast of Ephesus. See Simos.—3. Another, off the coast of Thracia, afterwards called Samothracia q. v.

Simius, i, m. a man killed by Cilius in the battle at Zima (Sib. Ital. xvii. 42).—2. A Roman knight of considerable distinction, who hired Stillicus with a prodigious fee, and, finding that he had betrayed his cause, went to the house of that perfidious orator, and fell upon his own sword, in the year 47 (Tac. Ann. xi. 5).

Simulium, i, n. an inland district of Italia, bordering on the northwest part of Apulia. Inh. Simulites, ium (Sic. Similis, itis, Liv. viii. 23), m. originally from Greece (Just. xx. 1). Adj. Similis, is, gen. itis, et, Similiticus, a, um. Sima ager, the territory of the Simulites (Liv. xxxi. 4). Simulitum bellum (Ann. Mar. xxx. 8. Aur. Vie. II. Vir. 26).

Simos, i, f. Samos, an island in the Aegean, the Archipelago, on the coast of Asia Minor, Natolia, opposite to Ephesus, Aiosoluc, about 32 miles long, and 22 broad. Greek authors, in general, make it about 57 miles in circumference. It is very elevated, and serves as a kind of landmark for the whole Archipelago. The channel which separates it from Natolia, is so narrow, that one person may hear another speak across it. Samos is very fertile, and all its productions, according to Strabo, were excellent, except wine. Its earthen ware, of which the Samians were considered the inventors, was highly valued. This island, according to Virgil (En. l. 16), was a favourite residence of Jūno, which some supposed to be the birthplace of that goddess. In Samos there was a cognominal town (Herod. i. 142). The present population is about twelve thousand. Inh. Samii, orum, m. who appear to have been an ingenious and active people, felt every kind of tyranny. Their government was first monarchical, then oligarchical, and afterwards democratical. At one time they were oppressed by the Persians, and at another, by the Grecian states. Ovidius perhaps alludes to these changes (Met. xv. 61), rather than to any acts of tyranny or oppression of the monarch Pölycrates q. v., under whom Pöthagoras passed the early part of his life. Adj. Samius, a, m.

Sāmtus vir, Pŷthāgōras (Ov. Met. xv. 60). Sāmta tērra (Liv. xxxvii. 10).

Sāmōsāta, ae, v. Sāmōsāte, arum, f. Se-misat, the capital of Cōmmāgēnē, stood on the Euphrātes. Here Lūciānus was born. Inh. Sāmōsātēnses, ium, v. Sāmōsātēni, orum, m. (Amm. Mar. xiv. 8).

Sāmōthrācē, es, v. Sāmōthrācia, ae, f. Samothraki, an island in the Archipelago, off the coast of Thrācia, Romania. It had this name from being peopled by a colony from Thrācia, to which it formerly belonged, who were joined by Samians, who had been driven from their island by the Ephesians. Plinius makes its circumference thirty-two Roman miles, and says, that its ancient name was Dārdāniā, which is likewise stated by Strābo, Pausānias and others. Sācēē, Monte Nettuno, the only mountain in the island of any note, rises to the height of ten thousand paces, and round the whole coast there is a great want of harbours (Plin. i. 462). The whole island was sacred from the worship of the Cabīri, and was consequently a general resort of the wretched, on which account Lūcētius has Ferrēa Sāmōthrācia, i. e. ferrēi anūli nōmīnē Sāmōthrācia insigniti (vi. 1042). Inh. Sāmōthrāces, um (Sing. Sāmōthrāx, ācis), m. Plī Sāmōthrāces, religious Samothracians, from their being almost wholly given up to the worship of the gods (Stat. Ach. ii. 158). The rites of heathen worship, some suppose to have originated with the Samothracians, which receives some countenance from Pausānias, who states, that Cēres instructed the Cābīrei, v. Cabīri. Adj. Sāmōthrācius, et, Sāmōthrāciēs, a, um. Sāmōthrāciū finium, the temple of Samothraki (App. 213).

Sanacharibus, i, m. king of Arābia and Assyria, invaded Egypt, where he suffered a severe disaster, from not having paid due reverence to the gods. The circumstances mentioned by Hērōdōtus, are an imperfect and garbled account of what is related in the Scriptures, and also misapplied, for instead of Egypt, he should have said Jerusalem (ii. 141).

Sānciā, ae, f. sister of Cōnsidius Prōcūlus, on whose execution, she was banished from Rome, in the year 32 (Tac. Ann. vi. 18).

Sanctio, ōnis, f. Sechingen, a town of Germany, on the right bank of the Rhine, opposite the territory of the Raurāci (Amm. Mar. xxi. 3).

Sāctius Erārium, Sāctiōris Erārii, n. See Erārium.

Sāncra, ae, m. a miser and glutton ridiculed by Mārtiālis (vii. 19).—2. A poet, whose writings were recommended neither by their excellence nor harmony (Mart. xi. 3).

Sāncus, i, m. a man from whom the Sabines believed themselves descended, and, on that account, worshipped as a god. They also called him Fīdus and Sēmo (Ov. Fast. vi. 214. Sil. Ital. viii. 420).

Sāndan, ānis, m. an Ethiopian of high rank and great wealth, said by some to have been a son of Hērōcles, and to have founded Tārus (Amm. Mar. xiv. 8).

Sāndrōcōtus, i, m. a man of low parentage, in the army of Alexander the Great, by whom he was ordered to be put to death, and was indebted to his swiftness for the preservation of his life. After the death of that monarch, he collected forces, excited the Indians to revolt, and killed the prefects of Alexander. Sēlēucus entered into a treaty with him, a proof of his great power, and then marched to the war against Antigōnus. Justinus says he reigned over India, and turned the liberty from the Grecian oppression into slavery (xv. 4).

Sāngārius, i, m. v. Sāngārium, i, n. the Saharia, a river of Phrygia, which takes its rise in the mountain Adōrēus (Liv. xxxviii. 18. Plin. i. 627, 648). See Sāgāria.

Sānquīnius Māximus, Sānquīniū Māxi-mi, m. a man of consular rank, who entreated the senators not to multiply the cares of the emperor Tiberius, when a member of the senate proposed bringing a particular business forward first day he was in court. He died in Lower Germany, when he had the command of the legions, in the year 47 (Tac. Ann. vi. 4 seq.).

Sāntōnes, um, rar. Sāntōni, orum (Sing. Sāntōnus, i, Luc. Phar. i. 422), m. a people of Gallia Cēltica, to the north of the river Cārāntōnus, the Charente. Their chief town was Mēdiolānum, afterwards Sāntōnes, now Saintes, and their country Saintonge (Ces. B. G. i. 10 seq.). Adj. Sāntōnicus, a, um. Sāntōnicus Océānus, the Bay of Biscay (Tib. i. 7. 10). Sāntōnicus cucullus, the Santonic cowl (Juv. Sat. viii. 145). The Romans derived the use of cowls, or hoods, from the Sāntōnes, and they appear to have covered the head and face when necessary, hence used for a disguise (ib. vi. 329).

Sāpaei, orum, m. a people of Thrācia, Romania (Ov. Fast. i. 389), called also Sintae and Saili (Strab. 667).

Sāpāudīa, ae, f. a tract of land on the east side of Rhōdānus, the Rhone, south of Lācus Lemānus, the Lake of Geneva, now the duchy of Savoy. The modern is evidently derived from the ancient name, which is first mentioned by Ammianus Marcellianus (xv. 11).

Sāphārus, i, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, killed in close fight by Q. Fābius Māximus, dictator, at the time he surrounded the troops of Hannibal, and that general had encircled the army under M. Minūcius Rūfus, joint dictator with Fābius (Sil. Ital. vii. 604).

Sāpīres, um, m. a people probably neighbours to the Tiberēni q. v. (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8). Considerable difference of opinion exists in regard to this word, mentioned by Ammianus. It is not improbable the Sāpīres are the same with the Sāspīres, noticed by Hērōdōtus (i. 110 seq.).

Sāpis, is, m. the Savio, a river in the north of Italy, which falls into the Gulf of Venice (Luc. Phar. ii. 406). Adj. Sāpīnūlus, a, um. Sāpīnula tribus (Liv. xxxi. 2).

Sāponia, ae, v. Sāponiae, arum, f. a town of Pānnōnia, near the junction of Drāvus, the Drave, with Dānūbius, the Danube (Amm. Mar. xxviii. 1).

Sāpor, ōris, m. a son of Artāxērxes, king of Pērsia, acquired great renown by his success against the Romans, and by restoring the kingdom to the natives. Like Hannibal, he appears to have entertained the greatest hatred against the Romans, and continued to annoy them during almost the whole of his reign. No sooner had he ascended the throne, than he commenced hostilities by entering Mēsōpōtāmīa, Jezirāh, taking Nisibis and Cārriā. The rapidity of his advances alarmed the Romans, lest, like the warrior above-mentioned, he should invade Italy. He laid siege to Antiochia, Antakie, which the emperor Gordianus had no sooner heard, than he marched against Sāpor, recovered the towns and countries which he had taken, and compelled that prince to retreat precipitately into his own country. Philippus made peace with him, in the year 241, and afterwards returned to Rome. During the reign of Vālērīanus, Sāpor renewed the war, retook the places which he had formerly gained by his arms, when Vālērīanus marched against him, met him in the field, and was entirely defeated. Sāpor refused to treat with the Roman ambassadors, and desired an interview with their emperor. Vālērīanus acceded to his request, and, not being sufficiently guarded, the faithless Persian having by stratagem made him prisoner, afterwards treated this captive monarch with the greatest ignominy, during the remainder of his life. The insolent conqueror, wherever he went, carried his prisoner dressed in his robes of state, loaded with chains, and used his neck as his footstool, when he mounted his horse. To this cruel indignity Sāpor added insulting speeches, and, at the end of three years, when death had released Vālērīanus from the Persian fetters, he ordered his body to be flayed, his skin to be dyed red, so as to preserve its natural appearance, and after being stuffed something in the form of a man, to be hung up in the temple of his gods. Sāpor then extended his conquests westward, overran Syria, and reduced a considerable part of Asia Minor, Natolia, to subjection. Bālīsta and Odēnāthus compelled him to recross Euphrātes, the El-Frat. Sāpor treated the Roman prisoners with the greatest cruelty, just giving food to preserve life, and drink once a-day. On coming to places difficult to cross, he ordered as many of the Roman prisoners to be killed, as would bring the ground to a level. After a reign of thirty-one years, he died in the year 271, when Aurēlianus was making preparations for commencing hostilities against him (Eutrop. ix. 7 seq.).

Sāphō, ōis, m. See Psapho.

Sāphō, ūs, f. a native of Lēsbos, Mytileni, who excelled in lyric poetry. Of her writings none have been transmitted, except an ode or two. These fragments display her poetic talents, in a style that, for delicacy, sweetness, animation and harmony, sets competition almost at defiance. It is to be regretted, that the character of the woman falls almost infinitely below that of the poetess, and that her life cannot be read, without the most offensive and revolting disgust. Disappointment in a wish, from which her mind should have recoiled with horror, impelled her to terminate her life, by leaping from the Leucadian promontory. If the sentiments which Ovidius has put into her mouth, do no injustice to her character, a pure mind cannot think of this celebrated poetess, without contempt and dislike. Anatolice Sāphō (Mart. vii. 68). Adj. Sāphīcus, a, um. Sāphīca mūsa, the muse of Sāphō, i. e. Sāphō herself, whom the Greeks called the tenth muse (Catul. xxxv. 16).

Sārācēnē, es. f. a district of Arabia Pērsia. Isā. Sārācēni, orum, m. Ammianus Micellinus describes them as barbarous, living without laws or fixed residence, of predatory habits, subsisting on milk, herbs, and the flesh of wild animals, and knowing nothing of the use of grain, or wine. According to that historian, their country extended from Asyria, to the cataracts of the Nile, a statement undoubtedly greatly beyond the truth. They were also called Scēnitæ Arabes, and appear to be called Characēni in Plinius, and their country Characēne (i. 719). After adopting the religion of Mahomet, they acquired great distinction by the extent of their conquests (Amm. Mar. xiv. 4).

Sārāmāna, orum, m. a maritime city of Hīrcānīa (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Sārānga, ae. f. Zarang, a town of Gēdrōh in Pērsia. The district had the same name. Isā. Sārāngue, arum, m.

Sārāngēs, is. m. a smooth running river, which falls into Pālūs Mēōtis (Orph. 1050).

Sārdānāpālus, i. m. the thirty-sixth and last king of the Assyrians, a man, says Justinus, more effeminate than a woman. Arbāctus, a lieutenant-general in Mēdia, with great difficulty and by much solicitation, having procured admission into the royal presence, found him amongst multitudes of concubines, spinning purple on a distaff, and apportioning their tasks among the maids, whom he surpassed not only in womanish dress, but in effeminacy of body, and lasciviousness of look. Indignant at so many men being subject to such a woman, and at their bearing arms for a spinster, who was handling a distaff, he formed a conspiracy against the life of Sārdānāpālus, which the latter did not attempt to meet, but, like a woman, for fear of death, sought a hiding place. At last he went out to battle with a few irregular troops, and being easily conquered retired to his palace, raised a pile of wood, which he set on fire, and, having thrown his riches into it, he precipitated himself into the flames and expired. His last was the only manly action in his life, and to it Ovidius alludes (Ib. 312). On his death, Arbāctus succeeded to the throne, and transferred the empire from the Assyrians to the Medes, in 821 B. C. (Just. i. 3). Plinius Sārdānāpāl, the down beds of Sārdānāpāl (Juv. Sat. xvi. 362). Adj. Sārdānāpālīcus, a, um.

Sārdēs, ium, seldom Sārdīs, is. f. Sart, the capital of Lydīa, stood on the side of Mount Tmōlus, Bouz-dag (Plin. i. 599).

Isā. Sārdīāni, orum, m. The Etruscans acknowledged them as a kindred nation (Tac. Ann. ii. 47: iv. 55). Adj. Sārdīanus, a, um. Sārdīāna jurisdictio (Plin. i. 600).

Sārdīca, ae. f. Triaditza, the chief town of inland Dācia, the ruins of which are visible near Sophia. The Roman emperor Māximianus was born in the vicinity of this town (Eutrop. ix. 22).

Sārdīnīa, ae. f. Sardinia, an island in the Mediterranean, to the south of Cōrsica, about 140 miles in length, and 70 in breadth, which contains nearly 420,000 inhabitants. Strābo (Lib. v.) makes it 220 miles long, and 98 broad. Some of the ancient geographers were still farther from the truth. Silius Itālicus derives the name from Sārdus, a son of the African Hēracles (lib. 824).

Claudianus says, it was anciently called Sārdōa (xv. 508), and Plinius relates, that it had the name of Sārdaliōtis, from its resemblance to a shipper, and Ichnūsa from the print or mark of the foot (i. 342). Nuda sub imagine plantae (Sil. Ital. xii. 357). The air of Sardinia was reckoned unhealthy, on which account the Romans made it a place of exile. The soil is very fruitful in corn; sēvices segētes optima Sardinia, the rich crops of fertile Sardinia (Hor. Od. i. 31. 4), but in modern times, ill cultivated. It also produces oil and wines. It was conquered by the Romans, in 235 B. C., under the command of T. Mānlius Torquātus, consul (Vel. Pat. ii. 38). Sardinia est in medio Tibēre, unhealthiness is in the most wholesome situations (Mart. iv. 60). Ich. Sārdi, orum (Sing. Sārdus, i), et, Sārdinēnses, ium (Eutrop. iii. 2), m. the Sardinians, were, at one period, sold for slaves at Rome in such numbers, that Sārdi became a general appellation for worthless and contemptible men. Habes Sārdos venāles; alium alio nequiores, which was in some measure a proverbial expression (Cic. Epist. ad Fam. vii. 34). Adj. Sārdōnēus, Sārdōnūs, Sārdōus, Sārdus, a, um, et, Sārdinēnsis, is, e. Sārdōus herba, an herb like smallage. Whoever eats this herb, becomes almost instantly subject to involuntary laughing and grinning (Sārdōnūs rīens), which terminate in death (Virg. B. vii. 41). Sārdōa rēgna, Sardinia (Ov. Fast. iv. 289). Sārdōi sinus, the bays or creeks of Sardinia (Claud. xxvi. 218). Sārdum mel, Sardinian honey, i. e. bitter honey, from the number of bitter herbs which that island produced (Hor. Art. Poet. 375).

Sarē, es, f. a village of the Mārōnītæ (Liv. xxxviii. 41).

Sārgēta, arum, m. a people mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus, amongst the tribes who live near the Black Sea, but their geographical position is unknown (xxii. 8).

Sariolēnus Vōcūla, Sariolēni Vōcūlæ, m. a notorious informer, who endeavoured to avoid taking the oath devised by the senate, that no man had by any act of theirs been aggrieved, and that they derived no benefit from the calamity of the times, in the year 70. Under Vitellius, he attempted to renew his iniquitous practices, at which the senators fired with indignation, threatened to lay violent hands upon this degraded fellow, and forced him to withdraw from the senate-house (Tac. Hist. iv. 41).

Sārissōphōri, orum, m. Macedonian soldiers armed with a very long spear (Sārissa). Livius calls them the strength of the Macedonians, meaning the Macedonian infantry. The same historian mentions Sārissōphōri in the army of Antiochus, king of Syria, perhaps from their having similar spears, or from the Syrians retaining the military terms of the Macedonians, with which they became first acquainted, when Alexander the Great invaded their country, with the view of retaining it in perpetual possession (Liv. xxxvi. 18 seq.).

Sārmātia, æ, f. a country of Europe, bounded on the south by Dāniūbus, the Danube, and on the west by the Vistula, having Pōn-tus Euxinus, the Black Sea, as part of its eastern limit. It was of greater extent in the interior, says Pōmpōnius Mēla, than on the seacoast. But there was another Sārmātia in Asia, of which neither the Greeks nor Romans knew any thing with certainty. Ich. Sārmātæ, arum (Sing. Sārmātæ, æ), m. called by the Greeks Saurōmātæ, arum (Sing. Saurōmātæ, æ), m. In dress and arms, according to Pōmpōnius Mēla, the Saurōmātæ bore a strong resemblance to the Parthians, but their manners were more gross, and their climate was more rigorous. They had no towns, no fixed places of residence. Whether feeding their flocks or pursuing their enemies, they carried their whole property along with them, and lived in an encampment. Warlike, free, unsubdued and ferocious, they trained to the use of arms their women, who fought with them in battle. To fit them for this exercise, they burned the right breast of the female children, that they might have the ready use of their right hand. To bend the bow, and to hunt, formed the exercise of the girls in early life, and to attack the enemy the employment of the full-grown. Not to have put a foe to death, they deemed a disgrace, and the punishment for this failure in national duty was prohibition from marriage. Tacitus informs us, that they used no shield, and lived either in waggons or on horseback (Hist. i. 79; Mor. Ger. 46). They formed their coats of mail of horses' hoofs, and used iron in no form, which rendered it necessary for them to exercise their ingenuity in various ways, to supply that important defect (Paus. i. 21). Sārmātis, Idis, f. of Sārmātia, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Sārmātis ōra (Ov. Trist. v. 3. 8). Adj. Sārmāticus, a, um. Sārmātici bōves (Ov. Trist. iii. 10. 34). The Sārmātæ ploughed with oxen (ib.). Sārmātica brūca (Val. Flacc. v. 425). Adj. Sārmātice, in the manner of the Sārmātæ (Ov. Ep. Pont. iii. 2. 40). Pōmpōnius Mēla mentions Saurōmātæ in Asia, inhabiting the banks of Tānāis, the Don; but does not describe either the extent or boundaries of their country, both of which were most probably unknown to him. Plinius informs us, that the Saurōmātæ on the Don, were descended from the Medes, in which he is followed by Solinus, and he adds, that they were divided into many tribes or nations. Strābo states, that they had no general uniformity of manners, and, in proof of this assertion, maintains that some of them were cannibals, and others abstained from eating the flesh even of animals (436).

Sārmēns, ēntis, m. a Roman killed in the first engagement with Hannibal, after he had invaded Italy (Sil. Ital. iv. 200).

Sārmēntus, i, m. a buffoon in the court of Augustus, who appears to have been a freedman, and a Tuscan by birth. Plūtarchus mentions him in the life of Antonius; and Juvēnalis (Sat. v. 3).

Sārnus, i, m. the Sarno, a river of Itālia, Italy, which rises in the territory of the Hirpini, runs through Cāmpānia, and falls into the bay of Naples. Pōmpōnius Mēla, the Sarno of Pōmpēi (Stat. Syl. i. 2. 265). Sār-rāstes, ium (Sing. Sār-rāstis, is), m. the people who lived on the banks of Sārnus, the Sarno (Virg. Æn. vii. 738).

Sārpēdon, ōnis, m. a son of Jūpiter and Lāodāmia, or Eurōpa. Some authors are of opinion there were two princes of this name, the one the son of Lāodāmia, daughter of Bellerōphon, and the other the son of Eurōpa, and younger brother of Minos. But historians generally mention only one Sarpēdon, the son of Eurōpa. Having failed in his attempt to wrest the sceptre of Crēta, Candia, from his elder brother Minos, he fled to Cāria in Asia Minor, and built Milētus. He afterwards became king of Lēda (Lēdi Sarpēdonis, Ov. Met. xiii. 255). But by what means he obtained that kingdom, ancient authors are not agreed. In the Trojan war he joined Priāmus, and, after putting many Greeks to death, he was wounded by Tēpōlēmus, king of Rhōdes, and afterwards killed by Pātrocclus. Ulysses boasts, that many of Sarpēdon's companions had fallen by his sword. Of these Ovidius (Met. xiii. 257 seq.) gives the names of eleven, nearly copied from Hōmērus (Il. v. 677, 678). Virgilius has transcribed the last of these lines (Æn. ix. 767). Adj. Sarpēdonius, a, um.—2. The teacher of the younger Cāto (Val. Max. iii. 1).

Sarpēdon, ōnis, f. a town of Thrācia. Adj. Sarpēdonius, a, um. Sarpēdonium prōmōntōrium, a promontory of Thrācia (Herod. vii. 58).—2. Another, of Cilicia. Adj. Sarpēdonius, a, um. Sarpēdonium prōmōntōrium, a promontory of Cilicia.

Sārra, æ, f. an ancient name of Tŷrus, which, according to Sērvius, it received from the fish (Sar); but Bōchartus derives Sārra from Tsor, which is the Hebrew mode of spelling what the Greeks wrote Tŷros, and the Latins Tŷrus. This derivation is rendered probable by Stēphānus, who mentions a Phœnician city called Sora, which bears a nearer resemblance to the Hebrew Tsor, or the Roman Sārra. Adj. Sārrianus, v. Sārrianus, a, um, of Tyre, Tyrian, purple; also Carthaginian. Sārrianum ostrum, Tyrian purple (Virg. G. ii. 506). Sārriana gēns, the Carthaginian nation (Sil. Ital. i. 72). Sārriana mīnima, Carthaginian deities (Sil. Ital. viii. 46).

Sārriānus, v. Sērriānus, i, m. a Rutulian youth, distinguished for his beauty, whom Nisus killed asleep, and drank (Virg. Æn. ix. 335).

Sārris, is, m. a man killed by Amānus in the battle at Zāma (Sil. Ital. xvii. 441).

Sārsina, v. Sāssina, æ, f. Sarsina, an inland town of Umbria, a district of Italy, of which the poet Plautus was a native. Sāssina dūces lāctis (i. e. pecōris) (Sil. Ital. viii. 461). Inh. Sārsinātes, ium (Sing. Sārsinās, ātis), m. Adj. Sāssinās, as, as; ātis. Sāssinas stīca (Mart. iii. 58).

Sārta, æ, f. a city on the canal dug by Xērxēs, at mount Athos (Herod. vii. 122).

Sārūnātes, ium, m. a people who lived to the E. of Switzerland, near the sources of Rhēnus, the Rhine. Their country is now called Sargans (Ces. B. G. iv. 10). Here the common editions of Cæsar have Nāntūātium.

Sārus, i, m. the Scioun, a river which takes its rise in Cāpādōcia, and running through Cilicia, falls into the sea, opposite Cŷprus (Liv. xxxiii. 41).

Sāson, ōnis, m. Sasone, a small island on the western coast of Greece, immediately to the north of Acrocēraunia. Cālīber Sāson, would induce the reader of Lucianus to suppose, that it was near the coast of Cālābria (Phar. ii. 627), although Strābo informs us, that it lies nearly equidistant from Brūndisium, Brindisi, and Epirus, Lower Albania, and Ptolēmæus places it in the Gulf of Venice, adjacent to Mācēdōnia, which is its true situation. From Silius Itālicus, its coast appears to have been dangerous, Hādūci fugiūb. fūstas Sāsonis ūrinās (vii. 480).

Sāspires, um, m. See Sāpīres.

Sāssula, æ, f. a town of the Thūrēs, taken by the Romans in 553 B. C. (Liv. vi. 19).

Sātārchæ, arum (Sing. Sātārchēs, v.) a Scythian nation, who lived near the Mæotis, the Sea of Azoph, according to Pōmpōnius Mēla. Valērius Flaccus likewise mentions them; but from his description little can be learned, either respecting their geographical position or national character (vi. 144). Plinius calls them Scythæ Sātārchæ, and makes them the neighbours of the Scythotauri on the east. Others have supposed, that to the Sātārchæ of Pōmpōnius Mēla, and Valērius Flaccus, this author has given the name Sātārchæi, in which case it would not materially differ from the others already-mentioned (i. 662). Ptolēmæus calls their town Sātārchē, and places it on Cēsōnēsus Taurica, the Crimea, not on the coast, but inland. Sōlinus informs us, that they prohibited the use of gold and silver, which secured them against avarice (ls).

Sātiāster, tri, m. a son of Tigrānus, king of Armēnia, appears to have been a man of hard practices. By some he is called Tigrānus Minor (Val. Max. ix. 11).

Sātībārzānes, is, m. a satrap of the Ašī, who informed Alexander the Great, that Bēssus had assumed the badges of royalty, and was collecting troops to support him in his independence. Some time after, he revolted to Bēssus, and in an engagement between the Macedonians and Ašī, fell in single combat by the hand of Eriylas, v. a general of Alexander the Great (Curt. vi. 6 seq.).

Sātīcōla, æ, f. Caserta, a city of Cāmpānia, first mentioned by Līvius, when the consul A. Cōrnēlius Cōssus pitched his camp near it, in the year 342 B. C. It was afterwards besieged by L. Æmilius, dictator, and attempted to be rescued, but without success, by the Sāmmites, whom he compelled to turn and fly, in 316 B. C. Next year it surrendered to the dictator Q. Fābius (Liv. vii. 32 seq.). Inh. Sātīcūlāi, et, Sātīcūlī, orum, m. in the Carthaginian war, joined Hānūbal, but their town was taken by the dictator Q. Fābius Māximus (Liv. xxiii. 39 seq.). Asper Sātīcūlus, from their rude or unpolished manners (Virg. Æn. vii. 729). Adj. Sātīcūlānus, a, um. Sātīcūlānus ager (Liv. xxiii. 14).

Sātīlōcis, entis, m. a beautiful stream in the Troad, on the bank of which Sātīlus, son of Enōps and Nāis, was born (Hom. Il. vi. 34 seq.).

Sātīlus, i, m. son of Enōps and Nāis, a beautiful nymph, was wounded in the Trojan war, by Ajāx "the swift" (Hom. Il. xiv. 443).

Sātīra, arum, m. an inland nation of the Thracians, through whose territories Xērxēs marched his army, when he invaded Greece, in 480 B. C. (Herod. vii. 110).

Sātīrāpēnē, es, f. a district of Mēdia (Curt. v. 2). Here the reading is very doubtful, some thinking it should be Attrāpēnē, others Sitacēne. Perhaps the common reading should not be altered, since Sātīrāpēi and Sātīrāpēni occur in good authors, unquestion-ably derivatives from Sātrāpēne, denoting the inhabitants of that country.

Sātricum, i. n. a town of Lātium, near to Vēlitræ and Lānūvium, but its precise site is not known. Like the other towns at no great distance from Rome, it was frequently taken by that conquering nation, and frequently revolted, now burned or levelled with the ground, and again rebuilt. Inh. Sātriciāni, orum, m. revolted to the Sānnites, in 320 B. C. (Liv. ix. 12).

Sātricus, i. m. a native of Sūlmo, Salmona, and descendant of the founder of that town. Nānthippus, when he commanded the Carthaginian forces, took him prisoner, and afterwards gave him, in a present, to the king of the Autōlōles, who carried him into Italy at the time he joined Hānnibal, with the view of his being his interpreter. Love of country and of freedom, induced Sātricus to seize on the first opportunity of deserting the Carthaginian camp, and the better to escape detection, he fled during the night without arms. On coming up to the party who had fallen in a skirmish, a few hours before, he put on the armour of one of the killed, who proved to be his own son, Māncius q. v., and in the very act of adjusting the accoutrements, he received a mortal wound from his other son Sōlūmus, who had gone in quest of his brother. A tender scene ensued, on the father and son recognising each other; the father expiring over the body of his dead son, by a wound received from his surviving son (Sil. Ital. ix. 68). Some imagine that the poet invented the history of Sātricus and his son, and that the whole must be referred to poetic fiction, rather than to authentic record. It forms a very interesting episode.

Sātrius Sēcūndus, Sātrii Sēcūndi, m. a creature of Sējanus, who, with Pinārius Nātta, commenced a prosecution against Crēmūtius Cōrdus, in the year 24. After being the active agent of that worthless minister, he in the end wrought the destruction of his patron. He married Albūcilla q. v., a woman infamous on account of her immoral practices (Tac. Ann. iv. 34 seq.).

Satropates, is, m. a prefect under Dārīus, killed in battle by Ariston, in 331 B. C. (Curt. iv. 9).

Sātūra, m. f. appears either to have been a name of the Pomptine marsh, or of a part of that fen (Sil. Ital. viii. 380).

Sātūrius, i. m. a superintendent of the servants of the bedchamber under the emperor Dōmītiānus, against whose life he conspired (Suet. Dom. 17).

Sātūrnia, ae, f. an ancient city now in ruins, of which the original name was Aurinia. Here a colony of Roman citizens was established, in the territory of Cālētra, in Etrūria, 185 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 55). Inh. Sātūrnīni, orum, m. (Plin. i. 322).—2. A city where Rome now stands (Plin. i. 333). See Rōma. Aurēlius Victor says it was built by Sātūrnus, whence the name (Or. 3).

Sātūrninus, i. m. a commander in the Roman army, whom his own troops proclaimed emperor. His victories over the barbarians showed his skill in war, and the prudence of his conduct, added to mildness of temper and steadiness in maintaining discipline, afford sufficient proof of his fitness for directing the forces of a great state. Of this quality he appears to have been sensible, from his saying to the soldiers on his election, "You have lost a good general, and made a bad emperor." His accurate observance of military discipline raised against him the hatred of the troops, who put him to death, in the year 263 (Eutrop. ix. 17. Aur. Vic. Cæs. 37).

Sātūrnus, i. m. the son of Cēlus and Tēr-ra, married his sister Rhēa, who is frequently called Ops and Cybelē. He was the younger brother of Titan, from whom he obtained the kingdom of the world, on condition he brought up no male children. In consequence of this agreement, Sātūrnus devoured his sons as soon as they were born. Rhēa, grieved at the loss of her children, at last devised means by which she was enabled to conceal the births of Jūpiter, Nēptūnus and Plūtō. Titan, having obtained information of this breach of the treaty, commenced hostilities against Sātūrnus, whom he dispossessed of the crown, and put in prison. Jūpiter, on reaching manhood, made war on Titan, defeated him, and restored his father to the throne. Being exasperated at his father's cruelty to his children, or unjust suspicions of his aspiring at the sovereignty, Jūpiter took up arms against Sātūrnus, and expelled him from his dominions. To escape the fury of his son, Sātūrnus fled to that part of Itālia, Italy, called Lātium, from his concealment, a small maritime district of Italy, south of Tiber, the Tesere, became joint sovereign with Jānus, king of that country, and governed with such moderation, that the golden age is said to have been under his reign. From him Justinus says Itālia was called Sātūrnia (xliii. 1). Besides giving laws to the Italians, he taught them to plant trees, to engraft, to cultivate the soil, to acquire wealth, and to retain it. From having been the first who enriched the soil by manure, he was called Sātrēūtus. Ancient authors differ greatly, with respect to the accounts both of the character and fate of Sātūrnus. Not a few assert, that he voluntarily resigned his crown to Jūpiter, and retired to Italy. According to some, he invented the Scythe, and, according to others, with that instrument his son Jūpiter mutilated him, and that it fell on the island Sciellia, Sicily, which, from that circumstance, received the name of Drēpānum, the Greek word for a Scythe. There are other accounts of him, at variance with all these; but consistency or uniformity is seldom found in fiction or fabulous history. Sātūrnus is god of time, and represented as an old man holding a scythe in his hand, and a serpent with its tail in its mouth, emblematical of the revolution of the year. Men were sacrificed to him in Lātium, by throwing them over Pons Mīlvius, and infants, on account of the hatred of Jūpiter (Lactan. i. 21). Aurēlius Sātūrnus, golden Sātūrnus, i. e. king of the golden age (Virg. G. ii. 538). Sātūrnia, ae, f. Jūno, the daughter of Sātūrnus, who is also called Sātūrnigēna, ae, f. Sātūrnālia, ium, e. orum, n. feasts of Sātūrnus, which continued three days, when slaves were on an equal footing with their masters. Adj. Sātūrnus, et, Sātūrninus, a, um. Pāter Sātūrnus, the Saturnian father, i. e. Jūpiter (Or. Met. i. 163). Sātūrnia Tellus, Sātūrnia arva, Sātūrnia regna, &c., Italy, from Sātūrnus being king of Lātium. Sātūrninus (Nēp- tūnus) (Virg. Æn. v. 799). Sātūrnus (mons), afterwards Cāpitōlius (Just. xliii. 1). Sātūrnus nūmērus, Saturnian numbers (Hor. Epist. ii. 1. 158). Perhaps equivalent to inelegant, ancient, from Sātūrnus being one of the first kings of Italy; but others understand the adjective as belonging to Sātūrnā, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, where a particular sort of verses were composed and repeated. The former is the more probable opinion. Sātūrnālītūs, a, um, of the festivals of Sātūrnus, used only by Mārtiālis. Sātūrnālītūa nūces (Mart. v. 31).

Sātūrum, i, n. a town of Cālābria, a district which abounded with rich pastures. Adj. Sātūreianus, a, um. Sātūreianus cūbāllus, an excellent horse (Hor. Sat. i. 6. 59).

Sātūrus, i, m. brother of Clēarehus, tyrant of Hērāclēa, Erebi, in Pōntus, on whose death he ascended the throne (Just. xvi. 5).

Sātūrus, i, m. a Satyr. The Satyrs were rural deities, demi-gods, having the horns, ears, legs and feet of goats, and the rest of their body human. They were exceedingly cunning, talkative, and lascivious. According to some writers on mythology, these monstrous beings were the children of Bāchus and Nicē, and, according to others, of Mērcūrius and Yphimē. Their form was said to have been first wholly human; but, being the guards of Bāchus, and not preventing his passing into different forms, Jūno, enraged at his changes, gave to the Satyrs the horns, &c., of a goat. Plinius supposes the Satyrs of the poets were apes. Saltantes Sātūri, the dancing Satyrs, i. e. a dance after the manner of the Satyrs (Virg. B. v. 73). Sātūri cūprīpēdes (Luc. iv. 584). Sātūris, i, m. a little Satyr. Adj. Sātūricus, a, um.

Saufāa, e, f. a woman of the most horrible lewdness (Juv. Sat. vi. 320).

L. Saufeus, L. Saufēi, m. a Roman knight, whose estate the triumviri sold. T. Pompōnius Atticus, with whom he lived for several years, and with whom he studied philosophy, had sufficient influence with the members of that illegal compact, to recover the valuable possessions of his friend Saufēus, and his messenger carried the first intelligence both of his property having been lost and regained.

Saufellus, i, m. a man held up to ridicule by Mārtiālis, from the class of people who attended him (il. 74).

Saufellus Trōgus, Saufelli Trōgi, m. a Roman knight concerned in the marriage of C. Silius and Messālina, for which Claudius ordered him to be instantly executed, in the year 48. Pōmpeius Urbicus, Dēcius Cāl-purnianus, Sūlpicius Rūfus, and Iūneus Virgillānus shared the same fate (Tac. Ann. xi. 35).

Sāvo, ōnis, m. Savona, a town of Ligūria, an Alpine town, at which Māgo, brother of Hānnibal, deposited the plunder which he had made in the taking of Gēnūa, in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 46).—2. The Savonē, a river of Cāmpānia, which runs slowly, on which account Stātius has Piger Sāvo (Sil. iv. 3. 66).

Saurōmātē. See Sūrmātē.

Sāvus, i, m. the Save, a river of Pānnōnia, which now forms a boundary between Austria and Turkey in Europe. It is one of the southern branches of Dānūbius, the Danube, and falls into that river at Singidūnum, Belgrade (Flor. iv. 12).

Sāxa Rūbra, Sāxōrum Rūbrōrum, n. the red rocks, a place on the Flaminian road, about nine miles from Rome (Tac. Hist. iii. 79).

Sāxōnes, um (Sing. Sāxo, ōnis), n. the Saxons, a German nation, from whom two of the circles in that country still have their name. The English nation are descendants of the Saxons, and this fact has not been contradicted. With respect to the Saxons themselves, matters do not stand on a similar footing of certainty. Some trace their origin to India, others to Asia, and the greatest number to Germany. The same degree of doubt prevails, with respect to the meaning and cases of their name. During the reign of Hārculus, they fell under the notice of Roman authors, and the inroads of the Scots and Picts on South Britain rendered it necessary, since the Romans could not protect them, to apply for aid to the Saxons. An armament under the conduct of two brothers, Hengist and Horsa, arrived at Thānētōs, Thanet, on the coast of Kent, in the year 449. Having defeated the Scots and Picts, Vortigern, who had invited them over, gave them large possessions in the country, which they had recovered from the enemy. Delighted with the richness of the soil and mildness of the climate, they received reinforcements from their countrymen in Germany, gradually subdued the country which they had come to protect, and divided it into seven kingdoms, known in history under the name of the Saxon heptarchy. Egbert united into one these seven kingdoms, in the year 827, since which period the country has been denominated England. Sāxōnē dōmītō (Claud. xviii. 392).

Scæus, a, um. Scæa pōrtæ, one of the six gates of Troy, of which the derivation is doubtful (Virg. Æn. ii. 612). Strāba has Scæi Thrāces, Scæus flūvius, and Scæus nūrus. Many words appear common to the Trojans and Thracians, which was a natural consequence of the frequent intercourse between these nations (852).

Scæva, e, m. a centurion, whose shield, at Dyrrāchium, Durazzo, was pierced in 280 (120, Flor. iv. 2) places in one day. Vālerius Māximus says, he was wounded in the head, shoulder, thigh, and had one of his eyes struck out, still he continued to fight (iii. 2). For his bravery, Cæsar gave him 200,000 asses, and raised him from the eighth rank of centurions to be the first centurion of the legion, or, Primipilus. Lūcānus has given his character (Phar. vi. 144 seq.). An uncertainty prevails respecting his prænōmen; hence, we find him called Cāssius, Mārcus, Minitius, and Numicius.

Scævōla, e, m. a surname of the Mūci q. v.

Scævōla, e, m. a noble Roman, who performed feats of great bravery at the battle of Cānnæ, overcame Cārili, Gābar, and Siocha, but was himself afterwards killed by Nēalces (Sil. Ital. ix. 372 seq.).—2. A covetous man, who became more avaricious as he increased in wealth (Mart. i. 104).

Scāldis, is, acc. im. v. in, m. the Esant, oftener the Scheld, or the Scheldt, a river of Gāllia Belgica, which takes its rise about 15 miles south of Cameracum, Cambray, in the province of Picardy, runs north, and dividing into two branches, Water Scheldt, which separates Flanders from Zealand, and falls into the German Sea, near the island Walcheren, and Ooster, or, Easter Scheldt, which passes Bergen-op-Zoom, and afterwards between the islands Beveland and Schouwen, below which it is lost in the German Sea. The latter was most probably the original channel. The former was only a small stream, which Otho I. enlarged in the tenth century. From him, it was often called Fossa Othonis. Several changes have taken place in the mouth of the river, in consequence of the levelness of the country, and the encroachments of the sea. Its course does not exceed 120 miles in length. The Scheldt at Antwerp, about 38 miles above Walcheren, is 1200 feet broad, and 22 deep; so that ships of great burden can come up to the quay, and, by means of canals cut through the town, vessels are brought to the very doors, for the purposes of loading and unloading. Ships of the line can sail to Rupelmonde, five miles above Antwerp, and without their guns and stores to Dendermonde, about twenty miles above that city. Cæsar erroneously makes it a branch of Mösa, the Meuse (B. G. vi. 33).

Scamander, dri, m. a river of the Troad, called by the gods Xanthus q. v. The army of Xerxes drank this stream dry, as that monarch advanced against Greece (Herod. vii. 43).

Scamandrius, i, m. a Trojan, the son of Strophus, whom Diana taught to hunt, and whom Meneleus killed (Hom. ii. v. 49).

Scandia, v. Scandinavia, v, f. Norway, Sweden, Lapland, and part of Finland, bounded on the S. by Sinus Códanus, the Baltic Sea; on the W. by the Atlantic Ocean, on the N. by the Northern Ocean, i. e. a part of the Atlantic Ocean, and on the E. by the Gulf of Bothnia, and the isthmus which connects it with the continent. The ancients considered Scandia an island. From Plinius, it appears, to have had also the names Baltia and Bastila (Plin. i. 475 seq.). Others are of opinion, that Scandia included only the western part of the countries above-mentioned. Adj. Scandianus, a, um. Scandiāna uala (Col. v. 10).

Scandium, i, n. et, Scandios, i, v. Scandia, v, f. a city of Cythra, Cerigo, on the southern coast of Greece (Hom. ii. x. 268).

Scantia, v, f. a vestal virgin, the superior of the order, who died in the year 23, and Cornelia, her successor, received two thousand sestertia, on purpose to render the priesthood more dignified, and the minds of the priestesses more devoted to the duties of their office (Tac. Ann. iv. 16).

C. Scantinius, C. Scantini, m. a tribune of the people, who was prosecuted, by Marcus, for attempting violation of his son, convicted and fined. From him some say, the law against that offence was called Scantinia lex, a derivation opposed by the usage of the Romans. See P. Scantinius.

P. Scantinius, P. Scantini, m. a pontiff in whose room Q. Cælius Metellus was elected in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 21). He carried a law De nefandis venere, to which Javénalis alludes (Sat. ii. 44). The punishment appointed by this law was a fine, but after the Roman emperors embraced Christianity, they punished the offenders with death. Adj. Scantinius, a, um. Scantinia lex, the law above-mentioned.

Scapte-Hylé, a place in Thracia, in which were mines of gold (Herod. vi. 46).

Scaptia, v, f. a town of considerable celebrity in Latiū, which Plinius mentions between Pométia and Pitulum (i. 333). Adj. Scaptius, a, um. Scaptia pibes (Sil. Ital. viii. 395). Scaptia tribus (Liv. viii. 17).

P. Scaptius, P. Scapti, m. a plebeian of a very great age, who informed the commons of Rome, that the land disputed by the Ardeates and Aricini, of which the decision was then submitted to the Roman people, belonged originally to Corioli, and by right of conquest was now the public property of the Romans. In this judgment, the tribes acquiesced, in opposition to the sentiments of the consuls and patricians, who protested both against the falseness of the evidence, and the scandalous injustice of the decision (Liv. iii. 71 seq.).

Scarphæa, v. Scarphia, v, f. a town of Locris, to which the Romans, under M. Acilius Glabrio, pursued Antiochus, king of Syria, on the same day that they had defeated him at Thermopylæ, 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 3: xxxvi. 19).

Scarpōna, orum, n. Charpigne, a town of the Netherlands, on the Moselle (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 2).

Scatinius. See P. Scatinius.

Scaurus, i, m. a surname of the Emili and Auréli. The name has been derived from having twisted ankles (Hor. Sat. i. 3. 47).

Scenitæ. See Saraceni.

Scēpius, i, m. mentioned by Ovidius, of whom nothing is certainly known, except that he wrote with severity against the manners of the Ausonians. Nor did Rome escape his censure (Ep. Pont. iv. 14. 38).

Scēptūchi, orum, m. (i. e. Sceptre-bearing) governors of provinces in Asiatic Sarmatia, to the west of the Caspian Sea. For hire, they readily joined in any quarrel, without regard to the character, or situation of the contending powers. Pharsimanes enlisted part of them, in the year 54. At that time, the Sceptuchians were engaged on both sides (Tac. Ann. vi. 33). The term also denoted princes, from their bearing sceptres. It is strictly speaking an adjective, which Homerus uses in the masculine gender as an epithet of kings, and Strabo in the feminine, to denote provinces (Hom. ii. li. 86. Strab. 728).

Scēdileadus, i, m. a king of the Thracians, or the Illyri. He was the father of Plēuratus, whom the Romans included in their treaty with Philippos, king of Macedonia, at Phœnicæ in Epirus, and although not mentioned by name, it is probable that Scēdileadus was also included in that treaty (Liv. xlii. 33 seq.).—2. Son of Gēntius, king of the Illyrians, carried captive to Rome, with his father, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 32). See Gēntius.

Schēdus, i, m. son of Pērimēdes, a commander of the Phœcenses in the Trojan war, and was killed by Hēctor (Hom. ii. xv. 515).—2. Son of Iphitus, and brother of Epistrophus, commanded the Phœcenses in the Trojan war, and was killed by Hēctor. Of all the Phœcenses, this Schēdus was by for the lowest (Hes. Th. i. 57 - vii. 285).

Sciōia, sc. f. the island of the Phaeacians, described by Odysseus as fertile, and the inhabitants very wealthy (Hes. Od. x. 34).

Sciōnia, sc. m. a king of Æthiopia, daughter of Sciōnia (Ov. Ep. Her. xii. 205). Sciōnia, sc. m. a king of Æthiopia, daughter of Sciōnia (Ov. Met. x. 689). Sciōnia has Sciōnia (Met. x. 689), to which Sciōnia, or some similar name is understood.

Sciōnia, sc. m. a merchant of Portus, a man of distinction and ability, whom, with Menippus, L. Æmilius Paulus, the Roman consul, consulted with respect to the passage into Portus, and resolved to employ them as guides, in 179 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 35).

Sciōnia, sc. m. a town of Æthiopia, the inhabitants of which, under Eurymedon, joined the Thebans against the Argives. It appears to have been adjoining to Hylē. Scio makes it a place, not a town, and mentions a river of the same name, which passes by it. Attilia Sciōnia, from Attilia being a native of Sciōnia (Stat. Th. vii. 285).—2. Kolonis, a town in Arcadia, so called from Sciōnia, a Boeotian. Pausanias thinks it probable that the course near Sciōnia in Arcadia, had its name from his daughter Attilia (viii. 35), and if his supposition be well founded, there would be only one Attilia born at Sciōnia in Boeotia, and removed in early life to the town of the same name in Arcadia.

Sciōthos, sc. f. Sciotti, or Sciathos, an island in the Mare Ægeum, the Archipelago, off the coast of Thessalia, Thessaly (Val. Flacc. Il. 8). Here Antiochus collected his ships, which had been scattered in crossing the Archipelago, in 194 B. C., at the time he went to make war against the Romans in Greece, and, in it, C. Marcins Figulus, prætor, who commanded the Roman fleet on that station in 171 B. C., sent a part of his troops to winter (Liv. xxxv. 43 seq.). It had a cognominal town, which Philippus destroyed, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 28 seq.).

Sciōtis, sc. f. a town of Elis, at which Xénophon resided after his banishment. Inh. Sciōntii, sc. m.

Sciōtis. See Sinis.

Sciōtis, sc. f. a town of Pallēnē (Herod. vii. 123).

Sciōpiada, sc. f. a poem written by Lucilius, in praise of the valour and justice of P. Cornélius Scipio Africānus (Hor. Sat. ii. 1. 17). Sciōpiada, sc. m. P. Cornélius Scipio Africānus, and P. Cornélius Scipio Æmiliānus, whom Virgilius calls the thunderbolts of war, and the destruction of Libya, by which he means Carthage (Æn. vi. 844). Ambo Sciōpiada, the two Sciōpiōnes above-mentioned (Juv. Sat. ii. 154). Sciōpiada, quē dūces fātum Carthāginita unum (Manil. l. 790).

Sciōpiō. See Cornélius.

Sciōpiō, sc. m. a commander of a Roman cohort, who was murdered in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. ii. 59).

Sciōpiō, sc. m. L. Sciōpiōnis, m. commanded the left wing under the Roman consul, L. Papius Cursor, at Aquilōnia, in the year 205 (Liv. x. 40).

Sciōron, v. Seyron, sc. m. a notorious chief and robber, who plundered along the coast of Aethiopia and Mægia. After he had compelled many of the inhabitants of the districts to do the most odious office to himself, he threw them from the high rocks into the sea. This was relieved Greece of this scourge by throwing him into the sea, on which his bones were changed into rocks that still bear his name between Mægia and Corinthus. Ovid informs us, that neither the sea nor the earth would receive them, until they had undergone that transformation, and that they continued from the time of his death till the event, suspended in the atmosphere (Met. vii. 444). Sciōronis, sc. f. applied to females or nouns feminine. Sciōronis, sc. m. Sciōronis, sc. m. Sciōronis, the rocks of Sciōron, i. e. the rocks into which his bones were changed (Ovid. xxvi. 185), which Plinius calls Sciōronis Sina (l. 422).

Sciōron, sc. m. eldest son of Darius, who deserted his father, went over to Artabanus king of Persia, and informed him of his father's revolt (Cæsar. Nep. Dat. 7).

Sciōtis, a town of Spain, taken by G. Cornélius Scipio, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 60).

Sciōtis, sc. m. a mountain in the centre of Bithynia (App. Bel. Mith. 185).

Sciōtis, sc. f. Scutari, Scutari, sc. m. the palace of Gentius, king of the Illyrii. It was the strongest fortified town of the Illyrii, and of difficult access. On the west side it is surrounded by the river Glasia and on the west by the river Barbus (Liv. xlii. 20 seq.). Inh. Sciōtis, sc. m. whom L. Anicius Gallus, by command of the Roman senate, ordered to contribute to the taxes which they had formerly paid to the king, and declared them to be free, in 119 B. C. (Liv. xiv. 26).

Sciōpitus, sc. m. a Scythian who, with Hyllus, having been banished from their own country, carried along with them a great number of the youth, and settled near the river Thermōdon. After the men of the colony had been cut off by a stratagem, their wives took up arms, and founded that nation of women so celebrated in antiquity under the name of Amāzōnes (Just. ii. 4).

Sciōtis, sc. m. the general name by which the Scythians, the descendants of Colāxais, called themselves; by the Greeks they are denominated Scythians (Herod. iv. 61).

Sciōtis, sc. f. a village near Citharon, Sciōtis, which was of very difficult access, and gave rise to the proverb, Neo Sciōtis ipse ibi, altumē sequēris cūntem. Perhaps the hill on which it stood had the same name, for some make Sciōtis a mountain. The inhabitants of that town were commanded by Eurymedon in the Theban war (Stat. Th. vii. 266).—2. A town of the same name near Olynthus (Strab. 593). Vestiges only of Sciōtis remained in the age of Pausanias (Paus. ix. 4).

Sciōtis, sc. m. a prætor of the Ætolii, in 215 B. C. By confirming the statements of M. Valerius Lævinus, he prevailed on his countrymen to make peace with the Romans. See Dorimachus. He afterwards made preparations for war on the Acarnānes, who formed the resolution of sacrificing their lives rather than submit to the Ætolians, and framed an awful curse, which all the men from fifteen to sixty swore to. This was the tion induced Scōpas to give up his plan, and they retreated into the inner parts of their own country, on the approach of the Macedonian king. In 202 B. C., Scōpas returned from Alēxandria, with a large sum of money given him by Ptōlēmæus, king of Egypt, to whose court he had repaired, on purpose to hire troops in Ætolia, in which it is probable he would not have left a single young man, had not Dāmōcritus either from patriotism or enmity opposed him, and thereby prevented him from carrying off more than six thousand foot and some horse (Liv. xxvi. 24 seq.). —2. A noble Thessalian. Scōpādæ, arum, m. the descendants of Scōpas (Theoc. Idyl. xvi. 36).

Scōrdisci, orum, m. a people of Pännōniā, originally a Celtic nation, who, in ancient times, occupied, besides the country just mentioned, great part of Mœsia, and also a considerable extent of Illyricum. Many of the names of the places on Ister, the Danube, possessed by the Scōrdisci, are purely Celtic, and Livius informs us, that in manners and language they resembled the Bästarnæ, on which account, Philippus, king of Mæcēdōniā, supposed that the latter would readily allow him a passage through their country to Italy, more particularly as their object was the plunder of a very wealthy nation. They appear to have been numerous, and therefore we find them in different countries. M. Cōscōnius, the Roman prætor, conquered the Scōrdisci in Thraciā, in 137 B. C., and they defeated C. Pōrcius Cato, consul, in 116 B. C. Two years after, M. Livius Drūsus, consul, gained a victory over them. Livius, the historian, adds, that the Scōrdisci in Thraciā, were descended from the Gauls, which proves that this was a tribe of the people above-mentioned (xl. 57—Ep. 63). Eutropius mentions the Scōrdisci in Mæcēdōniā (iv. 27). The Scōrdisci, says Florus, were the most savage of all the Thracians, and their situation in woods and mountains, accorded with their dispositions (iii. 4). Justinus says expressly they were Gauls (xxxii. 8).

Scōrdus, i, m. Monte Argentaro, or, Tehar Dag, a mountain of Illyriæ, which separates it from Dardāniā and Mœsia. It is by far the highest in all that country. At its foot on the east, is Dardāniā, on the south Mæcēdōniā, and on the west Illyricum (Liv. xliii. 20 seq.).

Scōrpūs, v. Scōrpūs, i, m. the seventh sign of the Zodiac, which anciently extended also over the space now occupied by the sign Libra. Hence, in geminas ubi brachia concavat arcus Scōrpūs, where the Scorpion in a circular direction extends his claws over two signs (Ov. Met. ii. 195).

Scōrpūs, i, m. a charioteer of great celebrity, whose death Mārtiālīs laments (x. 50 &c.).

Scōti, orum (Sing. Scōtus, i), m. the Scots, a British nation, whose origin is uncertain, and whose name is of doubtful derivation. In the language of the Picts and Caledonians, Scode, or, Scot, signifies a corner of a country, a name which might have been given by them to their feeble neighbours in contempt, whilst inhabiting only Argyllshire. But in Gælic, the term also signifies little, and Scotlan, a little flock. If this derivation, which, like the former, is Gælic, be admitted, then it will be unnecessary to have recourse to another meaning of that term, a wanderer, which some have attempted to support, by an expression in Ammianus Mærcellinus, Scōti per diversa vagantes multa populabantur (xxvii. 8). This quotation does not establish, that the Scots were a wandering or roaming nation; but that at the period referred to, they made predatory excursions. The etymology of the word Scot, must therefore be held undetermined. That it was a term, originally, of contempt, seems probable, since the natives never acknowledged it as their name, and there is no word in the Gælic language which signifies a Scotchman. A Highlander calls himself Albanich, or Gael. A similar uncertainty prevails with respect to the origin of the Scots, some maintaining that they were descendants of the Caledonians, and others that they are of Irish extraction, whilst several maintain that their ancestors were South Britons. The Gauls, who took possession of that part of the island, gradually drove the natives towards the western shores, whence they crossed into Hibernia, Ireland, at a later period into Scotland, and settled in Argyllshire. Here, while few in number, and of little strength, their more powerful neighbours might give them names of contempt, which have been transmitted to posterity. How long they remained in this state, and at what time they extended their conquest northward along the western coast, history gives no certain information; but in process of time, they became more than a match for their neighbours, whom they subdued, and united Cālēdōniā, Vālēntiā, and Pictāviā, in one kingdom, which from them is still denominated Scotland. This country which extends to 278 miles in length, and 180 in breadth, is bounded on the south by England, and on all other sides by the sea. See Britānnia. Its two grand divisions are Highlands and Lowlands, names naturally suggested by the general appearance of the country. Like other general characteristics, some exceptions prevail, as there are several mountains of considerable height in the Lowlands, and several extensive plains in the Highlands. Claudianus is among the first of Roman writers who mentions the Scots. He considers them different from the Picts, as does also Ammianus Mærcellinus (xxvii. 8). Both nations appear to have been then formidable (Claud. vii. 55). Adj. Scōticus, a, um. Scōtica tēla (Claud. xxii. 254).

Scōtius, i, m. a mountain (Ap. Bel. Mith.). Scōtūssa, æ, f. a town of Thēssaliā, Thessaly (Liv. xxviii. 5 seq.). Ish. Scōtūssæ, orum, m. Adj. Scōtūssæus, a, um. Scōtūssæus ager (Liv. xxxiii. 6). —2. A town of Mæcēdōniā, near the river Strýmon (Plin. i. 434).

Scribōniā, æ, f. sister of L. Scribōnius Libo, aunt of Libo Drūsus, and second wife of the Roman emperor Augustus, by whom she had one daughter named Jūlia. She had previously been twice married to men of consular dignity. The emperor afterwards divorced her, that he might marry Livia Drūsilla. She went into voluntary exile with her daughter Jūlia, whose lewdness obliged her father to banish her from Rome (Vel. Pat. ii. 100). —2. Wife of M. Licinius Crāsus, and mother of Piso Licinianus (Tac. Hist. i. 14).

Scribōniānus Cāmērinus, Scribōniāni Cāmērīni, m. a noble Roman put to death with his father, Sulpicius Cămerinus, in the year 67. Two years after, a slave named Gēta q. v., pretended to be Scribōniānus (Tac. Hist. ii. 72).

Scribōniānus Crāssus, Scribōniā Crāssi, m. brother of Piso Licinianus. Antonius, according to report, invited him to the head of the commonwealth, judging that his illustrious ancestors, added to his own personal dignity, and that of his brother, whom Gālba adopted, would secure him a number of partisans; but he resisted the temptation with inflexible firmness, rightly preferring present comfort to uncertain honours (Tac. Hist. i. 47 seq.).

Scribōnius, i. m. a mathematician or astrologer, who predicted, when Tibērius was a child, that he would become a king without the usual badge of royal dignity (Suet. Tib. 14).

Scribōnius Aprōdisius, Scribōni Aprōdisi, m. a slave and scholar of Orbilius Pūpillus, whom Scribōnia, daughter of Libo and wife of Augustus, purchased and manumitted. He re-wrote the books of Vērrius, "De Orthographia," closely imitating his style and manner (Suet. II. Gram. 19).

Scribōnius Libo, Scribōni Libōnis, m. often called simply Libo, the friend and relation of the father-in-law of Sextus Pōmpēius. Having been driven out of Etrūria, Tuscany, at the commencement of the civil war, he and M. Octāvius afterwards commanded the Liburnian and Achaean fleet. Libo was one of Pompey's confidential friends (Caes. B. C. i. 26 seq.). Flōrus has Octavius Libo (iv. 2), where the reading ought to be Octavius et Libo, i. e. M. Octāvius and Scribōnius Libo.

C. Scribōnius, C. Scribōni, m. a Roman who, after holding the office of a plebeian edile, obtained the city jurisdiction as praetor, in 195 B. C. He appears afterwards to have been appointed Cūrio Māximus (Liv. xxxiii. 42 seq.).—2. A praefect of the allies (Liv. xl. 31).

C. Scribōnius Cūrio, C. Scribōni Cūriōnis, m. was Cūrio Māximus in 196 B. C. Some suppose that Līvius calls him simply C. Scribōnius (xxxiii. 42 seq.); but others consider them different persons.—2. An orator of great distinction, was elected consul in 78 B. C., with Cn. Octāvius. In the following year, when praetor, he carried on a successful war against the Dardāni, penetrated as far as Dānūbius, the Danube, and brought the war to a termination within three years (Eutrop. vi. 2). Līvius describes this war as in Thrācia, and calls him simply Cūrio, or C. Cūrio (Ep. 92 seq.).—3. A tribune of the people, who warmly embraced the interest of Caesar. He compelled Cāto to quit Sicily, and then sailed to Africa, and having put P. Attius Vārus to flight, Jūba, king of Mauritānia, came suddenly upon him, and disdaining to fly, he and his whole army were, by the enemy, cut in pieces, when he was a lieutenant under Caesar (Suet. Jul. Caes. 36). According to Lūcānus, he possessed great abilities as an orator, which his want of patriotism and moral principle rendered, in a great measure, useless and contemptible. Caesar readily received his services, in whose opinion he probably stood higher from the vices above-mentioned.

Love of country and inflexible integrity fitted a man for being of service to that ambitious Roman (Phar. i. 269 seq.). To him Cicero addresses the first seven letters of the second book of his Epist. ad Fam., in the last of which he congratulates him on being appointed a tribune of the people. Adj. Cūriōniānus, a. um.

L. Scribōnius, L. Scribōni, m. a Roman taken prisoner by Hāmībal, at the battle of Cānne, and deputed by his countrymen who had fallen into the hands of the same enemy, to solicit the senate that they might be ransomed, in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 61).

L. Scribōnius Libo, L. Scribōni Libōnis, m. was appointed one of the three public bankers, in 218 B. C., at which time he was a plebeian tribune (Liv. xxiii. 21).—2. Obtained the praetorship, the foreign jurisdiction, and the government of the north of Italy, in 206 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 13).—3. Was a curule edile in 196 B. C., the year when the senate first had a place assigned for them at the celebration of the Roman games. Formerly the citizens sat without distinction. He was afterwards foreign praetor, and one of three commissioners appointed to settle colonies at Sipōntum and Būxētum (Liv. xxxiv. 54 seq.).—4. A tribune of the people, who proposed a law, that the Lūsiāni, who had surrendered upon the faith of the Roman people, and yet had been sold by Sē. Sulpicius Gālba, should be restored to liberty, in 152 B. C. From Cicero, Valērius Māximus and Quintiliānus, it appears the law did not pass (Liv. Ep. 49).—5. Was consul with L. Stātilius Sisenā, in the year 16 (Tac. Ann. ii. 1). He was the nephew of Scribōnia, the second wife of Augustus, and attempted to raise a rebellion against Tibērius (Suet. Tib. 25).

Prōcūlus Scribōnius. See Prōcūlus.

Scūltēna, ae. f. the Panaro, a river of Gāllica Cispadāna, one of the southern branches of Pādus, the Po, on which the Roman consul, C. Claudius Pūlcher, defeated the Ligūres, in 179 B. C. (Liv. xli. 12 seq.).

Scūtārius, i. m. an old soldier of Augustus. At his trial for slander, the emperor appeared as his patron, and pleaded in his defence (Suet. Aug. 56).

Scūtum, i. n. a shield; a part of the defensive armour of the Roman infantry, which they wore on their left arms to protect their bodies against the arrows, darts, and other missile weapons thrown by the enemy. It consisted of thin pieces of wood joined by plates of iron, and covered with thick skin or hide, from which the name is probably derived (corvis, corium). The most common form was oval, extending to 4 feet in length and 2½ in breadth. When a soldier had not his shield, he was said to fight sine corpore. In the heroic ages, the warriors in place of a shield, wore a brazen coat of mail, which consisted of two parts, one covering the breast and belly, the other, the back (Paus. x. 26). Adj. Scūtātus, a. um.

Scydrōmethis, Idīs, m. king of Sinōpē, Sinub, from whom the ambassadors of Prōlēmēus, king of Egypt, obtained the statue of Sērāpis (Tac. Hist. iv. 83 seq.).

Scylāceion, i. n. a promontory of Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, which appears to have been in the vicinity of Rhyndacus, the Ex- drenos-soni. Vālerius Flāccus describes it as foming by the waves breaking on its base (iii. 96).

Scyllāceum, Scyllācum, et, Scyllētium, i. n. Squillace, a town of the Bruttii, founded by an Athenian colony. Adj. Scyllāceus, et, Scyllāceus, a, um. Scyllācia littōra, the shores of Squillace (Ov. Met. xv. 702). Scyllāceus sinus, the bay of Squillace (Plin. i. 350).

Scylla, a, f. a daughter of Phōrcus, according to some; of Tȳphon, according to others; and of Hēcātē, according to Hōmērus, who does not mention her father. Cīrēē, either from jealousy, because Scylla was a greater favourite with Glaucus than herself, or, at the request of that deity, turned her into a sea monster of the most hideous form. Some say she retained her original form and beauty down to the waist; but others, that she had six heads, as many throats, and instead of hands, two claws. Hōmērus states she had twelve feet, and in the mouth of each of her six heads were triple rows of teeth (Od. xii. 89 seq.). All agree that her middle was encompassed by dogs, which never ceased barking. With the exception of Hōmērus, the ancient poets represent her body terminating in a huge and hideous fish, with a forked tail. Her residence was in a cave of the same name in Frētum Siculum, the Strait of Messina; on the Italian side, supposed to have been nearly opposite to Chārybdis, on the coast of Sicily, Sicily. This fiction probably originated in the south of Italy being ravaged by Phenicians, whose ship had on the prow the likeness of a monstrous female; and the dreadful noise of the waves in a tempest rushing into the cavities, would in after ages give additional support to the fable. Informes Scyllae, double formed Scyllae, from their form being partly human and partly monstrous (Virg. Æn. vi. 286). Another explanation of this imaginary character has been purposely passed over.—2. The daughter of Nisus, king of Mēgāra, who conceived a violent passion for Mīnos, king of Crēta, Candia, when he was besieging her father's capital. To ensure the fall of the city, and, in consequence of that event, the affection of her lover, she cut off from her father's head, whilst asleep, a hair of a purple colour, on which his good fortune depended, and presented it to him. Mīnos soon after carried the place, but punished the perfidy of Scylla, by ordering her to be thrown into the sea. She was changed, according to some, into a fish, and, according to others, into a lark or a hawk. Virgilius has been blamed for confounding the story of Scylla, the daughter of Nisus, with Scylla, daughter of Phōrcus (B. vi. 74); and Ovidius does the same (Fast. iv. 500). Adj. Scyllaeus, a, um. Scyllaea antra, the cave of Scylla (Claud. xxxvi. 447). Scyllaea monstra (Stat. Syl. v. 3. 280).—3. A slave of uncommon size, mentioned by Mār-tialis (vii. 37).

Scyllaeum, i. n. Schilli, or, Shylli, a promontory of Argolis, in the district of Hēr-miōnē, at which the fleets under Attālus, and L. Apustius, a Roman lieutenant-general, formed a junction, in 202 B. C., as did those of king Eumēnes and the Romans, under C. Līvius, nine years after (Līv. xxxi. 44 seq.).—2. Scyllio, a town and promontory in Brut-tius ager, so called from Scylla, the rock on the Strait of Messina.

Scyllis, Idis, m. a Greek who excelled in diving, an art which he taught his daughter, Cŷāna. Near Pēllon, during a storm, they destroyed some of the ships of Xērxes, by cutting their cables under water. In gratitude for their valuable services, the Amphityons erected statues to their memory (Paus. x. 19).

Scynus, v. Cynus, i. m. an officer under Alexānder the Great, who obtained Sūsāna on the death of that monarch (Just. xiii. 4).

Scȳri, orum, m. a Gothic nation, mentioned by Ammianus Marcēllinus (Excer.).

Scȳron, ōnis, m. one of the Mārmāridae, killed in a naval engagement, off Sicily, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 482).

Scȳros, i. f. Shyro, a small rocky barren island, which had a town of the same name (Hom. Il. ix. 664), in Mārē Aēgeum, the Archipelago, about twenty-eight miles east from Eubœa, Negropont, of which Lȳcōmēdes was king. To the court of that monarch, Achilles, disguised in a female dress, was sent by his mother, to avoid the necessity of his going to the Trojan war. Hōmērus does not mention his residence there. In this retirement, he had by Dēidāmīa, one of the king's daughters, a son (see Pȳrrhus), who appears to have remained there during that memorable siege. Hence, Phthiam Scȳronve ferantur (arma Achillis), let the arms of Achilles be sent to Phthia, i. e. to his father Pēlēus, or to Scȳros, i. e. to his son Pȳrrhus (Ov. Met. xiii. 156). This island does not exceed sixty miles in circumference. Thēsēus was buried in Shyro. Scȳrias, Iadis, f. a woman of Scȳros; Dēidāmīa (Ov. Art. Am. i. 682). Adj. Scȳrius, a, um, of Scȳros; also of Achilles, from his residence on that island. Scȳria pūbes, the youth of Scȳros (Virg. Æn. ii. 477). Scȳria membra, the limbs of Pȳrrhus (Ov. Ep. Her. viii. 112). Scȳria virgo, Dēidāmīa (Claud. x. 16).

Scȳtālē, es, v. Scȳtāla, a, f. a round piece of wood, three or four cubits in length, to which another was made exactly alike, both in length and thickness. The magistrates kept the one, and gave the other to the person intrusted with the command of their fleet or armies, to whom they communicated instructions, without danger of their falling into the hands of the enemy. When the magistrates had secret orders to convey, they took a long narrow slip or scroll of parchment, rolled it about the one which they had kept, one fold close to another, and then wrote whatever they wished to communicate across the parchment. When this was done, they took off the scroll, folded it up, and sent it to the commander. On receiving it, he applied it to his Scȳtālē, or staff, which being exactly like that of the magistrates, all the folds fell in with each other precisely as they did at the writing; and the characters, which before were so broken and disjointed, that it was impossible to read them, now became plain and legible. Both the parchment and staff bore the same name, Scȳtāla, just, says Plūtārchus, as the thing measured has the name of the measure. The merit of this invention belongs to the Lacedæmonians. It may not be improper to observe, that the name is derived from Scȳta, a skin, the substance on which they wrote.

Scȳtheus, i. m. an officer under Alexander

Sēgmērus, i. m. the brother of Sēgēstes, a German chief, who fell into the hands of the Romans, together with his son, in the year 14. A free pardon was granted to both (Tac. Ann. i. 71).

Sēgmündus, i. m. a son of Sēgēstes q. v. In the general revolt of Germani, this youth joined his countrymen, although the Romans had appointed him a priest of the Ubian altar (Tac. Ann. i. 57).

Sēglama, w. f. Castroteriz, a town of Cantabria in Spain (Flor. iv. 12).

Sēgni, orum, m. a people of Gallia Belgica, who lived in the vicinity of Silva Ardennā. A small town, Sinci, or, Signei, points out the place which they once inhabited (Cæs. B. G. vi. 32).

Sēgōbrigii, orum, m. a Gallic nation, who possessed the country on the east bank of Rhodanus, the Rhone, at the mouth of that river (Just. xliii. 3). See Nannus.

Sēgōmāx, ācis, m. one of the four kings who reigned in Cantium, Kent, at the time Caesar invaded Britain (Cæs. B. G. v. 22).

Sēgōntiāci, orum, m. a British nation, who lived on the south of Tāmēsis, the Thames. They appear to have been subject to Cassivellaunus, at the time Caesar attempted to add this island to the Roman empire. The scholar must not suppose that they were inhabitants of Sēgōntium, Caernarcon, opposite to Anglesey, on the strait which separates that island from the main land. Caesar did not penetrate so far into the country (Cæs. B. G. v. 21).

Segovia, w. f. Segovia, a town of Old Castile in Spain (Flor. iii. 22).

Sēgūntia, w. f. Signena, a town of the Arevaci, in Hispania Tarracōnensis, at which the Cētibēri had deposited all their baggage when they joined the Tūrdētāni, in 197 B. C.; on which account, M. Pōrcius Cato, the Roman consul, attempted to take it, but failed (Liv. xxxiv. 19).

Sēgūsiāni, orum, m. a people of Gallia Celtica, to the W. of Rhodanus, the Rhone. Their country was traversed by Ligēris, the Loire, towards the source of that river (Cæs. B. G. i. 10 seq.).

Sēgūsiō, ōnis, f. Susa, a town on the confines of Gallia and Italia, the capital of Cōtius, who was buried in its vicinity (Amm. Mar. xv. 10).

Sējānus. See L. Ailius Sējānus.

Sēus, i. m. a man mentioned by Jūvénalis. The name is probably fictitious, and hence occurs only in law cases (Sat. iv. 13).

Sēus Quādātus, Sei Quādātī, m. a man accused by Minutius Thērmas, and Q. Sēruius, in the year 32. Of his origin no account remains (Tac. Ann. vi. 7).

Sēus Strābo, Sei Strābōis, m. a Roman knight, and prefect of the praetorian guards, in which command his son, Ailius Sējānus, the favourite of the emperor Tiberius, had a joint commission with him (Tac. Ann. i. 7). Velleius Patērculus says, Sēus Strābo was the chief of the Roman knights.

Sēus Tābēro, Sei Tābērōis, m. an officer in the Roman army, who served under Gērmālicus. Vibius Sērēnus falsely accused him, drooping under bodily infirmity, of a conspiracy against the state. Tiberius, whose intimate friendship he enjoyed, seemed confused at the mention of his name, yet ordered no inquiry to be made against him (Tac. Ann. ii. 20 seq.).

Sēlāgus, i. m. the father of Amphius, possessed great wealth. He lived at Pesus (Hom. Il. v. 612).

Cn. Sēus, Cn. Seii, m. a Roman who had a horse of the Thracian breed, of uncommon size and colour. Into the possession of whomsoever he came, the inevitable destruction of the family and fortune almost immediately ensued; hence the proverbial expression, when a man was unfortunate, "He has the horse of Sēus." Adj. Sēianus, a, um. Sēianus equus (Gel. iii. 9).

Selē, es, f. a town of Sūsāna (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Sēlēmnius, i. m. a river of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morae, to which the ancients ascribed the virtue of curing of love the persons who drank of it (Paus. vii. 23). It had this name from a herd boy, Sēlēmnius, with whom the nymph Argyra was in love.

Sēlēnē, es, f. wife of Ptolēmaeus Lathūrus, from whom his mother, Clēōpātra, compelled him to separate, after she had born him two sons. She afterwards became the wife of Antiochus Grēpus (Just. xxxix. 3 seq.).—2. Daughter of M. Antōnius, and wife of king Jūba, by whom she became the mother of Ptolēmaeus q. v.

Sēlēpitāni, orum, m. a people of Illyricum, to whom L. Anicius Gallus, the Roman praetor, by order of the senate, granted liberty, in 169 B. C., and appointed to pay only one half of the taxes, which they had formerly done to their king, Gēntilius (Liv. xlv. 26).

Sēlēpius, i. m. king of Lyrnēssus and Thēbae. Sēlēpiādes, w. m. Evēnus (Hom. Il. ii. 693).

Sēlēucia, w. f. a town at the conflux of Tigris, the Dejilah, and Euphrātes, the El-Frat. Ctēsiphon stood near it, on which account the Arabs called them Modain, i. e. the two cities (Just. xxxv. 1).—2. Selefke, a city of Cilicia, which had this name from Sēlēucus Nicētor. It was formerly called Olbia and Hyria (Tac. Ann. ii. 69). Inh. Sēlēucēnses, i. um, m. Adj. Sēlēucēnsis, is, e. Sēlēucēnsis rex (Tac. Ann. vi. 42).

Sēlēucus, i. m. son of Antiochus and Lāōdicē, was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and received, on account of his bravery, the surname of Nicētor (i. e. the victorious). In the division of the countries which acknowledged subjection to that conqueror, Sēlēucus obtained Sīria, of which the capital was Bābylon. Justinus states, that he took Bābylon, having obtained additional forces conquered the Bactriāni, marched into India, where he formed an alliance with Sandrocōttus, returned to fight Antiochus, whom he killed in battle, and forced his son Dēmētrius to seek safety by flight. After this engagement, the confederates divided into parties, Sēlēucus joined with Dēmētrius, and Ptolēmaeus with Lysimachus. Lysimachus having, by cruelty, alienated the affections of his subjects, the surviving nobles and the commanders of his troops deserted to Sēlēucus, and compelled him to make war on their former sovereign. This was the last contest among the fellow-soldiers of Alexander the Great. Lysimachus had already attained his seventy-fourth, and Sēlēucus his seventy-seventh year. Even at this advanced period of life, both had youthful minds, both an insatiable desire of dominion, and both, notwithstanding the extensiveness of their territories, seemed to themselves shut up within the narrowest bounds. Lysimachus lost fifteen children, and fell, in battle, the last of his family. Seleucus rejoiced at so great a victory, boasted that he was not human work, but a divine gift, utterly unconscious that he was soon after to be himself an example of human frailty. Within eight months, Ptolemaeus II. treacherously accomplished his death. Lysimachus had married a sister of Ptolemaeus Ceraunus (Just. xlii. 4 seq.). He built a number of cities, sixteen called Antiochia after his father, six Laodicea after his mother, nine Seleucia after himself, four after his wives, one Stratonicea, and the other three Apamea (Ap. Bel. Syr. 104 seq.). He had seventy-two governments. To him Tacitus alludes (Ann. vi. 42). Adj. Selucidanus, a, um.—2. Surnamed Callinicus, son of Antiochus Theos and Laodice, and great-grandson of the former, ascended the throne of Syria in 246 B. C., on the death of his father. Amongst his first acts, was the murder of his stepmother, Berenice, sister of Ptolemaeus Evergetes, and of her young son, on which account the Egyptian king made war upon him, and, unless an insurrection in Egypt had recalled him, would have obtained possession of the whole kingdom of Seleucus. The fleet, which the latter raised after the departure of his enemy, was lost in a storm; yet this disaster proved favourable to Seleucus; for his subjects, who had revolted from hatred at their sovereign, returned to their duty; but in the first engagement with Ptolemaeus, he in a cowardly manner fled to Antiochia. Soon after, his brother Antiochus Hierax conquered him in battle, by means of the Gauls, from whom he redeemed himself with gold, and formed an alliance with these mercenaries. Almost at the same time with his kingdom, he lost his life, by being thrown from his horse, in 226 B. C. (Just. xvii. 2 seq.).—3. Surnamed Philopator, son of Antiochus Magnus and brother of Antiochus Epiphanes. He succeeded his father on the throne of Syria, continued to pay a heavy tribute annually to the Romans, and sent his son Demetrius to be educated at the capital of his enemies, where he received all the advantages which can be derived from able preceptors in the different arts and sciences. Livius has recorded only a few particulars respecting him. After a short reign of about twelve years, he lost his life by poison (Liv. xxxiii. 40—Ep. 46).—4. Son of Demetrius Nicator, king of Syria, and Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemaeus Philometor, king of Egypt, killed by his mother, because he had assumed the crown without her consent, after she had murdered his father, 125 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 60).—5. An eminent musician, but on what kind of instrument he played, antiquity has not informed us (Juv. Sat. x. 211).—6. A grammarian, whom the emperor Tiberius first expelled from his family, and afterwards compelled to die, for no other reason, than that he found out, by means of the emperor's servants, what books he had read through the day, and came prepared in the evening to answer any question which he might put (Sext. Tib. 56).—7. An astrologer, who flourished in the time of Gallus, Otho, &c. (Sext. Oth. 4). Tacitus and Plutarch call him Ptolemaeus, hence it is probable he had both names.—8. A mathematician, whom Vespasian retained to assist his consuls with insight into future events (Tac. Hist. ii. 78).

Selinus, antis, f. (m. Liv.), by the Greeks Selinuntium, i. m. Torre di Pulici, a town of Sicily, Sicily, between Hypan, the Eoli, and the river Selinus, is said to have abounded with palm trees, hence Virgilius, palmis Selinus (Æn. iii. 705). It was built by the Megarenses, and destroyed by the Carthaginians, who butchered men, women, and children, without distinction. The town most probably received its name from the river, and it from the number of bees on its banks. Is. Selinuntii, s. Selinusii, orum, m. 45. Selinuntius, a, um. Selinuntia upon the waters of Selinus, which were salt (Strab. 396). Therma Selinuntia, Sicily, are at a considerable distance from Torre di Pulici, upon the river Himera.—2. A city of Cilicia (Plin. i. 585). It was taken by Antiochus, king of Syria, from Ptolemaeus, king of Egypt, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 20).—3. A river, which flows through Pergamus (Plin. i. 611).—4. A river of Ælia (Paus. v. 6).—5. The river of Ventus, a river which rises in mount Olyon, and running northward falls into the Gulf of Lepanto, to the east of Hælicæ (Paus. vi. 24).

Sellus, i. m. a man who killed Clodius, a native of Pella, Palatisa, a town of Macedonia, in the decisive engagement at Zama (Sil. Ital. xvii. 429).—2. A parasite, against whom Martialis writes with considerable severity (ii. 14). The same poet has another epigram on Sellus, an atheist (iv. 21).

Sellasia, as, f. a town of Læconia, on the river Enus, at which T. Quinctius Flamininus encamped in 197 B. C., on his march against Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon (Liv. xxxiv. 23).

Sellæ, es, f. a town of Læconia, built by Greeks from Phœcia, which was first called Hylæ and Ellæ, changed by the Latins into Sellæ. Strabo says, in his time, it was called Etea. Latin authors generally call it Vella g. v.

Selleis, entis, m. a river of Elis, in Peloponnesus, the Marca.—2. A river of Achæia (Hom. Il. ii. 659 seq.).—3. A river of the Troad near Arisba (Hom. Il. xii. 97).

Selli, orum, m. a people who lived in the vicinity of Dodona, a town of Epirus, the south of Albania, of whom Hæmærus makes mention, adding, that they were the priests of Jupiter, and slept upon the ground (Il. xvi. 234). Lucianus, therefore, with propriety calls them ancient (Phar. iii. 180).

Sellisternia, orum, n. the sacred seats of the goddesses, on which they were placed at public festivals. The Lectisternia appears to have been a general term, which might be applied when speaking either of the gods or goddesses, but more commonly the latter (Tac. Ann. xv. 44). From a passage in Valerius Maximus, it appears that at supper, women sat when men reclined, and that from being a practice amongst mankind it was introduced to the worship of the gods. — Stock epulo ipse in lectulum, Jūno et Minerva in sellas ad cenam invitantur" (ii. 1).

A. Sellus, A. Sellii, m. created a plebeian tribune at Rome, in 421 B. C. (Liv. iv. 42).

Sēlymbria, ae. f. Selyria, a city of Thracia (Liv. xxxiii. 39).

Sēmēlē, es. f. a daughter of Cādmos, king of Thēbe, and Hērmiōnē, hence Hōrātius calls her Thēbāna (Od. i. 19. 2). When pregnant with Bācehus by Jūpiter, Jūno assumed the form of Bērōē, Semele's nurse, and advised her to solicit Jūpiter, as a proof of his divinity, to appear before her in celestial majesty. With this request he reluctantly complied, and Sēmēlē, unable to bear the splendour of the king of the gods, was reduced to ashes. Jūpiter, however, rescued the child from destructive flames, who was placed in his father's thigh, where he remained until the proper period of his birth. Hence Bācehus is called Bimāter. On account of her intercourse with Jūpiter, Sēmēlē is called Tyria pellex (Ov. Met. iii. 258). Lucus Sēmēla, a grove, sacred to Sēmēlē on the banks of Tiber, the Tevere (Ov. Fast. vi. 563). Adj. Sēmēlētus, et. Sēmēlētus, a. um. Prōles Sēmēlētā, Bācehus (Ov. Met. iii. 520). Sēmēla būta (Stat. Th. x. 897).

Sēmīdēus, i. m. half a god; a being endowed with immortality, but not permitted to dwell in heaven.

Sēmīrāmis, idos. f. daughter of Dērcētis, one of the most celebrated female characters of antiquity, was born at Ascalon, a city of Sīria, Jūstinus says of Dāmāscus (xxxvi. 2). History informs us, that she was first married to one of the principal officers of Ninus, who built Nineveh, and afterwards to that monarch. On the death of her husband, about 2300 B. C., she remained sovereign of the empire, which was greatly enlarged under her reign, by the conquest of the neighbouring states. Ovidius and others ascribe to her the building of Bābylon, although it is probable she only enlarged it. Jūstinus writes, that her son being under age, at his father's death, she assumed a different dress, pretended to be the son, not the widow of Ninus, and compelled the people to follow her example with regard to clothes, and that this is the reason that in Persia, the dress of the sex seems to be changed. She reigned forty-two years, if confidence can be placed in chronology, from the year of the world 1860 to 1902 (Just. i. 1. 2). The reader is unwilling to believe the account of her death given by Jūstinus. Her character is variously drawn by different historians. Phātretrā Sēmīrāmis, either from her warlike courage, or from the ancients representing her armed with a bow and arrow (Juv. Sat. ii. 108). Adj. Sēmīrāmīus, a. um. of Sēmīrāmis; of Bābylon; Babylonian. Crētus Sēmīrāmīo sanguine, descended from the blood of Sēmīrāmis (Ov. Met. v. 85). Sēmīrāmīa turres, the forts or citadels of Bābylon (Claud. i. 162). Sēmīrāmīa acus, a Babylonian needle, i. e. tapestry or embroidery (Mart. viii. 28).

Sēmōnēs, um. m. a Suevian nation of Germany, on the banks of Albis, the Elbe, who, with the Lāngōbārdi, revolted from Mārōbōdūus, to Arminius, in the year 17 (Tac. Ann. ii. 45).

Sēmō, ōnis. m. the founder of the Sabines, whom they worshipped as a god.

He had also the names Sāncus and Fidius (v. 6).

Sēmprōnīa, ae. f. sister of C. and Tib. Sēmprōnīus Grācehus, and wife of P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Afrīcanus Emīliānus Nāmāntinus, whom she was suspected to have murdered by poison, because he powerfully and successfully opposed the turbulent and seditious conduct of her brothers. No inquiry was made into that matter, but the popular seditions blazed out with great fury upon the death of her husband, in 131 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 59). On account of her personal deformity and barrenness, Applānus says that she neither was beloved, nor loved (Bel. Civ. 361).—2. Appears to have been the wife of Dēclmus Jūnius Brūtus (Sal. Cat. 40), who held the consulship with M. Emīlius Lēpidus Līvianus (79 B. C.), by whom she became the mother of D. Jūnius Brūtus, an accomplice in the assassination of C. Jūlius Caesar. She entered into the conspiracy of Cātīlina, and Sāllūstius has drawn her character in a masterly style. She had committed many atrocious deeds with a masculine intrepidity. Besides the advantages of noble birth and personal beauty, she was happy in her husband and children, well skilled in Greek and Roman literature, played, and danced with greater elegance than the modesty of her sex required. She possessed other accomplishments of no value, except as instruments of luxury. In her estimation, nothing was of less value than honour and modesty. Her lasciviousness had no bounds, and on money or reputation she set no value. She violated promises, practised perjury, and had been accessory to murder. Luxury involved her in all the miseries of poverty, and both united to render her a fit instrument for any act of iniquity. Notwithstanding these vices, she was not without genius, had a turn for poetry, and a pleasant vein of wit. In conversation she delighted by adaptation to circumstances, was modest, gay, or voluptuous, as imagination prompted, or her companions required. Her humour and pleasantry were in constant play, and rendered enchanting by the vivacity and sprightliness of her fancy. A vitiated imagination, and unrestrained passions, destroyed the many accomplishments of Sēmprōnīa, and have transmitted her name to the contempt and abhorrence of every succeeding age (Sal. Cat. 25—40).—3. The wife of Rūfus, to whom Mārtiālīs addresses an Epitaph, written on her husband (xii. 52).

Sēmprōnīus Blāsus, Sēmprōnī Blās, m. a Roman quaestor, killed by the Africans, in an incautious descent made on their coast by Cn. Sērvīllus Gēmīnus, the consul, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 31).

Sēmprōnīus Dēnsus, Sēmprōnī Dēns, m. a centurion of the praetorian cohort, whom Gāiba had ordered to escort Pīso Līcīnīanus, the day on which that emperor lost his life, by the cruelty of the praetorian cohorts. Sēmprōnīus discharged that duty with great fidelity and fortitude, giving to Pīso after he had been wounded, an opportunity of escaping from the tumult (Tac. Hist. i. 42 seq. h.).

Sēmprōnīus Tūcca, Sēmprōnī Tūcca, m. a man on whom Mārtiālīs writes an epigram, the point of which seems to depend on the adjective Cōsmicus (vii. 40).

1. Sempronius Asellus, S. Sempronius Asellianus, a. a. praetor at Rome, in 50 B. C., expelled by the senate, because he had given decisions in favor of debtors (Liv. Ep. 76).

2. Sempronius Asellianus, S. Sempronius Asellianus, a. a. obtained the consulship at Rome, in 497 B. C., and afterwards in 495 B. C. The festival called Stemania, was instituted in his first consulship (Liv. ii. 21. seq.).

3. One of the first military tribunes with consular authority. These new magistrates entered an office in 443 B. C. (Liv. iv. 7).

4. Another of the same name, elected to the same office, in 424 B. C., and was afterwards twice re-elected (Liv. ix. 25-27).

5. A master of the horse to T. Quinctius Cincinnatus, in 425 B. C. (Liv. vi. 29).

6. Sempronius Asellianus, C. Sempronius Asellianus, a. a. consul at Rome in 420 B. C., the year in which the Samnites took Capua. His carelessness and rashness proved fatal to the greater part of the army, for which L. Horatius, a tribune of the people, brought him to trial, but at the request of his four colleagues, who had served under the consul, he desisted. From this abandonment of prosecution, Sempronius reaped little advantage, since the tribunes in 419 B. C., not from patriotism, but from ill-will, brought the cause again before the people, when he was condemned to pay a fine of fifteen thousand asses (Liv. iv. 37-44). Adj. Sempronianus, a. um. Sempronianus senatus consultum (Cic. Fam. xii. 29).

7. Sempronius Blaesus, C. Sempronius Blaesus, a. a. was elected consul with Cn. Servilius Caelus, in 255 B. C. They sailed for Africa with two hundred and sixty ships, took several towns, and returning home with great booty were shipwrecked. This loss disheartening the Romans, the senate decreed that they should refrain from naval engagements, and only retain sixty ships for the protection of Italy (Eutrop. ii. 23).—8. A tribune of the people, who arraigned C. Fuluius for the loss of his army in Apulia, in 213 B. C. Although the tribune changed the mode of prosecution, first suing for a fine, and afterwards for a sentence of treason, he succeeded, and the culprit went into banishment, which the senate declared legal (Liv. xxvi. 2).—9. A plebeian edile in 188 B. C. He was afterwards elected praetor, when Sicilia, Sicily, fell to his lot as his province, and in 172 B. C., he and Sextus Julius Caesar were sent to restore the inhabitants of Abdera to liberty (Liv. xxxix. 7. seq.).

10. Sempronius Gracchus, C. Sempronius Gracchus, m. (anciently Græcus) son of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus and Cornelia. His brother Tiberius, who was elder than he, had a gentle and unruffled temper; but that of Calus was violent and irascible. He enjoyed the same education with his brother, and his abilities, added to his application, enabled him to derive from study similar advantages. In eloquence he surpassed those of his own age, and his love of distinction stimulated to vigorous and constant exertion. Undeterred by the fate of his brother, he entered the same career, and displayed abilities, which, under the direction of greater prudence, and perhaps better principle, might have placed him high among the citizens of Rome. He obtained the office of questor (127 B. C.), in which he conducted himself with great fidelity, honesty, judgment, and integrity. He supported the law proposed by C. Plautius Curio, a tribune of the people, that the commons should be at liberty to elect the new tribunes as often as they passed, in which he was opposed by his brother-in-law P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Emilianus, whose opinion prevailed. In his speech the latter maintained, that Tib. Sempronius Gracchus had been justly put to death, in 122 B. C. Next year he, Publius Plautius, and C. Plautius Curio, commissioners for the division of the lands, civil seditions, and were powerfully opposed by P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Emilianus, who one day left the assembly, went home in perfect health, and was found next morning dead in his bed. When tribune of the people, he passed several dangerous laws, among others one that grain should be given to the people at one-half and one-third of an as; another was an agrarian law, the same as his brother's; and a third, with the view of corrupting the Equestrian order, that six hundred should be taken into the senate, which then consisted only of three hundred members. Having been continued another year in office, he planted colonies in various parts of Italy by new agrarian laws, and one he himself conducted to the site of Carthage then destroyed (127 B. C. Liv. Ep. 69). At the expiry of his seditionous tribuneship, he seized Mucius Aævilius, Mucius Aævilius, with an armed multitude, which was defeated and himself killed by L. Opimius, consul in 123 B. C., who by order of the senate armed the people, and marched against him (Ep. 61). That he lost his life justly, every impartial reader of Roman history must allow. Even Juvénalis, a free friend to the liberties of his country, calls him sedition, which, of itself, would justify the fall of the Gracchi, and palliate the severity by which their deaths were effected. To them the agency of an unrestrained multitude employed against the laws must be referred, and even the consequences which resulted from their example long after their death. Men of less talent, but greater profligacy, saw what might readily be accomplished by this unbounded power, and therefore employed it to carry into effect their plans of ambition, by destroying half the population of Italy. At last sanguinary and perpetual commotion sunk in tyranny and despotism. Adj. Gracchianus, a. um, et, Sempronius, a. um. Gracchiana lex, the laws of Gracchus, which conferred the power of judging in civil cases on the knights (Vel. Pat. ii. 13), a jurisdiction which the knights abused. Semproniana lex, enacted that before the annual election of the consuls, two provinces should be selected, one for each of these magistrates, on which account they were called Provinciae Consulares. With respect to the other provinces, the consuls might either settle them by agreement or by lot (Sal. Jug. 27). Semproniae rogationes (Tac. Ann. xii. 60).

11. Sempronius Longus, C. Sempronius Longus, m. was appointed decemvir of religious rites, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xli. 21).

12. Sempronius Rutilius, C. Sempronius Rutilius, m. a tribune of the people, who with P. Sempronius Gracchus commenced a resecution against M'. Acilius Glabrio q. v., in the year 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 57).

C. Sémprônus Tuditānus, C. Sémprônii Tuditāni, m. was elected praetor, in 200 B. C., although he was then a plebeian edile. The north of Spain became his province, where he was wounded in battle by the natives, and died of his wounds. It appears that he had been a pontiff (Liv. xxxii. 27 seq.).—2. A consul in 131 B. C., who engaged the Lapydes, first unsuccessfully, and afterwards successfully. In the latter engagement, he owed much to the bravery of Decius Junius Brutus, the conqueror of Lusitania, Portugal (Liv. Ep. 59).

Cn. Sémprônus Blæsus, Cn. Sémprônii Blæsi, m. a lieutenant-general sent by the dictator Q. Fulvius, in 212 B. C., to take the command of the army in Etruria, in place of C. Cæpurnius (Liv. xxvii. 6).

L. Sémprônus Atratinus, L. Sémprônii Atratinus, m. the consular colleague of L. Papius Mugillanus q. v., in 444 B. C. They were next year appointed censors, and were the first who held that office (Liv. iv. 7 seq.).

M. Sémprônus Rutilus, M. Sémprônii Rutili, m. an officer of Cæsar, who had, with T. Labienus, the joint command of the two legions which that general ordered to march into the territories of the Siquani (Cæs. B. G. vii. 90).

M. Sémprônus Tuditānus, M. Sémprônii Tuditāni, m. a Roman of high rank, who, at the taking of Carthage Nova, Carthago, in 212 B. C., supported the claim of Q. Trebellius to a mural crown, in preference to Sextus Digittus (Liv. xxvi. 46).—2. A tribune of the people, who, acting according to the direction of the senate, proposed to the people, and the people ordered, that money lent between Roman citizens and subjects of the allied states, should be regulated by the same laws, as when both parties were citizens of Rome. The usurers evaded the laws against usury, by transferring the bonds to the subjects of the allied states; but this law, which passed in 195 B. C., put an end to that practice. After being praetor in Sicily, Sicily, he, in 187 B. C., obtained the consulship, marched against the Apulian Ligures, ravaged their lands, burned their villages and forts, and opened their country as far as Mæra, the Magra, and the harbour of Luna. The enemy posted themselves on the mountains, the ancient abode of their forefathers, from which they were dislodged and conquered. After an unsuccessful canvass for the censorship, he was elected a pontiff, and died during a pestilence, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 7 seq.).

P. Sémprônus, P. Sémprônii, m. a prefect of the allies, killed by the Gauls in 196 B. C., after a gallant resistance, in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 47).

P. Sémprônus Blæsus, P. Sémprônii Blæsi, m. a tribune of the people, who, in 193 B. C., opposed the triumph of the consul, P. Cornelius Scipio, for his conquest of the Boians, alleging that he ought first to subdue the Ligurians then in arms, because they uniformly assisted the Gauls. The senate prevailed on the tribune to desist from his opposition (Liv. xxxvi. 39 seq.).

P. Sémprônus Græchus, P. Sémprônii Græchi, m. a plebeian tribune who, with C. Sémprônus Rutilus, raised an action against

M'. Acilius Glabrio, in 191 B. C., maintaining, that he had neither exhibited in his triumph, nor lodged in the treasury, a considerable part of the royal treasure, and of the spoils taken in the camp of Antiochus, king of Syria (Liv. xxxvii. 57). See M'. Acilius Glabrio.

P. Sémprônus Longus, P. Sémprônii Longi, m. elected a praetor in 186 B. C., when the south of Spain fell to his lot as his province (Liv. xxxix. 32 seq.).

P. Sémprônus Sôphus, P. Sémprônii Sôphi, m. a tribune of the people in 310 B. C., who delivered a violent philippic against the censor Appius Claudius, whom he ordered to be seized and imprisoned. The obstinacy and dexterity of Claudius baffled every measure of the tribune, and he continued to retain his office in spite of his opponents, who were both numerous and powerful. In 305 B. C., Sémprônus was elected consul, when he and his colleague M. Sulpicius Saverrio took forty towns from the Æqui, and nearly extirpated the whole of that nation, for which they had the honour of a triumph. His next appointment was that of a plebeian pontiff, which was followed by his being elected a censor, with his consular colleague. In 298 B. C., he held the office of praetor, when the senate dreaded an attack from the Gauls (Liv. ix. 33 seq.).—2. Consul with Appius Claudius Crassus in 270 B. C. He divorced his wife, because she had presumed to go to the games without his knowledge (Val. Max. vi. 3).—3. Censor in 254 B. C. See M. Valerius Maximus.

P. Sémprônus Tuditānus, P. Sémprônii Tuditāni, m. a military tribune in the battle of Cannæ, where, from his future character, it may be inferred, he displayed considerable bravery. When all was over, he and a few soldiers instantly set out for one of the Roman camps, from which he advised the troops, although but half armed and without leaders, resolutely to fight their way through the enemy and join those who had fled, in similar circumstances, to the other camp. Drawing his sword, he formed into a wedge the soldiers who chose to follow him, and effected his escape, in spite of the Numidian cavalry. In 216 B. C., when curule edile, he was elected praetor. His success against the enemy secured his continuance in command, during three successive years. After holding the censorship, with M. Cornelius Cethegus, his countrymen raised him and his colleague to the office of consul, in 206 B. C.; at that time he was absent in Greece, of which country he was proconsul. With Philip, king of Macedonia, he formed a treaty on the following terms, that the Parthini, Dimallum, Bargulum, and Engulum should belong to the Romans; Atintania with the approbation of the senate should be ceded to the Macedonian. On the part of Philip, were included in the treaty Frusias, king of Bithynia, the Achei, Bæoli, Thessali, Acarnanes, and Epærotæ; on the part of the Romans, the Illyenses, king Attalus, Pleuratus, Natis, king of the Lacedæmonians, the Ekei, Messenii, and Athenienses. The people ratified the peace, because they wished to be relieved from every other enemy, in order to turn their whole efforts against the Carthaginians. Sémprônus quitted the army, returned to Italy, and received the command of the troops against Hannibal, in Britain age. In his military plans, anxiety for the destruction of the enemy, and love of martial fame, are more commendable, than either his caution, or regard for human life. After being defeated by Hannibal, P. Licinius Calpurnius, praetor, joined him, when Roman bravery triumphed against the Carthaginian general, who lost upwards of four thousand men. Hannibal retreated, the consul then took several towns, others surrendered voluntarily. Before that victory, Scipio Africanus saved a temple at Furius Prunigula. His high reputation induced his countrymen to continue him in command after the expiry of his office, to which the nobility of his family might have contributed, as well as his immense riches. He was a man of very great eloquence, deeply skilled in the political law, excelled in personal beauty and bodily strength, and appears to have obtained greater distinction than any Roman of that period. His last commission was on the conquest of Hannibal and the Carthaginians, to thank Ptolemy, king of Egypt, for his fidelity as an ally, and to request the same friendly disposition towards the Roman people, should they engage in war with Philip, king of Macedonia (Liv. xxii. 30 seq.).

Tib. Sémpronius Gracchus, Tib. Sémpronius Gracchus, m. was appointed master of the horse by M. Junius Pera, in 215 B. C., whose orders he obeyed with the utmost strictness, refusing even to assist the garrison in Cástilium, because the dictator forbade his engaging in battle. Hannibal intercepted the grain sent down the river in barrels, by the master of the horse, to alleviate the severity of the famine; he then threw nuts upon the river which were stopped by hurdles at Cástilium, yet want of provisions forced the garrison to surrender. When master of the horse and curule edile, he was elected consul with L. Postumius Albinus q. v., in 217 B. C. At his suggestion, the senate agreed to defer the war against the Gauls for one year, and to direct their whole force against Hannibal. An army consisting of twenty thousand allies besides volunteer slaves, fell to his lot, which he drilled with great care, and procured a perfect harmony between the freedmen and the slaves. Informed by the Cūmāni that the Cāmpāni had, with treacherous intention, invited them to celebrate a festival at Hāme on particular nights, Sémpronius surprised them, took thirty-four military standards, and killed two thousand men, among whom was Mārtus Alfinus, their general. Hannibal, anxious to obtain possession of Cūme, followed the consul to that seaport, to which he laid siege, but the Roman commander defeated his attempts, on which he retired in disappointment to Tifata. His valuable services continued him in command, which was distinguished by a remarkable victory over Hāno, for out of seventeen thousand foot and twelve thousand horse scarcely two thousand escaped. Sémpronius then granted to the volunteer slaves liberty which he promised previously to the battle, should the enemy be defeated. Four thousand, who did not distinguish themselves in the action, and on that account had withdrawn from the rest, dreading their commander's displeasure, he bound by oath to not desert whilst in the army, kept standing. In his second consulship he fought several considerable battles among the Ligurians, and took several considerable towns. Next year retaining his command, he was ordered by the consul to march the troops to Brundisium, but a dreadful pestilence ensued at Brundisium, whilst he was watching, and the struggles explained it to apply promptly to himself. Pūblius, a Lucanian, previously a steady friend of the Romans, now entered into a treaty with Mages, promising to deliver up Sémpronius into his hand. By a artful speech, this traitor laid a snare for the Roman commander, into which he fell, who too late perceived the treachery, made a furious but vain attack on the Carthaginians who deprived him of life, and sent his dead body to Hannibal. Of his death and intent there are different accounts. The manumitted slaves supposed themselves discharged after his death, on which account they immediately quitted their standards (Liv. xxii. 57 seq.).—2. Elected aedile in 206 B. C., and died of the pestilence which caused a great mortality at Rome, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 38: xli. 21).—3. A prefect of the allies, who fell in an engagement with the Bolani, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 36). See Cirillinae.—4. An eminent Roman, distinguished before all the youth of his age for activity, was in the army of the consul L. Cornélius Scipio, in 192 B. C., and sent by him to sound the disposition of Ptolemy, king of Macedonia, before he ventured to march from Amphissa to Hēllēspōntes, the Dardanelles, on his route against Antiochus, king of Syria. On the third day he reached Pella, and brought back a favourable answer. Three years after, when tribune of the people, the trial of P. Cornélius Scipio Africānus, with whom he was in enmity, gave him an opportunity of displaying his moral integrity, by befriending that great man, whom he protected against the iniquitous procedure of his colleagues, for which he had the thanks of the senate. He was married to the younger daughter of Africānus. His interposition in behalf of L. Cornélius Scipio Asiaticus showed the same rectitude of principle, besides other instances which prove the strict regard of Sémpronius to justice, and his uniform preference of the public good to private animosity. On being appointed praetor in 185 B. C., the north of Spain fell to his lot, where he carried on a successful war against the Celtiberians, whom he conquered, and the senate rewarded his services by decreeing him a triumph. The excellence of his plans, added to the bravery of the troops, secured him the victory in every contest. In Sārdinia, the same success attended his arms during his consulship; the whole island fell under the dominion of the Romans, and he formed arrangements calculated to secure the benefit of his conquest, both by the tranquillity of the island and by contributing to the support of the Roman state. In the temple of mother Mātūta, he hung up a tablet commemorative of his victory, besides having engraved on it a map of Sārdinia, and a representation of the battles which he fought in that island. He afterwards held the office of censor with C. Claudius Pulcher, and their severity excited violent resentment, which induced P. Rutilius, a tribune of the people, to proceed against them, and demand that C. Sulpicius Galba, praetor urbanus, should fix a day for their trial, which he did, and both were arraigned for treason. When sentence was partly passed against his colleague, Sémpronius took a solemn oath, although the tribunes told him that he was in no danger, that if Claudius were condemned, he would voluntarily go with him into banishment. This declaration secured the acquittal of Claudius, as well as a final stop to further procedure. Sémpronius built the Basilica which, from him, was called Sémproniana (Liv. xxxvii. 7 seq.).—5. Was the elder son of Tib. Sémpronius Gracchus and Cornelia, daughter of Scipio Africanus, a woman of extraordinary accomplishments, who devoted her attention to the education of her children, and procured for them the ablest instructors whom Greece could supply. Like his brother Caius, who was several years younger, he possessed great abilities, which he afterwards directed chiefly to the study of eloquence, and the constitution of the state. He embraced the interest of the commons against that of the nobles, a dictate of ambition, it may be inferred, rather than of judgment. This seems manifest from the unwarrantable length to which the Gracchi carried their innovations, which went to subvert the established usages, and the regular administration of government. In early life his character stood high, not only among the Romans, but also among foreign nations. He gained great reputation in Africa under his brother-in-law P. Cornélius Scipio Africanus Emilianus Numantinus, and afterwards under the consul Mancinus in the Numantian war. The enemy defeated the Romans, whom they surrounded, and refused to treat with the consul, preferring to him Gracchus, with whom they concluded a truce, by which twenty thousand Romans were preserved. The senate disapproved of the conditions, refused to ratify the treaty, and gave up the consul to the enemy, naked and in chains. That body not only excused Gracchus, who was the framer of the treaty, but also the other officers who had signed it; a proof either of the high respectability of Gracchus, or of the flagrant injustice of the senate. After this he attempted to put the Licinian law in force, which prohibited any one from having above five hundred acres of land, and sympathy for the oppressed Tuscans, whose lands the nobility had seized, appears to have induced him to take this step. Other reasons are mentioned; the advice of his teacher, Diophanes, and the persuasion of his mother, placards in the streets, and revenge at the senate's refusing to ratify his treaty with the Numantini. The law passed, but not without a powerful opposition, and he, his brother, and father-in-law Appius Claudius, were appointed to divide the public lands among the people. To increase his popularity, he proposed that the money arising from the property of Attalus, king of Pergamus, should be divided among the poor citizens who had obtained lands, to enable them to purchase cattle and requisite utensils; but Livius says that this money was to be given in place of lands, because there was not a sufficient quantity of ground to satisfy the people whose expectations he had raised.

On the same principle, he promulgated other laws equally offensive to the nobility. He now saw that his life was in danger, which he communicated to his friends who guarded his house during the night preceding the Comitia, and next day having heard that the people were met in the capitol, he went thither, and they received him with vociferous acclamations. Having been informed that the wealthy citizens had determined on his destruction, he mentioned it to those standing next him, who instantly seized on such implements as they could lay hold of, and prepared to defend him. Many having inquired the cause of this commotion, and his voice being drowned by the noise, he raised his hand to his head, to indicate that his life was in danger. His enemies immediately ran to the senatehouse, said he wished for a crown; on which his cousin P. Cornélius Scipio Nasica, the high priest, started to his feet, and said, "Let all who wish the safety of the state follow me." Many armed with sticks accompanied him to the capitol, dispersed all whom they met, and killed a considerable number. According to some, Tibérius was killed on the spot where he stood, according to others near the gate of the temple, and some maintain that as he fled he fell over one stretched on the ground, when P. Sätüricius, one of his colleagues in the tribuneship, gave him the first blow on the head with the foot of a stool, and a second stroke from L. Rūfus deprived him of life, in 135 B. C. In that mob three hundred fell, and their carcasses were thrown into Tiber, the Tecre, without the rites of burial (Liv. Ep. 88). His brother Caius requested he might be allowed to bury him, but the senate prohibited him. The conduct of Nasica has obtained the unqualified approbation of Cicero, an opinion fatal to the patriotism and right intentions of Gracchus. In this judgment of the orator, both Vālerius Māximus and Vēllēus Pātērcūlus join; and even Appianus, who blames the senate, admits that Gracchus acted too violently. It is the common fault of all hasty politicians, to think that the end justifies the means. See C. Sémpronius Gracchus. Adj. Gracchānus, a, um, et, Sémpronius, a, um. Gracchānus tūmūltus (Val. Max. i. 1). Gracchāna seditio (Val. Max. vi. 2).—6. A Roman of quaestorian rank, who, for criminality with Jūlia, daughter of Augustus, was banished to the island Cercina, where, after living for fourteen years, he was put to death by soldiers sent for that purpose (Tac. Ann. l. 53. Vel. Pat. ii. 100).

Tib. Sémpronius Lōngus; Tib. Sémpronii Lōngi, m. a noble Roman, who obtained the consulship in 220 B. C., with P. Cornélius Scipio, the father of Africanus. Sicily, Sicily, and Africa fell to his lot as a province. The senate appointed him a powerful force both by sea and land, with which he sailed for Sicily, and was met near the coast of that island with a fleet completely equipped, by Hiēro, king of Syracūse, who congratulated him on his arrival, and gave him valuable information respecting the plans of the Carthaginians. Before he reached Lilybaeum, it had been taken by the praetor M. Amilius, on which account he steered immediately for Melita, Malta, took possession of the island, and returned to Lilybaeum, Cape Boeo, where tūnus) (Virg. Æn. v. 799). Sātūrnus (mons), afterwards Cāpitōlinus (Just. xliii. 1). Sātūrnus nūmērus, Saturnian numbers (Hor. Epist. ii. l. 158). Perhaps equivalent to inelegant, ancient, from Sātūrnus being one of the first kings of Italy; but others understand the adjective as belonging to Sātūrnū, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, where a particular sort of verses were composed and repeated. The former is the more probable opinion. Sātūrnālītūs, a, um, of the festivals of Sātūrnus, used only by Mārtiālīs. Sātūrnālītūa nūces (Mart. v. 31).

Sātūrnū, i, n. a town of Cālābria, a district which abounded with rich pastures. Adj. Sātūrnēānus, a, um. Sātūrnēānus cūbāllus, an excellent horse (Hor. Sat. i. 6. 59).

Sātūrys, i, m. brother of Clēarchus, tyrant of Hērāclēa, Ereklī, in Pōntus, on whose death he ascended the throne (Just. xvi. 5).

Sātūrys, i, m. a Satyr. The Satyrs were rural deities, demi-gods, having the horns, ears, legs and feet of goats, and the rest of their body human. They were exceedingly cunning, talkative, and lascivious. According to some writers on mythology, these monstrous beings were the children of Bāchus and Nicē, and, according to others, of Mērcūrius and Yphtimē. Their form was said to have been first wholly human; but, being the guards of Bāchus, and not preventing his passing into different forms, Jūno, enraged at his changes, gave to the Satyrs the horns, &c., of a goat. Plinius supposes the Satyrs of the poets were apes. Saltantes Sātūri, the dancing Satyrs, i. e. a dance after the manner of the Satyrs (Virg. B. v. 73). Sātūri cāpripēdes (Lucr. iv. 584). Sātūris, i, m. a little Satyr. Adj. Sātūricus, a, um.

Saufēia, e, f. a woman of the most horrible lewdness (Juv. Sat. vi. 320).

L. Saufēus, L. Saufēi, m. a Roman knight, whose estate the triumviri sold. T. Pōmponius Atticus, with whom he lived for several years, and with whom he studied philosophy, had sufficient influence with the members of that illegal compact, to recover the valuable possessions of his friend Saufēus, and his messenger carried the first intelligence both of his property having been lost and regained.

Saufēllus, i, m. a man held up to ridicule by Mārtiālīs, from the class of people who attended him (il. 74).

Saufēllus Trōgus, Saufēlli Trōgi, m. a Roman knight concerned in the marriage of C. Silius and Messālina, for which Claudius ordered him to be instantly executed, in the year 48. Pōmpeius Urbicus, Dēcius Cāl-pūrnianus, Sūlpicius Rufus, and Iūneus Virgiliānus shared the same fate (Tac. Ann. xi. 35).

Sāvo, ōis, m. Savona, a town of Ligūria, an Alpine town, at which Māgo, brother of Hānnihāl, deposited the plunder which he had made in the taking of Gēniā, in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 46).—2. The Savonē, a river of Cāmpānia, which runs slowly, on which account Stātius has Piger Sāvo (Sil. iv. 3. 66). Saurōmāte. See Sarmātia.

Sāvus, i, m. the Save, a river of Pānnōnia, which now forms a boundary between Austria and Turkey in Europe. It is one of the southern branches of Dānūbius, the Danube, and falls into that river at Singidūnum, Belgrade (Flor. iv. 12).

Sāxa Rūbra, Sāxōrum Rūbrōrum, n. the red rocks, a place on the Flāminian road, about nine miles from Rome (Tac. Hist. iii. 79).

Sāxōnes, um (Sing. Sāxo, ōis), m. the Saxons, a German nation, from whom two of the circles in that country still have their name. The English nation are descendants of the Saxons, and this fact has not been contradicted. With respect to the Saxons themselves, matters do not stand on a similar footing of certainty. Some trace their origin to India, others to Asia, and the greatest number to Germany. The same degree of doubt prevails, with respect to the meaning and cause of their name. During the reign of Hōcūlus, they fell under the notice of Roman authors, and the inroads of the Scots and Picts on South Britain rendered it necessary, since the Romans could not protect them, to apply for aid to the Saxons. An armament under the conduct of two brothers, Hengist and Horsa, arrived at Thānātos, Thanet, on the coast of Kent, in the year 449. Having defeated the Scots and Picts, Vortigern, who had invited them over, gave them large possessions in the country, which they had recovered from the enemy. Delighted with the richness of the soil and mildness of the climate, they received reinforcements from their countrymen in Germany, gradually subdued the country which they had come to protect, and divided it into seven kingdoms, known in history under the name of the Saxon heptarchy. Egbert united into one these seven kingdoms, in the year 827, since which period the country has been denominated England. Sāxōnē dōmītō (Claud. xviii. 392).

Scæus, a, um. Scæe pōrta, one of the six gates of Troy, of which the derivation is doubtful (Virg. Æn. ii. 612). Strābo has Scæi Thrāces, Scæus flūciūs, and Scæus nūrus. Many words appear common to the Trojans and Thracians, which was a natural consequence of the frequent intercourse between these nations (852).

Scæva, e, m. a centurion, whose shield, at Dyrrāchium, Durazzo, was pierced in 230 (120, Flor. iv. 2) places in one day. Valērius Māximus says, he was wounded in the head, shoulder, thigh, and had one of his eyes struck out, still he continued to fight (iii. 2). For his bravery, Cæsar gave him 200,000 asses, and raised him from the eighth rank of centurions to be the first centurion of the legion, or, Prīncipilus. Lūcānus has given his character (Phar. vi. 144 seq.). An uncertainty prevails respecting his prænomen, hence, we find him called Cassius, Marcus, Minutius, and Nimicius.

Scævōla, e, m. a surname of the Mūci q. v.

Scævōla, e, m. a noble Roman, who performed feats of great bravery at the battle of Cānnæ, overcame Cārālis, Gābar, and Siccha, but was himself afterwards killed by Nēalces (Sil. Ital. ix. 372 seq.).—2. A covetous man, who became more avaricious as he increased in wealth (Mart. i. 104).

Scāldis, is, acc. im. e. in, m. the Escant, oftener the Scheld, or the Scheldt; a river of Gāllia Belgica, which takes its rise about 15 miles south of Cameracum, Cambray, in the province of Picardy, runs north, and dividing into two branches, Wester Scheldt, which separates Flanders from Zealand, and falls into the German Sea, near the island Walcheren, and Ooster, or, Easter Scheldt, which passes Bergen-op-Zoom, and afterwards between the islands Beecland and Schouwen, below which it is lost in the German Sea. The latter was most probably the original channel. The former was only a small stream, which Otho I. enlarged in the tenth century. From him, it was often called Fossa Othönis. Several changes have taken place in the mouth of the river, in consequence of the levelness of the country, and the encroachments of the sea. Its course does not exceed 120 miles in length. The Scheldt at Antwerp, about 38 miles above Walcheren, is 1200 feet broad, and 22 deep; so that ships of great burden can come up to the quay, and, by means of canals cut through the town, vessels are brought to the very doors, for the purposes of loading and unloading. Ships of the line can sail to Rupelmonde, five miles above Antwerp, and without their guns and stores to Dendermonde, about twenty miles above that city. Cæsar erroneously makes it a branch of Mösa, the Meuse (B. G. vi. 33).

Scamänder, dri, m. a river of the Troad, called by the gods Xanthus q. v. The army of Xerxes drank this stream dry, as that monarch advanced against Greece (Herod. vii. 43).

Scamândrius, i, m. a Trojan, the son of Ströphlus, whom Diana taught to hunt, and whom Ménélaus killed (Hom. ii. v. 49).

Scandia, v. Scandināvia, v. f. Norway, Sweden, Lapland, and part of Finland, bounded on the S. by Sinus Cōdānus, the Baltic Sea, on the W. by the Atlantic Ocean, on the N. by the Northern Ocean, i. e. a part of the Atlantic Ocean, and on the E. by the Gulf of Bothnia, and the isthmus which connects it with the continent. The ancients considered Scandia an island. From Plinius, it appears, to have had also the names Baltia and Bastilia (Plin. i. 475 seq.). Others are of opinion, that Scandia included only the western part of the countries above-mentioned. Adj. Scandianus, a, um. Scandiana mala (Col. v. 10).

Scandium, i, n. et. Scandios, i, v. Scandia, v. f. a city of Cythra, Cerigo, on the southern coast of Greece (Hom. ii. x. 268).

Scantia, v. f. a vestal virgin, the superior of the order, who died in the year 23, and Cōrnēlia, her successor, received two thousand sestertia, on purpose to render the priesthood more dignified, and the minds of the priestesses more devoted to the duties of their office (Tac. Ann. iv. 16).

C. Scantinius, C. Scantini, m. a tribune of the people, who was prosecuted, by Marc'ellus, for attempting violation of his son, convicted and fined. From him some say, the law against that offence was called Scantinia lex, a derivation opposed by the usage of the Romans. See P. Scantinius.

P. Scantinius, P. Scantini, m. a pontiff in whose room Q. Cæcilius Mætellus was elected in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxlii. 21). He carried a law De nefandis venērē, to which Juvēnalis alludes (Sat. ii. 44). The punishment appointed by this law was a fine, but after the Roman emperors embraced Christianity, they punished the offenders with death. Adj. Scantinius, a, um. Scantinia lex, the law above-mentioned.

Scaptē-Hylē, a place in Thracia, in which were mines of gold (Herod. vi. 46).

Scaptia, v. f. a town of considerable celebrity in Lätium, which Plinius mentions between Pōmētia and Pitūlum (i. 333).

Adj. Scaptius, a, um. Scaptia pūbes (Sil. Ital. viii. 395). Scaptia tribus (Liv. viii. 17).

P. Scaptius, P. Scaptii, m. a plebeian of a very great age, who informed the commons of Rome, that the land disputed by the Ardeātes and Aricini, of which the decision was then submitted to the Roman people, belonged originally to Cōriōli, and by right of conquest was now the public property of the Romans. In this judgment, the tribes acquiesced, in opposition to the sentiments of the consuls and patricians, who protested both against the falseness of the evidence, and the scandalous injustice of the decision (Liv. lii. 71 seq.).

Scārpheā, v. Scārpheā, v. f. a town of Lōcris, to which the Romans, under M. Acilius Glābrio, pursued Antiochus, king of Syria, on the same day that they had defeated him at Thērmōpyle, 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 3: xxxvi. 19).

Scārpōnna, orum, n. Charpigne, a town of the Netherlands, on the Moselle (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 2).

Scantinius. See P. Scantinius.

Scaurus, i, m. a surname of the Emili and Aurēlii. The name has been derived from having twisted ankles (Hor. Sat. i. 3. 47).

Scēntae. See Sārācēnē.

Scēptus, i, m. mentioned by Ovidius, of whom nothing is certainly known, except that he wrote with severity against the manners of the Ausonians. Nor did Rome escape his censure (Ep. Pont. iv. 14. 38).

Scēptūchī, orum, m. (i. e. Sceptre-bearing) governors of provinces in Asiatic Sarmātia, to the west of the Caspian Sea. For hire, they readily joined in any quarrel, without regard to the character, or situation of the contending powers. Phārismanēs enlisted part of them, in the year 34. At that time, the Sceptuchians were engaged on both sides (Tac. Ann. vi. 33). The term also denoted princes, from their bearing sceptres. It is strictly speaking an adjective, which Hōmērus uses in the masculine gender as an epithet of kings, and Strabo in the feminine, to denote provinces (Hom. ii. ii. 56. Strab. 728).

Scērdilædus, i, m. a king of the Thracians, or the Illyrii. He was the father of Pleūrātus, whom the Romans included in their treaty with Philippus, king of Macedōnia, at Phoenice in Epirus, and although not mentioned by name, it is probable that Scērdilædus was also included in that treaty (Liv. xxli. 33 seq.).—2. Son of Gēntius, king of the Illyrians, carried captive to Rome, with his father, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 32). See Gēntius.

Schēdus, i, m. son of Pērimēdes, a commander of the Phōcēnses in the Trojan war, and was killed by Hēctor (Hom. ii. xv. 515).—2. Son of Iphitus, and brother of Epistrophus, commanded the Phōcēnses in the Trojan war, and was killed by Hēctor. Of all the Phōcēnses, this Schēdus was by far the bravest (Hom. Il. ii. 517: xvii. 306).

Schéria, æ, f. the island of the Phææces, described by Hómērus, as fertile, and the inhabitants as very wealthy (Hom. Od. v. 34).

Schœneüs, ēs, m. a king of Arcādia. Schœneüs, idis, f. a patronymic of Atālānta, daughter of Schœneüs (Ov. Ep. Her. xvi. 263). Adj. Schœneüs, a, um. Schœneüs virgo, Atālānta (Ov. Met. x. 660). Ovidius has Schœneüs (Met. x. 609), to which virgo, or some similar noun is understood.

Schœnus, i, m. a merchant of Pērrhæbia, a man of distinction and fidelity, whom, with Mēuophilus, L. Emilius Paullus, the Roman consul, consulted with respect to the passage into Pērrhæbia, and resolved to employ them as guides, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 35).

Schœnus, i, m. a town of Bœōtia, the inhabitants of which, under Eurymēdon, joined the Thebans against the Argives. It appears to have been adjoining to Hylē. Strābo makes it a place, not a town, and mentions a river of the same name, which passes by it. Atālāntaus Schœnus, from Atālānta being a native of Schœnus (Stat. Th. vii. 268).—2. Kalamāhi, a town in Arcādia, so called from Schœneüs, a Boeotian. Pausānias thinks it probable that the course near Schœnus in Arcādia, had its name from his daughter Atālānta (viii. 35), and if his supposition be well founded, there would be only one Atālānta born at Schœnus in Bœōtia, and removed in early life to the town of the same name in Arcādia.

Scīlāthus, i, f. Sciatti, or Skiathe, an island in Mārē Ægæum, the Archipelago, off the coast of Thēssālīa, Thessaly (Val. Flacc. ii. 8). Here Antiochus collected his ships, which had been scattered in crossing the Archipelago, in 194 B. C., at the time he went to make war against the Romans in Greece, and, in it, C. Mārcius Figūlus, prætor, who commanded the Roman fleet on that station in 171 B. C., sent a part of his troops to winter (Liv. xxxv. 43 seq.). It had a cognominal town, which Philippus destroyed, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 28 seq.).

Scīnis. See Sinis.

Scīōna, æ, f. a town of Pāllēnē (Herod. vii. 123).

Scīpiāda, æ, f. a poem written by Lūcilius, in praise of the valour and justice of P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus (Hor. Sat. ii. 1. 17). Scīpiāda, arum, m. P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus, and P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Æmiliānus, whom Virgilius calls the thunderbolts of war, and the destruction of Libyā, by which he means Carthage (Æn. vi. 844). Ambo Scīpiāda, the two Scīpiōnes above-mentioned (Juv. Sat. ii. 154). Scīpiādaquē dūces fātum Carthāginis unum (Manil. i. 790).

Scīpio. See Cōrnēlius.

Scīpio, ōnis, m. a commander of a Roman cohort, who was murdered in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. ii. 59).

L. Scīpio, L. Scīpiōnis, m. commanded the left wing under the Roman consul, L. Pāpīrius Cūrsor, at Aquilōnia, in the year 295 (Liv. x. 40).

Scīron, v. Scyron, ōnis, m. a notorious thief and robber, who plundered along the coast of Attica and Mēgāria. After he had compelled many of the inhabitants of these districts to do the meanest offices to himself, he threw them from the high rocks into the sea. Thēseüs relieved Greece of this savage, by tumbling him into the sea, on which his bones were changed into rocks that retain his name, between Mēgāra and Cōrīnthus. Ovidius informs us, that neither the sea nor the earth would receive them, until they had undergone that transformation, and that they continued from the time of his death till that event, suspended in the atmosphere (Met. vii. 444). Scīrōnis, idis, f. applied to females or nouns feminine. Adj. Scīrōnis, a, um. Scīrōnia rūpes, the rocks of Scīron, i. e. the rocks into which his bones were changed (Claud. xxvi. 188), which Pīnīus calls Scīrōnia Sāra (i. 422).

Scīsmas, æ, m. eldest son of Datīmes, who deserted his father, went over to Artaxerxes king of Pērsia, and informed him of his father's revolt (Cor. Nep. Dat. 7).

Scīssis, a town of Spain, taken by C. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xii. 60).

Scōbōra, æ, m. a mountain in the coast of Bithynia (App. Bel. Mith. 183).

Scōdra, æ, f. Scutari, Scudari, or Scodra, the palace of Gēntius, king of the Illīryi. It was the strongest fortified town of the Libātes, and of difficult access. On the eastern side it is surrounded by the river Clausia, and on the west by the river Barbāna (Liv. xliii. 20 seq.). Inh. Scōdrēnses, um, m. whom L. Anicius Gallus, by command of the Roman senate, ordered to contribute half the taxes which they had formerly paid to the king, and declared them to be free, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 26).

Scōlōpītus, i, m. a Scythian who, with Hylīnus, having been banished from their own country, carried along with them a great number of the youth, and settled near the river Thērmōdon. After the men of this colony had been cut off by a stratagem, their wives took up arms, and founded that nation of women so celebrated in antiquity under the name of Amāzōnes (Just. ii. 4).

Scōlōti, orum, m. the general name by which the Scythians, the descendants of Cōlāxis, called themselves; by the Greeks they are denominated Scythians (Herod. iv. 6).

Scōlus, i, f. a village near Cithæron, Elætiæ, which was of very difficult access, and gave rise to the proverb, Nec Scōlum ipse ibis, allumēdē sēquēris eūntem. Perhaps the hill on which it stood had the same name, for some make Scōlus a mountain. The inhabitants of that town were commanded by Eurymēdon in the Theban war (Stat. Th. vii. 266).—2. A town of the same name near Olīnthus (Strab. 593). Vestiges only of Scōlus remained in the age of Pausānias (Paus. ix. 4).

Scōpas, æ, m. a prætor of the Ætōli, in 213 B. C. By confirming the statements of M. Valērius Lævinus, he prevailed on his countrymen to make peace with the Romans. See Dorimachus. He afterwards made preparations for war on the Acīrnānes, who formed the resolution of sacrificing their lives rather than submit to the Ætōlians, and framed an awful curse, which all the men from fifteen to sixty swore to. This curse

tion induced Scōpas to give up his plan, and they retreated into the inner parts of their own country, on the approach of the Macedonian king. In 202 B. C., Scōpas returned from Alēxandria, with a large sum of money given him by Ptōlēmaeus, king of Egypt, to whose court he had repaired, on purpose to hire troops in Etōlia, in which it is probable he would not have left a single young man, had not Dāmōcritus either from patriotism or enmity opposed him, and thereby prevented him from carrying off more than six thousand foot and some horse (Liv. xxvi. 24 seq.).—2. A noble Thessalian. Scōpādæ, arum, m. the descendants of Scōpas (Theoc. Idyl. xvi. 36).

Scōrdisci, orum, m. a people of Pännōnia, originally a Celtic nation, who, in ancient times, occupied, besides the country just mentioned, great part of Mœsia, and also a considerable extent of Illýricum. Many of the names of the places on Ister, the Danube, possessed by the Scōrdisci, are purely Celtic, and Livius informs us, that in manners and language they resembled the Bästarnæ, on which account, Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnia, supposed that the latter would readily allow him a passage through their country to Italy, more particularly as their object was the plunder of a very wealthy nation. They appear to have been numerous, and therefore we find them in different countries. M. Cōcōnīus, the Roman prætor, conquered the Scōrdisci in Thrācia, in 137 B. C., and they defeated C. Pōrcius Cato, consul, in 116 B. C. Two years after, M. Līvius Drūsus, consul, gained a victory over them. Līvius, the historian, adds, that the Scōrdisci in Thrācia, were descended from the Gauls, which proves that this was a tribe of the people above-mentioned (xl. 57—Ep. 63). Eutrōpius mentions the Scōrdisci in Mæcēdōnia (iv. 27). The Scōrdisci, says Plōrus, were the most savage of all the Thracians, and their situation in woods and mountains, accorded with their dispositions (iii. 4). Jūstinus says expressly they were Gauls (xxxii. 3).

Scōrdus, i, m. Monte Argentaro, or, Tehar Dag, a mountain of Illýricum, which separates it from Dārdānia and Mœsia. It is by far the highest in all that country. At its foot on the east, is Dārdānia, on the south Mæcēdōnia, and on the west Illýricum (Liv. xliii. 20 seq.).

Scōrpīos, v. Scōrpīus, i, m. the seventh sign of the Zodiac, which anciently extended also over the space now occupied by the sign Libra. Hence, in geminos ubi brachia concūbat arcus Scōrpīos, where the Scorpion in a circular direction extends his claws over two signs (Ov. Met. ii. 195).

Scōrpūs, i, m. a charioteer of great celebrity, whose death Mārtiālls laments (x. 50 &c.).

Scōtī, orum (Sing. Scōtus, i), m. the Scots, a British nation, whose origin is uncertain, and whose name is of doubtful derivation. In the language of the Picts and Caledonians, Scode, or, Scot, signifies a corner of a country, a name which might have been given by them to their feeble neighbours in contempt, whilst inhabiting only Argyllshire. But in Gaelic, the term also signifies little, and Scotlan, a little flock. If this derivation, which, like the former, is Gaelic, be admitted, then it will be unnecessary to have recourse to another meaning of that term, a wanderer, which some have attempted to support, by an expression in Ammīānus Mārcēllīnus, Scōtī per diērsa vagantes multa populabantur (xxvii. 8). This quotation does not establish, that the Scots were a wandering or roaming nation; but that at the period referred to, they made predatory excursions. The etymology of the word Scot, must therefore be held undetermined. That it was a term, originally, of contempt, seems probable, since the natives never acknowledged it as their name, and there is no word in the Gaelic language which signifies a Scotchman. A Highlander calls himself Albanich, or Gael. A similar uncertainty prevails with respect to the origin of the Scots, some maintaining that they were descendants of the Caledonians, and others that they are of Irish extraction, whilst several maintain that their ancestors were South Britons. The Gauls, who took possession of that part of the island, gradually drove the natives towards the western shores, whence they crossed into Hībērnia, Ireland, at a later period into Scōtland, and settled in Argyllshire. Here, while few in number, and of little strength, their more powerful neighbours might give them names of contempt, which have been transmitted to posterity. How long they remained in this state, and at what time they extended their conquest northward along the western coast, history gives no certain information; but in process of time, they became more than a match for their neighbours, whom they subdued, and united Cālēdōnia, Valēntia, and Pictāvia, in one kingdom, which from them is still denominated Scōtland. This country which extends to 278 miles in length, and 180 in breadth, is bounded on the south by Eng-land, and on all other sides by the sea. See Britānnia. Its two grand divisions are Highlands and Lowlands, names naturally suggested by the general appearance of the country. Like other general characteristics, some exceptions prevail, as there are several mountains of considerable height in the Lowlands, and several extensive plains in the Highlands. Claudīānus is among the first of Roman writers who mentions the Scots. He considers them different from the Picts, as does also Ammīānus Mārcēllīnus (xxvii. 8). Both nations appear to have been then formidable (Claud. vii. 55). Adj. Scōticus, a, um. Scōtica tēla (Claud. xxii. 254).

Scōtīus, i, m. a mountain (Ap. Hel. Mith.). Scōtīssa, æ, f. a town of Thēssālīa, Thēssaly (Liv. xxviii. 5 seq.). Inh. Scōtīssæi, orum, m. Adj. Scōtīssæus, a, um. Scōtīssæus oger (Liv. xxxiii. 6).—2. A town of Mæcēdōnia, near the river Strýmon (Plin. i. 434).

Scribōnīa, æ, f. sister of L. Scribōnīus Libo, aunt of Libo Drūsus, and second wife of the Roman emperor Augūstus, by whom she had one daughter named Jūlia. She had previously been twice married to men of consular dignity. The emperor afterwards divorced her, that he might marry Līvia Drūsilla. She went into voluntary exile with her daughter Jūlia, whose lewdness obliged her father to banish her from Rome (Vel. Pat. ii. 100).—2. Wife of M. Licīnius Crās-sus, and mother of Pīso Licītiānus (Tac. Hist. i. 14).

Scribōnīānus Cāmērinus, Scribōnīāni Cāmérini, m. a noble Roman put to death with his father, Sulpicius Camerinus, in the year 67. Two years after, a slave named Geta q. v., pretended to be Scribonianus (Tac. Hist. ii. 72).

Scribonianus Crassus, Scriboniani Crassi, m. brother of Piso Licinianus. Antonius, according to report, invited him to the head of the commonwealth, judging that his illustrious ancestors, added to his own personal dignity, and that of his brother, whom Gaius adopted, would secure him a number of partisans; but he resisted the temptation with inflexible firmness, rightly preferring present comfort to uncertain honours (Tac. Hist. i. 47 seq.).

Scribonius, i. m. a mathematician or astrologer, who predicted, when Tiberius was a child, that he would become a king without the usual badge of royal dignity (Suet. Tib. 14).

Scribonius Aphrodisius, Scribonii Aphrodisii, m. a slave and scholar of Orbius Pappillus, whom Scribonia, daughter of Libo and wife of Augustus, purchased and manumitted. He re-wrote the books of Verrius, "De Orthographia," closely imitating his style and manner (Suet. Il. Gram. 19).

Scribonius Libo, Scribonii Libonis, m. often called simply Libo, the friend and relation of the father-in-law of Sextus Pompeius. Having been driven out of Etruria, Tuscany, at the commencement of the civil war, he and M. Octavius afterwards commanded the Liburnian and Achaean fleet. Libo was one of Pompey's confidential friends (Cæs. B. C. i. 26 seq.). Florus has Octavius Libo (iv. 2), where the reading ought to be Octavius et Libo, i. e. M. Octavius and Scribonius Libo.

C. Scribonius, C. Scribonii, m. a Roman who, after holding the office of a plebeian edile, obtained the city jurisdiction as prætor, in 195 B. C. He appears afterwards to have been appointed Curius Maximus (Liv. xxxiii. 42 seq.).—2. A præfect of the allies (Liv. xl. 31).

C. Scribonius Curius, C. Scribonii Curiōnis, m. was Curius Maximus in 196 B. C. Some suppose that Livius calls him simply C. Scribonius (xxxiii. 42 seq.); but others consider them different persons.—2. An orator of great distinction, was elected consul in 78 B. C., with Cn. Octavius. In the following year, when proconsul, he carried on a successful war against the Dardani, penetrated as far as Danubius, the Danube, and brought the war to a termination within three years (Eutrop. vi. 2). Livius describes this war as in Thracia, and calls him simply Curius, or, C. Curius (Ep. 92 seq.).—3. A tribune of the people, who warmly embraced the interest of Cæsar. He compelled Clito to quit Sicily, and then sailed to Africa, and having put P. Attius Varus to flight, Juba, king of Mauritania, came suddenly upon him, and disdaining to fly, he and his whole army were, by the enemy, cut in pieces, when he was a lieutenant under Cæsar (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 36). According to Lucianus, he possessed great abilities as an orator, which his want of patriotism and moral principle rendered, in a great measure, useless and contemptible. Cæsar readily received his services, in whose opinion he probably stood higher from the vices above-mentioned.

Love of country and inflexible integrity unfitted a man for being of service to that ambitious Roman (Phar. i. 269 seq.). To him Cicero addresses the first seven letters of the second book of his Epist. ad Fam., in the last of which he congratulates him on being appointed a tribune of the people. Adj. Curiōnianus, a. um.

L. Scribonius, L. Scribonii, m. a Roman taken prisoner by Hannibal, at the battle of Cannæ, and deputed by his countrymen who had fallen into the hands of the same enemy, to solicit the senate that they might be ransomed, in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 61).

L. Scribonius Libo, L. Scribonii Libonis, m. was appointed one of the three public bankers, in 218 B. C., at which time he was a plebeian tribune (Liv. xxiii. 21).—2. Obtained the prætorship, the foreign jurisdiction, and the government of the north of Italy, in 206 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 13).—3. Was a curule edile in 196 B. C., the year when the senate first had a place assigned for them at the celebration of the Roman games. Formerly the citizens sat without distinction. He was afterwards foreign prætor, and one of three commissioners appointed to settle colonies at Sipontum and Buxentum (Liv. xxxiv. 54 seq.).—4. A tribune of the people, who proposed a law, that the Lusitani, who had surrendered upon the faith of the Roman people, and yet had been sold by Scipio to the Carthaginians, should be restored to liberty, in 152 B. C. From Cicero, Valerius Maximus and Quintilianus, it appears the law did not pass (Liv. Ep. 49).—5. Was consul with L. Statilius Sisenna, in the year 16 (Tac. Ann. ii. 1). He was the nephew of Scribonia, the second wife of Augustus, and attempted to raise a rebellion against Tiberius (Suet. Tib. 25).

Præcilius Scribonius. See Præcilius.

Scultenna, s. f. the Panaro, a river of Gallia Cispadana, one of the southern branches of Padus, the Po, on which the Roman consul, C. Claudius Pulcher, defeated the Ligures, in 179 B. C. (Liv. xli. 12 seq.).

Scutarius, i. m. an old soldier of Augustus. At his trial for slander, the emperor appeared as his patron, and pleaded in his defence (Suet. Aug. 56).

Scutum, i. n. a shield; a part of the defensive armour of the Roman infantry, which they wore on their left arms to protect their bodies against the arrows, darts, and other missile weapons thrown by the enemy. It consisted of thin pieces of wood joined by plates of iron, and covered with thick skin or hide, from which the name is probably derived (scutum, corium). The most common form was oval, extending to 4 feet in length and 2½ in breadth. When a soldier had not his shield, he was said to fight nudo corpore. In the heroic ages, the warriors in place of a shield, wore a brazen coat of mail, which consisted of two parts, one covering the breast and belly, the other, the back (Paus. x. 26). Adj. Scutatus, a. um.

Scydrōmethis, Idis, m. king of Sinopë, Sinub, from whom the ambassadors of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, obtained the statue of Serapis (Tac. Hist. iv. 83 seq.).

Scylaceton, i. n. a promontory of Præpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, which appears to have been in the vicinity of Abydus, the E-drenos-soni. Vālerius Flaccus describes it as foaming by the waves breaking on its base (iii. 36).

Scyllaceum, Scyllacium, et, Scyllētium, i. n. Squillace, a town of the Bruttii, founded by an Athenian colony. Adj. Scyllacēus, et, Scyllacēus, a. um. Scyllacēa littōra, the shores of Squillace (Ov. Met. xv. 702). Scyllacēus sinus, the bay of Squillace (Plin. i. 350).

Scylla, n. f. a daughter of Phœrus, according to some; of Typhoeus, according to others; and of Hecate, according to Hœmērus, who does not mention her father. Circe, either from jealousy, because Scylla was a greater favourite with Glaucus than herself, or, at the request of that deity, turned her into a sea monster of the most hideous form. Some say she retained her original form and beauty down to the waist; but others, that she had six heads, as many throats, and instead of hands, two claws. Hœmērus states she had twelve feet, and in the mouth of each of her six heads were triple rows of teeth (Od. xii. 89 seq.). All agree that her middle was encompassed by dogs, which never ceased barking. With the exception of Hœmērus, the ancient poets represent her body terminating in a huge and hideous fish, with a forked tail. Her residence was in a cave of the same name in Frētum Siculum, the Strait of Messina, on the Italian side, supposed to have been nearly opposite to Charybdis, on the coast of Sicily. This fiction probably originated in the south of Italy being ravaged by Phenicians, whose ship had on the prow the likeness of a monstrous female; and the dreadful noise of the waves in a tempest rushing into the cavities, would in after ages give additional support to the fable. Informes Scyllæ, double formed Scyllæ, from their form being partly human and partly monstrous (Virg. Æn. vi. 286). Another explanation of this imaginary character has been purposely passed over.—2. The daughter of Nisus, king of Mēgara, who conceived a violent passion for Minos, king of Crēta, Candia, when he was besieging her father's capital. To ensure the fall of the city, and, in consequence of that event, the affection of her lover, she cut off from her father's head, whilst asleep, a hair of a purple colour, on which his good fortune depended, and presented it to him. Minos soon after carried the place, but punished the perfidy of Scylla, by ordering her to be thrown into the sea. She was changed, according to some, into a fish, and, according to others, into a lark or a hawk. Virgilius has been blamed for confounding the story of Scylla, the daughter of Nisus, with Scylla, daughter of Phœrus (B. vi. 74); and Ovidius does the same (Fast. iv. 500). Adj. Scyllæus, a. um. Scyllæa antra, the cave of Scylla (Claud. xxxvi. 447). Scyllæa monstra (Stat. Syl. v. 3. 280).—3. A slave of uncommon size, mentioned by Mār-tialis (vii. 37).

Scyllæum, i. n. Schilli, or, Skyli, a promontory of Argolis, in the district of Hēr-mionē, at which the fleets under Attalus, and L. Apustius, a Roman lieutenant-general, formed a junction, in 202 B. C., as did those of king Eumenes and the Romans, under C. Livius, nine years after (Liv. xxxi. 44 seq.).—2. Scyllio, a town and promontory in Brut-tius ager, so called from Scylla, the rock on the Strait of Messina.

Scyllis, Idis, m. a Greek who excelled in diving, an art which he taught his daughter, Cŷana. Near Pellon, during a storm, they destroyed some of the ships of Xēræx, by cutting their cables under water. In gratitude for their valuable services, the Amphic-tyons erected statues to their memory (Paus. x. 19).

Scynus, v. Cynus, i. m. an officer under Alexander the Great, who obtained Sūslāna on the death of that monarch (Just. xiii. 4).

Scyri, orum, m. a Gothic nation, mentioned by Ammianus Marcëllinus (Excer.).

Scyron, ōnis, m. one of the Mārmāridæ, killed in a naval engagement, off Sicily, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 482).

Scyros, i. f. SkYRO, a small rocky barren island, which had a town of the same name (Hom. Il. ix. 664), in Mārē Ægæum, the Archipelago, about twenty-eight miles east from Eubœa, Negropont, of which Lŷcômē-des was king. To the court of that monarch, Achilles, disguised in a female dress, was sent by his mother, to avoid the necessity of his going to the Trojan war. Hœmērus does not mention his residence there. In this retirement, he had by Dēdāmīa, one of the king's daughters, a son (see Pŷrrhus), who appears to have remained there during that memorable siege. Hence, Phthiam Scy-rouve ferantur (arma Achillis), let the arms of Achilles be sent to Phthia, i. e. to his father Pēlēus, or to Scyros, i. e. to his son Pŷr-rhus (Ov. Met. xiii. 156). This island does not exceed sixty miles in circumference. Thēseus was buried in SkYRO. Scyrias, lādis, f. a woman of Scyros; Dēdāmīa (Ov. Art. Am. i. 682). Adj. Scyrius, a. um. of Scy-ros; also of Achilles, from his residence on that island. Scyria pūbes, the youth of Scyros (Virg. Æn. ii. 477). Scyria membra, the limbs of Pŷrrhus (Ov. Ep. Her. viii. 112). Scyria virgo, Dēdāmīa (Claud. x. 16).

Scytālē, es, v. Scytāla, n. f. a round piece of wood, three or four cubits in length, to which another was made exactly alike, both in length and thickness. The magistrates kept the one, and gave the other to the person intrusted with the command of their fleet or armies, to whom they communicated instructions, without danger of their falling into the hands of the enemy. When the magistrates had secret orders to convey, they took a long narrow slip or scroll of parchment, rolled it about the one which they had kept, one fold close to another, and then wrote whatever they wished to communicate across the parchment. When this was done, they took off the scroll, folded it up, and sent it to the commander. On receiving it, he applied it to his Scytālē, or staff, which being exactly like that of the magistrates, all the folds fell in with each other precisely as they did at the writing; and the characters, which before were so broken and disjointed, that it was impossible to read them, now became plain and legible. Both the parchment and staff bore the same name, Scytāla, just, says Plūtarchus, as the thing measured has the name of the measure. The merit of this invention belongs to the Lacedæmonians. It may not be improper to observe, that the name is derived from Scythra, a skin, the substance on which they wrote.

Scythæus, i. m. an officer under Alexander the Great, who obtained Sôgdiana, on the death of that monarch (Just. xiii. 4).

Scythēs, m., a king of Zāncē, who fled to Darius, and was by him declared to be the justest of all the Greeks known to him (Herod. vi. 23 seq.).

Scythia, w. f. an extensive country in the northern parts of Europe and Asia, the boundaries of which are unknown. Inh. Scythia, arum (Sing. Scythia, v. Scythēs, w.), m. the Scythians, whom Justinus considered the most ancient nation in the world, and relates the arguments by which they overpowered the Egyptians, who disputed their claim to that character. They subsisted chiefly by pasturage, and had no desire for money. They are described by some authors, as sober, temperate and just; by others, as wicked, inhospitable, and cruel. Both characters are perhaps true. From the great extent of their country, some of the tribes were probably very different in dispositions and manners. Gellius says they ate human flesh (ix. 4). According to Plinius, the Persians called the Scythians Sācā, and at an earlier period their general appellation was Aramēi (i. 678), but Strābo and others make Aramēi, a name of the Syrians (Strab. 59). Scythis, Idos, et. Scythissa, w. f. a Scythian woman, applied also to a noun feminine. Scythides memorantur, Scythian women are said (Ov. Met. xv. 360). Scythismus, i. m. an imitation of the Scythians. Adj. Scythicus, Scythius, et. Scythus, a. um. Scythica ora, the coasts of Scythia (Prop. iii. 16. 13). Scythica volūres, pheasants (Juv. Sat. xi. 139). Scythicus Jūpiter, a Scythian, i. e. a cold, atmosphere (Claud. lxxiv. 2). Scythicum frētum, the Black Sea (Mart. vii. 18). Scythica rūpes, Caucasus (Mart. xi. 85). Scythia hiemes, winters of Scythia, i. e. severe winters (Virg. G. iii. 197). Scythia smārāydu (Mart. iv. 28).

Scython, ōnis, m. a person born male, and afterwards became female (Ov. Met. iv. 280). Banier explains the fiction by stating, that the ancient name of Thrācia, was Scython, that it was afterwards called Thrācia from a famous sorceress, and that Scython being masculine, and Thrācia feminine, gave rise to the fable of Scython having changed sex.

Scythōpōlis, is, f. Bethsan, a city of Pālēstina, according to Ammianus Marcellinus (xix. 12), which does not appear to have been the idea of Plinius, who places it on the verge of Arābia, and says its ancient name was Nysa, from the nurse of Bāchus being buried there (i. 571).

Sēbennūis, Idis, f. a town of Egypt, which gave name to the district in which it stood. Inh. Sēbennitāni, orum, m. Adj. Sēbennyticus, a. um. Sēbennyticum ostium, the Sēbennytic mouth, one of the branches of the Nile, which divides into two channels, the Saitic and Mendesian (Herod. ii. 17).

Sēbēthus, i. m. the Sebeto, or, the Maddalena, a river of Italy, near Naples, which is now become an inconsiderable brook (Stat. Syl. l. 2. 263). Sēbēthis, Idis, f. a nymph, daughter of Sēbēthus, the Maddalena, and mother of Gēbālus by Tēlon (Virg. Aen. vii. 734).

Sēcūndilla, w. f. the wife of Sālētānus, who brought him a large fortune, which she bequeathed to him at her death (Mart. ii. 65).

Sēcūndas Cārrinas, Sēcūdi Cārrinūs, m. a rhetorician who, according to Dio Cassius, removed from Athens to Rome, and was banished by Cāligūla, for declaiming against tyrants (Juv. Sat. vii. 204). Of him Tacitus says, "He had the Greek philosophy fluent in his mouth, but not one virtue in his heart" (Ann. xv. 45).

Sedelaucum, i. n. Sautica, a city of Frasin, near the Chōra (Amm. Mar. xvi. 2).

Sēdētānia, w. f. a district of Spain, between Ibērus, the Ebro, and Sūcro, the Xucar, the capital of which was Caesar Augusta, Saragossa. Inh. Sēdētāni, orum, m. Līvius mentions, that in 197 B. C., the Sēdētāni attached themselves to M. Pōrcius Cāto (xxxiv. 20), from which period their name does not occur in the writings of that historian. Adj. Sēdētānus, a. um. Sēdētānus ager (Liv. xxix. 1). Sēdētāna cithāra (Sil. Ital. iii. 372).

Sedochēzi, orum, m. a people mentioned by Tacitus. The readings vary. Some commentators maintain, that no such people ever existed, and that instead of Sedochēzorum, it should be Sedochi Lāzerum, making Sedochus king of the Lāzi, a people of Sarmātia (Hist. iii. 48).

Sedratyra, w. f. a town of Gēdrosia, Māhran (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Sēdūlius, i. m. the prince and commander of the Lēmōvices, who was slain at Alēda Aliae (Ces. B. G. vii. 88).

Sēdūni, orum, m. a nation on the south bank of Rhōdānus, the Rhone, to the east of Lācus Lēmānus, the Lake of Geneva. They opposed Hānnibal near the very summit of Alps, the Alps, when he crossed these lofty mountains to invade Itālia, Italy. Their capital was afterwards called Civitas Sēdūnōrum, now Ston. It is probable that in consequence of their inhabiting so very uncomfortable a country as the Great or Little St. Bernard, they would frequently send out colonies in quest of milder climates and more fertile districts. Hence we find tribes of this name in different places (Ces. B. G. iii. 1).

Sēdūsī, orum, m. a nation of Germany, on the N. E. bank of Rhēnus, the Rhine. Their country was watered by Menas, the Maine (Ces. B. G. i. 51).

Sēgētāni, orum, m. a very brave and warlike nation, who fought in the army under the king of Persia in the year 359 (Amm. Mar. xix. 2).

Sēgētes, is, m. a chief, who headed one faction of the Catti, and Arminius, the other. The former, of a pacific temper, preserved an unshaken fidelity to the Romans. Arminius, his opponent, had married his daughter whom Strābo calls Thūselda. His speech to Gērmānicus indicates a goodness of disposition, and a command of the passions which gain the esteem of the reader. The emperor Tiberius honoured him with the title of Imperātor (Tac. Ann. i. 55–58).

Sēgēstica. See Sēgida.

Sēgēstum, i. n. Castel a Mare, a town of Sicily, in the vale of Mazara. Inh. Sēgētāni, orum, m. (Tac. Ann. iv. 43).

Sēgida, v. Sēgēda, Zafra, a town of Spain, near Betis, the Guadalquivir (Plin. l. 296). Līvius writes this word Sēgēstica (xxxiv. 17). Inh. Sēgēdenses, ium, m. (Flor. ii. 18).

Sēgimērus, i. m. the brother of Sēgēstes, a German chief, who fell into the hands of the Romans, together with his son, in the year 14. A free pardon was granted to both (Tac. Ann. i. 71).

Sēgimundus, i. m. a son of Sēgēstes q. n. In the general revolt of Germany, this youth joined his countrymen, although the Romans had appointed him a priest of the Ubian altar (Tac. Ann. i. 57).

Sēgisama, w. f. Castroseriz, a town of Cantabria in Spain (Flor. iv. 12).

Sēgnī, orum, m. a people of Galla Belgica, who lived in the vicinity of Silva Ardūenna. A small town, Sinei, or, Signei, points out the place which they once inhabited (Cæs. B. G. vi. 32).

Sēgōbrīgū, orum, m. a Gallic nation, who possessed the country on the east bank of Rhodanus, the Rhone, at the mouth of that river (Just. xliii. 3). See Nannus.

Sēgōnāx, ācis, m. one of the four kings who reigned in Cantium, Kent, at the time Cæsar invaded Britain (Cæs. B. G. v. 22).

Sēgōntiāci, orum, m. a British nation, who lived on the south of Tānēsis, the Thames. They appear to have been subject to Cassivellaunus, at the time Cæsar attempted to add this island to the Roman empire. The scholar must not suppose that they were inhabitants of Sēgōntium, Caernarvon, opposite to Anglesey, on the strait which separates that island from the main land. Cæsar did not penetrate so far into the country (Cæs. B. G. v. 21).

Segovia, w. f. Segovia, a town of Old Castile in Spain (Flor. iii. 22).

Sēgūntia, w. f. Signenca, a town of the Arevāci, in Hispania Tarracōnēsis, at which the Celtiberi had deposited all their baggage when they joined the Tūrdētāni, in 197 B. C.; on which account, M. Pōrcius Cato, the Roman consul, attempted to take it, but failed (Liv. xxxiv. 19).

Sēgūsīāni, orum, m. a people of Galla Celtica, to the W. of Rhodanus, the Rhone. Their country was traversed by Ligēris, the Loire, towards the source of that river (Cæs. B. G. i. 10 seq.).

Sēgūsio, ōnis, f. Susa, a town on the confines of Galla and Italia, the capital of Cōtius, who was buried in its vicinity (Amm. Mar. xv. 10).

Sējānus. See L. Ælius Sējānus.

Sēius, i. m. a man mentioned by Jūvénalis. The name is probably fictitious, and hence occurs only in law cases (Sat. iv. 13).

Sēius Quādrātus, Sēi Quādrātī, m. a man accused by Minūtius Thērmas, and Q. Sērvēus, in the year 32. Of his origin no account remains (Tac. Ann. vi. 7).

Sēius Strābo, Sēi Strābōnis, m. a Roman knight, and prefect of the prætorian guards, in which command his son, Ælius Sējānus, the favourite of the emperor Tiberius, had a joint commission with him (Tac. Ann. i. 7). Velleius Pāterculus says, Sēius Strābo was the chief of the Roman knights.

Sēius Tībēro, Sēi Tībēronis, m. an officer in the Roman army, who served under Gērmānicus. Vibius Sērēnus falsely accused him, drooping under bodily infirmity, of a conspiracy against the state. Tiberius, whose intimate friendship he enjoyed, seemed confused at the mention of his name, yet ordered no inquiry to be made against him (Tac. Ann. ii. 20 seq.).

Sēlāgus, i. m. the father of Amphius, possessed great wealth. He lived at Pesus (Hom. Il. v. 612).

Cn. Sēius, Cn. Sēi, m. a Roman who had a horse of the Thracian breed, of uncommon size and colour. Into the possession of whomsoever he came, the inevitable destruction of the family and fortune almost immediately ensued; hence the proverbial expression, when a man was unfortunate, "He has the horse of Sēius." Adj. Sēiānus, a. um. Sēiānus equus (Gel. iii. 9).

Selē, es, f. a town of Sūsāna (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Sēlēmnius, i. m. a river of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, to which the ancients ascribed the virtue of curing of love the persons who drank of it (Paus. vii. 23). It had this name from a herd boy, Sēlēmnius, with whom the nymph Argyra was in love.

Sēlēnē, es, f. wife of Ptolēmēus Lathūrus, from whom his mother, Clēōpātra, compelled him to separate, after she had born him two sons. She afterwards became the wife of Antiōchus Grypus (Just. xxxix. 3 seq.).—2. Daughter of M. Antōnius, and wife of king Jūba, by whom she became the mother of Ptolēmēus q. c.

Sēlēpitāni, orum, m. a people of Illyricum, to whom L. Anicius Gāllus, the Roman prætor, by order of the senate, granted liberty, in 169 B. C., and appointed to pay only one half of the taxes, which they had formerly done to their king, Gēntius (Liv. xlv. 26).

Sēlēpius, i. m. king of Lyrnēssus and Thēbæ. Sēlēpiādes, w. m. Évēnus (Hom. Il. ii. 693).

Sēlēucia, w. f. a town at the conflux of Tigris, the Dejilah, and Euphrātes, the El-Frat. Cēsēphon stood near it, on which account the Arabs called them Modain, i. e. the two cities (Just. xxxv. 1).—2. Sēlefke, a city of Cilicia, which had this name from Sēlēucus Nicātor. It was formerly called Olbia and Hyria (Tac. Ann. ii. 69). Inh. Sēlēucēnses, ium, m. Adj. Sēlēucēnsis, is, e. Sēlēucēnsis rex (Tac. Ann. vi. 42).

Sēlēucus, i. m. son of Antiōchus and Lāōdicē, was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and received, on account of his bravery, the surname of Nicātor (i. e. the victorious). In the division of the countries which acknowledged subjection to that conqueror, Sēlēucus obtained Sēria, of which the capital was Bābylon. Justinus states, that he took Bābylon, having obtained additional forces conquered the Bactriāni, marched into India, where he formed an alliance with Sandrocōttus, returned to fight Antiōchus, whom he killed in battle, and forced his son Dēmētrius to seek safety by flight. After this engagement, the confederates divided into parties, Sēlēucus joined with Dēmētrius, and Ptolēmēus with Lysimachus. Lysimachus having, by cruelty, alienated the affections of his subjects, the surviving nobles and the commanders of his troops deserted to Sēlēucus, and compelled him to make war on their former sovereign. This was the last contest among the fellow-soldiers of Alexander the Great. Lysimachus had already attained his seventy-fourth, and Sēlēucus his seventy-seventh year. Even at this advanced period of life, both had youthful minds, both an insatiable desire of dominion, and both, notwithstanding the extensiveness of their territories, seemed to themselves shut up within the narrowest bounds. Lysimachus lost fifteen children, and fell, in battle, the last of his family. Seleucus rejoiced at so great a victory, boasted that he was not human work, but a divine gift, utterly unconscious that he was soon after to be himself an example of human frailty. Within eight months, Ptolemaeus II. treacherously accomplished his death. Lysimachus had married a sister of Ptolemaeus Ceraunus (Just. xlii. 4 seq.). He built a number of cities, sixteen called Antiochia after his father, six Laodicea after his mother, nine Seleucia after himself, four after his wives, one Stratonicea, and the other three Apamea (Ap. Bel. Syr. 104 seq.). He had seventy-two governments. To him Tacitus alludes (Ann. vi. 42). Adj. Seleucianus, a, um.—2. Surnamed Callinicus, son of Antiochus Theos and Laodice, and great-grandson of the former, ascended the throne of Syria in 246 B. C., on the death of his father. Amongst his first acts, was the murder of his stepmother, Berenice, sister of Ptolemaeus Evergetes, and of her young son, on which account the Egyptian king made war upon him, and, unless an insurrection in Egypt had recalled him, would have obtained possession of the whole kingdom of Seleucus. The fleet, which the latter raised after the departure of his enemy, was lost in a storm, yet this disaster proved favourable to Seleucus; for his subjects, who had revolted from hatred at their sovereign, returned to their duty; but in the first engagement with Ptolemaeus, he in a cowardly manner fled to Antiochia. Soon after, his brother Antiochus Hierax conquered him in battle, by means of the Gauls, from whom he redeemed himself with gold, and formed an alliance with these mercenaries. Almost at the same time with his kingdom, he lost his life, by being thrown from his horse, in 226 B. C. (Just. xxvii. 2 seq.).—3. Surnamed Philopator, son of Antiochus Magnus and brother of Antiochus Epiphanes. He succeeded his father on the throne of Syria, continued to pay a heavy tribute annually to the Romans, and sent his son Demetrius to be educated at the capital of his enemies, where he received all the advantages which can be derived from able preceptors in the different arts and sciences. Livius has recorded only a few particulars respecting him. After a short reign of about twelve years, he lost his life by poison (Liv. xxxiii. 40—Ep. 46).—4. Son of Demetrius Nicator, king of Syria, and Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemaeus Philometor, king of Egypt, killed by his mother, because he had assumed the crown without her consent, after she had murdered his father, 125 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 60).—5. An eminent musician, but on what kind of instrument he played, antiquity has not informed us (Juv. Sat. x. 211).—6. A grammarian, whom the emperor Thierius first expelled from his family, and afterwards compelled to die, for no other reason, than that he found out, by means of the emperor's servants, what books he had read through the day, and came prepared in the evening to answer any question which he might put (Suet. Tib. 56).—7. An astrologer, who flourished in the time of Galba, Otho, &c. (Suet. Oth. 4). Tacitus and Plutarch call him Ptolemaeus, hence it is probable he had both names.—8. A mathematician, whom Vespasian retained to assist his councils with insight into future events (Tac. Hist. ii. 78).

Selinus, ūtis, f. (m. Liv.), by the Greeks Selinuntium, i, u. Torre di Pulici, a town of Sicily, Sicily, between Hympsa, the Boloi, and the river Selinus, is said to have abounded with palm trees, hence Virgilius, palmis Selinus (Æn. iii. 705). It was built by the Mēgarēnses, and destroyed by the Carthaginians, who butchered men, women, and children, without distinction. The town most probably received its name from the river, and it from the number of bees on its banks. Inh. Selinuntii, n. Selinusi, orum, m. Adj. Selinuntius, a, um. Selinuntia aquae, the waters of Selinus, which were salt (Strab. 396). Therma Selinuntia, Sciacca, are at a considerable distance from Torre di Pulici, upon the river Himēra.—2. A city of Cilicia (Plin. i. 585). It was taken by Antiochus, king of Syria, from Ptolemaeus, king of Egypt, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 20).—3. A river, which flows through Pergamus (Plin. i. 611).—4. A river of Elis (Paus. v. 6).—5. The river of Vastiza, a river which rises in mount Olonos, and running northward falls into the Gulf of Lepanto, to the east of Helice (Paus. vii. 24).

Sellus, i, m. a man who killed Clydeus, a native of Pella, Palatisa, a town of Macedonia, in the decisive engagement at Zama (Sil. Ital. xvii. 429).—2. A parasite, against whom Martialis writes with considerable severity (ii. 14). The same poet has another epigram on Sellus, an atheist (iv. 21).

Sellasia, æ, f. a town of Laconia, on the river Enus, at which T. Quinctius Fulminius encamped in 197 B. C., on his march against Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon (Liv. xxxiv. 28).

Sellæ, es, f. a town of Laconia, built by Greeks from Phocæa, which was first called Hyelæ and Ellæ, changed by the Latins into Sellæ. Strabo says, in his time, it was called Elæa. Latin authors generally call it Vella q. v.

Sellæis, ūtis, m. a river of Elis, in Peloponnesus, the Marcea.—2. A river of Achæia (Hom. Il. ii. 659 seq.).—3. A river of the Troad near Arissa (Hom. Il. xii. 97).

Selli, orum, m. a people who lived in the vicinity of Dodona, a town of Epirus, the south of Albania, of whom Homerus makes mention, adding, that they were the priests of Jupiter, and slept upon the ground (Il. xvi. 234). Lucanus, therefore, with propriety calls them ancient (Phar. iii. 180).

Sellisternia, orum, n. the sacred seats of the goddesses, on which they were placed at public festivals. The Lectisternia appears to have been a general term, which might be applied when speaking either of the gods or goddesses, but more commonly the latter (Tac. Ann. xv. 44). From a passage in Valerius Maximus, it appears that at supper, women sat when men reclined, and that from being a practice amongst mankind it was introduced to the worship of the gods. — Juv.

epulo ipse in lectulum, Jūno et Minerva in sellas ad cenam invitantur" (ii. 1).

A. Sēllius, a. Sēllii, m. created a plebeian tribune at Rome, in 421 B. C. (Liv. iv. 42).

Sēlymbrīa, v. f. Selveria, a city of Thracia (Liv. xxxiii. 39).

Sēmēlē, es. f. a daughter of Cādmos, king of Thēbae, and Hērmiōnē, hence Hōrātius calls her Thēbana (Od. i. 19. 2). When pregnant with Bāchus by Jūpiter, Jūno assumed the form of Bērōē, Semele's nurse, and advised her to solicit Jūpiter, as a proof of his divinity, to appear before her in celestial majesty. With this request he reluctantly complied, and Sēmēlē, unable to bear the splendour of the king of the gods, was reduced to ashes. Jūpiter, however, rescued the child from destructive flames, who was placed in his father's thigh, where he remained until the proper period of his birth. Hence Bāchus is called Bimāter. On account of her intercourse with Jūpiter, Sēmēlē is called Tyria pēlex (Ov. Met. iii. 258). Locus Sēmēla, a grove, sacred to Sēmēlē on the banks of Tiber, the Tevere (Ov. Fast. vi. 503). Adj. Sēmēlēus, et, Sēmēlēus, a. um. Prōles Sēmēlēia, Bāchus (Ov. Met. iii. 520). Sēmēla būta (Stat. Th. x. 897).

Sēmīdēns, i. m. half a god; a being endowed with immortality, but not permitted to dwell in heaven.

Sēmīrāmis, īdos. f. daughter of Dēreētis, one of the most celebrated female characters of antiquity, was born at Ascalon, a city of Sēria, Justinus says of Dāmāscus (xxxvi. 2). History informs us, that she was first married to one of the principal officers of Ninus, who built Nineveh, and afterwards to that monarch. On the death of her husband, about 2300 B. C., she remained sovereign of the empire, which was greatly enlarged under her reign, by the conquest of the neighboring states. Ovidius and others ascribe to her the building of Bābēlon, although it is probable she only enlarged it. Justinus writes, that her son being under age, at his father's death, she assumed a different dress, pretended to be the son, not the widow of Ninus, and compelled the people to follow her example with regard to clothes, and that this is the reason that in Persia, the dress of the sex seems to be changed. She reigned forty-two years, if confidence can be placed in chronology, from the year of the world 1860 to 1902 (Just. i. 1, 2). The reader is unwilling to believe the account of her death given by Justinus. Her character is variously drawn by different historians. Phāretrata Sēmīrāmis, either from her warlike courage, or from the ancients representing her armed with a bow and arrow (Juv. Sat. ii. 108). Adj. Sēmīrāmīus, a. um. of Sēmīrāmis; of Bābēlon; Babylonian. Crētus Sēmīrāmīo sanguine, descended from the blood of Sēmīrāmis (Ov. Met. v. 85). Sēmīrāmīa turres, the forts or citadels of Bābēlon (Claud. i. 162). Sēmīrāmīa acus, a Babylonian needle, i. e. tapestry or embroidery (Mart. viii. 28).

Sēmōnēs, um. m. a Suevian nation of Germany, on the banks of Albis, the Elbe, who, with the Lāngōbārdi, revolted from Mārōbōdōgus, to Arminius, in the year 17 (Tac. Ann. ii. 45).

Sēmo, ōnis. m. the founder of the Salines, whom they worshipped as a god.

He had also the names Sāncus and Fidius q. v.

Sēmprōnīa, a. f. sister of C. and Tib. Sēmprōnīus Grāccus, and wife of P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Africānus Emīliānus Nūmāntinus, whom she was suspected to have murdered by poison, because he powerfully and successfully opposed the turbulent and seditious conduct of her brothers. No inquiry was made into that matter, but the popular seditions blazed out with great fury upon the death of her husband, in 131 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 59). On account of her personal deformity and barrenness, Applānus says that she neither was beloved, nor loved (Bel. Civ. 361).—2. Appears to have been the wife of Dēcimus Jūnius Brūtus (Sal. Cat. 40), who held the consulship with M. Emīlius Lēpidus Livianus (79 B. C.), by whom she became the mother of D. Jūnius Brūtus, an accomplice in the assassination of C. Jūlius Cēsar. She entered into the conspiracy of Cātillina, and Sallūstius has drawn her character in a masterly style. She had committed many atrocious deeds with a masculine intrepidity. Besides the advantages of noble birth and personal beauty, she was happy in her husband and children, well skilled in Greek and Roman literature, played, and danced with greater elegance than the modesty of her sex required. She possessed other accomplishments of no value, except as instruments of luxury. In her estimation, nothing was of less value than honour and modesty. Her lasciviousness had no bounds, and on money or reputation she set no value. She violated promises, practised perjury, and had been accessory to murder. Luxury involved her in all the miseries of poverty, and both united to render her a fit instrument for any act of iniquity. Notwithstanding these vices, she was not without genius, had a turn for poetry, and a pleasant vein of wit. In conversation she delighted by adaptation to circumstances, was modest, gay, or voluptuous, as imagination prompted, or her companions required. Her humour and pleasantry were in constant play, and rendered enchanting by the vivacity and sprightliness of her fancy. A vitiated imagination, and unrestrained passions, destroyed the many accomplishments of Sēmprōnīa, and have transmitted her name to the contempt and abhorrence of every succeeding age (Sal. Cat. 25—40).—3. The wife of Rūfus, to whom Martialis addresses an Epitaph, written on her husband (xii. 52).

Sēmprōnīus Blāsius, Sēmprōnī Blāsi, m. a Roman quaestor, killed by the Africans, in an incautious descent made on their coast by Cn. Servilius Gēmīnus, the consul, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 31).

Sēmprōnīus Dēnsus, Sēmprōnī Dēnsi, m. a centurion of the praetorian cohort, whom Gālba had ordered to escort Piso Lacinianus, the day on which that emperor lost his life, by the cruelty of the praetorian cohorts. Sēmprōnīus discharged that duty with great fidelity and fortitude, giving to Piso after he had been wounded, an opportunity of escaping from the tumult (Tac. Hist. i. 42 sq.).

Sēmprōnīus Tucca, Sēmprōnī Tuccae, m. a man on whom Martialis writes an epigram, the point of which seems to depend on the adjective Cōsmīcus (vii. 40).

A. Sēmprōnīus Asēllō, A. Sēmprōnī Asēllōnīs, m. a praetor at Rome, in 91 B. C., murdered by the usurers, because he had given decisions in favour of debtors (Liv. Ep. 74).

A. Sēmprōnīus Atrātīnus, A. Sēmprōnī Atrātīnī, m. obtained the consulship at Rome, in 497 B. C., and afterwards in 492 B. C. The festival called Sātūrnālīa, was instituted in his first consulship (Liv. ii. 21 seq.).

—2. One of the first military tribunes with consular authority. These new magistrates entered on office in 443 B. C. (Liv. iv. 7).

—3. Another of the same name, elected to the same office, in 424 B. C., and was afterwards twice re-elected (Liv. iv. 35—47).

4. A master of the horse to T. Quinctius Cincinnātus, in 378 B. C. (Liv. vi. 28).

C. Sēmprōnīus Atrātīnus, C. Sēmprōnī Atrātīnī, m. consul at Rome in 423 B. C., the year in which the Sāmītes took Cāpua. His carelessness and rashness proved fatal to the greater part of the army, for which L. Hōrtēnsius, a tribune of the people, brought him to trial, but at the request of his four colleagues, who had served under the consul, he desisted. From this abandonment of prosecution, Sēmprōnīus reaped little advantage, since the tribunes in 419 B. C., not from patriotism, but from ill-will, brought the cause again before the people, when he was condemned to pay a fine of fifteen thousand asses (Liv. iv. 37—44). Adj. Sēmprōnīānus, a. um. Sēmprōnīānum senatus cōsultum (Cic. Fam. xii. 29).

C. Sēmprōnīus Blēsus, C. Sēmprōnī Blēsī, m. was elected consul with Cn. Sērvilius Cāpio, in 255 B. C. They sailed for Africa with two hundred and sixty ships, took several towns, and returning home with great booty were shipwrecked. This loss disheartening the Romans, the senate decreed that they should refrain from naval engagements, and only retain sixty ships for the protection of Italy (Eutrop. ii. 23).—2. A tribune of the people, who arraigned C. Fūlvīus for the loss of his army in Apūlia, in 213 B. C. Although the tribune changed the mode of prosecution, first suing for a fine, and afterwards for a sentence of treason, he succeeded, and the culprit went into banishment, which the senate declared legal (Liv. xxvi. 2).—3. A plebeian edile in 188 B. C. He was afterwards elected praetor, when Sicīlia, Sicily, fell to his lot as his province, and in 172 B. C., he and Sēxtus Jūlius Cēsār were sent to restore the inhabitants of Abdēra to liberty (Liv. xxxix. 7 seq.).

C. Sēmprōnīus Grāechus, C. Sēmprōnī Grāechī, m. (anciently Grāecus) son of Tib. Sēmprōnīus Grāechus and Cōrnēlia. His brother Tibērius, who was elder than he, had a gentle and unruffled temper; but that of Caius was violent and irascible. He enjoyed the same education with his brother, and his abilities, added to his application, enabled him to derive from study similar advantages. In eloquence he surpassed those of his own age, and his love of distinction stimulated to vigorous and constant exertion. Undeterred by the fate of his brother, he entered the same career, and displayed abilities, which, under the direction of greater prudence, and perhaps better principle, might have placed him high among the citizens of Rome. He obtained the office of quæstor (127 B. C.), in which he conducted himself with great fidelity, honour, judgment, and integrity. He supported the law proposed by C. Pāpīrius Cārbo, a tribune of the people, that the commons should be at liberty to elect the same tribune as often as they pleased, in which he was opposed by his brother-in-law P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus Æmiliānus Nāmantinus, whose opinion prevailed. In his speech the latter maintained, that Tib. Sēmprōnīus Grāechus had been justly put to death, in 132 B. C. Next year he, Fūlvius Flāccus, and C. Pāpīrius Cārbo, commissioners for the division of the lands, excited seditions, and were powerfully opposed by P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus Æmiliānus Nāmantinus, who one day left the assembly, went home in perfect health, and was found next morning dead in his bed. When tribune of the people, he passed several dangerous laws, among others one that grain should be given to the people at one-half and one-third of an as; another was an agrarian law, the same as his brother's; and a third, with the view of corrupting the Equestrian order, that six hundred should be taken into the senate, which then consisted only of three hundred members. Having been continued another year in office, he planted colonies in various parts of Italy by new agrarian laws, and one he himself conducted to the site of Carthage then destroyed (127 B. C. Liv. Ep. 60).

At the expiry of his seditious tribuneship, he seized Mōns Avēntīnus, Mons Aventino, with an armed multitude, which was defeated and himself killed by L. Opīmius, consul in 123 B. C., who by order of the senate armed the people, and marched against him (Ep. 61). That he lost his life justly, every impartial reader of Roman history must allow. Even Jūvenālīs, a firm friend to the liberties of his country, calls him seditious, which, of itself, would justify the fall of the Grāechi, and palliate the severity by which their deaths were effected. To them the agency of an unrestrained multitude employed against the laws must be referred, and even the consequences which resulted from their example long after their death. Men of less talent, but greater profligacy, saw what might readily be accomplished by this unbounded power, and therefore employed it to carry into effect their plans of ambition, by destroying half the population of Italy. At last sanguinary and perpetual commotion sunk in tyranny and despotism. Adj. Grāechānus, a. um. et, Sēmprōnīus, a. um. Grāechānus leges, the laws of Grāechus, which conferred the power of judging in civil cases on the knights (Vel. Pat. ii. 13), a jurisdiction which the knights abused. Sēmprōnīa lex, enacted that before the annual election of the consuls, two provinces should be selected, one for each of these magistrates, on which account they were called Provincie Consulāres. With respect to the other provinces, the consuls might either settle them by agreement or by lot (Sal. Jug. 27). Sēmprōnīa rogātīōes (Tac. Ann. xii. 60).

C. Sēmprōnīus Lōngus, C. Sēmprōnī Lōngī, m. was appointed decemvir of religious rites, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xli. 21).

C. Sēmprōnīus Rūtīlus, C. Sēmprōnī Rūtīlī, m. a tribune of the people, who with P. Sēmprōnīus Grāechus commenced a prosecution against M'. Acilius Glabrio q. v., in the year 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 57).

C. Sémprónius Tuditānus, C. Sémpróni Tuditāni, m. was elected praetor, in 200 B. C., although he was then a plebeian edile. The north of Spain became his province, where he was wounded in battle by the natives, and died of his wounds. It appears that he had been a pontiff (Liv. xxxii. 27 seq.).—2. A consul in 191 B. C., who engaged the Iapydes, first unsuccessfully, and afterwards successfully. In the latter engagement, he owed much to the bravery of Decius Junius Brutus, the conqueror of Lusitania, Portugal (Liv. Ep. 59).

Cn. Sémprónius Blaesus, Cn. Sémpróni Blaesi, m. a lieutenant-general sent by the dictator Q. Fulvius, in 212 B. C., to take the command of the army in Etruria, in place of C. Calpurnius (Liv. xxvii. 6).

L. Sémprónius Atratinus, L. Sémpróni Atrātini, m. the consular colleague of L. Papius Mugillanus q. v., in 444 B. C. They were next year appointed censors, and were the first who held that office (Liv. iv. 7 seq.).

M. Sémprónius Rutilus, M. Sémpróni Rūtīli, m. an officer of Caesar, who had, with T. Labienus, the joint command of the two legions which that general ordered to march into the territories of the Sequani (Ces. B. G. vii. 90).

M. Sémprónius Tuditānus, M. Sémpróni Tuditāni, m. a Roman of high rank, who, at the taking of Carthago Nova, Carthage, in 212 B. C., supported the claim of Q. Trebellius to a mural crown, in preference to Sextus Digittus (Liv. xxvi. 48).—2. A tribune of the people, who, acting according to the direction of the senate, proposed to the people, and the people ordered, that money lent between Roman citizens and subjects of the allied states, should be regulated by the same laws, as when both parties were citizens of Rome. The usurers evaded the laws against usury, by transferring the bonds to the subjects of the allied states; but this law, which passed in 193 B. C., put an end to that practice. After being praetor in Sicily, Sicily, he, in 187 B. C., obtained the consulship, marched against the Apulian Ligures, ravaged their lands, burned their villages and forts, and opened their country as far as Mära, the Magro, and the harbour of Lina. The enemy posted themselves on the mountains, the ancient abode of their forefathers, from which they were dislodged and conquered. After an unsuccessful canvass for the censorship, he was elected a pontiff, and died during a pestilence, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 7 seq.).

P. Sémprónius, P. Sémpróni, m. a prefect of the allies, killed by the Gauls in 196 B. C., after a gallant resistance, in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 47).

P. Sémprónius Blaesus, P. Sémpróni Blaesi, m. a tribune of the people, who, in 193 B. C., opposed the triumph of the consul, P. Cornelius Scipio, for his conquest of the Boians, alleging that he ought first to subdue the Ligurians then in arms, because they uniformly assisted the Gauls. The senate prevailed on the tribune to desist from his opposition (Liv. xxxvi. 39 seq.).

P. Sémprónius Gracchus, P. Sémpróni Grāchi, m. a plebeian tribune who, with C. Sémprónius Rutilus, raised an action against

M'. Acilius Glabrio, in 191 B. C., maintaining, that he had neither exhibited in his triumph, nor lodged in the treasury, a considerable part of the royal treasure, and of the spoils taken in the camp of Antiochus, king of Syria (Liv. xxxvii. 57). See M'. Acilius Glabrio.

P. Sémprónius Longus, P. Sémpróni Lōngi, m. elected a praetor in 186 B. C., when the south of Spain fell to his lot as his province (Liv. xxxix. 32 seq.).

P. Sémprónius Sōphus, P. Sémpróni Sōphi, m. a tribune of the people in 310 B. C., who delivered a violent philippic against the censor Appius Claudius, whom he ordered to be seized and imprisoned. The obstinacy and dexterity of Claudius baffled every measure of the tribune, and he continued to retain his office in spite of his opponents, who were both numerous and powerful. In 305 B. C., Sémprónius was elected consul, when he and his colleague M. Sulpicius Saverrio took forty towns from the Æqui, and nearly extirpated the whole of that nation, for which they had the honour of a triumph. His next appointment was that of a plebeian pontiff, which was followed by his being elected a censor, with his consular colleague. In 298 B. C., he held the office of praetor, when the senate dreaded an attack from the Gauls (Liv. ix. 33 seq.).—2. Consul with Appius Claudius Crassus in 270 B. C. He divorced his wife, because she had presumed to go to the games without his knowledge (Val. Max. vi. 3).—3. Censor in 254 B. C. See M. Valerius Maximus.

P. Sémprónius Tuditānus, P. Sémpróni Tuditāni, m. a military tribune in the battle of Canna, where, from his future character, it may be inferred, he displayed considerable bravery. When all was over, he and a few soldiers instantly set out for one of the Roman camps, from which he advised the troops, although but half armed and without leaders, resolutely to fight their way through the enemy and join those who had fled, in similar circumstances, to the other camp. Drawing his sword, he formed into a wedge the soldiers who chose to follow him, and effected his escape, in spite of the Numidian cavalry. In 216 B. C., when curule edile, he was elected praetor. His success against the enemy secured his continuance in command, during three successive years. After holding the censorship, with M. Cōrnēlius Cēthēgus, his countrymen raised him and his colleague to the office of consul, in 206 B. C.; at that time he was absent in Greece, of which country he was proconsul. With Philippus, king of Macedonia, he formed a treaty on the following terms, that the Parthini, Dimallum, Bargulum, and Engonium should belong to the Romans; Atintaula with the approbation of the senate should be ceded to the Macedonian. On the part of Philippus, were included in the treaty Prusias, king of Bithynia, the Achæi, Bæoti, Thessali, Acarnanes, and Epirætes; on the part of the Romans, the Illynes, king Attalus, Pleuratus, Nabis, king of the Lacedæmonians, the Elei, Messenii, and Athenienses. The people ratified the peace, because they wished to be relieved from every other enemy, in order to turn their whole efforts against the Carthaginians. Sémprónius quitted the army, returned to Italy, and received the command of the troops against Hännibal, in Brüttius ager. In his military plans, anxiety for the destruction of the enemy, and love of martial fame, are more commendable, than either his caution, or regard for human life. After being defeated by Hännibal, P. Licinius Crassus, proconsul, joined him, when Roman bravery triumphed against the Carthaginian general, who lost upwards of four thousand men. Hännibal retreated, the consul then took several towns, others surrendered voluntarily. Before that victory, Sēmpronius vowed a temple to Förtuna Primigēna. His high reputation induced his countrymen to continue him in command after the expiry of his office, to which the nobility of his family might have contributed, as well as his immense riches. He was a man of very great eloquence, deeply skilled in the pontifical law, excelled in personal beauty and bodily strength, and appears to have obtained greater distinction than any Roman of that period. His last commission was on the conquest of Hännibal and the Carthaginians, to thank Ptōlēmaeus, king of Egypt, for his fidelity as an ally, and to request the same friendly disposition towards the Roman people, should they engage in war with Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia (Liv. xxii. 50 seq.).

Tib. Sēmpronius Grāchus, Tib. Sēmpronius Grāchi, m. was appointed master of the horse by M. Jūnius Pēra, in 218 B. C., whose orders he obeyed with the utmost strictness, refusing even to assist the garrison in Cāsīlinum, because the dictator forbade his engaging in battle. Hännibal intercepted the grain sent down the river in barrels, by the master of the horse, to alleviate the severity of the famine; he then threw nuts upon the river which were stopped by hurdles at Cāsīlinum, yet want of provisions forced the garrison to surrender. When master of the horse and curule edile, he was elected consul with L. Pōstūmus Albīnus q. v., in 217 B. C. At his suggestion, the senate agreed to defer the war against the Gauls for one year, and to direct their whole force against Hännibal. An army consisting of twenty thousand allies besides volunteer slaves, fell to his lot, which he drilled with great care, and procured a perfect harmony between the freedmen and the slaves. Informed by the Cūmāni that the Cāmpāni had, with treacherous intention, invited them to celebrate a festival at Hāmæ on particular nights, Sēmpronius surprised them, took thirty-four military standards, and killed two thousand men, among whom was Mārlus Alfius, their general. Hännibal, anxious to obtain possession of Cūmæ, followed the consul to that seaport, to which he laid siege, but the Roman commander defeated his attempts, on which he retired in disappointment to Tifūta. His valuable services continued him in command, which was distinguished by a remarkable victory over Hāno, for out of seventeen thousand foot and twelve thousand horse scarcely two thousand escaped. Sēmpronius then granted to the volunteer slaves liberty which he promised previously to the battle, should the enemy be defeated. Four thousand, who did not distinguish themselves in the action, and on that account had withdrawn from the rest, dreading their commander's displeasure, he bound by oath never to eat nor drink whilst in the army, except standing. In his second consulship he fought several inconsiderable battles among the Lūcāni, and took several inconsiderable towns. Next year retaining his command, he was ordered by the consul to march the troops to Bēnēvēntum, but a dreadful prodigy occurred at Lūcānia, whilst he was sacrificing, and the aruspices explained it to apply personally to himself. Flāvius, a Lucanian, previously a steady friend of the Romans, now entered into a treaty with Māgo, promising to deliver up Sēmpronius into his hand. By an artful speech, this traitor laid a snare for the Roman commander, into which he fell, when too late perceived the treachery, made a furious but vain attack on the Carthaginians, who deprived him of life, and sent his dead body to Hännibal. Of his death and interment there are different accounts. The manumitted slaves supposed themselves discharged after his death, on which account they immediately quitted their standards (Liv. xxii. 57 seq.).—2. Elected augur in 206 B. C., and died of the pestilence which caused a great mortality at Rome, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 38: xli. 21).—3. A prefect of the allies, who fell in an engagement with the Boians, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 36). See Cōrōlāmus.—4. An eminent Roman, distinguished before all the youth of his age for activity, was in the army of the consul L. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, in 192 B. C., and sent by him to sound the disposition of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, before he ventured to march from Amphīssa to Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, on his route against Antiōchus, king of Sŷria. On the third day he reached Pēlla, and brought back a favourable answer. Three years after, when tribune of the people, the trial of P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus, with whom he was at enmity, gave him an opportunity of displaying his moral integrity, by befriending that great man, whom he protected against the iniquitous procedure of his colleagues, for which he had the thanks of the senate. He was married to the younger daughter of Africānus. His interposition in behalf of L. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Asiāticus showed the same rectitude of principle, besides other instances which prove the strict regard of Sēmpronius to justice, and his uniform preference of the public good to private animosity. On being appointed praetor in 185 B. C., the north of Spain fell to his lot, where he carried on a successful war against the Celtiberians, whom he conquered, and the senate rewarded his services by decreeing him a triumph. The excellence of his plans, added to the bravery of the troops, secured him the victory in every contest. In Sārdīnia, the same success attended his arms during his consulship; the whole island fell under the dominion of the Romans, and he formed arrangements calculated to secure the benefit of his conquest, both by the tranquillity of the island and by contributing to the support of the Roman state. In the temple of mother Mātūta, he hung up a tablet commemorative of his victory, besides having engraved on it a map of Sārdīnia, and a representation of the battles which he fought in that island. He afterwards held the office of censor with C. Claudius Pūcher, and their severity excited violent resentment, which induced P. Rutilius, a tribune of the people, to proceed against them, and demand that C. Sulpicius Galba, praetor urbanus, should fix a day for their trial, which he did, and both were arraigned for treason. When sentence was partly passed against his colleague, Sémproniūs took a solemn oath, although the tribunes told him that he was in no danger, that if Claudius were condemned, he would voluntarily go with him into banishment. This declaration secured the acquittal of Claudius, as well as a final stop to further procedure. Sémproniūs built the Basilica which, from him, was called Sémproniā (Liv. xxxvii. 7 seq.).—5. Was the elder son of Tib. Sémproniūs Grāchus and Cōrnēlia, daughter of Scipio Africānus, a woman of extraordinary accomplishments, who devoted her attention to the education of her children, and procured for them the ablest instructors whom Greece could supply. Like his brother Caius, who was several years younger, he possessed great abilities, which he afterwards directed chiefly to the study of eloquence, and the constitution of the state. He embraced the interest of the commons against that of the nobles, a dictate of ambition, it may be inferred, rather than of judgment. This seems manifest from the unwarrantable length to which the Grāchi carried their innovations, which went to subvert the established usages, and the regular administration of government. In early life his character stood high, not only among the Romans, but also among foreign nations. He gained great reputation in Africa under his brother-in-law P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Africānus, Emiliānus Numāntinus, and afterwards under the consul Māncinus in the Numantian war. The enemy defeated the Romans, whom they surrounded, and refused to treat with the consul, preferring to him Grāchus, with whom they concluded a truce, by which twenty thousand Romans were preserved. The senate disapproved of the conditions, refused to ratify the treaty, and gave up the consul to the enemy, naked and in chains. That body not only excused Grāchus, who was the framer of the treaty, but also the other officers who had signed it; a proof either of the high respectability of Grāchus, or of the flagrant injustice of the senate. After this he attempted to put the Licinian law in force, which prohibited any one from having above five hundred acres of land, and sympathy for the oppressed Tuscans, whose lands the nobility had seized, appears to have induced him to take this step. Other reasons are mentioned; the advice of his teacher, Diophānes, and the persuasion of his mother, placards in the streets, and revenge at the senate's refusing to ratify his treaty with the Numāntini. The law passed, but not without a powerful opposition, and he, his brother, and father-in-law Appius Claudius, were appointed to divide the public lands among the people. To increase his popularity, he proposed that the money arising from the property of Attālus, king of Pergāmus, should be divided among the poor citizens who had obtained lands, to enable them to purchase cattle and requisite utensils; but Livius says that this money was to be given in place of lands, because there was not a sufficient quantity of ground to satisfy the people whose expectations he had raised.

On the same principle, he promulgated other laws equally offensive to the nobility. He now saw that his life was in danger, which he communicated to his friends who guarded his house during the night preceding the Cōmītia, and next day having heard that the people were met in the capitol, he went thither, and they received him with vociferous acclamations. Having been informed that the wealthy citizens had determined on his destruction, he mentioned it to those standing next him, who instantly seized on such implements as they could lay hold of, and prepared to defend him. Many having inquired the cause of this commotion, and his voice being drowned by the noise, he raised his hand to his head, to indicate that his life was in danger. His enemies immediately ran to the senatehouse, said he wished for a crown; on which his cousin P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Nāsica, the high priest, started to his feet, and said, "Let all who wish the safety of the state follow me." Many armed with sticks accompanied him to the capitol, dispersed all whom they met, and killed a considerable number. According to some, Tibērius was killed on the spot where he stood, according to others near the gate of the temple, and some maintain that as he fled he fell over one stretched on the ground, when P. Sātūrcius, one of his colleagues in the tribuneship, gave him the first blow on the head with the foot of a stool, and a second stroke from L. Rūfus deprived him of life, in 135 B. C. In that mob three hundred fell, and their carcasses were thrown into Tiber, the Tecere, without the rites of burial (Liv. Ep. 68). His brother Caius requested he might be allowed to bury him, but the senate prohibited him. The conduct of Nāsica has obtained the unqualified approbation of Cicero, an opinion fatal to the patriotism and right intentions of Grāchus. In this judgment of the orator, both Valērius Māximus and Vellēus Pātērculus join; and even Appiānus, who blames the senate, admits that Grāchus acted too violently. It is the common fault of all hasty politicians, to think that the end justifies the means. See C. Sémproniūs Grāchus. Adj. Grāchānus, a, um, et, Sémproniūs, a, um. Grāchānus tūmūltus (Val. Max. i. 1). Grāchāna seditio (Val. Max. vi. 2).—6. A Roman of questorian rank, who, for criminality with Jūlia, daughter of Augustus, was banished to the island Cercēna, where, after living for fourteen years, he was put to death by soldiers sent for that purpose (Tac. Ann. i. 53. Vel. Pat. ii. 100).

Tib. Sémproniūs Lōngus; Tib. Sémproniū Lōngi, m. a noble Roman, who obtained the consulship in 220 B. C., with P. Cōrnēlius Scipio, the father of Africānus. Sicily, Sicily, and Africa fell to his lot as a province. The senate appointed him a powerful force both by sea and land, with which he sailed for Sicily, and was met near the coast of that island with a fleet completely equipped, by Hiēro, king of Syracūse, who congratulated him on his arrival, and gave him valuable information respecting the plans of the Carthaginians. Before he reached Lilybæum, it had been taken by the praetor M. Emilius, on which account he steered immediately for Mēlita, Malta, took possession of the island, and returned to Lilybæum, Cape Boeo, where he sold the prisoners taken both by himself and Æmilius, with the exception of the nobles. After he had made arrangements for the defence of the Italian and Sicilian coasts, in obedience to the order of the senate, he sailed to Rhinus, where he joined his colleague sick of the wounds received in the first engagement with Hannibal in Italy. A stranger to the general with whom he had to contend, flushed with his success at Malta, and naturally of a violent temper, he engaged that noble Carthaginian in opposition to the remonstrance of his colleague, and seems rather to have gained the victory. Despising the counsel of Cœnilius, he rashly led on his forces a second time against Hannibal, by whom he was completely defeated. Want of success neither sunk his spirits nor impressed his mind with an idea of Hannibal's superiority to himself, or of the inferiority of his troops to those of Carthage. He resolutely met his enemy again in the field, when the loss on both sides appears to have been nearly equal. Over Hanno at Grumentum, Saponara, in Lucania, he gained a considerable victory, killing two thousand of the enemy, and taking forty-one military standards. His own loss did not amount to three hundred men (Liv. xxi. 6—xxiii. 37). To him Eutropius refers (iii. 8 seq.), but by mistake calls him Gracchus instead of Longus. This error is found in the best editions of that author. Tacitus informs us, that Crēmōna was founded during the consulship of Sēmprōnīus (Hist. iii. 34).—2. Was elected a tribune of the people in 202 B. C., and opposed L. Cœnilius Lēntulus entering the city in ovation, on his return from Spain; although, in the opinion of the senate, he deserved a triumph, which, however, could not be conferred, since he was neither dictator, consul, nor prætor. Sēmprōnīus maintained, that an ovation was as unprecedented in this case as a triumph, yet at the unanimous request of the senate, he withdrew his opposition, and Cœnilius enjoyed the honour which the senate conceded. After being a curule edile and a triumvir for planting colonies at the mouths of the rivers Vultūrnus, the Volturno, and Litērnus, the Pescara, at Puteoli, and Buxētum, PolICASTRO, he was elected prætor, and obtained Sardinia for his province, which was continued to him next year. In 196 B. C. he obtained the consulship, when the senate decreed Italy a province to him and his colleague P. Cœnilius Scipio Africānus. The Boii, against whom he marched, attacked him before the arrival of the other consul, but were defeated after a very obstinate engagement. Next year he assisted L. Cœnilius Mērius in overpowering the Boii at Mutina, Modena, which was the last military action of any note, in which he bore a distinguished part. We find him among the candidates who contested keenly for the censorship in 186 B. C., when M. Porcius Cato and L. Valerius Flaccus obtained that office (Liv. xxxi. 20 seq.).—3. Son of Tibērius, appointed an augur in room of Otacilius Crassus in 212 B. C., and also a dēcēvir for directing religious rites, in room of Tib. Sēmprōnīus Longus, son of Caius, who died this year. This Sēmprōnīus died of an epidemic, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 6 seq.).—4. An officer in the army of the consul Acilius in 193

B. C., who commanded the troops which made an attack on part of the suburbs of Hircia, at the foot of Mount Ceta (Liv. xxxi. 22).

Tib. Sēmprōnīus Mūsca, Tib. Sēmprōnīus Mūsca, m. one of the five commissioners sent to examine and fix the boundaries, respecting which the inhabitants of Pisa and Lūna complained to the Roman senate, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 13).

T. Sēmprōnīus Rūtīlī, T. Sēmprōnīus Rūtīlī, m. married Dūrōnia, and destroyed the property of her son Æbūtius by her former husband, on which account, both he and his wife attempted to get rid of the youth by initiating him into the rites of Bacchus. The harsh treatment, which he received from his stepfather, because he refused compliance with his wishes, induced him to discover to the consul these iniquitous rites, of which he had received an account from Hecuba Fecēnia q. v., in the year 188 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 9—11).

Sēna, æ, f. v. Sēna Gāllica, Sinigaglia, a maritime town of Umbria, a district of Italy, near Æsis, Jesi. Thither the Romans sent a colony in 291 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 11), and Pōmpēius, having here defeated Mārius, plundered it.—2. An inland town of Etruria, Tuscany. Inh. Sēnēnses, ium, m. Adj. Sēnēnsis, is, e. Sēnēnsis cōlōnia (Tac. Hist. iv. 45).—3. Sain, a small island on the coast of France, near Uxāntes, Uxant, which, in ancient times, priestesses inhabited.—4. The Sesano, a river of Italy, which runs into the Gulf of Venice, near Sēna Gāllica, Sinigaglia. It had its name from the Sēnōnes Gālī (Luc. Phar. ii. 407 seq.).

Sēnātus, ūs, e. i. m. the Senate, or chief council of the Roman State. This institution, so celebrated in ancient history, owed its establishment to Rōmūlus, who is generally considered the founder and first king of Rome. To assist him in framing a code of laws, by which his subjects might be governed, and to act as his counsellors in all matters of importance, he chose 100 of the principal citizens, who, on account of their age, were called Sēnātōres, and from their paternal care of the state, or from their authority, Pātres. After the admission of the Sabines to the rights and privileges of Roman citizens, Rōmūlus, it has been supposed, incorporated 100 of the nobility of that nation, with the senate. This addition would have rendered the number of the senators, 200, which is in direct opposition to the authority of Livius, who maintains, that the original appointment continued without alteration until Tullius Hostilius increased it to 300 after the destruction of Alba Lōnga, 665 B. C. In the reign of Tārquīnius Priscus, the senate consisted of 300 members, which remained unaltered for a long period of time. After the expulsion of Tārquīnius Sūpērbus, 164 new senators were chosen to supply the places of those who had fallen victims to the cruelty of that tyrant. These newly-elected senators were, at first, called Cōscripti, to distinguish them from the old senators, Pātres, among whom they had been enrolled. But this distinction was not long observed, and Pātres Cōscripti, instead of Pātres et Cōscripti, soon became a common appellation of the whole senate. Sūlla, to gratify his abettors in oppression and murder, admitted many new members, and thereby increased the senate to about 400. From this period, the dignity of that venerable body began to decline. During the civil wars, characters the most abandoned and infamous were raised to senatorian dignity. Whilst Jūlius Cæsar tyrannised over the state, the senators were not fewer than 900; and in the early part of the reign of Augustus, they may be estimated at 1000. The object of this prince was to lessen the power of the senate; and with that view he reduced its members to 300; but this diminution giving rise to well-founded complaints among the nobility, and of course tending to render him unpopular, he agreed to fix the number at 600. Of how many members the senate consisted under the succeeding emperors, history gives no precise information. In the early ages of the Roman state, the senate was composed of men distinguished either for their skill and bravery in war, or for their knowledge and ingenuity in the arts of peace. Its members were originally chosen by the kings, and, after their expulsion, by the consuls, who possessed that privilege, till it was transferred, after the lapse of some years, to the censors, who, from their office, were better qualified to elect men most deserving of a seat in that august assembly. Senators were sometimes, though rarely, elected by an assembly of the people; and, only in one instance, after the battle of Cannæ, a Dictator was appointed to fill up the places of those who had fallen in that memorable engagement. In the early ages of the Roman State, Patricians only were admitted into the senate; but afterwards both Equites and Plebeians were allowed to aspire at that honour. At what age the laws permitted a man to be elected a senator seems uncertain. Those chosen by Rōmulus were, in general, as the name imports, old men. To this, however, his successors seem to have paid little attention; for Roman history affords instances of men being appointed members of the senate, before they had attained their 25th year. The offices which procured admission into the senate, were those of Quæstor, Edile, Prætor, and Consul. In the first ages of the state, the Romans boasted of their poverty; and indigence did not exclude merit from a seat in the senate. But when war had enriched the citizens, and luxury began to prevail, a law was passed, prohibiting every person from that honour, whose fortune was under 800,000 Sestertia, which, taking the Sestertius at one penny three farthings and three-fourths of a farthing, are equal to L.6458:6:8 sterling. During the republic, senators were not allowed to exercise any trade, nor to add to their wealth by merchandise. Augustus passed a law, ordaining the fortune of a senator to be not less than 1200 H. S.; and to those who were at that time in the senate, and not in the possession of that sum, he supplied the deficiency. The censors had the power to degrade a senator, if his fortune had fallen below the legal sum, or, on his being convicted of any thing flagitious or immoral; the disgrace was intimated by omitting his name (præterire), in reading over the list. This, however, seldom happened; and future good behaviour entitled him to be again restored to the senate. Senators enjoyed many particular marks of honourable distinction. They wore the Tunica Laticlavia, or waistcoat with a broad stripe of purple sewed to it in the front, and a kind of half-boots or buskin, ornamented on the forepart of the foot with a silver crescent or buckle in the form of a C. At solemn festivals, they wore the Prætæxta, and they alone had a right to feast publicly in the capitol. At all public spectacles, a particular place, called orchæstra, was allotted for them, on which they sat in curule chairs. At the games, the senators for 550 years, mixed with the people, and had not a separate place assigned to them, until A. Attilius Serranus and L. Scribonius, the ediles, following out the idea of the elder Africinus, made this invidious distinction, which greatly lessened the popularity of that noble Roman (Val. Max. ii. 4). Whenever business of any kind rendered travelling necessary, their expenses were defrayed out of the public treasury; and provisions for themselves and their attendants were always ready prepared on the road, by the time they were expected to pass. The latter privilege was, in general, termed a free legation. While Rome was governed by kings, the right of convoking the senate belonged solely to them; but, after their expulsion, to the consuls, dictator, master of the horse, military tribunes, and tribunes of the people; A. Gellius says, to the dictator, the consul, prætors, tribunes of the people, the interrex, and the præfect of the city (xiv. 7). Its members were anciently summoned by a public officer, called viator, because he called the senators from the country; in cases requiring despatch, by a public crier, or herald; and, in later times, by an edict published some days before, appointing the time and place of meeting. If a senator did not attend, and could not give a sufficient excuse for his absence, he was fined, unless above the age of 65, when attendance became voluntary. Except on those days in which the Cōmitia were held, ordinary meetings of the senate were on the Kalends, Nones, and Ides of every month, which was called Senatus Legitimus. When summoned for the despatch of any business on other days than those above-mentioned, the phrase was Senatus indictus. On particular occasions, the senate met in the open air; but most commonly in temples or places consecrated by the Augurs, that their deliberations might be rendered more dignified and solemn. When audience was given to foreign ambassadors, especially to those of enemies, or to their own generals, who claimed the honour of a triumph, or consulted on any other subject, because being invested with military command, the laws did not allow them to enter the city, the senate assembled without the walls, in the temple either of Apollo, or Bellona. The seats of the senators are supposed to have been benches of a long form, probably varying in length according to the number which they were designed to hold. The consuls sat in the first row; then, the other magistrates, according to their superiority; and last of all, the senators, who, at the time, held no office in the state. It was necessary for the magistrate who had called the meeting, to offer a sacrifice, and take the auspices before he entered the house, at which time, all the senators, out of respect, rose up. If the auspices proved unfavourable, or had not been properly taken, the senate was adjourned till another day. No business could be brought before the senate, without the permission of the consuls, except by the tribunes of the people, who, by interposing their negative (veto), could not only stop the debates, but prevent any motion from being carried into a decree, Sēnātūs cōnsultum, v. dēcrētum. The senators were originally called upon to deliver their opinions, according to their seniority; but, after the institution of the censorship, the Princeps Sēnātūs, or he whose name stood at the top of the censor's list, was first consulted, and, after him, those of consular dignity, each, in his respective order. In the time of Cicero, the consuls elect enjoyed this precedence; and in that of Caesar, the consul had a power to confer the honour of speaking first, for a year, on any person he pleased. The senators delivered their opinions standing, and, in general, though not always, addressed themselves to the whole house, by the title of Pātres Cōscripti. Every member possessed the privilege of speaking as long as he pleased. It is not therefore wonderful that individuals, having a particular interest to serve, or favourite object in view, often protracted their speeches beyond the tenth hour (see Hōra), after which no new reference could be made; nor could a decree be passed after sunset. When unnecessary prolixity, or irrelevant discussion had exhausted the patience of the senators, they drowned the voice of the speaker by their noise, and other marks of disapprobation, which generally compelled him to silence. Julius Caesar, when consul, ordered M. Pōrcius Cato to be taken to prison, because he would not stop speaking; the whole senate followed the patriot to prison, and to avoid the odium and hatred excited by this procedure, Caesar revoked his order (Gel. iv. 10). When the debate was continued to another day, the senators were not permitted to mention the subject. See Pāpirius (Gel. i. 23). If different opinions had been advanced and seconded, the consul, or presiding magistrate, put the original motion to the vote. The house then divided, each party retiring to a different side. This mode of proceeding was called, Peditibus in alterius sententiam ire, and the senators Pēdārī. According to some authors, the senators were called Pēdārī, who, not having borne any curule office, went on foot to the senate-house; but there is no doubt that originally Pēdārī Sēnātōres had the right of voting, but not of speaking, hence their name, and the expression, Caput sine lingua pēdaria sententia est (Gel. iii. 18). After the division the numbers were counted, and of the party which was greatest the consul said, Hæc pars major esse videtur. On the matter being finally determined, a Sēnātūs cōnsultum was drawn up, and signed by the principal members; but if 400, whom it required to constitute a quorum in the days of Augustus, were not present, or the decision not ratified by the tribunes, it was called Sēnātūs auctoritas, which was not valid, unless it passed into a consultum, v. dēcrētum, to which the tribunes added the letter T. The decrees of the senate were rarely reversed. Every one was at liberty to express his dissent, when they were under debate (re integrā); but on being determined, it was the interest, as well as duty, of every member to acquiesce in the opinion of the majority, and to support the law of the state. When the business was finished, the president dismissed the senate, and the decrees passed were carried to Tābulārīum, where the public registers were kept. They were sometimes engraved on tables of brass; and on particular occasions, they were inscribed in golden letters on columns of silver. Of the former kind several still remain. The government of the state might be said to be almost wholly vested in the senators. They were the guardians of religion, and the interpreters of the laws. They distributed the public money at pleasure, settled the provinces, nominated their ambassadors, appointed thanksgivings, could decree the title of king to any prince, and postpone assemblies at the people. It was their duty to inquire into public crimes and acts of treason, and to see that justice was properly administered. Their jurisdiction, except in creating magistrates, scarcely knew any bounds. Their power was remarkably conspicuous in civil dissensions, or in dangerous conjunctures, when they had recourse to that solemn decree, called Ultimū, v. Extrēmum, Ut consules dūrent opēram, ne quid detrimenti respublica caperet, by which the consuls were invested with absolute power. The power of the senate appears to have been inferior to that of the people, since they sometimes applied to that body, to compel the consuls who refused to act agreeably to their wish, as in the case of C. Jūlius Mēto and T. Quinctius Cincinnātus, 481 B. C. (Liv. iv. 26), and tribunes with consular power, as in the case of C. Jūlius Iūlus and P. Cōnellus Cōssus, in 407 B. C. (Liv. iv. 56). C. Jūlius Cæsar ordered the acts both of the senate and people to be daily committed to writing and published. His successor did not follow the precedent which Cæsar had the merit of establishing; but kept the proceedings of the senate as secret as possible, in which Tiberius followed him. The latter appointed a senator to perform that duty, whom he instructed what to insert and what to omit. Had every matter which came before the senate been recorded, the Register would form what we call the Journals of the House. The Pōntifex Māximus recorded the transactions of each year, and kept the book in his own house for the inspection of the people (Cic. Orat. ii. 13). Out of this register four grew at a future period; first, the acts of the emperor; second, the acts of the senate; third, of the people; fourth, games, spectacles, marriages, births, deaths, and daily occurrences of the city, called Diārna, which last was sent to the provinces (Tac. Ann. v. 4). The majesty of the senate rose and sank with the liberties of Rome. During the tranquil period of the republic, it was certainly one of the most venerable assemblies recorded in history. Increase of wealth produced luxury, and the patriotic Roman was lost in the sensual voluptuary. To gratify a desire of splendour and of unbounded profusion, recourse was too often had to means equally repugnant to love of country, and to regard for morality. Dignity of character disappeared in sordid selfishness, votes became venal, and the will of a tyrant, the only rule of decision. Cæsar's success on the plains of Pharsalia, opened the door of the senate to the meanest and most worthless of the people, nor from that period did the stern patriot, or virtuous citizen covet a seat in what was once the supreme Council of the nation. It continued to languish under the emperors, until finally abolished by Justinian, in the sixth century. Sēnātor, ōris, m. a senator, a member of the senate. Auctōritas Sēnātūs, the judgment of the senate, not ratified by the sanction of the tribunes. Sēnātūs cōsultum, v. dēcrētum, a decree of the senate. Adj. Sēnātorius, a, um, of or belonging to a senator; senatorian.

Sēnēca. See Annaeus.

Sēnēctius, i, m. a tribune of the nation of the Nērvii, who, with Anēctius, of the same rank and nation, made a brave resistance at the head of the German nations on the east of the Rhine, against D. Claudius Drusus, in 12 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 139).

Sēnōnes, um, m. a powerful and warlike nation of Gāllia Cēltica, who lived on Sēquāna, the Seine, about 70 miles above Paris. Their capital afterwards had their own name, now Sens. Minōres Sēnōnum, the posterity of the Sēnōnes (Juv. Sat. viii. 234). Et Sēnōnum fūrtas Lātīa sūmpsērē cohortes, and the Latin troops were seized with the madness of the Sēnōnes, i. e. of the Sēnōnes Gālli, when they burned Rome, and attempted the destruction of the capitol (Stat. Syl. v. 3. 198). Florus describes the Sēnōnes Gālli as men of prodigious size, with corresponding armour, of ferocious manners, seemingly born for the extirpation of mankind, and the destruction of cities (i. 13).—2. A people in Umbrīa, descendants from those in Gāllia, France (Liv. v. 34, 35).

Sēntinum, i, n. Sēntina, a town of Umbrīa. Inh. Sēntinātes, ium, m. Adj. Sēntīnas, as, as; ātis. Sēntīnas ager (Liv. x. 30).

Sēntius Sātūrninus Vētūlio, Sēntii Sātūrnini Vētūliōnis, m. by resolutely assuming the badges of the praetorship, after he had heard his name was on the list of the proscribed, effected his escape to Sicily, Sicily (Val. Max. vii. 3). Appianus relates the same story of one Pōmpōnius.

C. Sēntius, C. Sēntii, m. a Roman praetor, who was unsuccessful against the Thracians, in 95 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 70).

C. Sēntius Sātūrninus, C. Sēntii Sātūrnini, m. held the office of consul in the year 4, with Sextus Aelius Cāto (Vel. Pat. ii. 103). He was a man of some distinction.

Cn. Sēntius, Cn. Sēntii, m. succeeded to the government of Syria, on the death of Gērmānicus, in the year 19. The first act of the new governor was to send to Rome Mārtina, a woman notorious for dealing in poisons, and a peculiar favourite of Plāncina. His activity and bravery thwarted the plans of Cn. Cālpurnius Piso, the murderer of Gērmānicus, who attempted to disturb the province by corrupting the army, and having taken possession of Celendris, Sēntius compelled him to surrender at discretion. He afterwards allowed him to return to Rome, when he might have put him to death, or imprisoned him for life, in the year 19 (Tac. Ann. ii. 74—81).

Cn. Sēntius Sātūrninus, Cn. Sēntii Sātūrnini, m. a Roman general, who, with A. Plautius, conquered Britain in the year 43, and exhibited a splendid triumphal procession on their return to Rome, in consequence of their victory. Eutrōpius calls him Cn. Sēntius (vii. 13).

Sēpia, ae, f. a town of Argōlis (Herod. vi. 77).

Sēpiās, ādis, f. the Cape of St. George, a promontory of Māgnēsia (Val. Flacc. ii. 9). Near this promontory more than 1200 of the ships of Xēxes, which contained much treasure and thousands of men, were wrecked.

Sēpius Lesius, Sēpii Lesii, m. a Capuan of obscure birth and of small property, was the last who held the office of Mēdixtricius, in 213 B. C. He had little influence with his fellow-citizens, and his being despised by the nobles, probably contributed to the surrender of Cāpua to the Romans sooner than it would otherwise have done (Liv. xxvi. 6).

Sēptēmozōdium, i, n. a place in Rome, where M. Aurēlius built Nymphaeum (Amm. Mar. xv. 7).

Sēpticiānus, i, m. a man whom Mārtiālis blames, for having turned over his book without reading it (xi. 108).

Sēptimius, i, m. a native of Cāmērinum, Camerino, a town of Umbrīa, who joined in the conspiracy of Cātūlina, and was sent by that traitor to Picēnum, to adopt every measure which he might judge necessary for the success of the plot (Sal. Cat. 27).—2. A man deficient both in judgment and utterance (Sal. Frag.).—3. A Roman, captivated with the charms of Acēmē. Cātūllus has sung their loves (xlv).—4. A Roman centurion, killed in a revolt of the army on the lower Rhine, in the year 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 32).

Sēptimius Sēvērus, Sēptimii Sēvēri, m. a noble Roman, whom Stātiū commends for his uniting integrity with eloquence, and the love of peace. If the poet has not carried his praises beyond the truth, Sēptimius must have been a very amiable and respectable character (Syl. iv. 5. 3).

L. Sēptimius, L. Sēptimii, m. a tribune of the soldiers, sent along with Achillas, by Ptōlēmæus, king of Egypt, to murder Pompey, in whose army, during the war against the pirates, he had been a centurion (Caes. B. C. iii. 104). (See Pōmpēius). Lūcānus mentions him as one of the body guards of the Egyptian king; and describes him as a character suited for the execution of such an iniquitous purpose (Phar. viii. 597).

L. Sēptimius Sēvērus, L. Sēptimii Sēvēri, m. son of M. Sēptimius Gēta, was born at Lēptis, Lebeda, a town of Africa, between the Sýrtes, in the year 146. He was the only African who obtained the Roman purple. His father was of equestrian rank, and his uncles Agrippa and Sēptimius Sēvērus held the office of consul. After an excellent education, and acquiring a thorough knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages, he went to Rome at the age of eighteen, when the emperor M. Aurēlius nominated him a senator. Restrained by no moral principle, he passed his youth in licentiousness and criminality. His vices, however, did not prevent him from obtaining from the same emperor the offices of quæstor, tribune of the people, and praetor. The duties of these appointments he performed with diligence and fidelity, which, afterwards, secured to him the post of lieutenant-general under the pro-consul of Africa. By art and intrigue, he obtained the consulship, with the command of the troops employed to protect the banks of the Danube in Pannonia. The favour of these soldiers raised him to the imperial throne, a dignity which he had long in view. They advised him to avenge the death of Pertinax, and to dethrone Didius Julianus, which he immediately attempted, without allowing the zeal of the troops to abate, or time for considering the formidable obstacles which lay in the way. In quickness of apprehension, and in rapidity of execution, S  verus had few equals, and he increased the ardour of his troops, by setting them the example in bearing fatigue, cold, hunger, and every hardship. Didius Julianus, who had formerly saved his life in a criminal prosecution, yielded to him in all the qualities of a soldier and a politician. The praetorian cohort acting with their usual infidelity, and the senators with their usual adulation, the usual consequence ensued; the reigning monarch was killed, and his more powerful opponent declared emperor. After taking the usual oaths, and securing the co-operation of Albinus, who commanded in Britain, he set out to attack Pescennius Niger, who had been proclaimed emperor in the east, and in the first engagement obtained a decisive victory, on which the senate declared Niger a public enemy. Indulging his natural cruelty, S  verus banished the wife and children of Niger, whom he afterwards murdered, confiscated the estates of all who joined with his enemy, and put to death the senators who had served under his rival. He advanced into M  sopotamia, took possession of Nisibis, Nisibin, which he secured by a Roman garrison, and after a siege of three years carried Byzantium, Constantinople. This city he nearly destroyed, and made it subject to Perinthus. On his return from the east, he formed the design of cutting off Albinus, which he soon accomplished, and called his own son Caesar, changing his name into M. Aurelius Antoninus, better known by that of Caracalla. No rival now kept him in apprehension, he therefore gave full vent to his natural inclination, massacred the wife and children of Albinus, all the friends of that officer, and, according to some authors, forty-one senators, whose property he confiscated. Britain had formerly been under one government, but he then divided it into two. Intending to make war in the east, he had the merit of charging the exchequer with all the couriers despatched, not only to that quarter of the world, but also into the other states, which eased the provinces of a very heavy burden. The success of his arms in Arabia was tarnished by his cruelty even to his own officers and friends. After visiting Egypt, he returned to Rome in the year 203 or 204, where he declined the honour of a triumph, from the delicate state of his health. His war with the Jews scarcely deserves notice, but his severity against the Christians, which formed the fifth persecution, merits particular attention, both for the length of time which it continued, and for the extreme barbarity with which his edict was executed. The Britons, taking advantage of the emperor's absence in the east, compelled L  pus, the governor of their island, to purchase peace from them on very exorbitant terms. At the head of the army, by great labour and continued exertion, S  verus compelled the natives to retire to the north of the isthmus between the Firths of Forth and Clyde, on which, in the year 209, he erected a wall now wholly destroyed, from him called the wall of S  verus, but in Scotland it had the name of Graham's dyke. The dominion of the Romans never extended farther north than this line, and the conquest of the southern part of Scotland had cost him fifty thousand men. From the success of his arms, he had the title of Britannicus Maximus, and each of his two sons that of Britannicus. The contention of his sons, and the frequent attempts of Caracalla to deprive him of life, rendered his latter years completely miserable. He died at Eboracum, York, in the year 209, leaving the kingdom to be possessed equally by his two sons. He excelled in activity, which did not leave him even in his last moments, and in the administration of justice he acted impartially, besides enacting many good laws for the reformation of morals. S  verus was a great prince rather than a great warrior, and when we add deceit, avarice, and cruelty to his character, we complete the picture. In ordinary conversation he spoke the Pauis, which was his native language; but he employed the Latin in recording the principal events of his own reign.

T. S  ptimius, T. S  ptimii, m. a Roman knight, an intimate friend of Horatius, with whom he had been in the army of Brutus, and who, like himself, not only obtained the pardon but friendship of Augustus. He is said to have been both a lyric and tragic poet. Horatius addresses an ode to this author (ii. 6), whom he recommends to Tibullus Claudius Nero, with great delicacy and art, showing not only his knowledge of human nature, but of high life, which can only be obtained by intimacy with the noble and the polite (Epis. i. 9).

L. S  ptimicius, L. S  ptimici, m. a Roman, who cut off the head of C. Senonius Gracchus, extracted the brain, and filled up the cavity with lead, to make it weigh heavy, because the consul L. Opimius had promised to give its weight in gold to the person who should bring it to him (Val. Max. ix. 4).

S  ptizonium, i. n. a building at Rome, of a particular kind, which, in the end, consisted of seven piles or erections, one above another. In the time of Suetonius, there was only one; but, from Ammianus, the number must afterwards have increased (Suet. Tit. 1).

S  quana, m. f. the Seine, a river of Gallia, France, has its source in the province of Burgundy, runs in a N. W. direction, and falls into that part of the Atlantic Ocean, called Fr  tum Britannicum, the British Channel, at Havre de Grace. The course of this beautiful and picturesque river extends to 250 miles. Paris, the capital of France, originally a fort on a small island in the Seine, above 120 miles from the sea, now stands on both sides of this river, over which there are, in that city, 12 bridges (Ces. B. G. i. 1).

S  quana, m. f. a district of Gallia, France, bounded on the E. by Mons Jura, Mount Jura, which separated it from the country of the Helvetii, now Switzerland, on the N.

by Mount Vögēsus, Fange, which divided it from that of the Lēūci; on the W. by the country of the Ædūi and Lingōnes; and on the S. by that of the Ambārri and Allōbrōges. Divitiācus asserted to C. Julius Caesar, that the territory of the Sēquāni, in richness of soil, surpassed the whole of Gālīa (Cæs. B. G. i. 31). Inh. Sēquāni, orum (Sing. Sēquānus, i), m. the Sequans, or Sequanians, headed one of the factions of the Gallic states, and the Ædūi the other. The Sēquāni having long been inferior to the Ædūi, prevailed on Ariovistus to espouse their interest. By his assistance, they defeated their rivals in several battles, put all their nobility to death, deprived them of a part of their territory, and obliged them not only to give hostages, but also publicly to swear, they would not adopt any measures against the Sēquāni. Caesar, on his arrival in France, restored the Ædūi to their former ascendancy over the states of that country. According to Eutrōpius, the Sēquāni were first called Hēvētū (vi. 17). Adj. Sēquānus, et, Sēquānicus, a, um. Sēquānus ager, the territory of the Sēquāni. Sēquāna gēns (Luc. Phar. i. 425). Sēquānica textrix (Mart. iv. 19). It appears from the poet, that the cloth of which the Endrōmis was made, was woven by the Sequan women (ib.).

Sērāpiō, ōnis, m. an Egyptian who had been ambassador at Rome, was sent by Ptolēmaeus with a message to Achīllas, when he was marching the king's forces against C. Julius Caesar, then in Alexāndria. Diōscōrides was joined in the commission with him. Achīllas refused them a hearing, put Sērāpiō to death, and allowed the attendants of Diōscōrides to carry him off, supposing that he was mortally wounded (Cæs. B. C. iii. 109).

Sērāpis, Idīs, v. is, m. an Egyptian god, whose introduction into the Roman calendar took place under Antoninus Pius. The most ancient temple of this deity was at Mēmphīs, that at Alexāndria was more magnificent (Plin. i. 18). The lewdness of his worship outraged even Roman ideas of propriety at that period, and obliged the senate to abolish the mysteries of that obscene object of heathen idolatry. From Tacitus we learn, that Ptolēmaeus, king of Egypt, warned in a dream by a youth of graceful mien, and of a size beyond the human form, sent trusty friends to bring this god from Sinōpē, one of the most celebrated cities in Pōntus, to Egypt, and his ambassadors at last, after many presents and urgent importunity for three years, succeeded in obtaining the statue for which that monarch built a temple at Rhacōtis q. v. (Tac. Hist. iv. 81—84). Sērāpēum, v. Sērāpiūm, i. n. a temple of Sērāpis at Rome, built by the emperor Dōmītiānus (Eutrop. vii. 23).

Sērbōnis, Idīs, f. Sabaki Bardail, or the Lake of Baudoin, a lake in Egypt, which forms the boundary of that country on the east (Herod. ii. 6).

Sērdica, v. f. Sophia, the capital of Bulgaria in European Turkey (Amm. Mar. xvi. 8).

Sērēna, v. f. daughter of Hōnōrius, brother of Thēōdōsius the Great, whom the emperor adopted, and gave in marriage to Stilicho. Claudianus writes a poem in praise of this princess (xxix).

Sērēndivī, orum, m. an Indian nation, supposed, by some, to have been the inhabitants of Tāprōbānē, Ceylon (Amm. Mar. xxii. 7).

Sēres, um (Sing. Ser, ēris), v. Sērē, arum, m. an inland people on the east of Asia, supposed to have inhabited part of Eastern Tury, north of the Great desert, and extended to the northwest extremity of China. Their chief town was Sēra. Virgilius represents them gathering from leaves a substance which he calls cellera, of which they made cloth, which is generally understood to have been silk, but some, with more propriety, have supposed it to be cotton. If it was the production of a tree, according to the opinion of Virgilius, the latter supposition is the truth, but the mistake may have originated in the ignorance of the ancients respecting the silkworm, and the manner in which silk is produced. Pausānias understood the cloth to be silk, not cotton. His account of the silkworm is quite fabulous (vi. 26). It is probable that, in ancient, as well as in modern times, both cotton and silk cloths were fabricated in the eastern parts of Asia, and brought to Europe both by land and water carriage. Adj. Sēricus, a, um, of the Sēres, also of silk, silken. Sērica rēgiō, the country of the Sēres. Sērici pūllillī, silken pillows, softest or finest pillows (Hor. Epod. viii. 15). Sērica vēstis, cotton or silk apparel; the expression is generally understood to denote the first, although many are of opinion, that it meant the second (Tac. Ann. ii. 33). This kind of cloth appears to have been extremely thin, and worn by immodest women (Seneca de Beneficiis vii. 9). Sēricātus, a, um, applied to persons dressed in silk or fine cloth (Suet. Cal. 52).

Sērēstus, i, m. a Trojan chief, whom Ænēas appointed joint commander of the forces with Mnēsthēus, when he went to solicit auxiliaries from Evānder, and also in the event of his own death. He was a man of bravery, and distinguished himself by his strength and ardour. He was one of the party who went to Carthage to beg assistance from Elissa, after the Trojans had been driven on the African shore by the storm, which Æolus raised for their destruction at the request of Jūno (Virg. Æn. i. 611 seq.).

Sērgēstus, i, m. one of the Trojan chiefs, who accompanied Ænēas into Italy, and was an unsuccessful competitor for the naval prize. He sailed the ship Centaurus. From him the gēns Sērgia pretended to derive their origin (Virg. Æn. v. 121—203).

Sērgia, v. f. an infamous dealer in poison, who, with other women, had cut off many of the principal men in the Roman state in 331 B. C. (Liv. viii. 18). See Cornēlia.

Sērgius, a, um. Sērgia domus, the house, or clan, of the Sērgii, who traced their origin from Sērgēstus, one of the companions of Ænēas (Virg. Æn. v. 121). Sērgiōlus, i, m. a diminutive used by Juvēnalis, according to some authors, in contempt; but others, with more propriety, consider it as an epithet of endearment (Sat. vi. 105).

C. Sērgius, C. Sērgii, m. a Roman who was thrice elected a tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority (Liv. vi. 5—27).

C. Sērgius Orāta, C. Sērgii Orātrē, m. the first who formed hanging baths at Rome (Val. Max. ix. 1). Of his surname different derivations have been given.

Cn. Sērgius Plāncus, Cn. Sērgii Plānci, m. was praetor in 202 B. C., when the jurisdiction of the city fell to his lot. His authority was continued to him during the following year (Liv. xxxi. 4 seq.).

Cn. Sērgius Silus, Cn. Sērgii Sili, m. a Roman brought to trial by Mētellus Celer, and condemned for promising money to a matron, on expectations which he did not fulfil (Val. Max. vi. 8).

L. Sērgius, L. Sērgii, m. one of the three ambassadors whom the Romans sent with a golden bowl, as an offering to Apōllo at Delphi, Castris, in 393 B. C. (Liv. v. 23). See A. Mānlius.—2. One of three ambassadors sent to Carthage in 205 B. C., who narrowly escaped violence from the populace, but the Magistrates protected him (Liv. xxx. 25).

L. Sērgius Cātīlina, L. Sērgii Cātīlinæ, m. a noble Roman of patrician rank, appears to have been born in poverty, which accounts for the names of his parents not being transmitted. The cruelty of his dispositions, his undaunted resolution, and depravity of morals, fitted him for acting a distinguished part in the turbulent and bloody period in which he lived. He embraced the interest of Sūlla, in whose army he held the office of quæstor. That monster in his victory had in Cātīlina an able coadjutor, whose heart knew no sympathy, and his lewdness no bounds. He rejoiced in the carnage and plunder of the proscribed, and avenged some previous wrongs by butchering the citizens with his own hand. In the civil war, he caused the death of his own brother, and afterwards, at the request of his murderer, inserted his name, as if alive, in the list of those whom Sūlla had proscribed. Public opinion charged him with the death of his sister's husband, Q. Cæcilius, a Roman knight, of no party, who was peaceful both from natural disposition and advanced age. Sēneca, Cicero, Florus, and Plutarchus, have recorded many of his barbarous actions, which it is unnecessary to transcribe. By such conduct he recommended himself to Sūlla, who appointed him praetor, in 68 B. C. Next year he obtained Africa for his province, in the administration of which, it is doubtful whether he displayed greater cruelty, or greater avarice. By fraud, theft, and rapine, he acquired great riches; and punished with death many innocent men without trial. Disregarding the laws of justice and humanity, Cātīlina regulated his conduct by his own vicious desires. He seized equally on the property of individuals and the treasures of the state; and returned to Rome, loaded with the spoils of the Africans, which he expended partly in luxury, and partly in bribery during his unsuccessful canvass for the consulship. Sunk at last in infamy, he entered into a conspiracy against the state, which Cicero discovered and crushed. The principal conspirators, on being convicted, were strangled in prison, according to Appiānos, in presence of the consul (Cicero) (Bel. Civ. 431). This nefarious plot, Mārtialis calls sacriligious wickedness (ix. 72). The destruction of Rome by fire, and the massacre of all the citizens most remarkable for wealth, high rank, and patriotism, formed part of his plan. With this view he raised an army, to which the vigorous and decisive measures of Cicero compelled him to withdraw, after his designs on the city, the consul and senate, had failed. At the head of his troops, he displayed great bravery; and, preferring death to the fate which he knew awaited him if made prisoner, he fell in the midst of the enemy, fighting resolutely till the last (December, 65 B. C.). Snetonius writes that C. Octavius, the father of the emperor Augustus, as he went to his province of Māgdonia, cut off some banditti, the relics of the armies of Spārtacus and Cātīlina, who had taken possession of Thūrinus Ager (Suet. Oct. 3). Sallustius has given an interesting narrative of this conspiracy, which would have been more valuable, had the prejudices of the man not interfered with the duties of the historian. His character of Cātīlina is drawn with accuracy and judgment; of the same traitor we have a masterly delineation by Cicero, in his oration "pro Cælio." It does not differ from that of Sallustius with respect to facts; but he enters more minutely into his dispositions and conduct, and thereby places both the man and the traitor more fully before his readers. Virgilius describes Cātīlina as engraved on the shield of Enēas, hanging from a rock that threatened to fall, and trembling at the gaze of the furies (Æn. viii. 668).

L. Sērgius Fidēnas, L. Sērgii Fidēnæ, m. a Roman whose surname, in the opinion of Livius, was derived from the war which he carried on at Fidēnæ. He was twice elected consul, and thrice a military tribune, with consular authority. In his third tribuneship, he and M. Pāpīrius Mūgīlānus commanded the army, and had the authority one day each in succession. The Æquil attacked the Roman troops under the conduct of Sērgius, carried a complete victory, and, next day, took the Roman camp, which they had shamefully abandoned from fear, on which Q. Sērvilius Priscus was appointed dictator, in 417 B. C. (Liv. iv. 17—46).—2. A tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, in 396 B. C. Neglect of certain religious observances, rendered it necessary for Sērgius and his colleagues to resign their government, before the end of the year, that an interrègnum might be appointed, and the auspices taken anew (Liv. v. 16).

Man. Sērgius Fidēnas, Man. Sērgii Fidēnæ, m. a Roman who was appointed a military tribune with consular authority for the second time, in 401 B. C., when he preferred being conquered by the Falisci to conquering the enemy by the assistance of his colleague, L. Virgīnius, between whom there subsisted a personal hatred. Their mutual enmity caused the loss of many Roman lives, as well as of his camp. For this misconduct, the plebeian tribunes arraigned him, the people found him guilty, and adjudged him to pay a fine of ten thousand asses (Liv. iv. 61 seq.).

M. Sērgius, M. Sērgii, m. a decemvir elected in 451 B. C. Appiā Claudius q. v. was at the head of this election, consequently the other nine were rather his creatures than his colleagues (Liv. iii. 35).—2. A tribune of the soldiers, whom Scipio Africānus sent with P. Mārtius q. v., to lead three thousand men from Rhēgium to Lōcri, on purpose to recover the latter place which had revolted from the Romans, and ordered Q. Pūblius, propraetor, to assist them. A quarrel ensued betwixt them and Pléminius, and, on being brought to trial before Africânus, he acquitted Pléminius, adjudged the two tribunes guilty, and put them in chains, that they might be sent to Rome. After the departure of Africânus from Lœri, Pléminius first subjected them to the utmost degree of torture, then put them to death, and exposed their bodies without burial, in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 6-9).

M. Sêrgius Silius, M. Sêrgii Sili, m. a Roman praetor in 199 B. C., on whom the lots conferred the jurisdiction of the city (Liv. xxxii. 27 seq.).—2. A lieutenant-general under L. Aemilius Paullus, in 170 B. C.; at that time he commanded two troops of Samnite horse (Liv. xlii. 40).

Sêrîphus, i. f. Sêrîpho, oftener, Sêrpho, one of the Cypelâdes, a rocky barren desolate island, in which Pêrseus passed the early part of his life. To this place Roman criminals were sometimes banished under the emperors, to which Juvénâlis refers (Sat. vi. 564). The frogs of this island were said to be mute; hence Rana Sêrîphus proverbially denoted a person who spoke very little. Ins. Sêrîphii, orum, m. Adj. Sêrîphus, a, um. Sêrîphium saxum, the rock of Sêrîphus, i. e. rocky Sêrîphus (Tac. Ann. iv. 21).

Sêrpeus, fis, m. a constellation near the N. pole (Ov. Met. ii. 173).

Sêrranus, i, m. son of M. Atilius Rêgulus. At the battle near Trâsimênus, the lake of Ferrugia, he was wounded, and having escaped, accidentally stopped at the house of Mârus, who had served under his father, by whom he was kindly entertained, and his wounds dressed. Silius Itâlicus relates this casual meeting, in a manner that gives it great interest and tenderness (vi. 62 seq.).—2. A poor poet mentioned by Juvénâlis (Sat. vii. 80).—3. One of the creditors of Afer, who boasted extravagantly of his wealth (Mart. iv. 37).

Sêrrhêum, i, n. a fort in Thrâcia, taken by Philippus, king of Mâcedônia, in 202 B. C. There was a promontory of this name; on it the castle stood, which, at one period, belonged to the Ciconians (Liv. xxxi. 16).

L. Sêrtôrius, L. Sêrtôrii, m. a Roman who carried on a war in Celtiberia against the Romans (Caes. B. C. i. 61). Probably the reading here should be Q. Sêrtôrio.

Nevius Sêrtôrius Mâcro, Nevii Sêrtôrii Mâcrônis, m. prefect of the praetorian guards, who possessed great power, seized, by order of the emperor Tiberius, Sêjanus, and conveyed him to prison, where he was put to death. He afterwards, having formed an intimacy with Câlîgula, entered into a conspiracy against Tiberius, whom he smothered to death, according to some writers, under a load of clothes, in the year 37. The new emperor, a stranger to gratitude, first nominated Sertorius governor of Egypt, and then forced him to kill himself, by charging him with crimes, some of which Câlîgula and he had committed in concert. The wife and children of Sertorius shared the same fate. Tacitus writes simply Mâcro (Ann. vi. 15-50).

Q. Sêrtôrius, Q. Sêrtôrii, m. a Roman general of distinguished merit and bravery, who served his first campaign under C. Mârius against the Teutônes and Cimbri.

Unable to bear the sight of so many of his murdered countrymen, and being proscribed by L. Cômellus Sûlla, he forsook C. Mârius, hence Lûcânus, Fugâs Sêrtôrius (Phar. vii. 16) fled first to Africa, afterwards to Balcâres Insûlas, Majorca and Minorca, and, quitting them, entered the Atlantic Ocean, sailed to Fortûnâte insûlas, and at last landed in Spain, where he excited the natives to take up arms against his countrymen, and he carried on a successful war for many years. The Spaniards, from his bravery and success in war, called him Hânûibal (Ap. Bel. Civ. 421). He contributed greatly to civilize the natives of Portugal, and of the west of Spain, till then almost unknown to his countrymen, by establishing schools, and educating the children in the literature of Rome. In Lûsitânia he carried a white stag along with him, and avowed, that, by her, he was warned what he ought to do, and what he ought to shun (Val. Max. i. 2). The Romans sent two of their best generals against him; but their arrival, for a considerable time, added only to the splendour of his victories. It is impossible to say how long his bravery and military skill might have successfully resisted the Roman legions, had he not, at last, been put to death in 74 B. C., by the treachery of M. Pêrperna, Mânus Antônîus, and other conspirators. In proof of the high esteem in which his military talents were held, may be mentioned the conduct of the Tarûsâtes and Nôcâtes, who, in the third year of the Gallic war, sent to Spain for auxiliaries against Crâssus, one of Caesar's lieutenant-generals, and appointed them commanders, who had fought in that country, during the continuance of the war, under the standard of this brave general. Q. Sêrtôrius, in point of clemency, generosity, affability, and military valour, is one of the greatest characters recorded in the annals of Rome, although Lîvius represents him as cruel to his own party, many of whom he put to death merely on suspicion of treachery. With this great warrior Mithridâtes entered into a treaty, and then declared war against Rome (Liv. Epi. 79-96). Tacitus informs us, that Sertorius, like Hânûibal, lost the sight of an eye (Hist. iv. 13). Adj. Sêrtôrianus, a, um. Sêrtôrianum bellum (Flor. iii. 22). Sêrtôriana nêx (Amm. Mar. xxx. 1).

Q. Sêrvius, Q. Sêrvii, m. a Roman commander, who obtained the government of Cômâgênê, with the title of praetor, in the year 18. After the death of Germânicus, whom he had accompanied in all his expeditions, Cêstus became his accuser, and Tiberius declared against him. His misfortune excited compassion, probably from the injustice of his trial, and from being innocent of the conspiracy with which Tiberius charged him. Tacitus says, that he saved his life by becoming an accuser (Ann. ii. 56 seq.).

Sêrvilla, e, f. sister of M. Pôrcius Câtô, who died at Utica, was married to M. Jûnius Brûtus, by whom she became the mother of M. Jûnius Brûtus, the most distinguished of the conspirators against C. Jûlius Cæsar. After the death of her first husband, Dêcius Jûnius Silânus married her, and by him she had Jûnia, the wife of C. Cæsius Lôngînus, who joined her son in the plot against C. Jûlius Cæsar, for whom Sêrvilla had a por-peculiar attachment, which has been explained to the prejudice of her moral character. To this intimacy, some refer the expression uttered by Caesar, on seeing Brutus among the conspirators, Kali est, miser. If confidence may be placed in the accuracy of Suetonius, her criminality can scarcely be doubted. That biographer informs us, after mentioning several matrons whom Caesar had corrupted, that Servilia was his chief favourite, that he purchased for her a pearl which cost six millions of sesterces, and during the civil war, besides other presents, gave her very extensive estates in land, which were exposed to public auction. When many expressed their surprise at the lowness of the price, Cicero wittily said "Tertia is deducted." The historian adds, that she prostituted her daughter Tertia to Caesar (Suet. Jul. Cas. 50).—2. The second wife of M. Aemilius Lepidus, son of the triumvir. Her husband formed a plot against Augustus, of which she had probably foreseen the consequence, and put an end to her life by swallowing burning coals (Vel. Pat. ii. 88).—3. Daughter of Barea Soranus, remarkable for her affection to her father, which proved fatal to both. To their unjust sentence, the emperor did not add the ignominy of a public execution, but allowed them to choose their mode of dying. She was the wife of Annulus Pollio, and had not completed her twentieth year, when condemned to lose her life, in the year 67 (Tac. Ann. xvi. 30—33).

Servilia Nalis, Servilia Naldis, f. a favourite of Cn. Domitius, on whose account he deserted M. Antonius, in whose army he was a lieutenant-general, and joined Augustus. She is supposed to have been a freed-woman (Suet. Ner. 3).

Servili, orum, m. an Alban clan, admitted into the Roman senate on the destruction of their native city, and their residence fixed on Mount Collis by Tullus Hostilius (Liv. i. 30). Adj. Servilius, et, Servilianus, a, um. Servilius lacus, a lake in the eighth region, or ward of Rome, near the Roman forum (Cic. pro. Ros. 32). Serviliiani horti (Plin. v. 284).

Servilius, f. m. an informer, who, with Cornilius, was banished to the islands, because they had accepted a bribe to give up a prosecution, commenced by themselves, against Varius Ligur, in the year 84 (Tac. Ann. vi. 30).

Servilius Balaëro, Servili Balaëronis, m. an intimate of Augustus. He appears to have been a man of considerable humour (Hor. Sat. ii. 8. 21 seq.).

Servilius Capio, Servili Capionis, m. the husband of C. Julius Caesar's daughter, Julia, whom she repudiated, and was afterwards married to Cn. Pompeius Magnus (Suet. Jul. Cas. 21).—2. The commander of a consular army in Germany, over whom the natives gained a decisive victory (Tac. Mor. Ger. 37).

A. Servilius Priscus. See Q. Servilius Priscus.

C. Servilius, C. Servili, m. a Roman consul in 478 B. C. In the consular calendar he is called C. Servilius Struëtus Ahala (Liv. ii. 49).—2. Son of Q. Servilius Priscus, was appointed a tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority, in 417 B. C. A keen contest arose between him and his colleagues, who all preferred the command of the army to the government of the city; but his father interposed his paternal authority, and compelled him to remain at home, without referring the matter to the lots (Liv. ii. 45).—3. Appointed a commissioner with T. Annius, to settle a colony at Picenna, where he was taken by the Bello, with whom he remained in slavery for sixteen years, until he was rescued by his son, C. Servilius Geminus, consul, in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 25 seq.).—4. Sent ambassador with other two to Carthage, in 197 B. C., in consequence of Hannibal being suspected of forming plans with Antiochus, king of Syria, of which the object was to make war on the Romans. The able general soon perceived their real design, and fearing he might be delivered up to the Romans, privately quitted Carthage, in which he never returned. Servilius dedicated a temple to Jupiter next year, which had been vowed by L. Furius Purpureus years before (Liv. xxxiii. 47: xxxiv. 30). Perhaps he is the same person with C. Servilius Geminus. Justinus calls him C. Servilius, mentions no other, and says that his instructions were to procure the death of Hannibal (xxxii. 2).

C. Servilius Ahala, C. Servili Ahala, a master of the horse to the dictator Ciceronius, and killed, with his own hand, the traitor, Sp. Maelius q. v. He afterwards obtained the consulship in 427 B. C., and at the end of the year, was driven into banishment, as the reward of his valuable services (Val. Max. v. 3). In con. cal. he is called C. Servilius Struëtus Ahala (Liv. iv. 32—30).—2. A military tribune with consular authority, in 407 B. C., whose name Livius writes either Servilius Ahala, or, Ahala Servilius, but always when the prænomen is used, C. Servilius Ahala. He was a man of moderation and prudence, disapproved both of the contention of his colleagues, and their disobedience to the senate, on which account he named P. Cornélius Cossus dictator, by whom he was appointed master of the horse. In consequence of his merits and popularity, he was thrice elected a military tribune with consular power, always showed the same good dispositions, and, in compliance with the will of the senate, compelled his colleagues to resign before the time, in 301 B. C. (Liv. iv. 56 seq.).—3. Master of the horse to M. Furius Camillus, in 388 B. C. (Liv. vi. 2).

C. Servilius Cæsa, C. Servili Cæsa, m. a tribune of the people, a near relation, and intimate friend, of M. Postumius Pyrgensis q. v. Fear and shame prevented Servilius taking any part in behalf of the farmers of the revenue, whose fraudulent conduct had become notorious in 214 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 3).

C. Servilius Geminus, C. Servili Geminus, m. first distinguished himself by relieving the garrison in Tarentum, distressed by a famine, with corn which he procured in Tuscany, passed through the guardships of the enemy, and prevented the surrender of the fort. He was created a pontifex; afterwards plebeian edile, then master of the horse to T. Manlius Torquatus. His next office was that of curule edile, which was followed by the prætorship, when he obtained Sardinia for his province. In 205 B. C. he was raised to the consulship; in that office, Etruria, and Gallia became his province, where he performed nothing memorable, or worthy of notice, except rescuing his father and C. Lutatius, who had been in slavery with the Boii for sixteen years. From a vote of the senate, it appears to have been unlawful for a man to have been either a tribune of the people, or a plebeian edile, whilst his father was in bondage. The passage in Livius, to which reference applies, is confessedly obscure. Serrvilius was afterwards dictator, pontifex maximus, and died in 182 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 15 seq.).

C. Serrvilius Glaucia, C. Serrvili Glaucia, m. a Roman praetor, put to death in 102 B. C., by order of the senate, along with L. Apuleius Saurinarius and other of their mad associates (Liv. Ep. 69. Flor. iii. 16). His name occurs frequently in the writings of Cicero, from which he appears to have been artful, acute, witty, unsteady, and wicked.

Cn. Serrvilius Capio, Cn. Serrvili Capionis, m. was consul with C. Sempronius Blaesus q. v., in 255 B. C. Both consuls sailed for Africa with a fleet of 260, and after some success on that coast, were wrecked on their return with sixty ships of that great armament (Eutrop. ii. 23).—2. Was appointed pontifex in room of C. Papirius Miso in 215 B. C., and in succession obtained the offices of curule edile, praetor, and consul. Brutus ager fell to his lot as his province, upon his election to the consulship, in 205 B. C. Vanity prompted him to suppose, that he would be considered as the restorer of peace to Italy, and, therefore, he went after Hannibal into Sicily, Sicily, which was no sooner known at Rome, than the senate ordered the praetor to write him, that he should return to Italy. This magistrate assured the senate, that Serrvilius would not regard his letter; recourse was then had to a dictator, when the choice fell on P. Sulpicius, who, by his superior authority, recalled the consul to Italy. Notwithstanding of this temper of mind, the senate appointed him an ambassador, with some others, to secure the attachment of their allies in Greece, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 2 seq.).—3. A pontiff cut off by a pestilence in 176 B. C. (Liv. xli. 21).—4. A curule edile in 180 B. C., who, with his colleague, repeated the Roman games, in consequence of certain prodigies. During his praetorship, he was sent to the south of Spain, where he appears to have performed nothing worthy of notice. In 174 B. C., the senate sent him and T. Annus Luscus, to demand restitution from Persius, king of Macedonia, who treated them with neglect. Their report of the country, and the plans of the king, did not fail to procure a declaration of hostilities. Three years after, he was chosen consul. Next year, he appears to have been governor of Gaul (Liv. xl. 59 seq.).

Cn. Serrvilius Geminus, Cn. Serrvili Geminus, m. consul in 219 B. C. with C. Flaminius Nepos, to whose aid he sent four thousand horsemen, under C. Centenius, proprætor, but they were all cut off by Hannibal in Umbria, whither they had marched on purpose to avoid that great general, as they had heard of the battle at Trasimenus, the Lake of Perugia. At Ocriculum, Serrvilius met the dictator, to whom he gave over the army, and by whom he was ordered to proceed to Ostia, to man all the ships which were at Rome, to pursue the Carthaginians, who had captured the transports carrying supplies to the army in Spain, and to protect the coasts of Italy. On this service, he sailed around the coasts of Sicily, Sicily, and Sardinia, desolated the island Meninx, Gerbi, received from the inhabitants of Cædus, ten talents of silver, to prevent a similar calamity, and made an incautious descent on the coast of Africa, where he lost a number of troops. On arriving at Sicily, Sicily, he delivered the fleet to T. Otacilius, praetor, and in obedience to the order of the dictator, Q. Fabius Maximus, he went to take the command of the army. The consuls having adopted the plan of the dictator, Hannibal, from want of provisions, would have retreated into Gaul, but from an apprehension that his quitting Italy would be considered a flight. Both consuls showed an unwillingness to go to Rome to hold the elections, supposing that their absence from the army would be prejudicial to the state, and there having been some informality in naming a dictator, they were continued in office another year. Under the new consuls, Serrvilius obtained the command of a Roman legion, besides two thousand of the confederate infantry and cavalry. In the battle at Cannæ, where he lost his life, he led on the centre of the army (Liv. xxi. 57 seq.). To him Silius Italicus alludes (v. 114 seq.). Adj. Serrvilius, a. um.

L. Serrvilius Structus, L. Serrvili Structus, m. a military tribune, with consular power, in 416 B. C. (Liv. iv. 47).

M. Serrvilius, M. Serrvili, m. a military tribune in the army of L. Æmilius Paullus, in 183 B. C. (Liv. xl. 27).—2. A pontiff, chosen in room of C. Livius Salluator, in 172 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 11).

M. Serrvilius Geminus, M. Serrvili Geminus, m. elected an augur in the room of Sp. Carvilius Maximus, in 213 B. C. He was afterwards appointed a curule edile, and master of the horse to P. Sulpicius Galba q. v. After recalling from Sicily the consul Cn. Serrvilius Capio q. v., the dictator and his master of the horse spent the rest of the year, in going round the cities of Italy, which had revolted during the war, examining into the particular behaviour of each. Next year he was elected consul, and retained the command in Etruria after the expiry of his office. Passing over his appointments as a commissioner for the division of lands and planting of colonies, we find him acting the part of an upright citizen, in supporting the right of L. Æmilius Paullus to a triumph. In his speech he mentions, that he had three and twenty times accepted the challenges of the enemy, and that from every one of them he brought off spoils (Liv. xxvi. 23 seq.).

M. Serrvilius Nonianus, M. Serrvili Nonianus, m. an historian of considerable merit, who, in the opinion of Quintilianus, equalled, rather than resembled, Livius and Sallustius. That critic speaks from personal knowledge, and describes him as a man of an elevated genius, abounding in sentiment, but more diffuse than the character of history permitted (x. l. 102). Tacitus mentions him in his treatise on oratory, and to him he alludes (Ann. xiv. 19).

M. Serrvilius Rufus, M. Serrvili Rufus, m. an illustrious Roman, who obtained the consulship with C. Cestius Gallus, in the year 35. To him the emperor Tiberius gave up a considerable legacy left to him by Pátuleus, a Roman knight. This disinterested conduct, although in fact a mere act of justice, because a former will, regularly executed, constituted Serrvilius sole heir, gained the emperor much credit, and, considering the avarice and injustice which then prevailed, certainly merits commendation. Tacitus describes him as an eminent orator, and commends his history of Roman affairs, which time has destroyed. He died in the year 59 (Tac. Ann. B. 48 seq.).

P. Serrvilius, P. Serrvili, m. a decemvir for surveying and distributing among the veteran soldiers, that part of the lands of Samnium and Apulia, which was the public property of the Roman people, in the year 203 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 4).

P. Serrvilius Cásca, P. Serrvili Cásca, m. one of the conspirators against C. Julius Caesar, and is said to have given him the first wound (Eutrop. vi. 25). He was a tribune of the people, in 44 B. C., to which Cicero alludes (Att. xvi. 15). That orator states, that C. Serrvilius Cásca, the brother of P., was also present at the assassination (Phil. ii. 11).

P. Serrvilius Isauricus, P. Serrvili Isaurici, m. was elected consul, in 81 B. C., with Ap. Claudius Pulcher. When proconsul, he went against the Cilices, conquered their country, and subdued the Isauri, whence his surname. He took several cities belonging to the pirates, and some of the most celebrated towns in Lycia. He was the first of the Romans who entered mount Taurus with an army (Liv. Ep. 90 seq.). According to Eutropius, he had the honour of a triumph for his conquest of Isauria (vi. 3). To this success Claudianus alludes (xviii. 217).

P. Serrvilius Priscus, P. Serrvili Prisci, m. was elected consul, in 495 B. C., when the Volscian army marched to attack Rome, and the commons refused to enlist. By an edict prohibiting any Roman citizen from being held in confinement, so as to prevent giving in his name to the consuls, or taking possession of his goods while upon service, or making sale of them, or detaining in custody either his children or grand children, he soon completed the ranks, and gained a complete victory, after which he led back his army to Rome. By acting afterwards a middle part between the patricians and plebeians, he retired from office in favour with neither party. Tarrvilius Súperbus died that year (Liv. ii. 21-27).—2. Elected consul, in 463 B. C., and entered on office on the kalends of August, which was, at that time, considered the beginning of the consular year. He died in office, as did also his colleague (Liv. iii. 6 seq.).

P. Serrvilius Vetiá Isauricus, P. Serrvili Vetiá Isaurici, m. a Roman nobleman, who was Caesar's colleague in the consulship, in 50 B. C. To his daughter, Augustus was contracted, in early life, but the marriage did not take place (Suet. Aug. 62).

Q. Serrvilius, Q. Serrvili, m. a quaestor, who, with A. Cornélius, commenced a prosecution against M. Volscius Fictor, in 459 B. C., because he had given false evidence against Kesso Quinctius (Liv. iii. 24).—2. A military tribune with consular authority, first in 381 B. C., afterwards in 377 B. C., and a third time in 368 B. C. (Liv. vi. 2-36).

Q. Serrvilius Ahála, Q. Serrvili Ahála, m. was elected consul in 364 B. C., with L. Génécus, and they two held the same office in 361 B. C., when Génécus having been killed, he nominated Ap. Claudius dictator, a measure which met with the general approbation of the patricians. In consequence of a war with the Gauls being apprehended, he was himself appointed dictator, in 358 B. C., named T. Quinctius master of the horse, and, with the concurrence of the senate, vowed to celebrate the great games, if victory declared for the Romans. His operations were crowned with success, and he abdicated the dictatorship; but not before he had highly commended the conduct of the consuls. In 355 B. C., Serrvilius held the office of interrex (Liv. vii. 1-17).—2. Master of the horse to M. Fabius, in 350 B. C., and consul in 341 B. C. (Liv. vii. 22 seq.). According to the consular calendar, this is the same with the former, but that does not appear to have been the idea of Livius.

Q. Serrvilius Capio, Q. Serrvili Capionis, m. was elected consul at Rome, in 142 B. C., with C. Laelius Sapiens. According to Livius and the consular calendar, he procured the death of Viriáthus q. r., by assassinating traitors. In opposition to these authorities, Eutropius states, that when the murderers of Viriáthus claimed a reward from Serrvilius, he answered, that the Romans never approved of a commander being killed by his own soldiers (Eutrop. iv. 16). After enjoying the highest distinctions among his fellow-citizens, from his merit, he fell under disgrace, and died in prison (Val. Max. vi. 9).—2. Was consul in 108 B. C., and had for his colleague in office, C. Atilius Serrvilius. In the following year, he commanded an army in Gallia, and Cn. Manlius Máximus, consul, had another, on purpose to make head, in conjunction with the two consular armies, against the barbarians. They not only failed in repressing the advances of these northern invaders, but were unable to keep them in check. Taking courage, either from their numbers, or from the inability of the Roman generals, they stormed both camps, took them, and made Q. Serrvilius Capio and Cn. Manlius Máximus prisoners. Valérius Antias estimates the loss of the Romans at eighty thousand men, besides fifty thousand slaves, sutlers, and other retainers of the camp. The cause of this misfortune having been ascribed to Capio, the people ordered his goods to be sold by auction, and it is worthy of notice, that this was the first confiscation after the expulsion of L. Tarrvilius Súperbus (Liv. Ep. 67). Sallustius calls them Gauls, but Livius, Cimbrí, The Tigúrini, who lived near the Alps, joined them, on which account the former historian probably gave them the name of Gauls. They had previously defeated M. Junius Sllanus, and seemed to threaten the destruction of the state. It appears probable, they would have overrun Italy, had not C. Mártius nearly annihilated them. By Eutropius he is called Serrvilius Capio, and is said to have conquered the Lusitani (iv. 27).—3. A proconsul, who was murdered in 93 B. C., at Ascólum, Ascól, together with all the Roman citizens in that place, at the commencement of the Social war (Flor. iii. 18. Liv. Ep. 72).—4. A lieutenant-general of P. Rutilius Lupus, who made a successful sally against the enemy, by whom he was besieged. For this advantage, he was made equal in command with C. Marius, afterwards became rash, was taken in an ambuscade, his army routed, and himself killed, in 92 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 73).

Q. Servilius Fidenas, Q. Servili Fidenatis, m. a Roman who was once elected interrex, and six times a military tribune with consular authority (Liv. v. 8 seq.). See M. Valerius Maximus.

Q. Servilius Priscus, Q. Servili Prisci, m. elected consul at Rome, in 468 B. C., by the senators and their dependants, the plebeians having refused to attend, in consequence of the animosities between these two orders. In his second consulship, he was sent against the Æqui, when the unhealthiness of the troops compelled him to remain inactive within the lines (Liv. ii. 64 seq.).—2. Some, in place of Priscus, call this Servilius, Struettus. He was appointed dictator against the Fidenates and Veientes, in 434 B. C., when he named Post. Æbutius Elva master of the horse. Near Nomentum, he defeated the Etrurian legions, drove them into Fidenæ, and drew lines of circumvallation round the town, which could not be taken by storm, on account of its high situation, and the strength of its works, nor blockaded with success, from the great quantity of grain stored up in their magazines. He therefore carried a mine into the citadel, nor did the inhabitants know any thing of his plans, until the town was in his power. In 430 B. C., he requested the tribunes of the commons by the authority vested in them, to compel the consuls to name a dictator. Glad at an opportunity of extending their power, they told the consuls to obey the order of the senate, or they would command them to be carried to prison. The propriety of this appeal is surely questionable, although Livius states that he passed through the highest dignities with singular honour. Respecting his bravery as a soldier, and patriotism as a citizen, the same historian has recorded several proofs. He was afterwards nominated dictator, marched against the Æqui, and convinced them of their inferiority to the Romans (Liv. iv. 21—47).

Sp. Servilius, Sp. Servili, m. (surnamed Struettus, in con. cal.), was consul in 476 B. C., with A. Virginius. Over the Veentians, Servilius gained a considerable advantage, which he soon lost, and owed his preservation and that of his troops, to the timely arrival of his colleague. For his temerity he was brought to trial, when his dauntless intrepidity procured his acquittal (Liv. ii. 51 seq.).—2. One of the six military tribunes with consular power, who were elected in 367 B. C. They were all superseded in their office by the appointment of a dictator, a magistrate superior to all others in power, and the choice fell on M. Furius Camillus, who surpassed all the citizens in merit. Ten years before that time, he had been appointed censor (Liv. vi. 31, 38).

Servius, T. m. a notorious informer (Hor. Sat. ii. 1. 47).

Servius Maluginensis, Servii Maluginen-

sis, m. was Flamen Dialis, when he demanded the proconsulship of Asia, in the year 22. After a full inquiry into the regulations and general usage of that order, it appeared, that his office prevented his absence, and that the province could not be granted to him. He died next year, and his son succeeded him as priest of Jupiter (Tac. Ann. iii. 88 seq.).

Servius Tullius, Servii Tullii, m. son of Publius and Oeresia, a captive, if not a slave from the town of Corniculum in Latiun. Some derive his name from servus, a slave, and others from his having been preserved (servatus), while his mother was made prisoner by Tarquinus Priscus. Livius gives it as his opinion, that Servius Tullius, the principal man in Corniculum, was killed at the taking of the city, and left his wife Oeresia pregnant, that her high rank procured her from the Roman queen an exemption from slavery, the common fate of prisoners, and that the child was born in the palace and called by his father's name. Ovidius gives a different account of his birth, making him the son of Vulcanns and Oeresia. Servius, having been born after his mother became a captive, Livius thinks sufficiently accounts for the prevalent opinion of his being reckoned a slave, an idea which Horatius seems to have adopted from calling his reign ignobilis (Sat. i. 6. 9). Livius narrates the circumstance of a fire having blazed round the infant's head when asleep, which Tanquil explained as a presage of his future greatness, and of his becoming the greatest ornament both of her family and of the state. In consequence of this prodigy, to which the historian attaches no credit, Servius received the education of the king's son. On his attaining manhood, he was held in so high estimation by the people and the king, that the latter gave him his daughter in marriage, probably with the view of his succeeding himself in the throne. Soon after Tarquinus Priscus had been mortally wounded by the assassin, whom the sons of Ancus Marcius had hired to murder him, Servius issued from the palace with all the ensigns of authority, pretending that he acted under the direction and by the authority of his father-in-law, who was not killed, but stunned by the blow. In the mean time, he exerted his utmost efforts to procure the favour of the nobles, whose interest he soon obtained. Servius then announced the death of the king, and was appointed his successor by the senate, without the concurrence of the people. To secure his authority, lest, like his father-in-law, he should fall by the sons of his predecessor, he gave his two daughters in marriage to the two sons of Tarquinus Priscus, Lucius and Aruns. His valour and good fortune were very conspicuous in his war against the Veientes, and the other Etrurians. On his return to Rome, he established the census, an institution of the utmost importance and benefit to the state. At the conclusion of the census, he performed a lustration, called Südvëtaurilia, in the Campus Martius. To accommodate the number of citizens, he enlarged the city, by adding the two hills, Quirinalis, Monte Corvalla, and Viminalis, besides extending the limits of Esquilinus, Monte Esquilino. On the last he fixed his own residence, to bring the place into celebrity. He surrounded the city with a rampart trenches, and a wall; at the same time he enlarged the Pomerium. The next work of this monarch was the building of a temple to Diana, in conjunction with the chiefs of the Latin states, upon whom he had prevailed to engage in that undertaking, in consequence of its being commonly believed, that the temple of that goddess at Ephesus had been built by a general contribution from the states in Asia. This is probably the temple which Aurelius Victor and Tacitus call the temple of the moon, which was destroyed by fire in the year 64. From this period, his life was rendered miserable, by the fierce and restless tempers of his family. His elder daughter having murdered her husband, and his son-in-law Lucius, his wife, they soon after were joined in marriage, and the death of this venerable monarch was the necessary and premeditated consequence of that unlawful union. Servius Tullius reigned forty years. In his whole conduct, during that long period, he exhibited such mildness, moderation, and justice, as would have rendered it difficult for any successor to have equalled him in any of these virtues (Liv. i. 39—48).

M. Servius Sulpicius, M. Servii Sulpicii, m. brother of P. Sulpicius, who lost his life in the proscription of P. Cornelius Sulla, because he had adopted the interest of C. Marius. According to Cornelius Nepos, he married Anicia, cousin of T. Pomponius Atticus (Cor. Nep. Att. 2).

Sesamus, s. f. Amasserah, a town of Paphlagonia, on the coast of the Black Sea (Hom. Il. ii. 853).

Sesöstris, Isis, m. a king of Egypt, and one of the most distinguished monarchs who ever filled the throne of that country. The remote period in which he lived, renders it impossible to ascertain the truth of his conquests, which antiquity has recorded. Like other great warriors who overran kingdoms, or performed great feats in arms during the ages of ignorance, or barbarism, fiction would exaggerate his exploits, and love of the marvellous ascribe to one, military enterprises which had been conducted by many. History informs us, that he subdued by force of arms Ethiopia, Arabia, Libya, the greater part of Asia, and afterwards invaded Europe. Justinus mentions the success of his arms as far as Pontus, and asserts, that he did not make war on the neighbouring, but on distant nations, and that for the acquisition of fame, not of territory (l. 1 seq.); yet he planted colonies in that country (Val. Flacc. v. 419). Having satiated his ambition by the renown of his arms, he returned to Egypt, where he spent his time in giving encouragement to the fine arts, in erecting temples to the gods, and in the improvement of his kingdom. Some have applauded his mildness and lenity to the conquered, while others have loaded his memory with infamy for his cruelty, and add, that he put himself to death. His reign is supposed to have been some centuries before the Trojan war. To his conquests and cruelty Lucanus alludes (Phar. x. 276). Tacitus mentions, that the Phoenix appeared in his reign (Ann. vi. 28).

Sestius Gallus, Sestii Galli, m. an abandoned, prodigal old man, who joined the emperor Tiberius in his criminal and abominable practices (Suet. Tib. 42).

P. Sestius, P. Sestii, m. a Roman of patrician family, who was accused by C. Julius, one of the first dēcēviri, in consequence of a dead body having been found in his house (Liv. iii. 33).—2. A questor, who attempted to quell a mutiny in the army, by ordering a lictor to seize one of the most turbulent of the soldiers, on which a tumult arose, and he was obliged to withdraw, in consequence of his having been struck with a stone, in 223 B. C. (Liv. iv. 50). See M. Pudiculus Regillensis.

P. Sestius Căpitōlinus, P. Sestii Căpitolini, m. held the consulship at Rome, with C. Mēnētus, in 452 B. C. The ambassadors sent to Greece, having returned with copies of the Athenian laws, the dēcēviri of whom Sestius was one, were nominated to digest them into a proper code. This appointment superseded all the magistracies (Liv. iii. 32, 33).

Sestos, s. f. Zemenik, a town of Thracia, Romania, on the shores of Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, directly opposite to Abydos. Three tumuli have been formed on the spot once occupied by that town, of which the largest is called Sest Tepe, a name manifestly derived from Sestos. Ovidius has given celebrity to this town, by singing the love of Lēander and Hērō. It surrendered to the Romans in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 9). Sestius, ūdis, f. Hērō, a native of Seme (Stat. Th. vi. 547). Adj. Sēstus, s. Sētiācus, a, um. Sēta pūilla, Hērō (Or. Ep. Her. xviii. 2). Sētiācus Sinus, the Dardanelles (Stat. Syl. i. 3. 27).

Sēsūvii, orum, m. a people of Gallia Cătica, who, although not named inter Americā celtātes, must either have been included under that denomination, or possessed an adjoining district (Cæs. B. G. ii. 34). It is proper to add, that the readings in the chapter just referred to are various, and that in the writings of no ancient geographer does this word occur.

Sēthōs, ō, m. a king of Egypt, who lived in the time of the Trojan war. To him Hōmērus alludes (Od. xiv. 278—286).

Sētia, s. f. Sezzo, a town of the Vălci in Lăcium, not far from Antium. Azzo, to which the Romans sent new colonies in 353 B. C. (Liv. vi. 30). It stood on a declivity, commanding a view of the Pomptine marshes (Mart. xiii. 112). Inh. Sētini, orum (Sag. Sētinus, i), m. were frequently plundered by the Privēnātes and Fundāni, in the early ages of the Roman state, to which they seem to have remained uniformly steady and faithful friends (Liv. viii. 1). Adj. Sētinus, a, um. Sētinum (vinum), the wine of Sezzo, which the Romans greatly prized (Juv. Sat. x. 27), and which Augustus preferred to all others (Plin. iii. 130). Sētinus ager (Plin. i. 326).

Setovin, s. f. a town of Dălmătia, at the siege of which Augustus was severely wounded in the knee (Ap. Bel. Illyr.).

Sēvērus. See Sēptimius.

Sēvērus, i, m. a man who recommended to Mărtiālis, to publish more books; but the poet charges him with reading carelessly, and only a small part of what he had already published. Mărtiālis frequently mentions Sēvērus in his epigrams (ii. 6 gr.).—2. An architect, or rather, what in modern times would be denominated a civil engineer, flourished at Rome, under the emperor Nēro.

His projects, distinguished by boldness and originality, suited the enterprising spirit of that emperor. Celer, a genius of the same cast, assisted in forming the magnificent plans, in which they undertook to conquer nature, and to perform wonders beyond both the powers of imagination, and the wealth of the emperor. In the attempt to join Læus Avèrnis with the mouth of the Tevere, they failed, and little advantage could have been obtained from the execution of the intention. Scarcely any vestige of the undertaking remains visible (Tac. Ann. xv. 42).—3. The cousin-german of the emperor Cārācālla, who, having first treated him with kindness, caused him to be murdered.—4. Created Caesar, by the emperor Diōclētianus, at the request of Gālērīus, who afterwards made him Augustus. When Māxēntius had assumed the purple, Sēvērus, then out of Italy, hastened to oppose him, and being deserted by his soldiers, who had never loved him, and had then been bribed by his enemies, found himself obliged, after he had approached the vicinity of Rome, to fly to Rāvēnna, whither Māximīanus Hērēclēus pursued him, and by deception got him into his power. Sēvērus trusted to the sincerity of his promise, returned to him the purple, when Māximīanus, not openly to violate his oath, appointed his son to put Sēvērus to death, which he did by allowing him to open his own veins. Māximīanus thus added cruelty to perfidy, by making his son an instrument in violating his own oath, and to murder a man who, without necessity, had, by believing his promise, put himself into his power (Eutrop. x. 23).

Sēvīnus Pōmptīnus, Sēvīnī Pōmptīnī, m. a Roman expelled from the senate, on account of extortion under Claudius or Nēro, and restored to his rank by Otho, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 77).

Sēvīus, v. Sūvīus Nīcānor, Sēvī Nīcānōrīs, m. by birth a slave, on obtaining his freedom, probably a consequence of his genius, was the first who obtained reputation and dignity by teaching at Rome. Besides commentaries, he wrote satire, of which a few lines only remain. In the opinion of some ancient writers, infamy compelled him to leave Rome, and retire to Sārdīnīa, where he died. Mācrobīus speaks in high terms of his learning (Sat. ii. 14).

Sēūthes, m. m. a king of Thrācia, with whom Alcibiādes had considerable influence. Cōrnēlius Nēpos, in the life of Iphicrātes, calls him an ally of the Athenians. Q. Cūrtius mentions a Sēūthes, who cannot be the same person, if confidence may be placed in ancient chronology, since the period mentioned by the two writers differs sixty-eight years (x. 1).—2. Another king of the same nation, and father of Cōtys, who succeeded him in the government. Livius mentions Cōtys bringing reinforcements to Pērcēs, king of Mācēdōnīa, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 51).

Sēxtīa, v. Sēxtīa, m. f. the wife of Māmercus Scaurus, whom, on his being prosecuted, she exhorted not to wait for a public sentence, and died herself, with the resolution which she had recommended to her husband, in the year 94 (Tac. Ann. vi. 29).

Sēxtīa, m. f. the mother-in-law of L. Antistius Vētus, who opened her veins and expired at the same time with him and his daughter Pōllūtīa, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xvi. 10 seq.).

Sēxtīlia, m. f. a vestal virgin, found guilty of incest, and buried alive (Liv. Ep. 14).—2. The wife of L. Vitēllius, and mother of the Roman emperor Vitēllius. Tacitus describes her as having formed her manners on the model of the ancients. She conducted herself with great evenness of temper; never elevated by the honours of her son, nor deceived by the flattery of those around her. Death, in the year 69, saved her from the misery of witnessing the downfall of her family (Tac. Hist. ii. 64 seq.).

Sēxtīliānus, i. m. a drunkard derided by Mārtiālis (i. 12 seq.). Perhaps he is the person mentioned by the same poet (x. 29).

Sēxtīlius Fēlix, Sēxtīlii Fēlicis, m. a Roman commander, who remained firm to Vitēllius. He appears to have been a soldier of considerable merit and bravery (Tac. Hist. iii. 5).

C. Sēxtīlius, C. Sēxtīlii, m. a Roman who held the office of a military tribune with consular power, in 378 B. C. (Liv. vi. 30).

M. Sēxtīlius, M. Sēxtīlii, m. of Prégēllē, who came to Rome in 211 B. C., informed the consuls, that eighteen colonies had their contingent of troops in readiness, and that more would be supplied, if required (Liv. xxvii. 10).

P. Sēxtīlius, P. Sēxtīlii, m. a Roman, guilty of the most horrible ingratitude towards C. Jūlius Caesar, an eminent poet and orator, who had successfully defended him when accused of a very great crime. Vāllērius Māximus has held up his name to merited abhorrence (v. 3).

Sēxtīllus, i. m. a low and contemptible character, on whom Mārtiālis writes a severe epigram (ii. 28).

Sēxtīus, i. m. quaestor to L. Cālpurnīus Bēstia in the war against Jūgūrtha (Sal. Jug. 29).—2. A silly man mentioned by Cātūllus (xlii. 19). Adj. Sēxtīānus, a. um.

Sēxtīus Africānus, Sēxtīi Africāni, m. a Roman of illustrious birth, puffed up with family pride, and at perpetual variance with Q. Vōlūsius. These two with Trēbēllius Māximus, held a cēnsus through Gāllia, France, in the year 62 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19 seq.).

Sēxtīus Cābāllus, Sēxtīi Cābālli, m. a buffoon, whose attempts at wit, probably contributed to the amusement of his entertainers (Mart. i. 42).

Sēxtīus Clōdīus, Sēxtīi Clōdīi, m. a Sicilian, who taught rhetoric at Rome, both in the Latin and Greek languages. He enjoyed the intimacy of M. Antōnius, the triumvir, and Pōmponīus Atticus. His name occurs in the second of Cicero's philippics (Suet. Clar. Rhet. 5).

Sēxtīus Mūrēus, Sēxtīi Mūrēi, m. an officer under Caesar, sent with three legions against Lābo, who fought under the auspices of Pompey (Ap. Bel. Civ. 576).

Sēxtīus Pācōnīanus, Sēxtīi Pācōnīāni, m. a man of prætorian rank, whom the emperor Tiberius marked out for destruction. The senators rejoiced at his condemnation, on account of his turbulence, propensities to any iniquitous measure, and facility in acquiring a knowledge of the secrets of others. In prison, he amused himself with writing sarcastic verses against the emperor, by whom orders he suffered death by strangulation, in the year 85 (Tac. Ann. vi. 3-59).

C. SEXTIUS CALVINUS, C. SEXTI CALVINI, m. (whom Eutropius inaccurately calls SEXTIUS DOMITIUS CALVINUS), held the consulship with C. Cassius Longinus, in 126 B. C. These consuls carried war into Gallia, France, attacked the Arverni, and killed a prodigious number of them on the Rhone. Their king, Bibulus, surrendered himself to SEXTIUS, who brought him to Rome, which both consuls entered in triumph (Eutrop. iv. 22). When proconsul, SEXTIUS conquered the Saluvii, and founded a colony there, in 124 B. C., which from his own name, and the abundance of water from hot and cold springs, he called Aquæ Sextiæ, Aix, in Provence. Adj. SEXTIUS, a, um.

1. SEXTIUS, L. SEXTIUS, m. a tribune of the people, who proposed a law for granting a colony at Völæ, v. Böla, Polî, in 214 B. C., but was overpowered by the protests of his colleagues (Liv. iv. 49).—2. (Surnamed in con. cal. SEXTIUS LATERIANUS), a tribune of the people, who moved that a law should pass respecting debts, another respecting the extent of land to be possessed by one man, and a third, that there should be no military tribunes, but that one of the consuls should be a plebeian. The opposition of several of his colleagues, through the influence of the patricians, procured their rejection, and, therefore, on his being continued in office during next year, he prevented the election of the curule magistrates. To the office of a plebeian tribune he was ten times elected, and, in his last tribuneship, carried his law respecting the admission of a plebeian to the consulship, in consequence of which he was raised to the consulship, the first plebeian who held that dignity, in 365 B. C. (Liv. vi. 35 seq.).—3. A Roman of high rank and great merit, who was questor in the army of Brutus, yet, on his return to Rome, he obtained the friendship of Augustus, who, on resigning the consulship, chose L. SEXTIUS in his place. He never concealed from the emperor the sincerity of his attachment to Brutus, and the steadiness of his principles probably raised him in the esteem of Augustus. An intimate friendship subsisted between him and Horatius, who addresses to him an ode (l. 4). The poetic merits of that ode, claim higher praise, than the morality which it inculcates. From the shortness of life, Horatius ought to have drawn a very different conclusion, than an argument for indulging in intemperance.

M. SEXTIUS SIBINUS, M. SEXTI SIBINI, m. was elected to the office of plebeian edile, in 305 B. C., and next year to the praetorship, when he obtained the government of Gallia, i. e. the north of Italy (Liv. xxx. 26 seq.).

P. SEXTIUS BICULUS, P. SEXTI BICULI, m. a centurion of the first rank in Caesar's army, in the Gallic wars (Caes. B. G. ii. 25).

T. SEXTIUS, T. SEXTI, m. one of the three lieutenant-generals whom Caesar sent to augment his army, in the sixth year of the war in Gallia, France (Caes. B. G. vi. 1 seq.).—2.

A general on the part of C. Cassius, conquered in Africa by Q. Cornificius, in 44 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 123).

SEXTUS, j, m. a poor man, mentioned by Murtialis (ii. 3).—2. An usurer (Mart. ii. 44).—3. A confidential friend of the emperor Domitianus (Mart. v. 5). This name is of frequent occurrence in the epigrams of Martialis, and conveys all the information which can be obtained respecting the character introduced by the poet to his reader.—4. A native of Cheronea, Caprena, was the grandson of Plutarchus. He taught the Roman emperor M. Antoninus, the Greek language. The commentators of Eutropius seem, in general, to have considered Charonensis as his proper name (viii. 12).

SIBOTES, is, m. a Colchian commander in the war between the Argonauts and Siphians (Val. Flacc. vi. 249).

SIBŪZATES, v. SIBŪZATES, hum, m. a people of Aquitania, whose country lay along the Adour. Of their history nothing is known. Their capital, in the 3d or 4th century, bore their name, now Sobuse (Caes. B. G. ii. 7).

SIBYLLA, æ, f. a sibyl, a woman divinely inspired, of whom several are enumerated by ancient authors. According to some, the number amounted to ten (Lactant. i. 6), while others have only spoken of one; the one most celebrated, and most frequently mentioned by Roman writers, had her residence at Cumæ. Lactantius, who calls the Sibyl, Amalthæa, derives the name Sibylla from the Æolic, Sios, god, and bylē, counsel, and adds that the ancients called all prophetesses Sibyllas (ib.). Dionysius of Halicarnassus relates, that a woman (probably one of the Sibyls) offered nine books, to L. Tarquinus Superbus, for which she asked a particular sum. The monarch knowing neither the nature of the books, nor the character of the seller, refused to purchase them, at which she departed, burned three, and, having returned, demanded the same sum for the remaining six, which Tarquinus likewise declined. Retiring again from the palace, she destroyed other three, and immediately presented herself to the monarch, from whom she required the same price as at first.

Struck with the singularity of her conduct, Tarquinus, consulted the augurs, who, knowing the value of the writings, advised him to give the money required, and regretted the loss sustained by his refusal. After receiving the price, and charging the king to keep the books with great care, the woman went out from his presence, and was never seen more. It is stated by A. Gellius, that, on being refused the price asked, she burned three of the nine in presence of the king, and, on a second refusal, burned other three; she then asked, and received the sum which she had first named (i. 19). Soon after these writings became the property of Tarquinus, he appointed two men of patrician rank, to whom he added two public servants, for the purpose of preserving these books which contained the Sibylline prophecies, and of consulting them on great emergencies. After the expulsion of the kings, the noblest men in Rome solicited that office, which exempted them from military service and from city offices. To the charge of these books the Romans paid greater attention than to any other sacred rite. They were preserved in a stone chest in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, where they were destroyed after the war with the Marsi. The senate then ordered a collection of Sibylline oracles from various quarters, which the ancients considered spurious, and which, from that

Ius, appears to have been composed in hexameter verse (ii. 5. 16). Adj. Sibyllinus, a, um. Sibyllini libri, the books, or oracles, of the Sibyl (Liv. v. 13).

Sibyrrius, i, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, at whose death he obtained the Arctosi and Gedrosi (Just. xiii. 4). Arrianus calls him Sisyrrius (vi. 5).

Sicca, e. Sicca Veneria, w, f. Keef, an ancient town of Numidia, the foundation of which has been ascribed to the Numidians. It stood on the banks of Bagrada, the Mejerda, at a distance of about an hundred miles from the coast. In its vicinity C. Marius defeated Jugurtha. The worship of Venus is retained there in its most injurious form, which the reader may see described in Valerius Maximus (ii. 6), Herodotus and Strabo. Lich. Sicenses, ium, m. the Sicensians (Sal. Jug. 36).

Siccha, w, m. a man in the army of Hannibal, overpowered by Scévola, at the battle of Cannæ, as he came to the rescue of Gaius (Sil. Ital. ix. 985 seq.).

L. Siccus Dēntatus, L. Sicili Dēntati, m. perhaps the bravest of all the Romans, on which account he was called the Roman Achilles. He was in the army during a period of forty years, and engaged the enemy in one hundred and twenty battles, received forty wounds in the front, but not one in the back; was presented with eight golden, one obsidional, three mural, and fourteen civic crowns, besides eighty-three golden chains, upwards of one hundred and sixty suits of armour, eighteen spears, and twenty-five trappings. The people bestowed upon him many military gifts of different kinds, among these, says A. Gellius, were some for victory in single combat; but Valerius Maximus says, that he thirty times bore the spoils from the enemy, of which eight were gained over individuals who had challenged the whole Roman army. Availing himself of the general hatred of the soldiers to the decemvirs, and having frequently, in private conversation, spoken of a secession, and an election of tribunes of the people, these tyrants resolved to destroy him; and for this purpose sent him with a party, under pretext to choose a place for a camp; but in reality that he might be murdered. Of the hundred assassins who attended him, fifteen fell by his hand; and thirty were wounded. The rest would most probably have failed in their nefarious attempt, had not some ascended the rock against which Siccus had set his back, and intrepidly received their weapons in his shield, and thence threw down stones, by which he was overpowered; and at last killed. The decemvir buried him immediately, with military honours, at the public expense, to prevent his body being carried to Rome (Liv. iii. 43. Val. Max. iii. 2). Livius calls him simply L. Siccus, and others, L. Sicilius Dēntatus. Sicila, e, f. a village in Britain, according to Aurelius Victor; but in Gaul, according to others, at which the emperor Alexander Severus was put to death by his own soldiers (Aur. Vic. Cass. 24).

Sicilia, e, f. Sicily, an island in the Mediterranean, to the south of Italy; between 36° 40' and 38° 20' N. Lat., and 12° 15' and 15° 55' E. Long.; said to have been in ancient times a continuation of that country, but afterwards separated by the strength of the sea (Strab. 371. Just. iv. 1). It is of a triangular form, and in circumference about 471 miles. In the writings of ancient authors, both Greek and Roman, we find this island not unfrequently called Sicania. This latter name is said to be derived from Scani, orum, a people from Spain, whose name was derived from the river on the banks of which they lived (Sil. Ital. xiv. 34), and which, Thucydides supposed, was afterwards called Scoris, the Segre, who invaded the southern part of Italy, and, being driven from it, took possession of Sicily; and the former from their general Siculi. Some ancient authors maintain, that the Scani and Siculi were not the same people, and did not settle in Sicily at the same time. They assert, that the first are of Spanish, and the last of Italian origin. It was anciently called Triguetra, and Trinacria, from its triangular figure; afterwards Sicania, and at last Sicilia (Just. iv. 2). Of this island, Virgilius makes the ancient name Vulcania, from Vulcanus having his forges in mount Ætna (Æn. viii. 422). The promontories, in which the three sides terminate, are, on the W., Lilybœum, Cape Boeo, on the S. East, Pachynus, Cape Pasaro; and on the N. East, Pelorus, Cape Faro. The distance between Lilybœum and Pachynus is 160 miles, between Lilybœum and Pelorus 196, and between Pelorus and Pachynus 115. According to Ovidius, the giant Typhoeus was buried below Sicily, his feet under Cape Boeo, his right hand under Cape Faro, his left under Cape Pasaro, and his head under Ætna. This island is in general mountainous; but it has some beautiful verdant plains. Ætna, Monte Gibello, near the E. coast, about 50 miles S. of Pelorus, is the largest volcano in the world. Frœtum Sicilum, the Strait of Messina, which separates this island from Italy, was an object of terror to the ancient mariners; but, from greater skill in navigation, is now passed without anxiety. There is no danger unless when the winds and current are contrary. Some modern travellers and geographers maintain, that Charybdis is not a whirlpool, but a place where the waves are greatly agitated by pointed rocks. It is not above 500 feet at its greatest depth. From a recent census, it appears that Sicily contains 1,790,000 inhabitants, 600,000 of whom are ecclesiastics, or living on ecclesiastical revenues; there are on the island 1,117 convents, containing 20,000 monks and 20,000 nuns. Its superficial extent is estimated at 7,500 square miles, including the Æolian Islands. Sicelis, Idis, et, Scaniis, Idos, f. Sicilian, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Scyllides Mœsa, the muse of pastoral poetry; because Theocritus, the first writer of pastoral poetry, was a native of Sicily (Virg. B. iv. 1). Adj. Siculus, et, Sicanus, a, um, et, Siciliensis, is, e. Sicanus sinus, the bay of Syracusa (Virg. Æn. iii. 692). Siculi stellas, Sicily (Virg. Æn. i. 34). Siciliensis ruina (Just. xxiii. 3). Siciliensis ora (Amm. Mar. xxi. 7).

Sicilius, e. Sicilius, i, m. who, with Verceilus, excited the Hirpini to revolt from the Romans, and, on the taking of Strophi of their towns by M. Valerius, prætor, they were beheaded, 217 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 47). Here the readings vary greatly, and the commentators are divided as to the meaning of the sentence.

Sicimna, m., a mountain of Galla Cisalpina (Liv. xlv. 12).

C. Sicinius, C. Sicinī, m., was one of the prime movers of the revolt to Mōns Sacer, in 494 B. C., and he was among the first elected tribunes of the people (Liv. ii. 32).—2. A plebeian tribune who brought Appius Claudius to trial, in 470 B. C. (Liv. ii. 58–61).—3. A descendant of that C. Sicinius who was the first tribune of the people, and elected on Mōns Sacer (Liv. iii. 54).—4. One of the three ambassadors sent by the Roman senate to Greece, and different states of Asia, in 172 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 5).

Cn. Sicinius, Cn. Sicinī, m., elected praetor, and held the government of Sardinia, in 185 B. C. He had been previously an edile, and was unsuccessful in his first canvass for the praetorship (Liv. xxxix. 39 seq.).—2. One of the three commissioners who settled a colony of Roman citizens at Lūca, in 179 B. C. (Liv. xli. 13).—3. Was elected praetor, in 175 B. C., and was sent with troops to Apulia, to collect the locusts which covered the whole fields in prodigious swarms. He obtained Macedonia for his province, and was continued in command for another year. Livius mentions he left the city, Paladatus, from which it may be inferred he was to be commander-in-chief of the Roman forces in that country (xlii. 9–27).

L. Sicinius, L. Sicinī, m., a tribune of the Roman people (Liv. vi. 6).

P. Sicinius, P. Sicinī, m., a tribune of the Roman people, who passed a law, that no one should either contradict or interrupt a tribune whilst speaking to the people (Sal. Frag. 3). Adj. Sicinius, a, um. Sicinia lēs, the law above-mentioned.

T. Sicinius, T. Sicinī, m. (surnamed in con. cal. Sabinus) was elected consul, in 497 B. C., the year after Cōrnelianus quitted the Roman territory (Liv. ii. 40).—2. A Roman who proposed a bill, that his townsmen should abandon their native city, and occupy Voi (Liv. v. 24).

Sicōris, is, m., a Saguntine, whom his townsmen placed at the head of the deputation sent to the Roman senate, when Hannibal attacked their city (Sil. Ital. i. 633).—2. A Spaniard, one of the competitors for the prize in the foot-race given by Scipio Africanus, at the end of the Spanish war, in 208 B. C. (Sil. Ital. xvi. 475).

Sicōris, is, acc. im. m., the Sagre, a river of Hispania, Spain, which rises in the Pyrenees, is joined by Cinga, the Cineu, near Hērda, Lerida, and empties itself into Ibērus, the Ebro, after a course of forty miles (Ces. B. C. i. 40). From Lūcanus it appears to be a slow running river (Phar. iv. 14).

Sicyon, ōnis, f. Basiliā, or Vasilica, the capital of Sicyonia, which formed part of Achaea, a district of Peloponnesus, the Moria. Some authors consider Sicyonia as a separate province, bounded on the E. by Argolis, on the N. by Sinus Cōrinthiacus, the Gulf of Lepanto, and on the S. by Arcadia. It is celebrated as the most ancient kingdom of Greece, and, in its most flourishing state, the whole of Peloponnesus was included under this name. Sicyonia was very fruitful, and abounded with wine, olives, and all kinds of grain, hence Olivifera Sicyon (Ov. Ib. 317). Juvēnalis, from its situation, calls it high, or lofty (Sat. iii. 69). The inhabitants, Sicyonii, orum (Sing. Sicyonius, i), m., excelled in the working of metals, a natural consequence of their numerous mines, chiefly of iron. Adj. Sicyonius, a, um. Sicyonius ager (Liv. xxxiii. 13). Sicyonia bacca, the Sicyonian olive (Virg. G. 3. 519). Pulchra Sicyonia (salicamenta), beautiful Sicyonian shoes (Lucr. iv. 1118). They were highly ornamented, and therefore unmanly (Cic. de Or. i. 54). Sicyonia (vinum) (Plin. iii. 136). Sicyonius pictura, a style of painting, of which Epicurus, a native of Sicyon, was the author (Plin. v. 205).

Sida, a, f. Eski Adalia, a town of Epiphylia, on the coast (Liv. xxxv. 13). Id. Sidēta, arum, m. (Liv. xxxv. 48).

Sidicini, orum, m., a people of Campania, on the borders of Samnium, whose chief town was Tēanum, Tianno, called Tēanum Sidicinum, to distinguish it from Tēanum Apulum, a town of the Apulians. Their country was about the sources of Sāra, the Saone. They do not appear to have been either very numerous, or very powerful, as they are seldom mentioned in the pages of Livius. Adj. Sidicinus, a, um. Sidicinus ager, the territory of the Sidicini (Plin. i. 255). Sidicina cōhōrs (Sil. Ital. v. 531).

Sido, ōnis, m., the brother of Vāngio, and nephew of Vānnius, obtained half of the kingdom of the Suevi, and Vāngio, the other, on the expulsion of their uncle. Their fidelity to the Romans is commended by Tacitus, and his pages bear evidence to Sido's bravery (Ann. xli. 29).

Sidon, ōnis, v. Sidōnia, v. f. Sēda, ei, Sayd, called by the Turks, Tenide; a famous maritime city, the capital of Phenicia, about twenty-four miles north of Tŷrus. Josephus says this town had its name from Sidon, a son of Chanaan; but Justinus refers the name to Sidon, which in the Phenician language, signifies a fish. Præcōnque murex Sidon (Luc. Phar. iii. 217). Syria Sidon (Lucr. vi. 584). Inh. Sidōnii, orum, m., the Sidonians, or, Phenicians, were eminent for their industry, for their knowledge of commerce, and for the discovery of navigation. They were, however, considered as exceedingly artful, greedy of money, and dishonest in their intercourse with other nations. Sidōnis, idos, f. of Sidon, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine; Dido, queen of Carthage, who was a native of Sidon (Ov. Met. xiv. 80); Anna, sister of Dido (Sil. Ital. viii. 193). Sidōnis concha, the Sidonian shell, i. e. purple (Ov. Met. x. 267). Adj. Sidōnius, et, Sidōnicus, a, um, of Sidon, of Phenicia, of Carthage.

Sidōnus Hospes, Cādmus (Ov. Met. iii. 129). Sidōnia cōmites, Theban companions, from Cādmus, the founder of Thēbe, Thebes, the capital of Bœōtia, being a Sidonian (Ov. Met. iv. 542). Sidōnum filum, silk, rather linen thread (Luc. Phar. x. 141). Sidōnium ostrum, Sidonian, or, Phenician purple (Virg. Cir. 387). Sidōnia Dido (Virg. En. i. 446). Sidōnia urbs, Carthage (Virg. En. i. 678). Sidōnii dūces, Carthaginian commanders (Sil. Ital. i. 10). Sidōnii nautæ, Phenician sailors, the best of antiquity (Hor. Epod. xvi. 61). Sidōnus rōptus, the carrying off of Europa (Stat. Th. l. 5). Pleraque Sidōnæ (Sal. Jug. 78). Sidon, ōnis, f. a ship which the Romans captured from the Carthaginians, in a naval engagement near Sicily, during the second Punic war. Silius Italicus calls her Cādūa Sīdon (xiv. 579).

Sidōnes, um, m. a Getan nation, reckoned by Strabo part of the Bastarnæ. They appear to have lived near Ister, the Danube. Adj. Sidōneus, a, um. Sidōnea hābēnæ. Here the readings of Valerius Flaccus vary (vi. 95).

Sigāmbria, v. Sicāmbria, a, f. a district of Germania, Germany, bounded on the west by Rhēnus, the Rhine, and on the north by Rura, the Roer, which had its name from the Iah. Sigāmbri, v. Sicāmbri, orum, m. Two thousand of them assembled to plunder and extirpate the Ebūrōnes, at the time Cæsar invited the Gauls and Germans to that barbarous deed. Martialis says, they wore their hair plaited, which, like that of the other Germans, was red, flavente cæsariæ (Claud. xxiv. 18), and tied in a knot. To the fineness of their hair, Roman authors, particularly the poets, frequently allude. Juvēnalis calls them feræ or sterni (Sat. iv. 147). Adj. Sicāmbrius, et, Sigāmbrius, a, um. Sigāmbra cohors (Tac. Ann. iv. 47).

Sigēum, v. Sigeum, i, n. Cape Janissary, a promontory of Trōas. On this promontory stood a town of the same name, now Glauc-Kent, or, Yéng-Cheyr, built by the Mitylenians, which, after a long and brave resistance, fell under the power of the Athenians. Clark thinks, that Sigeum and Rhetium were the names, not of promontories, but of cities built after the time of Hómērus, who does not mention either of these promontories. Alexander the Great added it to his dominions. During the reign of his successors, it was destroyed, but rebuilt under the Christian Emperors, who made it a bishoprick. Adj. Sigēus, et, Sigeus, a, um. Sigēia littora, the shore of the Dardanelles at Cape Janissary (Ov. Met. xiii. 3). Sigēum præfūdum, that part of the Dardanelles at Cape Janissary (Ov. Met. xi. 197).

Sigērius, i, m. a servant of the bedchamber to the Roman emperor Dōmītiānus (Mart. iv. 79).

Sigillāria, ium, n. two days added to the Sāturnālia to prolong the festival (Suet. Claud. 5). Also the name of a street.

Sigimērus, i, m. a German prince, and father of Arminius. From the expression of Velleius Pāterculus, he seems to have been what in Scotland would be called a chieftain (ii. 118).

Signa, a, f. Segni, a town of the Volsi in Latium, at which Tāquīnus Spērbus planted a colony. It stood on Circeum promontorium, Monte Circeo, which had an excellent harbour. Inh. Signini, orum (Sing. Signinus, i), m. remained faithful to the Romans (Liv. xxvii. 10). Adj. Signinus, a, um. Signinum pigrum (Juv. Sat. xi. 73). The pears and wines of this district were much esteemed. The latter appears to have been harsh (Sil. Ital. viii. 378), and from Martialis the wine to have had an astringent quality (xiii. 116).

Signifer. See Aquila.

Sigovēsus, i, m. a sister's son of Ambigātus, king of the Cēltæ. Owing to the kingdom being overpeopled, his uncle advised him and his brother Bellovēsus q. v. to emigrate; and to take with them such a number of men as might overpower any resistance, with which they might meet. Hērcynius saltus fell to his lot in the year 390 B. C. (Liv. v. 34).

Sigynna, arum, m. a people who lived to the north of the Danube. In the language of the Ligurians, Sigynna signified merchants, and in that of the Cyprians, spears (Herod. v. 9). This name is variously written.

Sila, a, f. a woman on whom Martialis writes a disgusting obscene epigram (xi. 24).

Sila, a, f. an extensive wood in Apēnninus, the Apennines, in the territory of the Brūtii, near Consētina, Consenza, which still retains its ancient name (Virg. Æn. xii. 715).

Silii, orum, m. a people of Cēltibēria, who excelled in throwing the light javelin (Mart. iv. 55).

Silāna, a, f. a town of Thessaly, taken possession of by Amynāder, king of the Athāmānes, in 193 B. C.; and retained the same year by the combined army of Philip, king of Mācedōnia, and the Roman prætor M. Bēbius Tāmpilius (Liv. xxxvi. 13).

Silānus, i, m. a surname of the Junia clan. See Junius.

Silānus, i, m. a Roman commander, who fought with Hannibal in Italy, and harassed him by his vigilance and activity (Sil. Ital. xii. 483).—2. A man who lost his only son, on which account Martialis advises Aptānus, or Oppiānus, a legacy-hunter, to be assiduous in his attentions to him (vi. 62).

M. Silānus, M. Silāni, m. one of Cæsar's lieutenant-generals, whom he ordered to levy troops for the war in Gallia, France (Cæs. B. G. vi. 1).

Silārus, i, m. a man killed by C. Luchius in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xviii. 438).

Silārus, i, v. Siler, ēris, m. the Sela, a river of Italy, which separated the Lucāni from the Picēntini (Virg. G. iii. 146). According to Strabo, its waters had the power of petrifying wood or plants, and the petrification retained not only the form, but also the colour of the original substance.

Silēi, orum, m. (Sibi, Curt.), an Indian nation, who surrendered to Alexander the Great (Just. xii. 9).

Silēnus, i, m. the foster-father and preceptor of Bācchus. Hōrātius (Art. Poet. 239), calls him the guardian and attendant of that god, whom Virgilius represents giving an account of the origin of the world, according to the notions of the Epicureans (B. vi. 14 seq.). Æbānus says, that he was the son of a nymph, inferior to the gods, but superior to mortals. Both Virgilius and Ovidius represent him as addicted to drunkenness, and generally accompanied by satyrs. When Bācchus led his army to India, Silēnus wandered, and, having been taken to the court of Midas, was hospitably entertained by that monarch, who appointed a guide to conduct him to Bācchus. For this act of kindness, that god promised Midas q. v. whatever he should ask. According to some, Silēnus was a native of Malēa, and Pindārus informs us, that he was brought up there. He must have excelled in music as well as in poetry, since he and Mārtyas disputed with Apōllō, in playing on the pipe. He had temples in common with Bacchus, notwithstanding of which, the Sileni must have been mortals, since their tombs were seen among the Jews and Pergamenes. Pausanias states, that the old Sileni became satyrs (l. 23 seq.).—2. An historian, who wrote the life of Hannibal in Greek, which, from the expression used by Cicero, appears to have been a work of considerable magnitude (Div. i. 24). Livius mentions him, when treating of the affairs of Spain (xxvi. 49). Neither his country, nor the particular period at which he lived, is certainly known.

Silcum, i, n. See Sylcum.

Silia, æ, f. a woman of vicious practices, and ministered to the unlawful pleasures of the emperor Nero, who, on suspicion of her having betrayed him, ordered her into banishment, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xvi. 20).

C. Silius, C. Silii, m. a lieutenant-general in upper Germany, who, for his military success, received triumphal ornaments. His martial bravery in defeating the enemy, and in suppressing revolts in Gallia, did not protect him against the intrigues of Sëjanus, whose measures impelled him to a Roman death, in the year 24. He married Söla Galla q. v. (Tac. Ann. i. 31 seq.).—2. A noble Roman, consul elect, with whom Messalina fell in love, in the year 47. In form and manners, he surpassed all the Roman youth. To gratify Messalina, he repudiated his wife, Julia Siliana, and without being blind either to the greatness or danger of the crime, he complied with the wishes of that princess, on purpose to avoid her revenge. In return, she loaded him with wealth and honour; and to consummate their madness, they were publicly married. For this outrage of all moral principle, he atoned with his life, as soon as the emperor came to the knowledge of his crime (Tac. Ann. xi. 5).

C. Silius Italicus, C. Silii Italici, m. a Roman poet of considerable eminence, born during the reign of the Roman emperor Tiberius, but neither the year of his birth, the place of his nativity, nor the cause of his surname has been ascertained. Some have rashly concluded, that he was born at Itälica, Seville, a town in Hispania, Spain, and on that account called Itälica, while others maintain he was a native of Cörfinium, a town of Italy, which Sträbo says had the name of Itälica, during the Social war. The silence of Martialis, when enumerating the Spanish authors, with respect to Silius, amounts nearly to a proof, that Spain had not the honour of giving him birth; otherwise the epigrammatist, who was his friend and admirer, would not have omitted his name, when celebrating the praises of his native country. The other conjecture appears equally without foundation, since history does not support the assertion, that Cörfinium was ever generally known by the name of Itälica. On coming to Rome, Silius spent his time in studying law, and practising at the bar. He took Cicero for his model, obtained the character of an able lawyer, and an accomplished orator. The powers of his mind, his knowledge of business, and his steady attention, procured him the highest offices in the state. He held the consulship with M. Gälërius Trächäla at the time Nero died, in the year 66. Here it would be difficult to free his character from one of the foulest stains, that of being an informer to the merciless tyrant, who employed him in arraigning the wealthy and virtuous, whom he had unjustly doomed to lose their lives. Whether less of preferment, or dread of the emperor's cruelty, overpowered his moral rectitude, it will readily be allowed, that his forcible eloquence, added to his legal knowledge and mental ability, would render him a formidable tool in the hands of that ruthless monster. For this deviation from the path of virtue, he made ample compensation during the remainder of his life, by a long and unobscured course of the highest honour, and the strictest integrity. The result of his conduct was the esteem and affection of the people, and the favour of the emperor Vespasian. Under Vespasianus, he held the office of proconsul in Asia, and returned to Rome not only with an unsullied character, but with an increase of reputation, proportioned to his elevated employment. From this period, he resolved to withdraw from public affairs, and to indulge the bent of his mind by courting the muses, in honourable retirement. His wealth enabled him to gratify his taste, in procuring property in the country, recommended either by the dignity of its former possessor, or beauty of situation. He purchased Cicero's villa at Tusculum, Frascati, and an estate which was said to have once belonged to Virgilius, in the neighbourhood of Neäpölis, Naples. The birthday of the prince of Latin poets, Silius celebrated every year with the greatest solemnity, and it must be allowed, that admiration of his genius, has led him to too close an imitation of the Æneid. An incurable ulcer distressed him for a long time, which kept him in close retirement, and finding all remedies unsuccessful, he starved himself to death, not however until he had seen his eldest son consul. His younger son died at reaching manhood, before he had gained any distinguished office in the state. The only writing of Silius, transmitted to modern times, is his poem in seventeen books on the second Punic war, a work less read, and less known, than its merits deserve. The poet has too servilely copied Virgilius, and to say that he has fallen short of the original, is no disparagement, for where is the author since the days of the Mantuan bard, who would have equalled him? In many passages, there is great poetical merit, which discovers a vigorous mind, rich in the stores of graphic delineation, just sentiment, and classical elegance. From the great length of the work, and from the nature of the subject, the reader may expect to meet occasionally with tedious narration, and uninteresting particulars. It does not appear that Silius intended to write an Epic poem properly so called; since his work contains more historical facts, than poetical fictions. Indeed it would be rash to assert, that there is a single poetical character in the whole work. Hannibal, the chief personage, appears in no other view than as represented in history, without being adorned either by imaginary qualities, or fanciful embellishments, to give additional dignity or sublimity, on purpose to exalt him in the imagination of the reader. We find this hero just as described by Pölſbius or Livius, the historians followed by our author. Scipio, who, at a future period, conquered Hannibal, acts no part at the commencement of the poem, and afterwards makes his first appearance as a strippling, in a very subordinate rank. No doubt he rises in fame and greatness, but chiefly towards the end, and can scarcely be reckoned among Epic characters. It is perhaps only doing justice to the author, to account his work an historical, not an Epic poem; as he has followed none of the rules necessary to constitute a poem of the latter description. The siege of Saguntum, Muriedra, forms the commencement of his subject, as it did of the second Punic war, and he goes on narrating battles and events, as they occurred, in chronological order, with nearly the same accuracy as the historians already mentioned. The topic which he had chosen to celebrate, being real, not fabulous, and the events of modern date, necessarily rejected the grandeur of machinery, and all the advantages resulting from remote antiquity. Much valuable information with respect to persons and places, will be obtained by a careful perusal of this poem. Many Romans distinguished themselves by their courage, prudence, and patriotism, during that celebrated war; and Silius brings them distinctly to view in their real characters, undisguised by poetical exaggeration. The young reader should be cautioned, not to take many of the adjectives derived from nations, individuals, or places, in their primary acceptation; for they often refer to the colonies planted, and cities built, by their descendants. Pörpētius Silius, from the steadiness of his character and friendship (Mart. vii. 64).

P. Silius Nerva, P. Sili Nerve, m. was the colleague of Ap. Junius Silanus, in the consulship, in the year 28 (Tac. Ann. iv. 68). In the consular calendar he is called P. Silanus Nerva.—2. Held the consulship with M. Vestinus Atticus, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xv. 48).

Q. Silius, Q. Sili, m. a plebeian, and one of the first questors not of patrician rank. His election took place in 408 B. C. (Liv. iv. 54).

T. Silius, T. Sili, m. an officer whom P. Crassus sent to the Vēnēti q. v. to procure grain and forage for Vēlānus. But the Vēnēti seized them in expectation of regaining their hostages by this measure (Cæs. B. G. iii. 7).

Sillāces, is, m. a prefect of the Parthian king, under whom and Surēnas, Crassus and his army were totally destroyed (Flor. iii. 11).

Silo, ōnis, m. a man of vicious character, whom Cātillus upbraids for breach of agreement, in a transaction discreditable to the morals of both (ciii).

Silo Pōmpēdius, Silonis Pōmpēdii, m. (Pōpēdius, Flor. iii. 18), the author of the Social war, and commanded the Mārsi. He fell in battle, in 90 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 76).

Silpa, as f. a town in the south of Spain, near Betis, the Guadalquivir, at which the Carthaginian generals Mago, the son of Hāmilcar, and Hādrōbal, son of Gisgo, encamped with a powerful army, resolved to give battle to P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Africanus, in 208 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 12). It is quite unknown, and some suppose the reading should be Ilipa, agreeably to Appianus (Bel. Hisp.).

Silvānus, i. Phr. Silvāni, orum, m. the Silvans, were gods, or rather semi-gods, of the woods, whence their name is derived. They are often confounded with the Fauns and Satyrs, which they resembled in appearance, uniting the human form with that of a goat. This species, or class, of demi-gods was wholly Roman; no such name occurs in the writings of the Greeks. The Roman men sacrificed pigs to Silvānus (Juv. Sat. vi. 447). The husbandmen presented him only with milk (Hor. Epis. ii. 1. 143).

Silvia, as f. daughter of Tŷrrhēus, the chief herdsman of Lātinius, king of Lātium, whom Virgilius describes taking great care of the stag, the killing of which was the commencement of hostilities between Ænēas and the Italians. She adorned the horns of that domesticated animal, combed his hair, and washed him in a pure spring. Her grief on the animal flying home after it was wounded, is naturally described, and, after the first burst of her sorrow, she called on the peasantry to avenge that barbarous act (Virg. Æn. vii. 487). To this event reference is made by Mārtialis (xiii. 96).

Silvius, i. m. according to Livius, was the son of Ascēnius, accidentally born in a wood, to which circumstance his name has been referred. Others make him the son of Ænēas and Lāvīnia q. v. born after his father's death, which appears to have been the opinion of Virgilius. From him the kings of Alba were descended (Virg. Æn. vi. 763), and had the surname of Silvius (Liv. i. 3).

Silures, um, m. a British nation, who occupied part of Wales; Hertfordshire, &c. Cārētācus, renowned for his valour, added to their courage, and all who considered peace with Rome, as another name for slavery, flocked to his standard. Neither the merits of the commander, nor the innate love of freedom, and dauntless intrepidity of the troops, could overcome the discipline and bravery of the Romans. Frōntinus conquered them, but not before they had made many gallant efforts to secure their independence (Tac. Ann. xii. 32 seq.).

Simbrāvinus, v. Simbrānius, et, Simbrāvinus, a. um. Simbrāni cōlles, the hills overhanging the lake or lakes from which the emperor Claudius brought water to Rome (Tac. Ann. xi. 13). Simbrāna stāgna, three in number, and remarkable for the clearness of their water, and beautiful scenery around them (Tac. Ann. xiv. 22). They all fall into Anlo (Plin. i. 361). Simbrāvinus Rēus.

Simila, as f. a grove, which appears to have been in the neighbourhood of Rome. In it the Bācchānālia were celebrated (L. xxxix. 12). Here the readings vary, a some suppose it should be Sēmēla Sīmōli (Ov. Fast. vi. 503).

Simmas, as m. son of Andrēmon, orde by Alexander the Great to be brought in purpose to see the body of Alēx^{er}.

cēstes, after he had been put treason. An investigation conducted and that of Amŷntas is lowered. The latter made ar (Curt. vii. 1).

Simo, ōnis, m. an old man, the Andria of Tērēntius. f cozened Simo (Hor. Art. Poet. 238).—2. A slave of Herod, who usurped the sovereignty of Judæa, on the death of his master. Quinctilius Vārus, governor of Sýria, punished him for his rashness, and divided the kingdom among the three sons of Herod, giving Judæa to Archelāus, Gālilee to Hērōdes Antipas, and Trāchōnitis to Philippus Hērōdes (Tac. Hist. v. 9).—3. A commander of one of three armies in the Jewish war against the Romans. Iōānnes and Elēzārus were at the head of the other two armies. The three parties having quarrelled among themselves, laid stratagems against each other, fought several battles within the walls of Jerusalem, and consumed part of the city, with a large quantity of grain, by fire. After the destruction of Eleazar and his whole party, dread of the enemy then at their gates compelled the two contending factions to unite in their own defence (Tac. Hist. v. 12).

Simōis, ēntis, m. the Callifat Osmak, according to the statement of a late traveller (Clark), who says it is a branch of Scāmānder, the Mender. At their junction, the depth of Simōis, the Callifat Osmak, is considerable; but it is nearly stagnant, which does not correspond with the epithet Rōpidus, applied to it by Virgilius (Æn. v. 261). The small village Callifat, on the bank of this stream, not far from the place where it falls into the Mender, has given its name to Simōis, in modern times. It has its rise in mount Ida, hence Prōpētiūs, Idæus Simōis, who makes that mountain the birthplace of Jūpiter, confounding the Ida to the north of Troy with the Ida of Crēta, Candia (iii. 1. 27). It is proper to add, that the site of Trōja, the rivers or streams, which the ancients denominated Simōis, and Scāmānder or Xānthus, the plain of Trōja, &c., have been much disputed of late years; and that the result of no inquiry, which has yet been laid before the public, approaches to certainty on any one of these points. See Xānthus. Lubricus Simōis, the serpentine or winding Simōis (Hor. Epod. xlii. 21). Hēlēnus called Dodon one of the rivers of Epirus, Simōis, now Pistritza, hence to distinguish it from the Trojan rivers of that name, Virgilius writes Pāleus Simōis (Æn. iii. 302).

Simōisius, i. m. son of Anthēmion, killed by Ajāx Telāmōnius. His mother bore him on the banks of the Simōis, hence his name (Hom. Il. iv. 474 seq.).

Simōnides, is, m. an eminent Greek poet, was a native of Cos, Lango. His father's name was Lēōprēpis, who appears, from Æliānus, to have been a man of a strong mind, and probably possessed of considerable wealth. In his native island, Simōnides established a school, into which he introduced dancing, and singing in chorus. Disappointment or some other cause induced him to quit Cos, and to repair to the court of Hērō, king of Sýracūsæ, a prince distinguished for wisdom and the patronage of learned men. Here he shared the munificent liberality of that monarch, died in that town at the advanced age of ninety, and was buried with great magnificence. Simōnides wrote epigrams, plays, epic poems, and elegies. In the last, he excelled, and Quinctiliānus commends him for the propriety and sweetness of his style, which was rather plain and neat, than flowery or forcible. His chief excellence consisted in exciting sympathy and commiseration, in which respect some preferred him to all writers of the same kind. Poetry did not constitute his only merit. He devised some remarkable maxims, and his answer to Hērō, who asked him "what God is," showed a mind of deep reflection, "the larger I consider the subject, the more distant it appears to me." He tarnished his reputation by a sordid love of gain, and has not escaped censure, for being the first who prostituted the muses for hire. In the generosity of the heroes who employed him to celebrate their praises, he had no confidence, but pined for the sum which he was to receive, and only wrote for pecuniary reward. He meddled about the towns of Asia, singing the conquerors at the public games, in order to obtain money. The artificial memory was his invention, and the result of thinking and on the place where each of the company is sitting at an entertainment, which he had scarcely left, when the house fell, and he figured their bodies so completely, that their relations could not distinguish them. Some fragments of his writings still remain. Tacitus writes, that to him has been ascribed the merit of completing the Greek alphabet, which formerly consisted only of fifteen letters (Ann. xi. 14). Adj. Simōnidēs, x. um. Simōnidēs lācrimæ, the tears of Simōnides, i. e. the tears excited by the elegiac Simōnides (Cat. xxxviii. 8).

Simos, m. a native of Phōcæa, Fochia, who with Prōtis, commanded the fleet which carried the colony from that city to the mouth of Rhōdānus, the Rhone, where they found a settlement, and built Māsilla, Marseilles in 546 B. C. (Just. xliii. 3).

Simūlus, i. m. an husbandman (Virg. Georg. 3).

Sina, is, m. a mountain of Arābia, of which Moses took possession, according to the inaccurate account of Jūstinus (xxxvi. 2).

Sinatrocēs, is, m. son of Pirātes. He ascended the throne of Pārthia in 70 B. C. and was succeeded by his son Pirātes in 53 B. C.

Sinchi, orum, m. a people of enormous cruelty, who lived on Pōntus Euxinus (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8). See Artach.

Sinda, orum, n. a town of Persia (Strab. 825 seq.). Inh. Sindēnses, lum, m. (Id. xxxviii. 15). Adj. Sindēnsis, is, e. Sindēnsis ager.—2. Cin. a town of India.

Sindes. See Gydes.
Sindi, orum, m. a Scythian nation, to the east of Bosphōrus Cimmerius, the Strait of Caffa. Degēnēres Sindi, mean, contemptible Sinds (Val. Flacc. vi. 86). Adj. Sindicus, a, um. Sindicus pōrtus, Sundgöl. Sindica cēltas, the state or territory of the Sindi (Plin. i. 659).

Sindus, i. f. a town of Mýgdōnia (Herod. vii. 123).

Singāra, is, f. Singar, a town of Mēsopotāmia, Al-jezirah, at which the Roman emperor Cōnstantius lost a certain victory, by the inconsiderate rashness of the troops, in the year 348 (Eutrop. x. 10). This town gives name to a range of mountains in the neighbourhood.

Singidōnum, i. n. Seged, or, Sinaetrez, a town of Pannōnia. Inh. Singidōnenses, ium, m. Adj. Singidōnensis, is, e. Singidōnensis ager (Aur. Vic. Ep. 44).

Sinis, is, m. son of Pölýpemon and Silēa, whom Hyginus calls Pityocampes, from his bending pine trees. He was a robber of great cruelty, who put men to death by tying them to trees which, by his prodigious strength, he had brought forcibly together. On cutting the ropes which kept them bent, the unhappy victims were instantly torn in pieces, by the elasticity of the trees returning them to their former position. Thēseus made him suffer the same death (Ov. Met. vii. 440. Stat. Th. xii. 576). The name is frequently written Scinis (Prop. iii. 22. 37).

Sinūces, is, m. a Parthian of noble birth, and of great opulence, by whose advice the Parthians entered into a conspiracy against Artābānus, in the year 34 (Tac. Ann. vi. 31 seq.).

Sinon, ōnis, m. a Greek of great art, resolution, and cunning, who presented himself to Trojan shepherds, after his countrymen had, by a feint, quitted the coast of Troy, pretending that he had incurred the displeasure of Ulysses, by threatening to revenge the death of Pālāmēdes, his relation, whom that prince by a fictitious accusation had prevailed on the Greeks to put to death as a traitor. He falsely stated, that his countrymen, dispirited by the long continuance of the siege, and despairing of carrying the city by force, wished to give up the war, and to return home. Storms for a time prevented their sailing. On consulting the oracle of Apōllo, they were informed, that in order to procure a favourable wind, they must sacrifice a Grecian life, and that Calchas, the soothsayer, at the instigation of Ulysses, had doomed him to the altar. He readily allowed, that he had effected his escape before the fatal day arrived, and in return for the kindness of the Trojans, who had promised him his life, he offered to make a discovery which would be as beneficial to the subjects of Priāmus, as it would be destructive to the Greeks. He then informed them, that the wooden horse, which was then before them, had been built to appease the vengeance of Dīāna, which had been excited by Ulysses and Diōmēdes carrying off the Pallādium from her temple. By an ingenious but deceitful speech, for the truth of which he often appealed to the gods, he convinced the credulous Trojans of his sincerity, and prevailed on them to make a breach in the wall, and admit the wooden horse full of Greeks into the city. During the following night, the perjured Sinon opened it, and his countrymen who were enclosed in its belly came out, unbarred the gates of Troy, by which the Grecians entered, and set the city on fire (Virg. Æn. ii. 57 seq.).

Sinōpē, es, f. Sinab, or, Sinub, the chief city of Paphlagonia, the birthplace of Diōgēnes the Cynic, hence Ovidius calls him Cynicus Sinōpēus (Ep. Pont. i. 3. 67). Mithridates was also a native of this city, and in it he both reigned and died. Plinius mentions it as a colony, but at what time the Roman colony was established there, and of the nature of the settlement, history gives no certain information (i. 650). Lucullus, on taking it from Mithridates, declared it a free town (Ap. Bel. Mith.). Inh. Sinōpēuses, iun (Sing. Sinōpēnsis, is), m. The ambassadors of Eumēnes, Phārnāces, and the Rhodians, had an audience of the Roman senate, and complained of the sufferings of the Sinōpēnses, in 184 B. C. (Liv. xl. 2). Sinōpis, idis, f. a kind of red stone, much praised by Plinius, which was first found in Pōntus, and received its name from Sinōpē. This author mentions three varieties of this kind of stone (v. 184).—2. See Sinūceus.

Sintia, æ, f. a town on the river Strýmon. Inh. Sintii, orum, m. (Liv. xlii. 51). Adj. Sinticus, a, um. Hēraclea Sintica. See Hēraclea.

Sinticē, es, f. the district around Sintia q. v. Sinties, um, m. the inhabitants of Lēmnos. They had this name from the Greek verb sinō, I hurt; because they were said to have been the first who invented, or fabricated martial weapons of iron. They received Vulcānus, on his fall from the skies (Hom. Il. i. 594).

Sintricus, i, m. a king of Pārthia, and father of Phrāates (Ap. Bel. Mith. 242).

Sinūessa, æ, f. a town of Lātium, to the south of Lāris, the Garigliano, which had its name from being situated in Vēscinus Sinus. It was built by Greeks, who called it Sinōpē, which the Roman colonies changed into Sinūessa (Liv. x. 21). Its ruins are near Rocca di Mondragone. Mollis Sinūessa (Mart. vi. 42). Adj. Sinūessinus, a, um. Sinūessinus pōpulus, the inhabitants of Sinūessa (Liv. xxvii. 38). Sinūessana aqua (Liv. xxii. 13), called by Mārtialis Sinūessana unda (xi. 83), hot baths at Sinūessa, held in high repute by the ancients, hence Silius Itālicus, Tepēns Sinūessa (viii. 527). According to popular belief, these waters cured barrenness in women, and madness in men (Plin. iv. 778). Sinūessanus ager, the territory of Sinūessa, which produced good wine (Plin. i. 240).

Siphnus, i, f. an island off the coast of Attica. Inh. Siphni, orum, m. (Herod. iii. 57).

Sipūs, ūntis, f. v. Sipūntum, i, n. a city of the Daunii, a people of Apūlia, a district of Italy (Luc. Phar. v. 377). The Romans changed this name into Sipōntum, according to the idiom of their language. Strābo makes it the work of Diōmēdes, adding that it had the name of Sēpius, from Sēpia, a kind of fish, thrown out there by the billows. Alexander, king of Epirus, took it, in 325 B. C. Here a Roman colony was planted, in 196 B. C., and eight years after, new settlers were sent thither, in consequence of its being deserted (Liv. viii. 24 seq.). The modern town Manfredonia, has been built from the ruins of Sipōntum. Inh. Sipōntii, orum, m. Adj. Sipōntinus, a, um. Sipōntina scietas (Cic. Agr. ii. 26).

Sipylus, i, m. a son of Niōbē, whom Apōllo killed by an arrow (Ov. Met. vi. 231). Adj. Sipylēus, a, um. Sipylēia gēnitrāx, Niōbē (Stat. Syl. v. i. 33).

Sipylus, i, m. Cusinus, a mountain and town of Lȳdia, which, according to Strābo, an earthquake destroyed (86). The mountain, or more probably, a part of the mountain, had at a distance the appearance of a woman weeping, but lost that form on its being approached (Paus. i. 21). See Niōbē. Inh. Sipylēni, orum (Sing. Sipylēnus, i), m. Adj. Sipylēus, a, um.

Sipyrhicus, a, m. an Ætolian, who was at the head of the embassy sent by his countrymen to Hēraclea, to consult with L.

Apústius, and Attálos, king of Asia, in 202 B. C. At that meeting, he accomplished little for the good of his countrymen, as Attálos refused the troops which he asked, from their not aiding him against Philippus, king of Mæcédônia, when desolating the country about Përgama, and the Romans only gave promise, whereas the Etóli required immediate assistance (Liv. xxxi. 46).

Siráci, orum, v. Siráces, um, m. a people of Asia, to the south of Mount Caucásus (Tac. Ann. xii. 15). Their name is variously written.

Síre, arum, f. a town of Odómántica térra, in Thrácia, at which the Roman consul L. Æmilius Paulus received a letter from Perséus, king of Mæcédônia, soon after he had defeated him at Pýdna (Liv. xlv. 4).

Síren, énis, f. a Carthaginian, or Sicilian ship, which the Roman consul Mærcéllus burned, in a naval engagement off the coast of Sicília, Sicily, during the second Punic war. Pennata Siren (Sil. Ital. xiv. 567).

Sírenes, um, f. See Sýrenes.

Síris, is, f. Torre di Senna, a town of Lúcia, a district of Italy, at the mouth of Síris, the Senna (Just. xx. 2).—2. A town of Pæónia. Inh. Sirópeónes, um, m. only possessed part of that district (Herod. v. 15).

Sírtus, i, m. a star of the first magnitude, in the mouth of the Dog, which rises about the time the sun enters Leo, towards the end of July, making what we call the dog-days. The heat of that period is beautifully described by Virgilius (G. iv. 425 seq.). Hyginus says, that it has this name from its brightness (propter flammæ candorem); and others derive it from the Greek verb σείω, I dry. Adj. Sírtus, a, um. Síria sídera (Claud. el. 124).

Sírmio, ónis, f. Sermione, a peninsula in Baniacus, Lago di Garda, subject to violent agitations. Cæcilius had a villa on this peninsula, which is nearly in the centre of the lake (Catul. xxxi. 12).

Sírmium, i, n. Alt Schabacz, a town of Pánnônia, at the junction of Bacunius, the Bozzent, with Sávus, the Sáve. Under the later Roman emperors, this city, in grandeur and wealth, ranked among the first in that overgrown state. The country in which it stood retains the name of Sírmia. The emperor Próbns, who was a native of this city, was killed near it in the year 282 (Eutrop. ix. 17). Inh. Sírmíenses, ium, m. (Aur. Vic. Cas. 29).

Sírpheus, i, m. a centurion in the Roman army, whom the eighth legion would have put to death, had not the fifteenth prevented them, in the year 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 23).

Sisámmes, is, m. the father of Otánes, one of the royal judges, whom Cambyses slayed alive for his perversion of justice, and, having covered a seat with his skin, caused his son, whom he had appointed to the same office, to sit upon it, and ordered him to keep constantly in memory what tribunal he occupied (Herod. v. 25).

Sisária, orum, n. a fort in Mésopotámia (Ann. Mar. xviii. 6).

Siscénnius Iacchus, Siscénnii Iacchi, m. an eminent grammarian in the south of France (Suet. II. Gram. 3).

Sisela, æ, f. Sisecchi, a town at the junction of Sávus, the Sáve, and Cólápis, the Kulp (Plin. i. 385. Vel. Pat. ii. 113).

Sisénēs, is, m. a Persian, once governor of Egypt, who had been sent to Philippos, king of Mæcédônia, by his sovereign. The kindness of Philippos induced him to remain in that country, but when Alexander set out for the east, he accompanied that warlike youth, and was reckoned amongst the most faithful of his friends. An accident subjected him to the suspicion of Alexander, by whose order he lost his life (Curt. iii. 7).

Sisénna, æ, m. a man who excelled inillery and sarcasm (Hor. Sat. i. 7. 8). Some suppose that he is the person whom Cicero calls Cornélius Sisénna, of whom the historian relates an anecdote equally dishonourable to Augustus, as to Sisénna and his wife. Cicero ranks him among the orators, and he has been commended for his learning, knowledge, and humour. He wrote Roman history, and translated Aristides, whose lascivious writings disgraced his memory, and he seems to have likewise inserted anecdotes of the same offensive kind, in his own historical compositions (Ov. Trist. ii. 44).

—2. A centurion in the Roman army, who, returning from Syria, landed on the island Cýthnus, where an impostor, who pretended to be the emperor Néro, would have put him to death, unless he had joined his standard, but he effected his escape from the island (Tac. Hist. ii. 8).

Sisichthon, ónis, m. a name given by ancient poets to Neptúnus, from an idea that he was the cause of earthquakes (Aur. Met. xvii. 7).

Sisýphus, i, m. a son of Æólus and Eurétta, brother of Athámas and Salmónax, was a distinguished Grecian prince. He built a city, called at first Ephýrē, and afterwards, Córínthus, Corinth, on the isthmus which joins Pélóponnésus, the Moræa, to the continent of Greece. He married Mécopé, a daughter of Atlas, by whom he had several children. The great powers both of his mind and body, he prostituted to the most and dishonourable practices of deception and robbery. It was asserted by some, that Anticlea, the mother of Ulysses, was pregnant to Sisýphus at the time she married Læertes, on which account Ajax reproaches Ulysses with being the son of that notorious thief (Ov. Met. xlii. 31). For his crimes, he was condemned in the Infernal Regions, to roll, to the top of a high mountain, a huge stone, which had no sooner gained the summit, than it rolled back with accelerated rapidity to the plain, thus rendering his punishment eternal (Ov. Met. iv. 429). Inquietus Sisýphus (Mart. x. 5); and in the same sense the same poet has Læsus Sisýphus (v. 81). Sisýphides, æ, m. Ulysses (Ov. Art. Am. iii. 313). Adj. Sisýphus, a, um. Crætus Sisýpho sanguinē, a son of Sisýphus, i. e. Ulysses, according to Ajax (Ov. Met. xlii. 32).

Sitácēnē, es, f. a country in Bábýlônia, of which the capital was Sitácē, now Karkaf, in ruins (Curt. v. 2). Inh. Sitácēni, orum, m. (Steph.).

Sitálces, is, m. one of those who murdered Parménion, by order of Alexander the Great (Curt. x. 1).

Sithocus, i, m. a Gallogrecian, whose hand Mithridates employed against his own life, after he had been defeated by Pómpéius (Aur. Vic. Vir. II. 76).

Sithōnia, æ, f. a district or country of Thracia, Romulia, or, Romania, between the mountain Haemus and Ister, the Danube, towards the mouth of that river. Sithōnia is often used for Thrace in general; which Gellius makes the original name of that country (xiv. 6). Inh. Sithōnii, orum, m. Eclis non lēis Sithōnia, Bacchus not gentle to the Sithōnii; severe to the Thracians (Hor. Od. i. 18. 9). That nation was remarkable for their brutality and quarrelsomeness when drinking, having seldom a festival which ended without bloodshed. Sithōnis, idis, f. of Thrace, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Sithōnis unda, the Thracian sea, i. e. the northern part of the Archipelago (Ov. Ep. Her. ii. 6). Adj. Sithōnius, a, um, of Sithōnia, of Thracia, Thracian. Sithōnia nives, Thracian, or northern snows, i. e. deep snows (Virg. B. x. 66). Sithōnia nūris, Thracian matrons (Ov. Met. vi. 588).

Sitūs, is, f. Setif, a town of Mauritania, Morocco and Fez. Adj. Sitūsensis, is, e (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Sitōnes, um, m. a Suevian nation, who, in the opinion of the best critics, inhabited Norway. If acquiescence in this judgment may be safely conceded, it proves the immense extent of territory possessed by that people (Tac. Mor. Ger. 45).

P. Sittius, P. Sittii, m. a Roman knight, born at Nuceria, Nocera, of which there were more than one in Italy, and therefore it is difficult to ascertain that to which Sallustius refers. He engaged in the conspiracy with Cātīlina, and having been summoned to stand trial, before the discovery of that detestable combination, he fled to Africa with a number of his associates and dependents, and assisted the king of Mauritania, Morocco and Fez, against the neighbouring princes. Cicero, in his oration for P. Cornēllius Sūlla, says, that he quitted the city in consequence of his agreement with the king of Mauritania, that he had formerly been there, and that the idea of his being in the conspiracy was absurd. The orator describes him as a respectable man, and calls him his old friend and acquaintance (Cic. Or. pro Sul. 20). It ought to be kept in mind, that Cicero was pleading for P. Cornēllius Sūlla, and that wishing to make the most of his case, he uttered at the bar a character most probably different from his real sentiments. We have the authority of Sallustius for believing that Cātīlina reckoned him among his friends (Sal. Cat. 21). Dio Cāssius informs us, that Sittius with his troops joined the standard of C. Jūlius Caesar in Africa.

Sitzges, um, m. a people in Scythia extra Imaum, to the south of the Anubii (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Smēnus, i, m. a river of remarkably sweet water, which has its source in Taygetus, Pente Dactylon (Paus. iii. 24).

Smēdis, is, m. a brother of Cāmbyēs, king of Persia, who ordered him to be put to death, because he had dreamed that he saw him sitting on the throne. Before the execution of that sentence, Cāmbyēs accidentally received a dangerous wound; but his death did not save the life of his brother (Just. i. 9).

Smillax, acis, f. a nymph beloved by Crō-cos, both of whom were changed into flowers, in return for the chaste and innocent lives which they led (Ov. Met. iv. 283).

Smynthēus, ēos, m. a name of Apōllō, which, according to Eustathius, and others, he received from Smynthus, a town in the Troad (Ov. Met. xii. 585). The Scholiast on Hōmērus derives it from Smynthos, a mouse, in the language of the Trojans, that god having saved the people from a plague of mice.

Smȳrna, rar. Zmȳrna, æ, f. Ismir, or, Ismir, a principal town of Iōnia, built by Tāntālus, who called it Naulōchus. It afterwards received the name of Smȳrna, from Smȳrnē, an Amazon. The natives did not know whether Tāntālus, a son of Jūpiter, or Thēsēus, the son of a god, or one of the ancient Amazons, founded their city. Here M. Brūtus and C. Cāssius met in 44 B. C., to plan the war which they were about to carry on against Augustus and M. Antōnius (Liv. Ep. 122). Inh. Smȳrnei, orum (Sing. Smȳrneus, i), m. believed that Hōmērus was their countryman. They were much given to luxury and extravagance; but brave and vigorous, when roused to action (Tac. Ann. iv. 56). Adj. Smȳrneus, a, um. Smȳrneus vites, Hōmērus (Luc. Phar. ix. 984). Smȳrnei mōres, a proverbial expression, for effeminate and luxurious manners.

Smȳrna, m, f. a poem of Cinnā, commended by Cātūllus (xv).

Sobli, e. Sibli, orum, m. a people of India, who believed that their ancestors had served in the army of Hērēcles, and, on account of sickness, had been left in that country. For clothes they had the skins of wild beasts, and for weapons, clubs, when Alexander the Great was in that part of Asia, in 327 B. C. (Curt. ix. 4).

Sōchus, i, f. Derbesah, a town of Syria, to the east of Iasius Sinus, the Gulf of Seanderoon.

Sōciālē bellum, the Social war, was a consequence of M. Livius Drusus q. e., a tribune of the people, holding out the pernicious hope of pecuniary rewards, and promising to the states of Italy the freedom of the city, on purpose to obtain their support in effecting certain measures. To gratify the expectations which he had excited, surpassed his power, and the ensuing discontent gave rise to secret meetings and conspiracies; from which resulted the Social war, a name given by that nation to lessen the odium, but it was in reality a civil war. The Mārsi, Pēlignī, Vēstini and Mārrucini first took up arms, and were joined by the Picēntes, Fērentīni, Hirpini, Pōmpeiani, Vēnusini, Apūli, Lūciani and Sānnites (Ap. Bel. Civ. 374). Many other states revolted to the enemy, but their names are not recorded. The Umbri declared against the Romans, and were defeated by A. Plōtius, as did also the Hirpini, whom L. Cornēllius Sūlla overpowered, in 90 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 70 seq.).

Sōclides, æ, m. a native of Egina, the eldest son of Agēsīmāchus (Pin. Nem. vi. 85).

Sōcrātes, is, m. son of Sōphroniscus, a statuary, was a native of Athens. His mother, Phēnārētē, followed the profession of a midwife, a proof of the poverty, or at least mean condition of his parents. In early life, Sōcrātes wrought with his father, and statues, admired for the taste and elegance of their execution, have been mentioned by some writers of antiquity as his workmanship. At what age he quitted this mechanical employment, and applied himself to the study of mind, history affords no certain information. He studied first under Archélâus and Anaxagoras, from whom he learned the first principles of that knowledge, which formed the basis of his personal character, and philosophical opinions. To talents, powerful beyond what almost ever falls to the lot of man, he added bodily activity and martial courage. Two of his friends and scholars, Alcibiâdes and Xénophon, owed the preservation of their lives to his military prowess. His whole aim appears to have been to persuade men to check and subdue their vicious and irregular desires, and to cultivate and improve their virtuous and proper inclinations. The mental serenity and the dauntless firmness which he himself possessed, and which nothing could disturb or alarm, he recommended to others, and exemplified in his own life. He fearlessly condemned whatever he disapproved in the conduct of his countrymen, for which they assailed him with every species of abuse, contumely, and misrepresentation. Sôcrâtes pitied their malevolence, disregarded their insults, despised their threats, and exerted himself to rectify their vicious practices, and ameliorate their lives. Wherever he could do good he attended, and the dignity with which he applauded what was just and beneficial, gave an importance to his opinions, which the purity of his character, and the simplicity of his doctrines rendered doubly impressive. That undisturbed serenity which his mind possessed, and the irresistible force of truth, which even prejudice could not withstand, made the Athenians consider him a being of a superior order. Like the summit of a mountain which rises above the storm and enjoys perpetual tranquillity, the mind of Sôcrâtes, by controlling every turbulent and irregular passion, basked in the perpetual sunshine of undisturbed repose, considering every thing inferior to itself. This noble and just conception of the human mind procured inestimable advantages to the philosopher, and communicated to succeeding generations much of what is valuable. He was the founder of moral science. He taught in no particular place, but conversed freely and readily with all who chose to hear him. To give men just opinions and to render them happy, engrossed his whole attention. Little solicitous about the celebrity of his name, or the number and rank of his scholars. To combine a system of opinions, and acquire the name of the author of a new philosophy, formed no part of his plan, and were indeed trivial in comparison of the noble purposes which he had ever in view. He divested the study of wisdom of its asperities and technicalities, adapting it to all classes of the community, on which account he was said to have brought philosophy from heaven. Aristôphânes first attacked the character of Sôcrâtes, in his comedy of "the clouds" at the instigation of Melitus, and the fickle populace began to utter their unfounded calumnies and spiteful malignity against a man, who was not only the ornament and benefactor of their state, but the boast of mankind. Melitus, Anitus and Lycon arraigned him before the tribunal of the five hundred, for corrupting the Athenian youth for innovations in religion, and for ridiculing the gods of his native city. On these false charges, partial judges, on the testimony of perjured witnesses, found him guilty, and sentenced him to death. He rejected, beneath the dignity of a philosopher, the speech of his friend Lysias, composed with great art for his defence, alleging that goodness of mind and contempt of danger were becoming in a mortal being destined to live for ever with the gods. In his defence, he spoke with great animation, energy and firmness, disproving the false accusations, and appealing to all who knew him, for the truth of his statements. He was condemned to drink hemlock, and having recommended his children to the protection of the judges, he retired to prison with perfect composure in the prospect of death. The festival of Dêlia deferred his execution for thirty days, and during that period he conversed with his friends on a variety of topics, a considerable part of which Xénophon and Plato have recorded. With the same composure of mind, which he showed through life, he drank the hemlock, and, in a short time after, expired. The Athenians soon repented of this outrage against virtue and philosophy, and, for their criminality, his accusers and enemies suffered the merited contempt and hatred of the citizens; some of them fell by their own hand, others were banished, and one was put to death. It ought not to be forgotten, that, by means of his friends he might have easily escaped from prison; but he considered such a measure derogatory to his principles, and added, "Whether shall I flee to escape the inevitable doom of the human race?" Alcibiâdes laughed at Sôcrâtes, whom he found riding on a stick, and playing in the midst of his children (Val. Max. viii. 8). Adj. Sôcrâticus, a. um. Sôcrâtica dômus, the sect of Sôcrâtes, i. e. the writings of the philosophers, who adopted his opinions (Hor. Od. i. 29. 14). Midd. Sôcrâtici sêrmônibus, imbued with Socratic conversations, i. e. skilled in Socratic philosophy (Hor. Od. iii. 21. 9). Sôcrâticeorûm, the Socratic order, i. e. succession of Socratic philosophers (Claud. xvii. 87). Sôcrâtici pênâtes, frugal Socratic sect, in comparison of the Epicureans (Juv. Sat. xiv. 320). Sôcrâtici cladi, men of vicious lives, who professed the philosophy of Sôcrâtes, i. e. discoursed and reasoned like that philosopher, but practised unnatural vices (Juv. Sat. ii. 10). —2. Appointed governor of Cilicia, by Alexander the Great, in 332 B. C. (Curt. iv. 5). Sôcrâtici, ônis, m. a man of infamous character (Catul. xlvii). Socûnda, orum, n. a maritime city of Hircânîa (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). It probably stood on a river of the same name, called also Sârnius, near Attrucki. Sôcus, i, m. a man who fell by the hand of Ulysses, but not before he had given that hero a severe wound. He was the son of Hippâsus, and brother of Chârôps (Hom. Il. xi. 427 seq.). Sobâris, is, m. a Mede, whom Cýrus freed from prison, and afterwards made his intimate friend and companion. That monarch gave his own sister in marriage to Sobâris (Just. i. 6).

Sōfōnus Tīgēllīnus, Sōfōnū Tīgēllīnī, m. entered into the conspiracy against the Roman emperor Cālīgūla, for which M. Lēpīdus, and Lēntūlus Gētīllus, suffered death. At that time Sōfōnus lay under sentence of banishment, for adultery with Agrippīna, from which he extricated himself, restored Cōssūtianus Cāpitō, his son-in-law, into the senate, after he had been expelled, became one of the prefects of the praetorian cohorts, and gained the entire confidence of the emperor Nēro. By his advice the emperor put several illustrious citizens to death. The entertainment given by him to Nēro on Agrippīna's lake, in point of extravagance, profusion, splendour, and infamy, was perhaps never surpassed. At it, Nēro married himself, as wife, to a man named Pŷthagōras, and soon after completed his crimes by setting fire to Rome. The flames of that conflagration first appeared in the garden of Sōfōnus. Nēro granted triumphal honours to Sōfōnus, erected his statue in the forum, adorned with triumphal decorations, and placed it likewise in the imperial palace. His great power induced the citizens to gratify his love of money by legacies, and he continued to enjoy his honours during the life of Nēro. At a future period, he declared for Gālba, whose successor Otho ordered him to put himself to death, in the year 69. He received the fatal news, in a circle of his concubines, of whom he took leave with tenderness, and, after some trifling delays, cut his throat with a razor, disgracing, says Tacitus, his infamous life, by a savage and dishonourable death (Ann. xiv. 48 seq.).

Sōgdīāna, ie. f. Usbeck Tartary, a country of central Asia. Inh. Sōgdī, v. Sōgdīānī, -orum, m. (Just. xii. 5). Adj. Sōgdīānus, -a, -um. Sōgdīānā prōvīncla (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Sōghēus, is, m. a native of Egina, whose victory at the Nemean games, Pīndārus has celebrated (Nem. vii.).

Sōhēnus, v. Sōānus, is, m. created king of Itūrrea, by the Roman emperor Cālīgūla, in the year 38. At his death, this kingdom was added to the province of Sŷria, in the year 49 (Tac. Ann. xii. 23).—2. A king of Sōphēnē, hence Tacitus calls him Sōphēnēs Sōhēnus (Ann. xiii. 7). That historian alludes to him (Hist. ii. 81 seq.).

Sol, is, m. the Sun, supposed to be the same with Apōllo and Phēbus q. v.

Solē, es, f. an island city of Hŷrcānīa (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Solī, -orum, f. Mezella, a town of Cilicia (Liv. xxxiii. 20). It was also called Sōlo, and Pōmpēiōpōlis q. v.—2. A town on the northwest side of the island Cŷprus, founded, according to tradition, by the advice of Sōlon, while an exile, in that island; hence its name. Strābo gives a different account of its foundation, which he refers to the Athenians Acmas and Phalērus. Inh. Sōlī, -orum, m. were originally Athenians, whose intercourse with foreigners corrupted their language, and from them impropriety of expression, or violation of grammar was called Sōlīcismus, v. Sōlēcismus. Of this derivation of Sōlēcismus, Strābo seems doubtful, and also Sōldas. What is said respecting the building and language of the inhabitants of the Cyprian city, is also told respecting the Cilician.

Sōlīmus, i, m. a man born on mount Ida, a companion of Aenēas, from whom Sūlmo, Sulmona, derived its name (Ov. Fast. iv. 79 seq.).

Sōlēis, -entis, f. a promontory of Africa (Herod. ii. 32).

Sōlon, -ōnis, m. son of Exēcēstides, a descendant of Cōdrus, was a native of Sālāmīs, Colouri. His mother was related to Pīsistrātus, who forms a prominent character in the history of the Athenians. Inheriting from his father a patrimony unequal to his support, he supplied the deficiency by trading as a merchant. His love of knowledge exceeded that of riches, and, therefore, he made his mercantile voyages contribute at least as much to his intellectual as to his worldly treasures. Besides exercising his genius in poetical composition, he early applied himself to the study of morals and politics. He soon acquired distinction among his countrymen, and by a stratagem which in modern times would excite only derision or contempt, he prevailed on the Athenians to renew the war for the recovery of Sālāmīs, Colouri, which, after a long and unsuccessful struggle, they had discontinued in such disgust, that they declared it capital for any one to renew their claims on that island. Pīsistrātus and he, having been intrusted with the command of the army, defeated the Megarensians, who had seized on Sālāmīs, and thus recovered his native island. The strength of his mind and the integrity of his heart spread his fame over the states of Greece, and the successful alliance which he formed in defence of the temple of Dēlphi, Castris, against the Cirrhaeans, added to his celebrity. To quell the dissensions which subsisted between the rich and the poor, and to terminate the oppression under which the debtors groaned, the Athenians appointed him Archon, with the united powers of supreme legislator and magistrate. His political sagacity, united with his activity, soon restored the contending parties to a good understanding; after which he formed a new distribution of the people, instituted new courts of judicature, and framed an excellent code of laws, which afterwards formed the basis of what the Romans denominated the Laws of the Twelve Tables. Like every other heathen legislator, he laboured under the great and insuperable disadvantage of ignorance respecting the true God, and of that pure morality, derived from the knowledge of the Scriptures, the only true source of national happiness. In his criminal laws, voluntary exile was the punishment for premeditated murder, and rape was considered a less crime than seduction. Having bound the Athenians by a solemn oath to observe his enactments for an hundred years, he resigned his office, removed from Athens, travelled into Egypt, and afterwards visited the court of Croesus, king of Lŷdia. Antiquity has transmitted several of his wise sayings to that monarch. After an absence of ten years, he returned to Athens, where he found his laws disregarded, and the greatest dissensions prevailing, in consequence of the usurpation of Pīsistrātus. Unable to bear the sight of such misery, he retired to Cŷprus, and died at the court of Philōcŷpus, king of that island, in the eightieth year of his age, about 558 B. C. It is scarcely necessary to add, that the ancients reckoned him one of the seven wise men of Greece. On the abolition of the monarchy, and establishment of the republic, the laws of Solon were again revived, and continued in full force for four hundred years. Three commissioners were sent from Rome to procure a copy of his laws, in 454 B. C. (Liv. iii. 31). Faciunda vix justis Solonis (Juv. Sat. x. 274). Æriumnisque Solonēs, and wretched Solons. The centurion means, that such men as Solon rendered themselves miserable by severe study (Pers. Sat. iii. 79).—2. Governor of Pŕdna, in 170 B. C. Through his agency the town was surrendered to Persēs, and sacked by the soldiers (Liv. xlv. 45).

Solŕnŕus, a, um. Solŕnŕus ager, v. campus, a level tract of land in Lŕtium, at the sources of Nŕnŕcius and Jŕtŕrna, near Lŕvinŕum, into which the Antiŕtes made an inroad, in the year 338 B. C. (Liv. viii. 12).

Solŕis, ŕntis, v. Solŕs, ŕntis, f. Solanto, a town of Sicily, which stood between Pŕnŕmus and Himŕra.—2. A promontory forming the extremity of Atlas, now called Cape Cantin (Herod. ii. 32).

Solŕvŕtŕtus, i, m. general of the Gallŕgrŕci, who had made war against Eumŕnes, king of Asia. The Roman ambassadors met this chieftain of the Gauls at Sŕnnŕda, in 169 B. C., when he appears to have acted with considerable violence (Liv. xlv. 34).

Solŕma, orum, n. Jerusalem, which Stŕphŕnus says was built after the destruction of the temple; an assertion, which every reader of Scripture knows, is far from being accurate. Inh. Solŕmi, orum (Sing. Solŕmus, i), m. considered by some writers as natives of Pŕsŕdia, or the neighbouring district. Heathen authors almost never speak of the Jews, either with truth or impartiality. In proof, see Tacitus (Hist. v. 1 seq.). Adj. Solŕmus, a, um. Solŕma lŕges (Juv. Sat. vi. 544). Solŕmus cinis, the ashes of Jerusalem, to which Titus reduced that city (Stat. Syl. v. 2. 138). Solŕmus pŕleis (Val. Flacc. l. 13).

Solŕmi, orum, m. a distinguished nation on the confines of Lycia. Some are of opinion that the Solŕmi of Hŕmŕrus were the Pŕsŕda of later times (Hom. Il. vi. 184).

Solŕmus, i, m. a follower of Œnŕas, who settled in Italy, and built a town to which he gave his own name, corrupted afterwards by the Italians, into Sŕlmo q. v.—2. A son of Sŕtrŕcus q. v., and a descendant of the former, who went in quest of his brother Mŕncinus, during the night preceding the battle at Cŕnŕne. A skirmish had taken place between the Romans and Carthaginians that evening, and Mŕncinus had fallen. On reconnoitring by moonlight the scene of action, he discovered a man clad in his brother's armour, whom he mortally wounded, supposing him to be a Carthaginian, who had deprived his brother of life. Transported with grief on finding that he had killed his own father, he plunged his sword into his own bosom, and fell dead on the body of his parent, who had just expired (Sil. Ital. ix. 72 seq.).

Sŕmŕnus, i, m. the god of sleep, was the reputed son of Erŕbus and Nox. His palace was a cave into which the rays of the sun never penetrated. Poppies and other herbs inducing sleep, abounded at the entrance. He is represented by Ovidius as stretched on a couch, fast asleep, and surrounded by his thousand sons (Met. xi. 592 seq.). Pŕndŕnas says that of all the gods, Sŕmŕnus was the greatest favourite of the Muses.

Sŕmŕno, ŕnis, m. brother of Mŕrcŕmŕrus q. v., killed in a conspiracy of the nobles, threatening that he would avenge the injury and banishment of his brother (Claud. xxi. 241).

Sŕpŕter, ŕtri, m. a prætor of Sŕrcŕnus, in 216 B. C. Lŕvius has recorded part of a speech, which he delivered at the request of his colleagues and the senate, respecting the death of Andrŕnŕdŕrus, and Thŕmŕstus q. v. (xxiv. 23—25).—2. An officer under Philip, king of Mŕcŕdŕnia, who sent him with four thousand men and some money to assist the Carthaginians, in 205 B. C. The Romans took him prisoner, and the ambassadors of that monarch requested they would give him up (Liv. xxx. 26 seq.).—3. An Acarnanian in the service of Philip, king of Mŕcŕdŕnia, for whom he commanded the garrison at Chŕlcis, in Eubŕea, where he was killed by an attack of C. Claudius Cŕnsŕs, commander of the Roman fleet, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 23).—4. A general under Persēs, king of Mŕcŕdŕnia, who was killed in an engagement with the Romans, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 66).

Sŕphŕnes, is, m. a Grecian commander in the reign of Xŕrŕpes (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 6).

Sŕphŕnŕ, es (Sŕphŕnŕ, Greek), f. a district of Armŕnia, traversed by mount Tŕurus, placed by D'Anville, to the east of Cŕpŕdŕcia. Pŕnius, Strŕbo, and Mŕla seem not to have had the same ideas of this country. Mollis Sŕphŕnŕ (Luc. Phŕr. iii. 593).

Sŕphites, e. Sopithes, æ, m. an Indian king, who opened his gates to Alexander the Great, and received him in a friendly manner. In return for his kindness, that warlike monarch left him in the peaceful possession of his territories (Curt. ix. 1).

Sŕphŕcles, is, m. a Grecian of high birth, who excelled as a tragic poet. He is said to have been born at Athens, about 495 B. C., to have composed his first tragedy at the age of twenty, and to have lived till he was near an hundred years old. He did not spend his whole life in writing tragedy, since he commanded an army, and performed a number of actions, which Sŕldas has recorded. Of the forty-three tragedies written by Sŕphŕcles, only seven have escaped the ravages of time. Of his death two accounts have been transmitted; the one, that he died from joy at hearing he had been declared the first tragic poet, and that the same information had the same effect on Diŕnŕsius, tyrant of Sicily, Sicily. This is mentioned by Pŕnius (ii. 87), and Valŕrius Mŕximus (ix. 12). The other account, which rests on the authority of Lŕcŕanus, is, that he was choked with the stone of a grape in the ninety-fifth year of his age. Pŕnius records, that Bŕcehus ordered this "prince of the tragic buskin" to be buried during the siege of Athens by the Lacedŕmonians, and that Lŕsŕnder, their king, in consequence of being frequently warned, in his sleep, to "allow his darling to be buried," granted a suspension of hostilities during the funeral. His sons attempted to cognosce him, with the view of obtaining possession of his property, when he read part of a tragedy which he had just finished, to the judges before whom this action was brought. The elegance of language, the poetic skill, and excellent sentiment which this production contained, proved so forcibly to the judges, the injustice of the charge, that they not only declared him in the full use of reason, but found his son Iophon insane, because he had brought that charge against his father. Adj. Sôphoclêus, a, um. Sôphoclêus cōthârnu, the huskin of Sôphoclêus, an expression frequently employed to signify the most elegant and sublime species of tragic composition. (Virg. B. viii. 10. Mart. iii. 20.) Sôphoclêus hiatus, Sophoclean gaping, i. e. bawling like a mouthing actor of the tragedies of Sôphoclêus (Juv. Sat. vi. 636).

Sôphônîsba, æ, f. daughter of Hâsdrûbal, son of Gisgo, whom her father married to Sôphâx, king of the Mâsesyli, in order to secure his alliance to the Carthaginians. She had a powerful influence over her husband, whom she excited to great exertion in support of her native state. The united forces of Hâsdrûbal and Sôphâx yielded to Roman bravery, and the latter was made prisoner by C. Lælius and Mâsinissa. The country might then be considered at the mercy of the conquerors, into whose hands Sôphônîsba fell, on the taking of Cirta. On her knees she supplicated Mâsinissa to protect her from the Romans. Captivated with her youth and beauty, without considering that she was at the disposal of the conquerors, he assented to her request, and, that he might have it in his power to fulfil his promise, immediately married her. C. Lælius first reprobated this act of Mâsinissa, of which Scipio Africânus afterwards privately disapproved, stating, that she, as well as the country, was in the hands of the Romans, who might dispose of them as they thought fit. At this reproof Mâsinissa was so deeply affected, that he sent her a cup of poison as the only means of deliverance from the Romans, which was in his power. With great resolution she swallowed the fatal draught, and expired in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 12—15).

Sôphron, ôis, m. a comic poet, a native of Syracûsa, Soragosa. Quintiliânus calls him a writer of farces, and adds, that Plâto admired him so much, that he kept his books under his pillow on his deathbed (l. 10). This poet flourished in the reign of Xêrxes, king of Pêrsia. He wrote in the Doric dialect, but such was the obscurity of his style, that it was difficult to apprehend his meaning; hence Stâtius, Implicitus Sôphron, involved, intricate, Sôphron (Syl. v. 3. 158).

Sôphronîus, i, m. a man to whom Martiâlis addresses two epigrams (iv. 71 seq.).

Sôphrôsînê, æ, f. a daughter of Diônysius, the elder, and Aristômâchê; was the wife of Diônysius, the younger (Cor. Nep. Dion. 1).

Sopîana, æ, f. Sozia, or, Funfstrichen, a town of Pannônia (Amm. Mar. xxviii. 1).

Sôpôlis, is, m. the father of Hermôlaus, who reproved that youth for the violence of his speech to Alexander the Great, after he had been convicted of treason against his sovereign (Curt. viii. 7).—2. An eminent painter.

Sôra, æ, f. Sora, a town of the Volsi, on Liris, the Garigliano, which the Romans took by surprise, in 344 B. C. After revolting to the Sannites in 315 B. C., it was retaken by the Romans in the same year, having been betrayed into their hands during the night by one of the townsmen. Seven years after, the Sannites again obtained possession of it; but next year it was recovered by the Romans, who sent thither a colony of four thousand men, in 306 B. C. From this period, Sôra seems to have remained subject to Rome. The natural advantages of its situation, afforded the means of long resistance; but when the Romans could not prevail by bravery, they generally succeeded by treachery or stratagem (Liv. vii. 28 seq.). Inh. Sôrani, orum (Sing. Sôranus, i), m. Adj. Sôranus, a, um. Sôranus ager, the territory of Sôra (Liv. x. 33).

Sôrâctê, is, n. v. Sôrâctes, is, m. Sant Oreste, an insulated mountain of striking appearance, about twenty-eight miles from Rome, of two thousand two hundred and seventy-one feet in height. It was sacred to Apôllo, hence Virgilius, Sâncti cûctos Sôrâctis Apôllo, because his sacred rites were annually performed on it by the Hirpi, who walked without injury over burning wood! On this account, they enjoyed, by a decree of the Roman senate, exemption from military service, besides every other immunity (Virg. Æn. xi. 785. Plin. ii. 10).

Sôranus, i, m. a prætor, killed during the war between C. Mârius and L. Côrnelius Sûlla (Flor. iii. 21).

Sôsia Gâlla, Sôsîæ Gâllæ, m. the wife of C. Silius, was intimately connected with Agrippina, and, on that account, hated by Tibêrius. Resolved on their destruction, he put both Silius and Sôsia immediately on trial, when sentence of banishment was pronounced against the latter, and, to prevent a final judgment, the former put an end to his own life (Tac. Ann. iv. 19 seq.).

Sôsibiânus, i, m. a man of low birth and character, who seems to have been a legacy-hunter (Mart. i. 82 seq.).

Sôsibius, i, m. the tutor of Britânnicus, who had the ear of the emperor Claudius, and entered into the conspiracy against Pôppæa and her lover Valêrius Asiaticus. On the motion of Vitellius, the senate voted him ten thousand sesterces, the reward of this prosecution (Tac. Ann. xi. 1—4).

Sôsilaus, i, m. a nobleman of Rhodes, who was one of those present with T. Quinctius Flâminius at the interview with Nâbis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, when they were besieging his capital, in the year 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 30).

Sôsilus, i, m. a Lacedæmonian, who accompanied Hannîbal in his military expeditions, and wrote an account of his wars in seven books. Under him that great general acquired a knowledge of the Greek language (Cor. Nep. Han. 13). In the opinion of Pôlybius, he does not deserve to be reckoned an historian, but a fabulist (lib. 20).

Sôsîngîtes, is, m. a lake in Assyria, abounding with bitumen and naphtha. By Strâbo this lake is called Thônitis (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Sôsîpôlis, Idis, f. (i. e. the preserver of cities) was worshipped at Olympia on the mountain Crônus (Paus. vi. 20).

Sôsis, Idis, m. a Syracusan, one of the conspirators against Hîerônymus; after whose death he accompanied Theodotus to Syracûsa, where they effected a revolution, without shedding of blood. This regicide went into the interest of the Romans, and M. Claudius Marc'ellus sent him to Philōdēmus, the commander of the fort Eur'yālus, to treat with him about a surrender (Liv. xxiv. 21 seq.).—2. A brazier of Sýrácūsē, who appeared in the ovation of M. Claudius Marc'ellus in 213 B. C., with a golden crown on his head. In return for his good offices, particularly that of conducting the Romans into Sýrácūsē by night, when they first entered that city, the senate decreed him the freedom of Rome, five hundred acres of land in the territory of Sýrácūsē, and his choice of the houses in that city, which had belonged to any person who had been punished according to the laws of war (Liv. xxvi. 21—30).

Sōsithēs, Māgnēs, Sōsithēos Māgnētis, m. an ambassador sent by Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā, along with Hērācleus Scotinus and Crito Bērōseus to Hannibal, after the battle of Cānnæ. The former ambassadors of that monarch, despatched on a similar mission, had been taken by the Romans (Liv. xxiii. 38 seq.).

C. Sōsius, C. Sōsi, m. held the consulship at Rome with Cn. Dōmītiūs Abēnōbārbus in 34 B. C., when Augustus and M. Antōnius were preparing for deciding their differences by an appeal to the sword (Cor. Nep. Att. 22). He and Gēllius Pōpili-cōla commanded the fleet of M. Antōnius at the battle of Actūm. The conqueror saved his life (Vel. Pat. ii. 85). Perhaps he is the person mentioned by Tacitus as having conquered the Jews (Hist. v. 9).

Sōsius, i, m. a general who commanded under M. Antōnius, in the Parthian war, with great success (Ap. Bel. Par.).

Sōsthēnes, is, m. a Macedonian of low birth but of great bravery, who kept in check, and cut off, a number of the Gauls, after they had killed Ptolēmaeus Cērannus, and routed his army. In preference to the nobles then aspiring at the crown, the army saluted him king, a title which he declined, taking only that of commander (Just. xxiv. 5).

Sōstrātus, i, m. a Greek poet, who wrote the campaigns of Xērxēs in Greece, of whom nothing is known. Juvēnālīs says he "sung with wet wings," words of doubtful meaning, since they may refer to the perspiration occasioned by violent recitation, to poetic ecstasy, which raised Sōstrātus above the truth of history, as if intoxicated, or to real drunkenness, which would produce the same effect. A knowledge of the private life and character of Sōstrātus would have rendered the meaning of these words precise and certain (Sat. x. 178).—2. A man in the army of Alexander the Great, who was strongly attached to the noble youth Hērmodōlus, and prevailed on him to enter into a conspiracy against their sovereign (Curt. viii. 6).—3. A priest in the temple of Vēnus, in the island of Cýprus, whom Titus consulted respecting his future fortune, in the year 69. In a private interview, Sōstrātus laid open a scene of splendour that filled the mind of Titus with enlarged ideas, and future prospects, which fired his youthful imagination with all the ardour of unbounded ambition, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. ii. 4).

Sōta, æ, m. a physician, the father of Fāb-ulla (Mart. iv. 9).

Sōtādes, æ, m. a poet of no great merit

(Mart. ii. 86).—2. A man of impure practices (Mart. vi. 26).

Sōtlātes, lum, m. a people of Aquitānā, whose country extended along Gārlum, the Garonne, and whose chief town was Sōtlātum, Sas. Their territories formed part of what was afterwards called Nōvopōpūlānā, bounded by the Garonne, the Pyrenees, and the Bay of Biscay. Attiliānus was the chief man among them for many years (Cæs. B. G. iii. 20 seq.).

Sōtimus, i, m. one of the royal pages of Alexander, king of Epīrus, who asked him, when he stood doubtful whether he should cross the Achēros, in consequence of the oracle of Jūpiter, at Dōdōnā, why he hesitated, since the Lūcāni only sought an opportunity of betraying him. The king then plunged into the river, and was transfixed by one of the Lūcāni, who afterwards smothered his body in a shocking manner, in 22 B. C. (Liv. viii. 24).

Sotion, onis, m. a peripatetic philosopher, who wrote a book, entitled Kīlēx apōlōn, or, Cōrūncōpia (Gel. i. 8).

Sōza, w, f. a town of Dēndāriēs tīm, deserted by Mithridātes, and taken by the Romans, in the year 50 (Tac. Ann. xii. 16).

Spācō, ūs, f. or, Cynō, the wife of Mithridātes, the herdsman of Astyāges, who nursed Cýrus, whom his grandfather had ordered to be killed, but Hārpagus, a confidant of the king, instead of executing the cruel order, gave the infant for exposure to Mithridātes, whose wife, Spācō, suckled him. The word is said to signify in the Median language, a female dog, or, wolf, and this probably gave rise to the fiction of Cýrus being preserved in a miraculous manner. The story bears a close resemblance to that of Rōmūlus (Just. i. 4. Herod. i. 110).

Spānūs, i, m. a man ridiculed by Mār-āllīs (ii. 41).

Spārgābīsus, i, m. son of Tōmýris q. s. queen of the Māssāgētēs, whom Cýrus surprised at midnight, finding him and his whole army drunk (Val. Max. ix. 10).

Spārtā, w, f. Spārtē, es, f. Mīstra, or, Mīsthrā, the capital of Lācōniā, a country in Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, received this name from Spārtā, daughter of Lādon, the wife of Lācēdēmōn, who founded it. At one period, this city might be considered the metropolis of Greece. Mīsthrā is nearly two miles from Spārtā, which has been long in ruins, and now called Faleis castra, is completely fortified, stands five hundred feet above the plain, and is divided by the torrent Pandēmōnā. It contains about seven thousand inhabitants, who are chiefly Greeks, and who carry on a considerable trade in silk. It was of a circular form, about forty-eight stadia in circumference, situated on a plain, but containing some rough places and eminences. Near Mīsthrā, at the foot of Tāygētus, is a cypress tree which measures thirty feet in circumference. Inh. Spārtāni, orum, m. (Just. iii. 6). Spārtiātes, w, m. a Spartan or Lacedemonian. Adj. Spārtānus, n, um. Spārtānā cīvīs, a Spartan virgin (Virg. Æn. i. 316). Spārtānā gens, the Spartans or Lacedemonians (Ov. Met. iii. 208). Spārtānā discipulus (Liv. xxxviii. 17).

Spārtācus, i, m. a celebrated gladiator, by birth a Thracian, who, having escaped from the school of C. Léntulus Batiāta at Cāpua, with seventy-four (sixty-four, Vel. Pat., and not more than thirty, Flor.) of his companions, took up arms against the Roman state. Numbers soon flocked to his standard, whom he, having instructed them in military exercise, and furnished with arms, marched from their places of concealment, against the Roman armies. He and Crīxus commanded the slaves in Bellum Sērvilē, whose number amounted to ninety thousand (Vel. Pat.; Florus says ten thousand, iii. 20), in which they defeated Ap. Claudius Pūlcher, a Roman lieutenant-general, and P. Varinius Glāber, prātor, 74 B. C. He fought successfully against Cn. Cōrnēlius Lēntulus Clōdianus, consul, and also defeated L. Gēlius Pōphicōla, the other consul, and Q. Arrius, prātor. Spārtacus gained another victory over C. Cassius, proconsul, and Cn. Manlius, prātor. M. Licinius Crāssus marched against this rebel, and, though at first doubtful of success, overpowered his forces, killing himself, with sixty thousand of his men, having previously put to the sword thirty-five thousand of them under Gaiūlus. This decisive victory terminated the war. In that last engagement, Spārtacus displayed astonishing bravery, fighting on his knees, and sacrificing to his fury many of the Romans. After that battle, his body was not found (Ap. Bel. Civ. 426). At one period this insurrection threatened the destruction of the state, and the bravery of the insurgents may be estimated, from their resisting and frequently defeating the forces of the republic, during the space of three years. According to Florus, from being a stipendiary Thracian, Spārtacus became a soldier, afterwards a deserter, and then a robber. On account of his great strength, after his crimes had subjected him to death by crucifixion, the Romans preserved his life, and sentenced him to become a gladiator. Eutrōpius, besides Spārtacus and Crīxus, mentions a third commander, Gēnōmāus (vi. 7). Vāgans Spārtacus, roaming Spārtacus, from his traversing the greater part of Italy, and supporting his troops by plunder (Hor. Od. iii. 14. 19). The cruelties and outrages of these rebels, are described by Claudiānus (xxvi. 155), and Velleius Pātērcūlus (ii. 30 seq.). Cicero calls C. Antōnius a cut-throat, a robber, and a Spārtacus (Phil. iv. 6.)

Spārtāni, orum, m. a people who lived near the Caspian Sea (Just. xl. 1). By some authors they are called Spārti.

Spātūle, es, f. a sea nymph (Claud. x. 167). Spēleum, i, n. a city of Mācēdōnia, at which L. Emilius Paullus halted two days, after he had exhibited games at Amphipolis, Jenikei, and was on his way towards the shore of the Gulf of Venice (Liv. xlv. 33).

Spēlūna, ae, f. Sperlonga, a villa, or country seat (Tac. Ann. iv. 59), or a prētōrium, according to Suetonius, near Tarrācina, belonging to the emperor Tiberius, at which several of his guests and attendants were killed, by an accidental fall of a great many huge stones. He however escaped (Suet. Tib. 39).

Spērchēos, v. Spērchius, i, m. the Ellada, a very rapid river of Thessaly, which rises in the country of the Eniēnes, and empties itself into Sinus Mālācus, the Gulf of Lamia. It has a bridge of three pointed arches. Its banks are said to be covered with poplar trees; hence Popūlifer (Ov. Met. i. 579). Spērchēis, ēidos, f. of Spērchius, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Spērchēides unda, the waters of the Ellada (Ov. Met. vii. 230). Spērchionides, ae, m. Lycētus, the son of the river Spērchēos (Ov. Met. v. 86).

Spērchiae, arum, f. a town of Thessaly, the lands around which were plundered by the Etōli, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Speūsippus, i, m. a philosopher, who, for eight years, was at the head of the Acadēmia, having succeeded his granduncle, Plāto, and was himself succeeded by Xēnōcrātes (Val. Max. iv. 1).

Sphaerus, i, m. a philosopher who instructed Augustus in philology (Suet. Aug. 89), whom Dio calls the freedman and teacher of Augustus, adding, that he honoured him with a public interment (xlviii. 33).

Sphēlus, i, m. father of Iāsus, and son of Būcōlus, hence his patronymic Būcōlides (Hom. Il. xv. 338).

Sphīnx, ingis, m. a monster which sprung from Echidna and Tūphon, having the face of a woman, the breast, feet, and tail of a lion, with the feathers of a bird. Jūno sent this pest to torment the Thebans, in the reign of Crēon, by devouring the inhabitants. Having learned a riddle from the Muses, the Sphīnx promised to withdraw from the state, as soon as any one should announce the solution. The riddle was proposed in the following words, "What animal has one voice, at first four, then two, and, at last, three feet?" The difficulty long perplexed the Thebans, and the inhabitants continued to be destroyed by the Sphīnx. Œmon, son of Crēon, perished in this manner, and, on his death, his father proposed the crown and Iōcāsta to the explainer of the riddle. Œdipus, probably stimulated by the greatness of the reward, applied his powerful mind to the subject, and, having discovered the meaning, told the king, that the animal described by the Sphīnx was Man, who, in infancy, from using his hands as well as feet in walking, may be said to have four feet, in after life, employed but two, and in old age, to these he added a staff, which may be reckoned a third. On this solution, the Sphīnx threw itself headlong from the citadel, and Œdipus received the rewards of his ingenuity (Apol. iii. 5).

Spicillus, v. Spicūlus, i, m. a gladiator or sword-player, on whom the emperor Nēro bestowed the hereditary estates and houses of men, who had enjoyed the honour of a triumph (Suet. Ner. 30).

Spina, ae, f. Longastrino, a town of Italy, near the most southern mouth of the Po, built by the Thessalians (Just. xx. 1). Adj. Spīneticus, a, um. Spīneticum ostium, the channel or mouth of the Po, next to Spina.

Spīnther, ēris, m. a surname of the Lēntūli q. v.

Spīō, ūs, f. a sea nymph, one of Cyrene's train. Her name has been derived from caverns of water (Virg. G. iv. 838).

Spītamēnes, is, m. the chief friend of Bēssus, but he afterwards acted like the bitterest enemy, for he and Cātēnes delivered him bound to Alexander the Great (vii. 5 seq.).

Spīlēndōphōrus, v. Spēndōphōrus, armourbearer of the Roman emperor ānus, called by Martiālis, Dōminus

Spölētum, i. n. Spoleto, an inland town of Umbria, near the territory of the Sābīni, and sources of Nār, the Nera, called Sanguinarium, from the emperor Æmiliānus being killed there (Aur. Vic. Ep. 31). The Romans established a colony at Spölētum, in 242 B. C., and Hannibal attempted to carry it by storm, but failed, and it is not improbable that the brave resistance, which he there met with, suggested, to him the impropriety of marching against Rome. At this town, Līvius informs us, a woman was transformed into a man, in 216 B. C. (Ep. 20—xxiv. 10). Inh. Spölētīni, orum, m. refused the charge of Gēntius, king of the Illyrii, with his wife and children, in 169 B. C., to whose custody the Romans wished to commit these captives, on which account they were sent to Igitūrvium (Liv. xxvii. 10 seq.). Adj. Spölētīnus, a, um. Spölētīna (lāgēna) data est (Mart. vi. 89).

Spōla Opīma, the spoils which the commanders of the Romans obtained, by killing the general of the enemy with their own hand. Rōmulus procured the first, by slaying Acron, king of the Cēnīnēsēs; A. Cōrnēlius Cōssus had the honour of the second, in consequence of his putting to death Lārs Tōlūmīus, king of the Vēīentes, in 436 B. C.; and M. Claudius Mārcellus the third, who deprived of life, Viridōmārus, king of the Gauls, in 222 B. C. (Liv. i. 10 seq.). Although a Roman, in single combat, or in battle, killed the commander-in-chief of the enemy, he did not obtain the Spōla Opīma, unless he had the supreme command in the army. In proof of this fact, it may be mentioned, that T. Mānlius Tōrquātus, M. Vālērīus Cōrvīnus, and P. Cōrnēlius Scīpiō Æmiliānus, each of whom slew the general of the enemy's forces, did not obtain that honour, because they fought under the command of another (Val. Max. iii. 2).

Spōnsio. See Fodus.

Spōrādes, um, f. certain islands in Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, to the southeast of the Cyclādes. They are about twelve in number, and have this name from being scattered, or lying at a considerable distance from one another (Apol. Rhod. iv. 1711. Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Spōrus, i, m. a eunuch of the emperor Nēro (quem quondam exsecutū formare in mulierem tentaverat). In his flight from the palace, Spōrus accompanied the emperor, and assisted him in accomplishing his own death (Aur. Vic. Ep. 5).

Spūrinna, æ, m. an haruspex, who, in examining into the entrails of a victim offered by C. Jūlius Cēsar, not long before his death, predicted danger to that ambitious Roman, on the Ides of March, and neglect of this warning cost that intrepid warrior his life. On his way to the senatehouse on the Ides, he met Spūrinna, to whom he jeeringly said, "The Ides of March are come," to which the soothsayer replied, "They are indeed come; but they are not past." Soon after, Cēsar fell by the hands of the conspirators (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 81).

Stābērius, i, m. a miser, who dreaded poverty as the worst of evils, thought riches comprised every thing, and, anxious that his wealth should be known to posterity, ordered, by his Will, that the sum which he left at his death should be inscribed on his tombstone (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 84).

Stābērius Eros, Stābērii Erōtis, m. an eminent grammarian, whose love of literature procured him his freedom. Among other illustrious Romans, he taught Brūtus and Cāssius, nor would it be just to his memory not to mention, that in the time of the dictator, Sūlla, he admitted into his school the children of the proscribed, whom he educated without fee (Suet. II. Gram. 13).

L. Stābērius, L. Stābērii, m. the governor of Apollōnia, at the time Cēsar advanced against that town. Being unable to prevail on the inhabitants to oppose that general, L. Stābērius fled privately out of the town, and escaped (Cæs. B. C. iii. 12).

Stābia, arum, f. Castel a mar di Stabia, a town of Cāmpānia, to which the convalescent used to resort, in order to recover strength by drinking milk (Plin. i. 334. Ov. Met. xv. 711). Adj. Stābiānus, a, um. Stābiānum litus (Senec. N. Q. vi. 1).

Stāgira, orum, n. (Stāgirus, i, f. Herod. vii. 115), a town of Mācedōnia, at which the philosopher Aristōtēles was born (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 4).

Staius, i, m. a tribune of the soldiers, despatched to Brūndisium, Brindisi, by the emperor Tiberius, with a strong body of soldiers, to crush, in its commencement, a servile war, under T. Cūrtisius. He arrived in time, and, having seized the principal conspirators, with their leader, he carried them to Rome, bound in chains (Tac. Ann. iv. 27).

Stājus Minācius, Stāji Mināci, m. a general of the Sāmnites, whom the prisoners taken from Cāmpānia, after some had got loose and set the rest at liberty, seized and dragged on horseback a prisoner to the Roman consul (Liv. x. 20).

Stāphylus, i, m. son of Bāochus, and brother of Phanus. Nothing certain respecting him is known.

Stāsānor, ōris, m. obtained the government of the Drāncæ and Arīi, on the death of Alexander the Great (Just. xiii. 4).

Stāsippus, i, m. a native of Tēgēa, Picoli, a town of Arcādīa. Of his right principle and love of country, Vālērīus Māxīmus has recorded a notable instance (iv. 1).

Stātiellæ aque, Stātiellarum aquarum, f. Aequi, or, Aich, a town of Līgūria, on the river Bōrmio, in the duchy of Montserrat. It is also called Aquæ Stātiellorum. Ind. Stātielli, orum, et, Stātiellates, ium, e. Stātiellenses, ium, m. M. Pōpillius Lænas killed more than the half of them in 175 B. C., on which the rest surrendered unconditionally, trusting to the clemency of Pōpillius, who first stripped them of their armour, and then sold them for slaves. Of this act of cruelty, besides his attacking them without cause, the senate disapproved, ordered him to return the purchase money to the buyers, and to quit the province as soon as he had placed them in liberty. From ferocity of temper, Pōpillius refused to obey the mandate of the senate, went to Rome, where he remonstrated against that order, but without success. They appear to have been the only Līgūres, who had not made war on the Romans. On going back to his province, he again attacked them, and his unprovoked hostility roused all Līgūria, and irritated the senate, who, in their favour, passed a law, which restored some thousands to their liberty. The fixed determination of the senate, aided by two of the plebeian tribunes, compelled him against his will, to return to Rome, to stand his trial; but an artifice of the prætor evaded the ends of justice (Liv. xlii. 7-22). Adj. Stätillās, as, as; ātis. Stätillās ager (Liv. xlii. 7).

Stätilla Mēssālna, Stätillā Mēssālnæ, f. traced her lineage from Stätillus Taurus. The emperor, Nēro, on purpose to obtain her as his wife, murdered her first husband, M. Vestinus Atticus (Tac. Ann. xv. 68 seq.).
Stätillius Cāpella, Stätilli Cāpellæ, m. a Roman knight, but a native of Africa, born at Sābrāta (Suet. Vesp. 3).

Stätillus Cōrvīnus, Stätilli Cōrvīni, m. grandson of the orator, Mēssāla, who, by seducing a number of freedmen and slaves, formed a conspiracy against the Emperor Claudius, in which he was joined by Gāllus Asīnus (Suet. Claud. 13).

Stätillus Taurus, Stätilli Tauri, m. a proconsul in Africa, had a large fortune, and possessed beautiful gardens, which Agrippina coveted, and prevailed on Tāquitius Priscus, who had served under Stätillus in Africa, to prefer against him a charge of extortion, and of practising magic arts. This false accusation drove Stätillus to self-destruction, in the year 53 (Tac. Ann. xii. 59 seq.).

L. Stätillius, L. Stätilli, m. a Roman of the equestrian order, who joined in the conspiracy of L. Sūrgius Cātīna, and undertook, with the assistance of P. Gābīnus Cāpito, to set the city on fire. On being arrested, he was committed to C. Jūlius Cæsar, and, on his being produced before the senate, he made a candid confession of his guilt. For his crime he suffered the punishment of death by strangulation in prison (Sal. Cat. 17).

T. Stätillus Sīsēnna Taurus, T. Stätilli Sīsēnnæ Tauri, m. held the office of consul with L. Scribōnius Libo, in the year 16. Tāctus writes his name Sīsēnna Stätillus Taurus (Ann. ii. 1).

T. Stätillus Taurus, T. Stätilli Tauri, m. a man of obscure birth, who, by his personal merit, and the interest of Augustus, rose to the highest dignity in the Roman state. He defeated M. Æmīlius Lēpidus in Sicily, had the honour of a triumph for his success in Africa, and twice held the consulship; first, with M. Vipsānius Agrippa in 38 B. C., and eleven years afterwards with C. Jūlius Cæsar Octāvius Augustus, hence Hōrātius has lētum Taurō, i. e. T. Stätillio Taurō iūctum consule (Epis. i. 5. 4). Under Augustus, he commanded the land forces at Actium, where he routed the cavalry of M. Antōnius, and for his valuable services in that war, the conqueror rewarded him liberally (Vel. Pat. ii. 85 seq.). He built the first amphitheatre of stone, that was in Campus Mārtius (Suet. Aug. 29).

Stätinæ, arum, f. supposed to have been islands off the coast of Cāmpānia, Campania, which produced excellent wine. Plinius has been quoted to prove, that these islands emerged from the sea, during the agitation of an earthquake; but the readings scarcely support that opinion, good editions having stignum, not, Stätinam emersisse. The expression of Stätus (Stätinusque rēnātas, Syl. iii. 5. 104), seems to have given rise to these conjectures. Adj. Stätānus, a, um. Stätāna vīna (Plin. iii. 132).

Stätira, æ, f. a daughter of Dārius, whom Alexander the Great married. After the death of that conqueror, Rōxāna murdered both her and her sister, threw their dead bodies into a well, and covered them over with earth. In this act of assassination, she had the aid of Pērdiccas (Just. xii. 10. Plut. in vit. Alex.).

Stätus, i, m. a tribune of the Roman soldiers (Tac. Ann. xv. 60).—2. A Samuian, who distinguished himself in the Social war, rose to the highest rank in the state, by his wealth, valour, and dignity of birth. On account of his riches he was proscribed by the second triumvirate (Ap. Bel. Civ. 603).

Stätus Annæus, Stätii Annæi, m. the friend of the philosopher L. Annæus Sēneca q. v., who administered to him, at his own request, a draught of the most active poison (Cicuta), which had not the effect of causing immediate death (Tac. Ann. xv. 64).

Stätus Cæcilius, Stätii Cæcili, m. one of the Insūbres Gēlli, a writer of Latin comedy, whose style Cicero has condemned (Att. vii. 3). Gēllius gives some quotations from his writings (ii. 23).—2. See Stätus Cæcilius.

Stätus Dōmītius, Stätii Dōmīti, m. a Roman, degraded from the tribunician rank, on the mere suspicion of being disaffected to the emperor Nēro, in the year 65 (Tac. Ann. xv. 71).

Stätus Gēllius, Stätii Gēlli, m. a Samuian general, taken prisoner by the Romans, in 306 B. C. (Liv. ix. 44).

Stätus Mōtīus, Stätii Mōtīi, m. commander of the garrison at Cāsīllum, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 19).

Stätus Mūrcus, Stätii Mūrci, m. a man to whom Cæsar was indebted for information respecting the demands of Scribōnius Libo and M. Bibūlus (Cæs. B. C. iii. 15).—2. A man sent with Sūlpicius Flōrus by Otho to murder Piso Lācīnīanus (Tac. Hist. i. 43).

Stätus Prōxīmus, Stätii Prōxīmi, m. a tribune of the prætorian guards at Rome, who engaged in a conspiracy against Nēro, and, although he obtained a free pardon, disdained to use it, from the vanity of dying by his own hand (Tac. Ann. xv. 50-71).

Stätus Stätillus, Stätii Stätilli, m. a commander of the Lūcāni and Brūtīi, killed in an engagement with the Romans under C. Fābricius Lūscinus (Val. Max. i. 8).

Stätus Trēbius. See Trēbius.

L. Stätus Mūrcus, L. Stätii Mūrci, m. a man of prætorian rank, who went as proconsul to Asia, afterwards into Sýria, where he and Q. Mārcius Crispus had the command of very powerful legions, which they gave up to C. Cæssius Lōnginus. At a future period, he sailed to Sicily, Sicily, with a powerful fleet, where he was unjustly put to death by Sēxtus Pōmpēius (Vel. Pat. ii. 69, 77). Perhaps he is the person mentioned by Cæsar (Bel. Civ. iii. 15).

T. Stätus, T. Stätii, m. a tribune of the people, who joined his colleague L. Cædicius in bringing to trial Sp. Sērvilius on the expiry of his consulship (Liv. ii. 52).

Stätōnes, um, m. a people of Italy, in Etrūria. Adj. Stätōnēnsis, is, e. Stätōnēnsis ager (Plin. i. 241). Stätōnēnsis lūcus, the lake of Mezzano, had a floating island (Scenec. N. Q. iii. 25).

Stätörus, l. m. a man little raised above the rank of a slave, who sometimes commanded the armies of Sýphax, king of the Misesýli, in Nómídiá (Liv. xxx. 28).

Q. Stätörus, Q. Stätöril, m. one of the three ambassadors sent by Scípío Africánus to Sýphax, in 215 B. C. This Roman remained with the Numidian monarch, and taught a body of young men the military exercise of the Romans (Liv. xxiv. 48). Perhaps he is the person mentioned in preceding article.

Státúa, æ, f. a statue. It is probable that statues were first made in honour of the gods. From ancient authors, it is evident that they were in the early ages shapeless stones, and that of Cýbèle, the mother of the gods, was, even in the most refined period of Grecian history, never of any other form. The materials of which these figures consisted, were very different, not only in different countries, but even in the same country and district. In Greece, few appear to have been made of clay, not many of wood, a great number of stone; and in the latter ages, they were generally of brass, silver, or gold. The last metal was not unfrequently united in the same figure with ivory. Pausánias mentions two or three constructed of iron. For several ages, metal statues were not cast, but consisted of plates, united probably by soldering. The Sámians had the honour of being the first who cast statues and other things in metal (Paus.).

Stella, æ, m. a native of Pátávium; Padua, was a particular friend of P. Pápinus Státius, who dedicates to him the first book of his Sylvæ, and writes an Epithálámium on his marriage with Viólántilla (Syl. i. 2). He was both a poet and an orator; but of his history little more is known than what is mentioned in the poem of his friend, and in the epigrams of Mártialis. The latter commends him highly (i. 8 &c.).

Stellátis Cámpus, Stellátis Cámpi, et Stellátis Cámpi, Stellátium Cámporum, m. a very fertile plain of Cámpaña, surrounded by Vúltúrnus, Sávo, and some mountains of inconsiderable height (Sil. Ital. xi. 266). Into it the Sámmites made an incursion in 306 B. C., which was the cause of a war between them and the Romans. Hannibal's guide conducted him into this plain, by mistaking the Carthaginian pronunciation, and thinking that he said Cásilinum, whereas he said, or meant to say, Cásinum. The defective articulation of the general, cost the guide his life (Liv. ix. 44 seq.). Adj. Stellátinus, a, um. Stellátina tribus (Liv. vi. 5).

Sténnius Ninnius Céler, Sténni Ninnli Céleris, m. a nobleman of Cápuá, who, with his brother Pácúvius Ninnius Céler, lodged Hannibal, when that city surrendered to him, in the year 218 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 8).

Sténtor, óris, m. a Grecian, whose voice equalled that of fifty men (Hom. Il. v. 785).

Sténtoris, idis, f. a lake in Thrácia, not very far from Dóriscus (Herod. vii. 58).

Sténclérus, i, f. a city of Messénia (Herod. ix. 64).

Stéphánio, ónis, m. an actor of Latin plays, banished by Augustus, because he kept a married woman with her hair cut short, and dressed in a boy's clothes, to serve him at table. The emperor first caused him to be publicly whipped through all the three theatres (Suet. Aug. 45).

Stéphánus, i, m. a man who had been near the residence of Mártialis (Mart. x. 53). Suetónius mentions a man of this name, a steward of Dómitilla, who had a active hand in the death of the emperor Dómitianus, but, whether the same, or a different person, cannot be ascertained (Dm. 17).

Stérópes, is, m. one of the Cýclópes (Virg. Æn. viii. 425).

Stértínus, i, m. a Stoic philosopher, to whom Hörátius sneers (Sat. ii. 3. 296).

C. Stértínus, C. Stértínii, m. elected prætor, and obtained the government of Sírénia, in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 35).

L. Stértínus, L. Stértínii, m. sent præconsul to Spain in 202 B. C. From that country he returned four years after, carried into the treasury fifty thousand pounds weight of silver, built out of the spoils two arches before the temples of Fórtuna, and mother Mátuta, and one in the great Circus, in each of them placed a gilded statue. Same year he was sent ambassador to the cities of Thrácia (Liv. xxxi. 50 seq.).—2. A quæstor who was sent to Brúndisium, Brindisi, in 170 B. C., to provide lodging for Miságènes, a son of Mésinissa, who, as he returned home, from serving with his father's auxiliaries under the Roman consul L. Æmilius Paullus, had his fleet scattered by a storm, and was himself, in bad health, driven into Brúndisium with only three ships (Liv. xlv. 14).—3. An officer in the Roman army, who routed the Brúctéri, and to him Ségimérus surrendered. Having first punished the Angrivárii for their perfidy, he received their submission, and granted a general pardon; in the year 61 (Tac. Ann. i. 60 seq.).

Stésagóras, æ, m. father of Címon, and grandfather of Miltiádes.—2. Brother of Miltiádes, for whom he made a speech when arraigned for treason, because he had not taken Páros. Miltiádes was then convicted by the wounds which he had received in besieging that town. Neither the groundlessness of the charge, nor the defence of Stésagóras had any influence over the people, who condemned him to pay a fine of fifty talents, although they knew him to be innocent. Córnelius Népos writes Stésagóras (Milt. 7).—3. A nephew of Miltiádes, son of Címon, his brother uterine, who lost his children in the war with the Lámpsaceni (Herod. vi. 38).

Stésichórus, i, m. a distinguished lyric poet, who was born at Himéra in Sicily, of whom Quintiliánus gives the following character:—"The subjects which Stésichórus has treated, prove the strength of his genius. He sung the greatest wars, and the most illustrious commanders, supporting the weight of epic poetry on his lyre. He gives a becoming dignity both in acting and speaking, to his characters, and if he had observed proper bounds, no one would have come nearer Hómérus; but he is redundant, a fault which must be censured, but it is a fault of copiousness" (x. 1). He employed the Doric dialect, and it is said, that he wrote a poem against Héléná, which excited the wrath of her brothers Cástor and Póllux, who deprived the poet of sight, which he regained on his recanting, and writing a poem in her praise. To this fiction, Hörätius alludes (Ep. xvii. 42 seq.). His works, which extended to sixteen books, are wholly lost, with the exception of a few fragments. Stätius, alluding to the sublimity of his poetry, has Fērōx Stēsichōrus (Syl. v. 3. 154), and Hörätius conveys nearly the same idea, by Grāves cūmānā Stēsichōri (Epod. ix. 8).

Sthēnēlāus, i, m. the son of Ithēmēnes, killed by Pātrocclus (Hom. II. xvi. 586).

Sthēnēlus, i, m. one of the Grecian commanders, who was shut up in the wooden horse. He was the son of Cāpāncūs, and father of Cylarābes; one of them who fought against Thēbæ, Theba. Among his countrymen he ranked as a brave soldier, hence Hörätius, Sthēnēlus sciēns pūgnā (Od. i. 15. 24). From Troy he carried Jūpiter Trīdēlus, having two of his eyes in the ordinary place, and the third in his brow. He was buried in the Gymnāsium of his son.—2. The son of Pērsēus and Andrōmēda. He drove Amphitrōn from the whole territory of the Argīvi, and obtained possession, not only of Mycēnā, but also of Tiryns.—3. A king of Ligūria, whose son Cyēnus was changed into a swan. Sthēnēlēs, i, m. f. of Sthēnēlus, applied to females, or nouns feminine.

Sthēnēlēs cōlūcris, a swan (Ov. Met. xii. 581). Adj. Sthēnēlētus, a, um. Sthēnēlētā prōles, Cyēnus (Ov. Met. ii. 367). Writers are apt to confound these characters.—4. A companion of Hērclēs, in the expedition against the Amazons, in which he died, and that hero buried him near the river Cāllichōrus. The fame of the Argonautic expedition reached the shades of the dead, who wished to see their sons and descendants, whilst engaged in that perilous voyage. The Fates granted that favour to none except Sthēnēlus. He was the father of Eurysthēus (Val. Flacc. v. 90 seq.). Sthēnēlētus hōstis, Eurysthēus, son of Sthēnēlus, king of Argos, (Ov. Ep. Her. ix. 25).

Sthēnius, i, m. a Roman soldier, who fell in battle by the hand of Hannibal, at the foot of the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 343).

Sthēnōbēa, æ, f. daughter of Iōbātes, king of Lycia, who married Prētus, king of Argos. She conceived a violent attachment to Bellērōphon, who rejected her advances, on which she, regardless of truth, complained to her husband, that he had offered her violence. Prētus, on receiving this accusation, despatched Bellērōphon to his father-in-law, Iōbātes, with a letter stating his crime, who, from unwillingness to put such a man to death by his own hand, sent him to be killed by the Chimæra. After the destruction of the Chimæra, which he effected on Pōgāsus, he fell from that horse, on the plains of Lycia, and dislocated his hip-joint. Iōbātes, admiring his bravery, gave him in marriage one of his daughters, and as soon as the report of that union reached Sthēnōbēa, she killed herself (Hyg. 57).

Stichus, i, m. an Athenian nobleman, who fought in the Grecian army at Troy, was the companion of Mēnēsthēus, and was killed by Hēctor (Hom. II. xiii. 193 seq.).

Stictēs, es, f. (Painted), one of Acteon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 217).

Stilicho, ōnis, m. a distinguished general under the Roman emperor Thēōdōsius the Great, by birth a Goth, whose victories and moral excellences Claudīanus has celebrated. That emperor gave him in marriage his niece, and adopted daughter, Sērēna. Hōnōrius married his daughter Māria, on which Claudīanus wrote an epithalamium (x). He fell under the displeasure of his son-in-law, by favouring the inroads of his countrymen, on the Roman empire, or, at least, being desirous, that they should overturn the Roman government, on which he caused him to be put to death. His guilt, whether true or imaginary, proved the ruin of his family. Some writers maintain his innocence (Claud. iii. 350). Adj. Stilichōnius, a, um. Stilichōnia virgo, Māria (Claud. x. 177).

Stimicon, ōnis, m. a shepherd's name (Virg. B. v. 55).

Stimo, ōnis, m. a fortress of Thēssālia, which surrendered to Amynāder, king of the Athāmānes, in 200 B. C., after Gōmphi had fallen into his hands (Liv. xxxii. 14).

Stimula, æ, f. a grove on the banks of Tiber, the Tevere, called also Sēmēla (Ov. Fast. vi. 503). Lūcus Sēmēla, v. Stimula, appears to have been the corrupt and vulgar expression for Lūcus Sēmēles.

Stiphēlus, i, m. a centaur killed by Cērēus, in the battle with the Lāpithæ, at the nuptials of Pirithōus (Ov. Met. xii. 459).

Stirus, i, m. a noble youth of Albānia, to whom Mēdēa had been betrothed, before the arrival of Iāson at Cōlchis. In the war against the Scythians, he was wounded, afterwards pursued Mēdēa, and her brother Ab-syrtus, and at last was drowned (Val. Flacc. iii. 497 seq.).

Stōbi, orum, m. Stobi, a town of Pæōnia, near which Philippos, king of Macedōnia, defeated the Dārdāni, in 199 B. C.; and not far from it, that monarch began to build a city, in 185 B. C., which, in honour of his elder son, he called Pērsēis (Liv. xxxiii. 19 seq.).

Stochādes, um (Sing. Stechas, ādos), f. the Hieræ, three small islands off the coast of Messālia, Marcellæ, whose names were Prōtē (first), Mēsē (middle) or Pōmpōniāna, and Hypēa (last). These islands form, with the main land, a large bay, in which the British fleet has frequently blocked up that of France, in the harbour of Toulon (Tac. Hist. iii. 43. Luc. Phar. iii. 516).

Stoeni, orum, m. a nation of the Alps, conquered by the Roman consul Q. Mārclius Rēx, in 120 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 62).

Stōici, orum (Sing. Stōicus, i), m. the name given to a sect of Grecian philosophers, from Stoa, a porch, where Zēno, their founder, taught. Adj. Stōicus, a, um. Stōica dōgmata, the maxims, or opinions of the Stoics (Juv. Sat. xiii. 121). Stōici libelli, the books of the Stoics (Hor. Ep. viii. 15). Adv. Stōicē, in the manner of the Stoics (Cic. Paradox. l. 3c.).

Strābo, ōnis, m. a man remarkable for strength of vision, of which Sōlinus gives a notable instance, and adds, that Cicēro has transmitted, that he wrote the whole of the Iliad in so small a letter, that it could be put into the shell of a nut.—2. One of the most eminent geographers of antiquity, was born at Amāsia, v. Amāsēa, Amasia, a town of Pōntus, which stands on Iris, the Jezil-Ermek. His parents are said to have been natives of Crēta, Candia; but no ancient author has recorded their names, or the year in which he was born or died. He flourished during the reign of Tiberius. It is not improbable, that Strābo had considerable advantages, from the condition and circumstances of his father, since he studied in almost all the celebrated schools of Asia, and there he became acquainted with the opinions and doctrines of each sect. Although antiquity had been silent on this point, the numerous philosophical observations with which his writings abound, furnish sufficient evidence of the fact. Almost the only particulars of his life which are known, are to be found in his own writings. In consequence of geography being his favourite pursuit, he was an extensive traveller, indeed, he visited almost every country of which he gives a description. From the imperfect state of geographical science, at the time he wrote, many palpable mistakes necessarily occur in his pages, yet, from the useful information which his book contains, it must be esteemed one of the most valuable relics of antiquity. It is to be deeply regretted, that his work has not been transmitted entire. Of the seventeen books of which it originally consisted, a considerable part is wanting at the end of the seventh, a most interesting portion of his work, and the ninth is formed from mutilated manuscripts, on which account it is entitled to less confidence. From the manner in which the twelfth book begins, it seems probable that part of the eleventh has been lost. Few of the editors of Strābo have observed the want of connexion between these two books, and therefore consider the eleventh as entire. Besides geography, Strābo wrote histories, which have wholly perished. On this subject, it is manifest, the compositions of Strābo would be very valuable, from the proofs we have in his short narrations, relative to history and antiquities. Of the writings of this geographer which have been transmitted, the reader may expect to find many passages mutilated, or rendered so obscure, that it is difficult, if not impossible, to discover the author's meaning. Classical literature owes great obligations to German scholars, and it is much to be wished, that some of the learned editors of that country, would direct their attention to the geography of Strābo.

Strātū, es, f. a town of Arcēdia, mentioned by Hōmērus (Il. ii. 606), and by Stātius (Th. iv. 286). The latter poet has translated literally from the former.

Strātus, i, m. a son of Nēstor (Hom. Od. iii. 418).—2. A physician sent by Eumēnes, king of Asia, to Rome, in 169 B. C., with his brother Attālus, whose fidelity he suspected. By the faithful advice of Strātus, Attālus was prevented from acting dishonourably towards his brother (Liv. xlv. 19).

Strātō, ōnis, m. king of Arādus, Ruad. He was received under the protection of Alexander the Great (Curt. iv. 1).—2. A native of Aegēa, who, at the request of M. Jūnius Brūtus, after his second defeat, killed him, in 44 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 124).

Strātōcles, ēos, m. a celebrated Grecian comedian, praised by Quintillānus (xi. 3), and also by Jōvēnālīs (Sat. iii. 99).

Strātōn, ōnis, m. appointed king of Tȳrus, by the slaves. Alexander the Great restored the crown to his descendants (Just. xviii. 3).

Strātōnīcē, es, f. wife of Sēlēucus, and stepmother to Antīochus, who fell violently in love with her. Concealing his unlawful attachment, he pined gradually away, and was on the point of death, when the cause of his illness was discovered. To preserve his life, Sēlēucus yielded up to his beloved son, his wife, for whom he had the greatest affection (Val. Max. v. 7).—2. A concubine of Mithridātes, who delivered to Cn. Pōmpēus the treasures of that monarch (Ap. Bd. Mith. 245).

Strātōnīcēa, ae, v. Strātōnīcē, es, f. Eub. Hissar, a town of Cāria, so called from Strātōnīcē q. v., which the Rhodians besieged without success in 199 B. C. Next year it was given to them by the Romans. Strātōnīcis, idis, f. of Strātōnīcēa, applied to females, or nouns feminine, Strātōnīcis Flens (Tac. Ann. iii. 63). Ins. Strātōnīcōnes, ium, m. (Tac. Ann. iii. 62). Adj. Strātōnīcēnsis, is, e. Strātōnīcēnsis ager (Liv. xxxiii. 18).

Strātōnīcus, i, m. the treasurer to Philip, king of Mācēdōnia, and his son, Alexander (Plaut. Rud. iv. 2. 27).

Strātōnidas, ae, m. a man who accompanied Zeuxippus, after the murder of Brēchylas, to Tānagra (Liv. xxxiii. 28).

Strātus, i, f. Porta, the strongest city of Ætōlia, south of Sinus Ambrācius, the Gulf of Arta, near the river Achēlōus, the Aspropotamo. Here the Ætōli assembled in 191 B. C., when they heard that Ambrācia was besieged (Liv. xxxviii. 4 seq.). Ins. Strātū, orum, m. (Liv. xliii. 22).

Strēpsīlides, ae, m. a Theban, whose praises Pindārus has sung, in consequence of his victory in the Pancratium, at the Isthmian games (Ist. vii).

Strōngylē, es, f. Strombolo, the largest of the Æolian islands, except Līpāra (Ap. Bd. Civ.).

Strōphādes, um, f. Strivali, anciently called Plōte, two small islands in the Ionian sea, thirty-five Roman miles from Zēphythus, Zante, and four hundred stadia from the coast of the Morea. They had the name Plōte (Μωρη), because they seemed to float, and Strōphādes from Στροφή, turning. The name has been referred to Calais and Zēthes having driven the Harpies from the house of Phīnēus, king of Thrācia, pursued them to these islands, turned, and again joined the Argonauts. Strābo calls them also Cyparissiarum insula, because they were opposite to the town Cyparissia, or before Cyparissium promontorium. Virgilius, agreeably to what is above stated, represents them as the abode of the Harpies (Æn. iii. 209).

Strōphius, i, m. son of Crēsus, king of Phōcis, who married Anāxibla, sister of Agamēmnon, by whom he had Pylādes. Strōphio atque Agamēmnone nati, the sons of Strōphius and Agamēmnon, &c. v. Pylādes and Orēstes (Ov. Ep. Pont. ii. 6. 25).—2. A grandson of the former, was the son of Pylādes and Elēctra.

Strōmon, ōnis, m. a Scythian commander, whom Cārēsus overpowered, in the war between the Argonauts and the Scythians (Val. Flacc. vi. 193).

Strōmon, ōnis, m. the Stramonica, a river which anciently separated Thrācia, Romania, or Romania, from Mācēdōnia. Thācydides states, that it had its rise in mount Sēlōmus.

Pholus, in Hæmus; and Strabo, near Rhodope. But this difference is inconsiderable, since these were parts of the same range of mountains, which were, by ancient authors, frequently used without discrimination. Claudianus represents the Bessi leaping over it, in despite of its largeness, Facili contemptum Strymonæ saltu damnant Bessi (xxvi. 178). After a course of about ninety miles, this river falls into Sinus Strymonicus, the Gulf of Contessa. Under a lofty rock on this stream, Orpheus bewailed the death of Eurýdicé, where the melody of his music attracted the oaks, and appeased the tigers (Virg. G. iv. 508). Strymonii, orum, m. the people who lived on this river (Herod. vii. 75). Adj. Strymonius, a, um, of Strymon, Thracian. Strymoniae grues, Strymonian cranes; that kind of bird abounded on the banks of this stream (Virg. G. i. 120).

Stübëra, m, f. (Σταβήρα, Sûidas), a town of Mæcædonia, to which the Roman consul, P. Sulpicius Galba, marched after the battle of Octolophum, in 202 B.C., not knowing whether Philippus, king of Mæcædonia, had retreated (Liv. xxxi. 39). Adj. Stübëreus, a, um.

Stymphaliis, Idis, f. a district of Mæcædonia, which, along with Atintania and Elmiothis, formed part of the fourth division of that kingdom, after it was reduced to a Roman province (Liv. xlv. 30).

Stymphalus, i, m. (Πύμψαλα, orum, n.) the Lake of Vouli, a lake of Arcadia, not of great extent, but grand and picturesque, from being surrounded by mountains of a bold outline, and of magnificent appearance. A mountain which bore the same name, now Monte Poglii, or, Glynnio-Vuni, probably stood on the verge of the lake.—2. A river of Arcadia, which rises in a spring with great force, about half a mile from the town Stymphalus, traverses the Lake of Vouli, and falls into a chasm, whence it runs in a subterranean channel, for two hundred stadia, until it approaches Argos, when it rises, forming Erisinus, the Kephalaria. Stymphale membrande (Claud. xlv. 1). Stymphalis, Idis, f. applied to females, or nouns feminine. Stymphalides undæ (Ov. Met. ix. 187). Stymphalis silva (Ov. Met. v. 585).

Stymphalus, i, f. a town of considerable note, on which account Pindarus calls it the metropolis of Arcadia. Here Juno was said to be educated by Téménus, son of Pélægus. It stood at the distance of five stadia from the Lake of Vouli (Strabo says fifty), and its ruins are still considerable, on a rocky eminence rising from the north side of the lake. Inh. Stymphali, orum, m. Adj. Stymphalius, et, Stymphaliæus, a, um. Stymphalia terra, the ground belonging to Stymphalus (Liv. xxxiii. 14). Stymphalia monstra, the monstrous birds which lived on human flesh, killed at Stymphalus by Hércules (Catal. lxxiii. 113).

Styra, orum, n. Stoura, a city of Eubœa, Negrepont. Inh. Styrcæus, i, um, v. Styrci, orum, m. (Herod. viii. 46).

Styx, igis, m. a river in the Infernal Regions. Epimenides, the Cretan poet, makes Styx the daughter of Oceanus, and wife of Piræus; Hæsioidus says of Pallas (Paus. viii. 18). The oath of the gods was inviolable, when they swore by this stream; Dii cujus jurare timent, et fallere nomen. Besides swearing by Styx, Sæmus makes Juno lay her one hand on the earth, and the other on the sea, in token that she would fulfil her promise (Hom. II. xiv. 270 seq.). The ancients believed that the souls of all whose bodies had not been buried, were compelled to wander an hundred years, on the banks of Styx, before they could be allowed to cross it; hence no death was so much dreaded as shipwreck. When the body was interred, the soul or spirit, Umbra, Manes, v. Simulacrum, was said to be functum sepulchris, and therefore on its arrival admitted into the boat of Chæron, the ferryman of that river. The Greeks and Romans supposed the Infernal Regions to be in the centre of the earth. Hence, Stygisque admoverat umbris, had placed near the Stygian shades, i. e. deep in the earth (Ov. Met. i. 139). Adj. Stygiælis, is, e, et, Stygius, a, um, of Styx, infernal. Stygialia sacra, Stygian rites, i. e. magic rites (Virg. Cir. 374). Stygias Juppiter, Plutō (Virg. Æn. iv. 638). Stygias frater (Jovis), Plutō (Virg. Æn. x. 113). Stygia cymba, the Stygian boat, i. e. the boat of Chæron (Virg. G. iv. 506). Stygia palus, v. unda, the river Styx. Stygias lacus, the same. Stygias eripites, the Furies (Val. Flacc. li. 106). Stygias sordes, the Fates (Luc. Phar. ix. 838).—2. A spring in Nônæria, the water of which was poisonous. It falls or rather trickles down a rock, and is afterwards lost in the river Cræthis. To the waters of Styx, the ancients attributed the power of dissolving a vast number of substances, which must be imputed solely to fiction (Paus. viii. 18). There appear to have been other fountains of this name in Greece, possessing the same quality; Curtius mentions one in Mæcædonia. Water from it, according to some, terminated the days of Alexander the Great (x. 10).

Suardones, um, m. the Suardonians, a German nation, whose geographical position cannot be ascertained with any degree of certainty (Tac. Mor. Ger. 40).

Subcënturio, onis, m. a lieutenant, who was the substitute of the cënturio, or captain (Liv. viii. 8).

Sübërtum, i, n. Sovetto, a town of Tuscan, not far from Sôana, the Soana, which has its name a Sübërt, from the quantity of that kind of wood produced by the lands around. Some are of opinion, that the town should be Sübërtum. Inh. Sübërtini, orum, m. Adj. Sübërtanus, a, um. Forum Sübërtanum (Liv. xxvi. 23). Authors are divided both with respect to the name of the town, and its site (Cluv.).

Sübläquæm, i, n. La Badia di Subjaco, a villa of the Roman emperor Nêro, on the borders of the Simbraine lakes (Tac. Ann. xiv. 22).

Süblæus pons, Süblæi pöntis, m. a wooden bridge erected by Ancus Mærcius over Tiber, the Tevere, in order to form a communication between Janiculum, Monte Gianicolo, and the city Rôma, Rome. It was the first bridge built over that river (Liv. i. 33).

Subôta, orum, n. an island between Elen and Athos (Liv. xlv. 28).

Sübrus Dextery, Sübrü Dextet, m. a military tribune, who remained faithful to Galba, in a tumult which preceded the downfall of that emperor, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 31).

Sūbrius Flāvius, Sūbrii Flāvii, m. a tribune of the pretorian cohort, who entered with ardour into a conspiracy against the Roman emperor, Néro, and formed the design of putting him to death, whilst singing on the stage, or whilst rambling abroad in his midnight frolics. Had the measure succeeded, Sūbrius and others intended to bestow the purple on the philosopher Sēneca, from respect to his virtues. On the discovery of the conspiracy, he, at first, attempted to evade the weight of evidence against him, but afterwards with great fortitude avowed the part which he had acted. When Néro asked him, how he could forget the obligation of his oath, Sūbrius replied, "I hated you; nor was any soldier more faithful to you, whilst you deserved to be loved. I began to hate you, after you had become the murderer of your mother, and of your wife, a charioteer, a comedian, and an incendiary." The monster, unaccustomed to the voice of truth, startled at the narrative of his own conduct, and nothing in the whole conspiracy made so deep an impression on his mind, as the declaration of Sūbrius, whom he ordered for immediate execution (Tac. Ann. xv. 49-67).

Sūbura, v. Sūbūra, m. f. a street in Rome. Clāmōsa Sūbura (Mart. xii. 18). Mediā Sūbura (Juv. Sat. x. 156). Adj. Sūbūrānus, a, um. Sūbūrāni māgistra (Mart. xi. 79). Sūero, ōnis, m. a Rutulian killed by Æneas (Virg. Æn. xii. 505).

Sūcro, ōnis, f. Alzira, a town of Spain, at the mouth of Sūcro, the Xucar (Plin. i. 299). Inh. Sūcrōnēnses, ium, m. (Val. Max. iii. 7).

Sūcro, ōnis, m. the Xucar, a river of Spain, the waters of which Silius Italicus mentions as being very cold (iii. 372). Its course is easterly, and it falls into the Mediterranean Sea, in north lat. 39°.

Sūdētum. See Sūbūrtum. Suedius Clēmēns, Suedii Clēmētis, m. a centurion of the first rank, under the emperor Otho, who intrusted to him and other two officers, the expedition against Gallia Nārbōnēnsis, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 87 seq.).

Suessa. See Aurūnea, and Pāmētta. Inh. Suessāni, orum, m. (Liv. vii. 38).

Sūessōnes, et, Suessōnes (3 syl.), um (Suessōnes, Luc. Phar. i. 423), m. a people of Gallia Belgica, whose country was bounded on the S. by Mātrōna, the Marne. Their capital Augusta, afterwards Suessōnes, now Soissons, stands on Axōna, the Aisne. Although a brave and powerful nation, they were obliged to submit to the arms of Cæsar, in 59 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 104).

Suessitāni, orum, m. a people in the north of Spain, adjoining to the Lūcētāni, whose territory lay to the north of the Ebro, towards the mouth of that river. Adj. Suessitānus, a, um. Suessitānus ager (Liv. xxviii. 24). Suessitāna jūventūs (Liv. xxxiv. 20).

Suessūla, m. f. Castel di Sessola, a town of Cāmpānia, at which the Romans defeated the Sāmītes, in 342 B. C. Inh. Suessūlāni, orum, m. (Liv. vii. 37 seq.).

Suetes (2 syl.), is, m. a Scythian commander, killed by Argus, in the war against the Argonauts and Colchians (Val. Flac. v. 550).

Suetōnius Lēnis, Suetōnii Lēnis, m. a tribune in the Roman army, was the father of C. Suetōnius Trānquillus, the Biographer of the first twelve Roman emperors. His son mentions that he was present at the battle near Bēbriacum, between the troops of Otho and Vitellius. Victory declared for the latter, and consequently placed him on the imperial throne.

C. Suetōnius Paullinus, C. Suetōnii Paullini, m. a distinguished commander of the Roman army, who made war against the Mauritanians, desolated their country, and crossed mount Atlas, which no general had done before him. Cn. Hosidius Geta succeeded him, and had the honour of terminating the war in Mauritania, after which it became a Roman province, in the year 41. The emperor appointed Suetōnius commander-in-chief in Britain, and, victory still attending him, he subdued Anglesey, defeated the Britons under Boudicca, in a pitched battle, when eighty thousand of them are said to have fallen. Had he not met with opposition from Jūlius Classiciānus, the Intendant, he would probably have conquered the whole island. Néro soon after recalled him, and his military reputation, as well as personal character, appears to have declined from this date. He held a commission under Otho, who consulted him on all important matters, and followed his advice. He meanly exposed himself to Vitellius for fighting against him, and this humble submission procured his pardon. His conduct in the latter years of his life, tarnished the honours gained by his success in arms. He even confessed, that he had betrayed Otho, and grounded his claim to the forgiveness of Vitellius, on his fraud and perfidy to the preceding emperor. Tacitus speaks in harsher terms of Suetōnius in his life of Agricola, than in his History. With whatever defects he may be charged in his latter years, it cannot be denied, that his victories, both in Mauritania and Britain, rank him high among Roman generals (Tac. Ann. xiv. 29 seq.).

Sūēvi, v. Suevi (2 syl.), orum, m. a nation of Gērmānia, Germany, who inhabited a large tract of country (Suevia, a, f.) lying between Albis, the Elbe, and Vistula, the Viśtula, on the northern side of Silva Hērcynia. They made many inroads on the Roman territories under the Emperors. Cæsar makes them by far the greatest and most warlike of all the German nations, and adds that they were said to possess an hundred cantons (B. G. v. 1). Lūcānus calls them Phāri, from their having, in general, reddish hair; which their name is likewise said to signify (Phar. ii. 21). Adj. Sūēvus, et, Suevius, a, um. Sūēvus crinis, very long coarse hair, of a reddish colour (Sil. Ital. v. 134). Mārē Suevicum, the Baltic Sea, called also Sinus Cōdānus.

Sūfēnus, i, m. a bad poet, whom Catullus ridicules for his vanity, and who appears to have written with great bitterness and malignity (xiv. 19).

Sūgāmbri, v. Sīgāmbri, orum, m. an Indian nation, who, with the Ambri, opposed the progress of Alexander the Great, with an army of eighty thousand foot, and sixty thousand horse. Their numbers appear more remarkable than their bravery, since they made a feeble resistance against the skeleton army of the Macedonian conqueror (Just. xii. 9).

Sūlius Cæsōnīus, Sūlī Cæsōnī, m. a man whom the emperor Claudius pardoned, although implicated in the criminality of Mēssālina, in consequence of his vices, and the indignity to which he had submitted (Tac. Ann. xi. 36).

M. Sūlius, M. Sūlī, m. surnamed Rūfus, according to some authors, and Nērvīlīānus, according to others, was the consular colleague of C. Antistius Vētus, in the year 51 (Tac. Ann. xii. 25).

P. Sūlius, P. Sūlī, m. a Roman of some distinction, powerful, venal, and high in favour with the emperor Claudius, whose friendship he perverted to improper purposes. In the former reign he had been banished to an island, and, on his return, became a noted informer. Mēssālina suborned him to prosecute Pōppea and her lover Vālērīus Asiaticus. From Tācītus, he appears to have been one of the worst of men, and merited a severer punishment than banishment with confiscation of property. The senate allowed a part to his son and grand-daughter, and fixed his residence in the Bālēares. Sēnēca conducted the prosecution which delivered the state from that pestilential character, not however without subjecting his own reputation to some stain. Sūlius had formerly served as quaestor under Gērmānīcus (Tac. Ann. iv. 31 seq.).

Sūlōnes, um, m. a nation inhabiting Sceden, and several of the isles which now belong to Denmark. On this account, as well as the ancients believing Scāndia, v. Scāndināvia, Norway, Sweden, Scāndia, and Finland to be an island, Tācītus says the Sūlōnes lived on the ocean. From them and the Cimbrians, sprang the Normans, who obtained great celebrity by their arms, and, at last, settled in that part of Gāllia called from them Normandy. Tācītus mentions their power at sea, describes the form of their ships, and, from the account which he gives of their government, it appears to have been both hereditary and despotic. They held riches in great esteem, the reason given by the historian for their submission to despotism (Tac. Mor. Ger. 44 seq.).

Sūlsmōntium, i, n. Monte Cervera, a mountain of the Līgūres, who fled to it and Bālīsta in 189 B. C., when the Roman consul M. Āmīlius Lēpidus was ravaging their lands and villages in the plains. From these mountains, Āmīlius obliged them to descend, and defeated them in a regular engagement. The consul A. Pōstūmīus Albinus Lūscus invested this mountain in 182 B. C., cut off all supplies of provisions, and obliged the Līgūres to surrender (Liv. xxxix. 2 seq.).

Sūletius, i, m. a noted informer (Hor. Sat. i. 4. 70). See Caprius.

Sūlla, ae, m. See Cōrnēlius.

Sūlla, ae, m. an astrologer, who foretold to the emperor Cālīgūla, when consulting him, that death speedily and inevitably would befall him; and the event justified the declaration (Suet. Cal. 37).

Sūlmo, ōnis, m. a Rutulian, killed by Nīrus (Virg. Ēn. ix. 412).

Sūlmo, ōnis, m. Salmona, a town of the Pēllīgi, on the east side of Apennīnus, the Apennines, celebrated for being the birthplace of the poet Ovidius, who traces its derivation from Sūlmus, a companion of Ānēas (Fast. iv. 79 seq.). It is distant from Rome about ninety miles, and its situation is elevated, hence Sūlus Itālicus, Gēlidus Sūlmo (viii. 510). Inh. Sūlmōnēnses, ium, m. (Plin. i. 358). Adj. Sūlmōnēnsis, is, e. Sūlmōnēnsis ager, the territory of the Sūlmōnēnses (Plin. iii. 416). De Sūlmōnēsi (femīnā) (Juv. Sat. vi. 187).—2. Sarmonetta, a town of Lātīum, which formerly belonged to the Hērnicī.

Sūlpicia, ae, f. a respectable woman, the mother-in-law of the Roman consul Sp. Pōstūmīus Albinus, in whose house he had the interview with Hīspāla Fecēnīa, respecting the orgies of Bāchus, in the year 188 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 12).—2. Daughter of Sērvīus Pātērcūlus, and wife of Q. Fūlvīus Flāccus, judged the purest matron in Rome, at the consecration of the statue of Vēnus Vērtīcōrdia, in the year 116 B. C. (Val. Max. viii. 14).—3. Daughter of Sūlpicius Sērvīus (Tibul. iv. 10. 4).—4. The wife of Cālēnus, to whom Mārtiālis writes an epigram, on his happiness in the conjugal state (x. 38).

Sūlpicia Pratēxtāta, Sūlpicia Pratēxtāta, f. the wife of Crāssus, who fell by the wicked conduct of Aquīllus Rēgūlus, and she appeared in the senate with her four fatherless children as evidence against Aquīllus, in the year 71 (Tac. Hist. iv. 42).

Sūlpicius, i, m. a tribune of the soldiers, who had not, on the day following the Ides of Quīntilis (August), performed the rites of augury, and had, without being certain of the favour of the gods, exposed, on the third day after, the Roman army to the enemy, which occasioned the day after the Ides, and thence it followed, as some think, the days after the Kalends, and Nones, to be reckoned inauspicious (Liv. vi. 1).—2. A Roman historian, whose writings have perished. Of his character, country, and family, nothing certain is known (Cor. Nep. Hann. 13).—3. A tribune of the people, who embraced the interest of C. Mārius against L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, and opposed his entrance into Rome (Flor. iii. 21).

Sūlpicius Asper, Sūlpiciū Aspri, m. a centurion, one of the active conspirators against the emperor, Nēro, in the year 66. Being asked by the emperor himself, why he had conspired against his life, Sūlpicius undauntedly replied, "Because there was no other relief from your flagitious crimes." On uttering this sentence, he instantly suffered the punishment of death (Tac. Ann. xv. 49–68).

Sūlpicius Cāmērinus, Sūlpiciū Cāmērinī, m. a Roman, who had governed in Africa, with pro-consular authority, and, after his return, was charged with acts of cruelty to individuals, not with extortion, or any charge of a public nature. The emperor acquitted him in the year 59. Nēro afterwards put both Sūlpicius and his son to death (Tac. Ann. xiii. 52 seq.).

Sūlpicius Flāvus, Sūlpiciū Flāvi, m. an intimate of the emperor Claudius, with whose assistance he began to write history. To this species of composition he had been encouraged by T. Livius (Suet. Claud. 41).

Sūlpicius Flōrus, Sūlpiciū Flōri, m. a man who belonged to a British cohort, whom Gālba presented with the freedom of Rome. By order of Otho, he and Stālius Mūrīcus put Piso Licinianus to death, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 43).

Sulpicius Rufus, Sulpicii Rūfī, m. director of the public games, whom the Roman emperor, Claudius, caused to be executed at the same time with C. Silius, in the year 48 (Tac. Ann. xi. 35).

C. Sulpicius, C. Sulpicii, m. elected a prætor in 214 B. C., when the government of Sicily, Sicily, fell to his lot (Liv. xxv. 41).—2. Another who held the same office, in 171 B. C., when he and M. Claudius pleaded the cause of the commons against the consuls, who complained, that even the younger men did not obey their summons. Sulpicius attributed the backwardness to enlist, on the part of the commons, solely to the consuls courting popularity, and offered to complete the levies by their prætorian authority, a measure which the senate approved, and the prætors raised the whole number for the Macedonian war, within eleven days (Liv. xliii. 14, 15).

C. Sulpicius Cæmerinus, C. Sulpicii Cæmerini, m. created censor, in 379 B. C., and resigned his office on the death of his colleague, Sp. Postumius Reginensis (Liv. vi. 27).

C. Sulpicius Gallus, C. Sulpicii Gallus, m. a Roman pontiff, who died in 201 B. C., three years after his appointment (Liv. xxxii. 7).—2. Another pontiff, who was chosen in place of M. Semonius Tuditanus, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xli. 21).—3. Elected prætor, in 173 B. C., to whose lot the jurisdiction of the city fell (Liv. xlii. 28—31).

—4. Held the office of consul at Rome, with D. Hæterius Agrippa, in the year 22. Tacitus calls him C. Sulpicius (Ann. iii. 52).—

5. A man of consular rank, and brother of the Roman emperor Galba, embraced a voluntary death, because he had been excluded from obtaining a province in the usual manner, which he considered as a signal to die, and he obeyed, in the year 36. Tacitus calls him C. Gallus (Ann. vi. 40).

C. Sulpicius Gallus, C. Sulpicii Galli, m. served in the Roman army under L. Æmilius Paulus, probably in the capacity of a tribune of the soldiers, whom his commander sent to announce to the senate his victory over the Ingauni Ligures, in 183 B. C. Certain Spaniards, who had gone to Rome to complain of the rapacity and injustice of M. Titinius, P. Furius Philus, and M. Metellus, chose, by order of the senate, four patrons, of whom C. Sulpicius Gallus was one. In 172 B. C., he obtained the prætorship, when the jurisdiction of the city fell to his lot. He appears to have been a man of science, since he foretold an eclipse of the moon, when he was in the army of M. Æmilius Paulus, in Macedonia, on the day before the Nones of September. With the permission of the consul, Sulpicius collected the soldiers, and informed them, lest it should be considered as a prodigy, that the moon would next night be eclipsed, from the second hour of the night till the fourth, and that it ought to excite no wonder, since eclipses happened in the course of nature, at stated times, and both the period when they happened, and their duration could be ascertained beforehand. The eclipse came on at the time mentioned by Sulpicius, and continued during two hours. His wisdom appeared to the soldiers almost divine, a proof, that the nation knew little of astronomy. In 168 B. C., he was chosen consul with M. Claudius Mæcellus, and subdued the Ligures (Liv. xl. 23—Ep. 46). Of this name Valerius Maximus mentions one, who divorced his wife, because she had been sent out of doors, without a veil (vi. 8).

C. Sulpicius Longus, C. Sulpicii Longi, m. elected consul, first in 336 B. C., with P. Ælius Petus q. v. He was twice re-elected to that office. The success of the arms under his command, seems attributable to the arts of treachery rather than to military bravery. No sooner did he march against a town, than it was betrayed into his hands, and to his disgrace, it ought to be recorded, that a general carnage commonly ensued (Liv. viii. 15 seq.).

C. Sulpicius Peticus, C. Sulpicii Peti, m. was elected consul with C. Licinius Stolo, in 363 B. C., and three years after he held the same office with the same colleague. He had afterwards the honour of being four times re-elected to the consulship, and, in consequence of a war with the Gauls, joined by the Tiburtes, was appointed dictator, in 337 B. C., when he named M. Valerius master of the horse. For some time, Sulpicius declined battle with the enemy, from their situation being unfavourable, and their disposition not adapted for delay. The soldiers, at last, having become impatient for battle, agreed to solicit the dictator, and that Sextus Tullius, of great military fame, should be their speaker. This request he did not think it prudent to refuse, although he disapproved both of the conduct of the troops and of Sextus Tullius, and promised they should be allowed to fight next day. He invented an expedient which both the Romans and other nations have since often adopted. In order to deceive the enemy, with an appearance of strength greatly beyond the reality, he ordered the panniers to be taken off the mules, and only two sidecloths to be left. The muleteers having received the arms either of the sick, or of the prisoners, mounted them, and a thousand of these mixed with a hundred horsemen, took their station in the woods above the camp, with instructions not to move till ordered. This ostentatious display of inefficient troops alarmed the Gauls, and impeded their flight, so that the dictator gained a more complete victory than had been obtained since that of Camillus. From the spoils, he consecrated a great quantity of gold in the capitol, and inclosed it in hewn stone. In his fifth consulship (330 B. C.), he marched against the Taurinenses, who did not meet him in the field, and, therefore, he desolated their country, on which they sued for peace, and obtained a truce for forty years (Liv. vii. 24—25). To him Eutropius refers (ii. 5).

L. Sulpicius, L. Sulpicii, m. a military tribune in the army of L. Æmilius Paulus, who had an important command in the battle, which compelled the Ligurians to give hostages to the Romans, in 183 B. C. He was sent to Rome with L. Aurelius Cotta, to report these transactions (Liv. xl. 27 seq.).

P. Sulpicius, P. Sulpicii, m. an interrex, who held an election of consuls, in 300 B. C. (Liv. x. 11).—2. One of Cæsar's lieutenant-generals in Gallia. Q. Tullius Cicero said

P. Sulpicius were stationed among the Æduli, at Cabillo, v. Cabillonum, Chalons, and Mâcon, on Arar, the Saône. These two officers were intrusted with the care of provisions (Ces. B. G. vii. 90).

P. Sulpicius Cæmærinus, P. Sulpicii Cæmærinus, m. one of the three commissioners sent by the Roman senate, to bring written copies of the famous laws of Solon, and to obtain information regarding the laws, institutions, &c., of the other Grecian states, in the year 454 B. C. (Liv. iii. 31). See A. Mælius.

P. Sulpicius Gælba, P. Sulpicii Gælba, m. son of Ser. Sulpicius Gælba, was consul with Cn. Fulvius Centumalus (2) in 213 B. C., although he had not formerly borne any curule magistracy. He entered on his office on the Ides of March, and during that year, Hannibal, having been foiled at Cápua, marched against Rome, on which Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with a part of his forces, quitted Cápua, in order to defend the capital. The senate ordered the consuls to cast lots for their provinces, when Macedônia fell to Sulpicius, who succeeded M. Valerius Levinus in the government of that country. In this province, the senate continued him for two successive years, and allowed him five hundred pounds' weight of gold, from Sancius Æriatun, and the command of the fleet. Attalus, king of Asia, joined him with a number of ships. Sometimes Sulpicius made attacks on land, whilst Attalus assisted him at sea. Their combined fleet effected nothing worthy of being recorded, nor did his operations on land, although occasionally successful, alter considerably the general state of the war with the Macedonian monarch. After he returned to Italy, he was created dictator on purpose to recall Cn. Servilius Cæpio, consul, who, from vanity of being considered the restorer of peace to Italia, Italy, had gone into Sicilia, Sicily, after Hannibal, when Scipio Africanus had carried the war into Africa. He named M. Servilius Geminus q. n. master of the horse, and, by the weight of his authority, compelled the return of the consul. C. Aurelius Cotta was appointed the colleague of Sulpicius in his second consulship, in 202 B. C.; when Macedônia again fell to his lot; but the people almost unanimously voted against the Macedonian war. At the request of the senate, he assembled the people again, and in an eloquent speech laid the true state of matters before them, on which all the centuries declared for immediate hostilities. The heralds informed him, that he might proclaim war against Philippus, either in his own presence, or at the nearest garrison in his kingdom. The senate ordered the consuls to disband the veteran troops, allowing Sulpicius to enlist volunteers from the army of Scipio Africanus, which had returned from Africa. After he had entered Macedônia, he took several towns by assault; others surrendered, some from inclination, or from fear. Philippus declined a general engagement, and contented himself with sending out skirmishing parties, which generally proved inferior to the Romans. Sulpicius rode up to the Macedonian entrenchments, upbraided the king with cowardice, and endeavoured, by all the means in his power, to provoke him to give battle; but without success. This was the first instance in which the Romans employed elephants, several of which they had taken in the Punic war. Sulpicius then encamped at Octôphus, thinking he might forage there with greater safety, when Philippus, having followed, attacked the Romans scattered over the fields, which brought on a pretty general engagement, in which the king had nearly lost his life, from his horse being wounded. The Macedonians lost two hundred killed, besides prisoners, many horses richly caparisoned, and other spoils. During next night, Philippus decamped; sent a messenger to Sulpicius on pretence of asking a truce to bury the dead, but in reality to effect his escape. Having gone to rest, the consul promised an answer next day, by which means Philippus gained his object, and was beyond the reach of the Romans, before they knew that he had quitted his station. After attacking a few towns of no great importance, the consul returned, without any decisive engagement, to Apollonia, whence he had set out in the beginning of the campaign. He afterwards served as a lieutenant-general under T. Quinctius Flamininus, and, at a later period, was one of the ten commissioners whom the senate appointed with T. Quinctius Flamininus to conclude a peace with Philippus, king of Macedônia. The ambassadors of Antiochus, king of Syria, could not form a treaty of alliance with the senate, and therefore they appointed P. Sulpicius Gælba, P. Villius Tappulus, and P. Ælius Pætus to go into Asia, and conclude a peace with that monarch in person. These ambassadors immediately set out on their journey, and spent some time in Asia, in fulfilment of their mission; but returned to Rome without having come to any determination, leaving matters in the same unsettled state, as when they went thither (Liv. xxv. 41 seq.).

P. Sulpicius Quirinus, P. Sulpicii Quirini, m. a man of great wealth, who married Lépida, by whom he had no children, on which account she attempted to impose upon him a supposititious child. Her husband repudiated her, which her guilt and infamy well deserved, yet his resentment, after their separation, rendered her an object of compassion. With the ancient patrician family of the Sulpicii, this man had no connexion, being born at Lanuvium, Civita Lavinia. He obtained distinction by his military services, and talents for business, which induced Augustus to raise him to the consulship, with M. Valerius Messala Barbatus, in the year 12. By sordid avarice, he accumulated a large fortune, and obtained triumphal honours for his success in taking some forts in Cilicia. Gratitude for the kindness which he showed to Tiberius, at the time he resided in the island of Rhodus, induced that prince, after he became emperor, to desire the senate to decree a public funeral to Sulpicius, who did not merit such distinction (Tac. Ann. iii. 22-48).

P. Sulpicius Rufus, P. Sulpicii Rufi, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who, with the assistance of C. Marius, enacted a number of pernicious laws, which Sulla abrogated on his returning to Rome, when he drove from P. Sulpicius Rufus and C. Marius from the city. This victory Sulla proved, by setting a price on their heads, that Sulpicius would have escaped, had been betrayed by one of his own slaves, who discovered the place of his concealment in a farm-house, from which he was brought out and killed, in 89 B. C. The slave received the reward promised to the discoverer. Sulla immediately after ordered him to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock, because he had betrayed his master (Liv. Ep. 77). The account given by Velleius Paterculus is different from that of any other author (ii. 19). Cicero describes Sulpicius, as an orator of the very first eminence, who obtained great popularity by opposing C. Julius Caesar's canvass for the consulship, contrary to law. It does not appear, that he committed any of his speeches to writing, for what was, after his death, published in his name, by P. Caninius, can scarcely be considered his work, since it is unknown whether the editor wrote from recollection, or from notes of the author (Cic. Off. ii. 14 § 6). To him Sallustius refers (Frag. 1), and Eutropius (v. 4). Adj. Sulpicius, a. um. Sulpicia leges, the laws above referred to.—2. One of Caesar's lieutenant-generals, to whom he gave the charge of the port in Gallia, France, from which he sailed for Britannia, Britain, and a garrison sufficient to protect it during his absence (Caes. B. G. iv. 22).

P. Sulpicius Saverrio, P. Sulpicii Saverriensis, m. obtained the consulship in 305 B. C. with P. Sempronius Sophus. During this year, the Romans, in the space of fifty days, took forty-one towns from the Æquans, most of which they destroyed, and almost extirpated the whole of that people. Twenty-four years after, Sulpicius was again elected consul, when he and his colleague P. Decius Mus marched against Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, whom they defeated, killing twenty thousand of his men and some elephants. In 301 B. C., Sulpicius was chosen a censor, when two tribes were added, Antensis and Terentina (Liv. ix. 45 seq. Eutrop. ii. 13).

Q. Sulpicius, Q. Sulpicii, m. a lieutenant-general to A. Postumius Tubertus, who assigned to him the charge of the camp, in 431 B. C. (Liv. iv. 27).

Q. Sulpicius Camerinus, Q. Sulpicii Camerini, m. a military tribune with consular power, first in 401 B. C., and afterwards in 397 B. C. (Liv. v. 8 seq.).—2. A Roman, who held the consulship with C. Poppæus Sabinus, in the year 8 (Suet. Vesp. 2).

Q. Sulpicius Longus, Q. Sulpicii Longi, m. a military tribune with consular power, in 389 B. C. The capital of Rome was this year besieged by the Gauls. Sulpicius concluded a capitulation with Brennus, the chieftain of that nation (Liv. v. 36–48). See Brennus.

Ser. Sulpicius, Ser. Sulpicii, m. principal curio, died of an epidemic distemper which raged at Rome, in 463 B. C. (Liv. iii. 7).—

2. A military tribune with consular authority, who recovered Tusculum in 376 B. C., and was afterwards thrice elected to the same office. He married the elder daughter of M. Fabius Ambustus; her sister was married to C. Licinius Stolo q. v., a plebeian (Liv. vi. 22–33).—3. A lieutenant-general in the Roman army, who conquered the Marrucini, and reduced the whole of their country, in 91 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 76).—4. A senator, who attended Juba at his entry into Utica, after the destruction of Curius and his army (Caes. B. C. ii. 44).—5. Was the son of C. Sulpicius Galba, and grandson of Servius, s. Servius Sulpicius Galba, a celebrated orator and the first distinguished character of that family. He held the rank of lieutenant-general in Caesar's army during the Gallic war, and afterwards joined the conspiracy, which the republican party formed against the life of that ambitious and unprincipled general. An instance of the intrepid freedom which he used with Caesar, Valerius Maximus has recorded (vi. 2). Ser. Sulpicius Galba, his great grandson, succeeded to the government of the Roman state on the death of the emperor Nero.—6. A Roman lawyer of great learning, who wrote on the ceremonies of religion (Gel. vi. 12).

Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus, Ser. Sulpicii Camerini, m. was elected consul in 500 B. C. with M. Tullius. Nothing memorable occurred that year (Liv. ii. 19).—2. Consul in 461 B. C. Seven years after, he was one of the three deputies sent to Athens to procure a copy of the laws of Solon, and to obtain information respecting the institutions, customs, and laws of the other Grecian states. On his return, in 451 B. C., he was appointed a decemvir, afterwards sent as a deputy to the Roman army, which had revolted, and posted themselves on Mons Aventinus in 449 B. C. He distinguished himself, when he had the command of the cavalry, in a successful battle against the Sabines, Volscians, and Æquans. With great intrepidity, he broke through the centre of the enemy's line, which threw them into disorder, and contributed greatly to their defeat in 446 B. C. (Liv. iii. 10–70).—3. Consul in 392 B. C., afterwards a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, when he and Agrippa Purnus marched against the Salpinates, whose territories they plundered, for the enemy did not venture to fight. In 388 B. C. he was an interrex, but did not hold an election, which was done by his successor L. Valerius Potitus (Liv. v. 29 seq.).—4. A consul in 344 B. C., when the Auruncians suddenly commenced hostilities, and apprehensions were entertained, that it was part of a scheme formed by the whole Latin nation, on which account L. Furius Camillus was created dictator (Liv. vii. 28).

Ser. Sulpicius Galba, Ser. Sulpicii Galba, m. was elected a curule edile at Rome, in 211 B. C. Before he obtained the office of a praetor, he was one of the five ambassadors sent to Attalus, king of Pergamus, to obtain from him Idaea Mater, in 207 B. C., and died six years after (Liv. xxvii. 21 seq.).—2. After being a curule edile, he was elected praetor, and to his lot fell the jurisdiction of the city. For the office of consul he stood candidate, the second time, in 187 B. C., when, as in the former canvass, he was unsuccessful (Liv. xxxviii. 35 seq.). A person of this name, probably the same, was a tribune of the soldiers in the second legion, who had a personal dislike to L. Emilius Paullus, on which account, he opposed his triumph for the conquest of Persens. The principal men of the city reproached him for the shamefulness of this conduct, which weakened his resistance; but a speech of M. Servilius Geminus baffled his plan, and secured to the consul the honour of a triumph (Liv. xlv. 35 seq.).—3.

A Roman prætor, who sold to the Gauls the Lusi-tani, after they had surrendered on the faith of the Romans. This act of injustice induced L. Scribônus, a tribune of the people, to propose a law in 151 B. C., for their restoration to liberty, which M. Pörçius Cato, censor, supported with great zeal, in a speech which he afterwards published in his Annals. Q. Fulvius Nobilior gave his support to Sulpicius, who made a piteous oration in his own defence, embraced his two infant sons, and the son of Sulpicius Gallus, for whom he was tutor, and thus gained his cause by exciting the commiseration of the assembly (Liv. Ep. 48, 49). To this prosecution, Tacitus alludes (Ann. iii. 66). The stigma, attached to this trial for breach of faith, seems to have been forgotten, since he obtained the consulship with L. Aurelius Cotta, in 146 B. C. Cicero mentions him as an orator of some eminence, but Tacitus speaks of his language and composition as inelegant and harsh (Cic. de Orat. i. 53 &c. Tac. Or. 18).—4. A Roman, who, having been taken by the Lucanians, effected his escape by means of the woman with whom he lodged. He defeated the Pelignians in a pitched battle, in 92 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 72, 73).—5. Was the first who built, in Rome, public storehouses, or vaults, in which wine, corn, and other articles of that kind, were laid up until they were bought, on which account these warehouses (horrea) were called by his name. From them such as had no great store or variety of wines, used to supply themselves when occasion required. Adj. Sulpicius, a. um. Sulpicia horrea, cellars, vaults, or storehouses, such as Sulpicius first erected (Hor. Od. iv. 12, 18).—6. Was the son of C. Sulpicius Galba, and grandson of Servius, v. Servius Sulpicius Galba, a celebrated orator, and the first distinguished character of that family. He held the rank of lieutenant-general in Cæsar's army, during the Gallic war, and afterwards joined the conspiracy, which the republican army formed against the life of that ambitious and unprincipled general. An instance of the intrepid freedom which he used with Cæsar, Valerius Maximus has recorded (vi. 2). Ser. Sulpicius Galba, his great grandson, succeeded to the government of the Roman State on the death of the emperor Nero.—7. Was the great-grandson of Ser. Sulpicius Galba, one of the conspirators against C. Julius Cæsar. His mother's name was Mummia Achæica (Suet. Gal. 3). The prænomen of his grandfather and father has not been transmitted. The former obtained no distinguished office under government, having never risen higher than prætor. He devoted his time chiefly to study, and published a voluminous and not uninteresting history, which time has destroyed. His father discharged the office of consul, and was distinguished as a pleader, more by his industry, than genius. The Roman emperor, Claudius, always treated the subject of this article as a friend, and under him he succeeded Gæticus, in the command of the army on the Rhine, restored the discipline of the troops, and conquered the Catti. In the reign of Nero, he held the government of Hispania Tarracônensis, eight years, at first active, and severe in the punishment of culprits, afterwards he gave himself up to indolence, either from natural disposition, or from fear of exciting the jealousy of the tyrant. Vindex requested him to assert the rights of mankind, by putting Nero to death. He entered readily into the measure, from having discovered that the emperor had sent private orders to take away his life. The army having saluted him emperor, he declined accepting the title, and called himself the lieutenant-general of the senate and Roman people. From the most respectable men in his army, he formed a sort of senate, with whom he might advise upon important matters, as often as necessity should require. After this measure, and raising a guard for his person, he issued proclamations throughout the empire, requesting all to unite in the common cause, and adopt every possible means to secure the speedy destruction of the tyrant. Vindex lost his life in the attempt, and Sulpicius had oftener than once nearly fallen a victim to the designs of his enemies. News of Nero's death roused his spirits, which the fate of Vindex had depressed. He discontinued the title of lieutenant-general, and assumed that of Cæsar. His character for avarice and cruelty, injured him in the opinion of the Romans, still he obtained the government with more favour than he conducted it. Three favourites, T. Vinus, Cornélius Læco, and his freedman Icælus, to whom he had lately given the surname of Maritimus, had, by their influence over him, the whole administration in their hands. Hælotus and Tigellinus, two of the most mischievous favourites of Nero, Sulpicius not only protected against the violence of the people, who demanded their punishment, but censured the latter for their cruelty, bestowing on Hælotus a distinguished mark of his favour. This conduct provoked the hatred of the people, particularly the soldiers, whom he had defrauded of the donation promised at their taking the oath of allegiance to him. The emperor did not perceive, that the disaffection of the troops originated in aversion to himself, and contempt of his advanced age, foolishly imagining that it proceeded solely from his having no son, for which reason he adopted Piso Frugi Licinianus, a young man of high birth and great accomplishments. This measure induced M. Salvius Otho to take immediate steps for securing the empire to himself, by exciting an insurrection among the soldiers, who soon put the emperor to death. He fell near the lake of Curtius, and his body was allowed to remain there, until a common soldier, accidentally passing, on his return from the place where he had received corn, observed it, severed the head from the body, and, there being no hair by which he could carry it, thrust his finger into the mouth, in which manner he presented it to Otho. After cruelty and contempt had been gratified, by insulting the lifeless body, his steward, Argus, buried both it and the head in his garden, on the Aurelian road. Such was the end of Ser. Sulpicius Galba, after a reign of seven months, in the seventy-third year of his age, and sixty-ninth of the Christian era. Of his personal vices, it would be improper to give any account; the shortness of his reign precludes any certain knowledge of the nature of his administration. In private life, he certainly appeared a more distinguished character, than he did after being invested with the purple. Favouritism, in general, is the mark of a weak mind. Now it must be acknowledged, that Galla possessed very considerable abilities, yet the reins of government were held not by himself, but by the persons already mentioned. What high ideas of his fitness for government would mankind have entertained, had he never ascended the throne. All would have judged him worthy of the empire, had he never been emperor (Eutrop. vii. 16). Adj. Gālbānus, a, um. Gālbānus (militēs) (Tac. Hist. i. 51). Gālbāna (lēgio) (Tac. Hist. iii. 7).

Ser. Sulpicius Rufus, Ser. Sulpicii Rufi, m. a military tribune with consular power, in 387 B. C. He was afterwards twice re-elected to the same office (Liv. vi. 4—21). —2. A consul in 53 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 108). During that year, all Gallia to the west of Rhēnus, the Rhine, was conquered by C. Julius Caesar, except what was inaccessible by marshes (Sal. Frag. 1). Sulpicius warmly embraced the interests of Caesar, in opposition to his colleague, M. Claudius Mārcellus (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 29).

Sūmānus, i, m. perhaps Pluto (quasi summus manum), because thunder during the night was ascribed to him, as that during the day was to Jupiter. From the expression of Ovidius, it appears that the Romans had no precise idea respecting Sūmānus (Fast. vi. 731).

Sūniātus, i, m. a Carthaginian, the enemy of Hāno, who had the command of the army in Sicily, Sicily. From hatred to Hāno, he informed Dionysius, by a letter written in Greek, of his coming against him. The letter having been intercepted, Sūniātus suffered the death of a traitor, and the Carthaginians passed a law interdicting the use of the Greek letters, and the study of that language (Just. xx. 5).

Sūni, orum, m. a people of Germany, who afterwards removed to Gāllia Belgica, and inhabited, according to Cluverius, the duchy of Lamberg. (Tac. Hist. iv. 66). To their name may be referred Shonech, a village in that district.

Sūnium, i, n. Capo Colonna, a promontory of Attica, at the base of which was a harbour, and, on the top, a temple of Minerva. From this promontory, Ægeus precipitated himself into the sea, on seeing the ship in which his son, Theseus, had gone to Crēta, Candia, returning with black sails (Stat. Th. xii. 625). Sūniās, ādis, f. of Sūnium, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Sūniās Minerva (Paus. i. 1). Adj. Sūniācus, a, um.

Sūnōnēsis lācus, a lake in Bithynia (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 8).

Sūvētaurilla, ium, n. a sacrifice at the conclusion of the census, so called from the animals slain, a cow, a sheep, and a bull. Servius Tullius appointed this purification, or expiatory sacrifice, which was not confined to the termination of the census. To obtain the favour of the gods, armies, and the city Rome, were sometimes purified in this manner (Liv. i. 44, Var. R. R. ii. 1).

Sūpræ, arum, m. a rude and uncivilized people of Persia (Amm. Mar. xxx. 1).

Sūra. See Cornellius.

P. Sūra, P. Sūre, m. a lieutenant of T. Otacilius, pretor, in Sicily, Sicily, to whom the fleet of Cn. Servilius Geminus, consul, was delivered over, to be brought to Rome, after the unfortunate descent of Servilius on the African coast, in the year 220 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 31).

Sūrēnas, n. Sūrēna, n. m. the title among the Parthians, of the man next in dignity to the king. Roman authors frequently use this term, in place of the proper name (Tac. Ann. vi. 42. Liv. Ep. 106).

Sūrrētum, i, n. Sorrento, the most southern town in Cāmpānia, which is said to have had its name from the Sūrēnes, who had their abode there (Plin. i. 327). Inh. Sūrrētini, orum (Sing. Sūrrētīnus, i). m. (Liv. xxii. 61). Adj. Sūrrētīnus, et, Sūrrētīnus, a, um. Sūrrētīnum Prīmōntīum, the Cape of Minerva (Plin. i. 524). Sūrrētīni mōtes, the mountains of Sorrento, which produced excellent wine, not apt to affect the head (Plin. i. 326 seq.). Sūrrētīna (vīna) (Mart. xiii. 110).

Sūsa, orum, n. (Sūsa, n. f. Just.), Susa, the chief city of Sūsiāna, a country of Persia, called by Herōdōtus, Masanōia, from Mēmon, who reigned there, and by whose father, Tithōnus, it was built (v. 52). This is the account of Strābo; but Plinius says it was built by Dārius, son of Hytāpes, who probably enlarged it, although its foundation must be referred to a much more ancient date (i. 718). Its walls measured an hundred and twenty stadia; but whether the enclosed space was wholly or only partially occupied by houses, appears doubtful. The Persian monarchs generally resided at Sūsa, Susa, during the winter, from the mildness of the climate, and they spent the summer at Ecbātāna. It was taken by Alexander the Great, in 330 B. C. (Just. xi. 14). Sūsiāna, n. Sūsiāne, es, e. Sūsis, idis, f. that part of Persia, of which Sūsa was the capital (Plin. i. 717). Inh. Sūsiāni, orum (Sing. Sūsiānus, i). m. Adj. Sūsiānus, a, um. Sūsiāna gēns (Just. xiii. 4).

Sūsi, orum, m. troops in the army of Dārius (Curt. ix. 12). The reading is very doubtful, perhaps it should be Sōgdiāni.

Sūsus, i, m. a Cretan, who, with Sillus, of Gnōssus, commanded a body of men under Pērsēs, king of Mācedōnia, in 123 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 51).

Suthul, ūlis, m. (i. e. the town of eagles) a town of Nūmidia, the situation of which is unknown. Here Jūgūrtha, king of Nūmidia, Algiers, kept his treasures, and Sillūstius describes it as built on the edge of a craggy mountain, encompassed by a plain which the rains in winter rendered a morass. A. Postūmus Albinus, during that season, attempted to make himself master of Suthul, which could neither be taken nor invested at that time of the year. This rash project, originating in presumption, and ignorance of military tactics, put the whole Roman forces in the power of Jūgūrtha, and they bought their lives by the ignominy of passing under the yoke (Sal. Jug. 37).

Sūtrium, i, n. Sutri, an inland town of Etrūria, Tuscany, towards the southern extremity of that district, to which it served as a barrier. The Tuscans besieged and carried it, after which Cāmillus retook it in 388 B. C. This town formed a kind of barrier against Etrūria, on which account the Tuscans frequently attempted to get possession of it; but the Romans, knowing its value, baffled their utmost efforts, and preserved its alliance. Is. Sūtini, orum (Sing. Sūtinius, i), m. seem, in general, to have been well disposed towards the Romans, in whom they found able protectors; although they had reason at times, to complain of the severity of their exactions (Liv. vi. 3 seq.). Adj. Sūtinius, et, Sūtius, a, um. Sūtinius ager (Liv. xxvi. 34). Sūtia lecta (Sil. Ital. viii. 491).

Sybāris, is, m. a Trojan killed by Turnus (Virg. Æn. xii. 363).—2. A soldier in the army of Etæcles, killed in the Theban war by Hippomedon (Stat. Th. vii. 641).—3. A youth beloved by Lydia (Hor. Od. i. 8. 2).

Sybāris, is, f. Sybari, a town of Lucania, on Sinus Tarentinus, the Gulf of Taranto, which Cluvérius says, was afterwards called Thuri, and was destroyed by the inhabitants of Cröton. It was a place of considerable eminence, and had its name from the river on the left bank of which it was founded. It afterwards extended over the right bank, until its circumference exceeded six Roman miles. Is. Sybāritæ, arum (Sing. Sybāritæ, e). Sybāritæ, is, f. Sybāritani, orum, m. were addicted to profligacy, luxury, and extravagance. Sybāritis, idis, f. of Sybāris, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Adj. Sybāriticus, et, Sybāritanus, a, um, of Sybāris, or the Sybāritæ; luxurious; gross. Sybāritica mensa, a luxurious table. Sybāritici libelli, indecent books (Mart. xli. 97). Sybāritanus exercitus (Plin. ii. 207).

Sybāris, is, m. the Cochile, a river of Lucania, which gave name to Sybāris, Sybari, from its standing on its banks. Cluvérius mentions it was so called, from Sybāris, a fountain in Achæia, which intoxicated the people who drank of it. According to Plinius, it rendered the oxen and sheep, which pastured on its banks, black, and even darkened the hair of the men, rendering it harder and curled; whereas Crathis, the Crati, had an opposite effect, making the cattle white, and the hair of the persons who drank of it fair, softer, and straight (iv. 781). Ovidius ascribes the same qualities to Sybāris, the Cochile, which Plinius does to Crathis, the Crati (Met. xv. 315).

Sycheus, i, m. (whom Servius calls Sichæus, and Justinus, Acærus) was the maternal uncle of Elissa, nicknamed Dido, whom he married. He held the office of priest of Hæreules, in Scripture, Baal, an honour next to that of king. From dread of Pygmalion, king of Phenicia, who was his brother-in-law, he concealed his great riches, by burying his money in the ground, of which Pygmalion obtained information, and murdered him to get possession of it. Elissa, by whom he was most affectionately beloved, in consequence of his death, entered into alliance with some of the nobles, who, like herself, hated the tyrant, and dreaded his cruelty, escaped from her native country, and founded Carthage (Just. xviii. 4).—2. A son of Hædrubal, by a daughter of Hæmilcar, consequently Hænnibal was his maternal uncle. He was one of the commanders in the Carthaginian army, and was killed by the Roman consul in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. iii. 245 seq.).

Sycōrium, i, m. Sardilar, a city of Thessaly, at the foot of mount Ossa, the southern side of which overlooks the plains of Thessaly, the other side, Mæcedonia and Mægnesia. Here Perseus, king of Mæcedonia, resolved to wait on the coming up of the Romans, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 54).

Sydon, onis, m. a Scythian, the brother of Rhodanus. They both commanded troops in the war between their countrymen, and the united forces of the Argonauts and Colchians (Val. Flacc. vi. 69).

Syëdra, arum, f. Syëdra, e, f. a maritime town of Cilicia, from which Cn. Pömpæus was driven, after the battle of Pharsalia. Here the readings in Flörus vary (iv. 2); but this appears the best, and is supported by Lucanus, who has Parvisque Syëdris (Phar. viii. 259).

Syëne, es, f. Essuan, a city of Upper Egypt, on Nilus, the Nile, which the ancients considered situated under the tropic of Cancer. They knew the time of the summer solstice, by the sun being vertical, or, what is the same thing, by objects having no shadow, at twelve o'clock noon. Ancient geographers, from this circumstance, frequently mentioned Syëne, and have recorded a number of particulars, which have ceased to be interesting, from the facts being generally unknown. Syëne exusta torrente Canero (Luc. Phar. viii. 851). Syëne flectens umbras nusquam (Luc. Phar. ii. 587). Syëntes, is, m. a native of Syëne; Phorbas (Ov. Met. v. 74).

Syënes, is, m. a Scythian, who commanded the Hylæi, in the war between his countrymen, and the combined army of Argonauts and Colchians (Val. Flacc. vi. 74).

Sygambri. See Sugambri.

Sylæum, i, m. a town of Phrygia (Steph.). Others place it in Pamphylia. It was under the government of Moagetes, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 14).

Syllus, i, m. a native of Gnossus, in Cræta, Candia. He and Susus were at the head of a body of men under Perseus, king of Mæcedonia, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 51).

Sylöson, ontis, m. the brother of Polycrates, tyrant of Samos. Darius, when in a private station, had taken a fancy for the robe of Sylöson, which he readily gave him. Out of gratitude for this kindness, on his attaining the sovereignty, Darius conferred on him the city, and the whole island of Samos (Val. Max. v. 2).

Sylvia. See Sileia.

Symethus, i, m. a man in the army of Hænnibal, who killed both Marius and Clipper, in the battle at Cannæ, in the year 218 B. C. (Sil. Ital. ix. 410).

Symethus, i, m. the Jaretta, a river of Sicilia, Sicily, which runs eastward, and falls into the sea to the south of Etna, Monte Gibello. It appears to be the largest river of that island. Symethis, idis, f. of Symethus, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Symethis nympha, a nymph who was a Naid, or daughter of that river, and the mother of Acis, by Fannus (Ov. Met. xiii. 750). Adj. Symethius, a, um. Symethius heros, Acis, grandson of Symethus (Ov. Met. xiii. 897).

Symethus, i, f. a town of Sicilia, Sicily, on the bank of Symethus, the Jaretta. Is. Symethli, orum, m. (Plin. i. 348).

Symë, es, f. Simi, an island in the Mediterranean, between Rhodus and Gnidos (Herod. i. 174).

Symes, is, m. a mountain near the river

Araxes, which served as a city to the inhabitants (Orph. 746). From the name occurring only in this author, and the readings being so doubtful, nothing certain respecting it can be determined.

Symmachus, i. m. an officer of great bravery in the army of Alexander the Great. Trusting to his valour, he, with Nicānor, attempted what was impracticable, and the lives of both were the forfeiture (Curt. viii. 13).—2. A physician, whose mode of treating his patients, Mārtialis deservedly holds up to contempt (v. 9).

Symplegades, um (Sing. Symplēgas, ādis, Luc. Phar. ii. 718), f. Pavonare, two small rocks, at the northern extremity of Bosphorus Thracicus, the Strait of Constantinople, or, rather in Pontus Euxinus, the Black Sea, one on the European, and the other on the Asiatic coast. Hōmērus calls them Plāncetæ, and others, Sündrōmādes, um (Pētræ), which Jūvenālis has translated literally, Concurrentia saxa (Sat. xv. 19). These three names are derived from Greek verbs, of which the first signifies to strike against; the second, to wander; and the third, to run together. To those who approached these rocks, they seemed alternately to meet and separate, and there is no doubt that they received these appellations, in consequence of that visual deception. To their natural appearance, or to the spray and mist by which they are enveloped, from the waves breaking in with violence against them, Cŷanēæ (blue or dark coloured) may be referred. The ancients supposed they were placed at the entrance of Pontus Euxinus, the Black Sea, for the purpose of crushing the ships which attempted to pass them. Plinius justly treats this as fiction (l. 473). That Jūvenālis considered the common account of the Pavonare fabulous, is manifest, from his introducing them with Scylla, &c. His translator, Mr. Gifford, has rendered Concurrentia saxa, "rocks that float and jostle on the main." The Symplegades were considered islands, until a late traveller examined them carefully, and found each joined to the mainland by a kind of low isthmus; and when it is inundated, which always happens in stormy weather, they appear as islands. An altar of white marble, long known by the name of Pompey's pillar, stands on the European Symplēgas. These rocks appear to have been more or less modified by fire, and to have been cemented during the boiling of a volcano, which gives them a very particular appearance.

Synhālus, i. m. a man in the army of Hannibal, who excelled in a knowledge of medicine, and in curing of wounds. He received his information from his grandfather, who bore the same name, and had been instructed in the healing art by Jupiter Ammon (Sil. Ital. v. 352 seq.).

Synhorium, i. n. a castle of Armenia Minor (Amm. Mar. xvi. 7).

Synnas, ādis, f. Sýnnāda, orum, n. et, Sýnnāda, æ, f. Herjan, a city of Phrygia, built by Acamas, after the Trojan war; and a number of Macedonians inhabiting Asia Minor, Natolia, having assembled there, the town was, from that circumstance, called Sýnna, which the neighbouring states changed into Sýnnāda. Cn. Mānlius Vūlso, consul, was the first Roman commander who visited Sýnnāda, which he passed on his march against the Gāllogræci, in 191 B. C., when he found the inhabitants of it and the neighbouring towns had deserted them from fear. The immense plunder his army thus obtained, so encumbered the troops, that they did not march above five miles a-day (Liv. xxxviii. 15). Adj. Sýnnādicus, a. um, Sýnnādicum marmor, marble from Sýnnāda, highly esteemed by the Romans for the fineness of its quality, and beautiful purple spots, to which Stātilius alludes (Syl. l. 5. 38), and Claudianus (xx. 273).

Sypheum, i. n. a town of the Bruttii, which revolted from the Carthaginians to the Romans, in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 19). Its situation is unknown.

Sýphax, ācis (the second syllable short, in an oblique case, occurs only in Claudianus (xi. 91), Sýphace, where Bartholus conjectured the reading should be Anibālex, which the sense requires; and Gesner approves that emendation, in his edition of 1739), n. a king of Nūmidia, Algiers, who had commenced a war with the Carthaginians, in the year 215 B. C. On that account, Cnæus and Pūblius Cōrnēlius Scīpiō, who commanded the Roman forces then in Spain, sent three centurions as ambassadors, to Sýphax, on purpose to conclude a treaty with him in the name of the senate. After a short conversation, these veterans found him comparatively ignorant of war, of which he himself became so convinced, that he requested one of them should tarry for a time with him to train his infantry. The Nūmidians fought almost wholly on horseback, and as the strength of the Carthaginians consisted chiefly of infantry, he wished to have a body of the same kind, that he might fight them on an equal footing. The ambassadors agreed to his request, on condition that he gave security for the safety of the one who remained. Q. Scītōrius continued with Sýphax, who sent ambassadors with the other two Romans to the consuls in Spain, to ratify the treaty, and to persuade the Nūmidians to revolt from the Carthaginians, and to join the Romans, both of which objects were accomplished. The Carthaginians then excited Gāla, king of the other part of Nūmidia, to make war on Sýphax, whom Māsīnissa, son of that prince, not only defeated, with the loss of thirty thousand men; but pursued to the western coast, opposite Cádiz, where he carried on a successful war against him. After P. Cōrnēlius Scīpiō Africanus had subdued the Carthaginians in Spain, and had resolved, if possible, to carry the war into Africa, he sent his friend C. Lælius, to negotiate a peace with Sýphax, who had made war on the Carthaginians, and whose territories were separated from Spain only by the Strait of Gibraltar. The Māsēsīli were the neighbours of the Mauri. Sýphax readily agreed to the treaty, which, however, with the suspicion peculiar to uncultivated minds, he considered insecure, and therefore refused to ratify, except with the commander-in-chief in person. Africanus, who overvalued both his resources and his sincerity, judged it inexpedient to refuse compliance, and, accordingly set sail for the African coast, at considerable risk both from the sea and the Nūmidian king. He entered the harbour at the same time with Häsdrübal, son of Gisgo, who had sailed thither for the same purpose. The vanity of Sýphax was gratified, by seeing at his court these distinguished generals of the two most powerful nations then in the world, soliciting his friendship. He attempted to reconcile the two commanders, thinking that on their agreement hostilities would cease between their respective states. To gratify this king, Africānus agreed to sleep under the same roof, to eat at the same table, and to recline on the same couch with Häsdrübal; but declined discussing political subjects, because he could only enter into terms of pacification with him by authority of the senate. Sýphax concluded a treaty with Africānus, on which the latter returned to Spain. Sýphax married Sôphônissa, daughter of Häsdrübal, son of Gisgo, and soon after formed an alliance with the Carthaginians, of which he sent notice to Africānus, and advised him not to come into Africa, otherwise he must take up arms against him. When Mäsinissa had secured himself in the throne of his father, war commenced between them, and by the immense superiority of his numbers, Sýphax, first by his general, and afterwards with his son, Vermina, completely defeated him, and most probably seized on his kingdom. After Africānus had made his descent on the Carthaginian territory, Sýphax came to the assistance of Häsdrübal with fifty thousand foot and ten thousand horse. As he had formerly been in alliance with Rome, Africānus endeavoured, but in vain, to detach him from the Carthaginians, and to prevail on him to renew the treaty with the Romans. From the ambassadors whom he had sent to these generals, Africānus acquired an accurate knowledge of their mode of encampment and of posting watches, by which he was enabled to destroy, by fire, all their tents in one night. Both Häsdrübal and Sýphax fled, and were pursued by C. Lælius and Mäsinissa. The Mässii readily flocked to the standard of their native prince, and deserted Sýphax in such numbers, that the Roman commanders had a sufficient force for attacking him in his own kingdom. On coming to an engagement, the combined army of Häsdrübal and Sýphax fled at the first onset, and the latter, after being wounded, was made prisoner. Africānus sent him to Rome under C. Lælius, when the senate ordered him to be kept a prisoner at Alba, from which he was removed, at a future period, to Tibur, Tivoli, where he died (203 B. C.), and had the honour of a public funeral. Pölybius asserts, that Africānus led him in triumph, but Livius states, that he died before the splendid procession of Africānus, in consequence of his subjecting Carthage to the power of Rome (Liv. xxiv. 48—xxx. 45). According to Appianus, he died of a disease, before the senate had determined on his fate (Bel. Pun. 14).

Sýracüse, arum, f. (seldom Sýracüsē, v. Sýracüsa), Saragusa, or, Saragossa (Syracuse, Britons), the largest and most celebrated city of Sicily, founded, according to Strabo, by Archias, one of the Hēraklides, a native of Athens, in 730 B. C. The name is said to be derived from Sýracō, Il Pantano, a marsh in its neighbourhood. The sea washed it on three sides, and it was divided into four parts, Epipölē, Týcha, Neäpölis, and Achradina, which might be considered each as a separate town, for which reason it was sometimes called Teträpölis, and the name is almost always used in the plural number. The island Örtügla was afterwards joined to the continent, which may be considered as a fifth part. Cicero says it was the largest and most beautiful of all the Grecian cities, and some idea may be formed of its strength and resources, from the long period, during which it resisted the bravery and military skill of the Roman army under M. Claudius Märcellus. The taking may be considered as the destruction of that magnificent and flourishing city, for it never recovered either its celebrity or splendour. It was an hundred and eighty stadia in circumference, and had two excellent harbours, the greater, one of the best in the world, and the smaller called Læculus.

Inh. Sýracüsāni, v. Sýracüsāi, orum, m. amount in modern times to about twelve thousand. The ancient population of this city appears incredible. Adj. Sýracüsianus, et, Sýracösianus, a, um. Sýracüsianus (pörtus), the greater harbour of Sýracüse (Cic. Ver. vi. 38). Sýracüsianus versus, pastoral verse; from Theëritus, the first writer of pastoral poetry, being a native of Sýracüse (Virg. B. vi. 1). Sýrēnes, rectius Sýrēnes, um (Sing. Sýrēnis), f. the Sirens, imaginary beings, with the head of a beautiful woman; the rest of the body resembled that of a bird. But some assert, that they had the human form about the waist, and that from the middle downward only were they covered with feathers. Ancient fable makes them the daughters of Achëlōus and of the muse Melpömēnē, Tërpsichörē, or, Calliöpē; or, of Achëlōus and Stëröpē, daughter of Pärthäon. Hömērus writes their name sometimes in the dual, and occasionally in the plural number; in general they are accounted three, Aglöpöhna, Thëlxiepia, and Pisinōē; or, Pärthēnöpē, Lëucōsila, and Ligen. They were represented as inhabiting a small island on the S. coast of Itälia, Italy, nearly opposite to Pölōrus, Cape Parro, in Sicily, and by the sweetness of their voices, alluring sailors on the rocks to their destruction. Ulysses having passed them without stopping, they, agreeably to the prediction of an oracle, put an end to their lives, by throwing themselves into the sea. That part of the Mediterranean in which they were drowned, was called Sýrēnis, Idis, f. Adj. Sýrēnius, a, um. Sýrēni scöpali (Gel. xvi. 8).

Sýrgis, is, m. a river of Scythia, which falls into Pälus Mäotis (Herod. iv. 123).

Sýria, m, f. a very extensive country of Asia, the boundaries of which were not precisely ascertained by ancient geographers. It was anciently divided into three parts, Sýria Cölē, Phenicā, and Pälästina; i. e. Cölē-Sýria, the Plain of Bekka, Phenicā, and Pälästina (Bochart). Taken in its largest sense, Sýria was bounded by the Mediterranean on the W.; by Aräbia on the S.; by Euphrätēs on the E.; and by Mount Taurus on the N. It was divided into a number of districts, of which the most considerable were, Pälästina, Jüden, Phenicā, Bābylōnia, and Mésopotāmia, Jezrah. &c.

² Tābūlius ager, land allotted by the state to the private Roman creditors, in place of the third and last instalment which became due, in 202 B. C., for the gold, silver, and brass, which they had voluntarily given into the treasury, in 212 B. C., at the suggestion of M. Valerius Laevinus, consul. The ground had this name from the creditors being recorded in the public books (in tābūlis). Livius writes, Trientius Tābūliusque is ager, quia pro tertio parte pecunie datus erat, appellatus. Perhaps the conjunction should be omitted, as Trientius and Tābūlius refer to the same thing, differing only in the one denoting the amount of the payment, a third; and the other the public register, tābula. These lands were valued at an as per acre per annum, merely as an acknowledgment that they had been the property of the state, and whenever the treasury could afford payment, the occupiers, if they chose, might give them up (Liv. xxxi. 13).

⁶ Tādīus, i. m. a Roman, whose armour an elephant pierced at the battle of Cānnæ, and lifting him from the ground carried him through the ranks. After recovering from the fright, he thrust his sword into both the eyes of the animal, on which the tower fell, and the men in it were crushed to death (Sil. Ital. ix. 587 seq.).—2. A man mentioned by Pērsius (Sat. vi. 66).

Tieda, m. f. a torch, or flambeau; marriages. Among the Romans, marriages were celebrated in the house of the bride's nearest relation, and she was conducted to the residence of her husband in the evening by torch light. Hence the poets came to use Tieda and Pax in the sense of Nuptia, denoting a marriage, or a wedding. Three boys attended the bride, one at each hand, and the third carried a torch of pine-wood, or of thorn before her. Besides that one, other five torches preceded her, making the nuptial torches in number amount to six. There were three forms of legal marriage among the Romans. 1. Unus, when the parties lived together by mutual agreement for one year, and the wife not absent three nights from her husband's house during that time. 2. Confarreatio, when the ceremony was performed by the Pontifex Maximus, or Flāmen Dialis, and the parties tasted a cake of meal, water and salt. 3. Cōemptio, a mutual purchase, where the parties gave to each other a small piece of money, and asked certain questions. The last two were the more honourable. The marriage oath was by fire and water, according to an ancient writer; because the Romans considered these elements as the parents of all things. This too was the idea of certain sects of the Greek philosophers.

⁷ Tiedia, m. f. an abandoned Roman woman, mentioned by Juvēnalis (Sat. ii. 49).

first taught the Tuscans the art of foretelling future events (Ov. Met. xv. 558). The natives of that district gave him this name, which, perhaps, in their original language, expressed his formation, or the art which he communicated to them. Tāges was the foster-child of Taulas (Val. Flacc. vi. 222). In ancient history, a man's being the son of a god, a mountain, a river, or the soil, only meant, that he was of obscure birth, or that his pedigree was unknown. Lūcānus with propriety considers the art, of which Tāges was the inventor, a deception (Phar. i. 637). Adj. Tāgēticus, a, um. Tāgētici libri (Amm. Mar. xvii. 10).

Tāgus, i, m. a man in the army of Adrāstus, who stabbed in the back Ethēclus, in the Theban war (Stat. Th. x. 308).—2. A noble Spaniard, of ancient family, distinguished both by beauty of countenance, and bravery in arms. Silius Itālicus derives his name from the river (i. 152 seq.).

Tāgus, i, m. the Tagus, a large river, which rises in Hispania, Spain, enters Lusitania, Portugal, passes Lisbon, the metropolis of the latter kingdom, where it is three miles broad, and falls, after a course of nearly 300 miles, into Mare Atlanticum, the Atlantic Ocean, about nine miles below that city. In ancient times, gold dust was found in the bed of this river (Ov. Met. ii. 251). Quidquid auri Tāgus expulsi (Luc. Phar. vii. 755).

Talabrīga, æ, f. Torocæ, a town of Lusitania, Portugal, on Vācua, the Vouga (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 295).

Tālāion. See Tālāus.

Tālāssius, i, m. the marriage word among the Romans, from the circumstance of the party of one Tālāssius, in the rape of the Sabine women, having carried off one of great beauty, and answering to those who inquired to whom she was destined, that she was carrying to Tālāssius (Liv. i. 9).

Tālauri, orum, f. a city of Pōntus, in which the Romans found the most valuable furniture of Mithridātes (Ap. Bel. Mith.).

Tālāus, i, v. Tālāion, ōis, m. son of Bias and Perō, who married Lysianassa, by whom he had Adrāstus, Pārthēnōpeus, Prōnāx, Mēcisteus, Aristōmāchus, and Eriphylē, who married Amphlārāus. Apōllōdorus makes Lysimāchē his wife's name, and adds she was the daughter of Abas, son of Mēlāmpus. Tālāus, with his brothers Arēus and Lēōdōcus, sailed in the Argō to Cōlchis in quest of the golden fleece (Stat. Th. v. 406). Vālerius Flāccus describes him as tall and beautiful beyond his companions, and states, that he displayed great bravery in the war against the Scythians (i. 358 seq.).

Tālāionides, æ, m. a son of Tālāus. Dux Tālāionides, Adrāstus (Stat. Th. v. 18).

Adj. Tālāionius, a, um. Tālāionia Eriphylē (Ov. Art. Am. iii. 13).—2. Son of Pērdix, sister of Dēdālus, whom that artist killed, lest he should surpass himself in genius. This youth applied the jawbone of a serpent, which he had accidentally found, to the dividing of wood, and, in consequence of this circumstance, invented the saw, which excited the jealousy of his uncle (Apol. iii. 15). The readings in Apōllōdorus are various respecting this name.

Tālāreclus, rectius Tālārchus, i, m. a friend of Hōrātius, by birth a Greek; wealthy, and of high rank to whom the poet addresses an ode (i. 9). He lived in Rome, and had a villa in the territory of the Falisci, near Sōracte, Sant Oreste, in which Hōrātius composed that ode.

Tālicus, v. Tāicus, v. Dāicus, i, m. (of which the proper name seems to be Dāis), the Jark, a river of Sarmātia, according to some authors, according to others, of Scythia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Tālius Gēmīnus, Tālī Gēmīnī, m. the prosecutor of A. Fābrius Vēntus, and obtained sentence of banishment against him, in the year 63 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 30).

Tālthēbius, i, m. a herald of Agamēnon, who, with Eurýbates, took Briseis from Achilles, and conducted her to the tent of his master (Hom. Il. i. 320). Briseis mentions this circumstance in her letter to Achilles (Ov. Ep. Her. iii. 9). Different states of Greece pretended to show his tomb in their territory. Tālthēbiades, arum, m. the descendants of Tālthēbius, who, as a mark of honour, were employed in all foreign embassies (Herod. viii. 134).

Tālus, i, m. a Rutulian, killed by Æolus (Virg. Æn. xii. 513).—2. A king of Crēta, Candia, who would not allow the Argonauts to land on that island (Arg. x. 651).

Tāmāssus, i, f. an inland town of Cyprus, the vicinity of which abounded with metals. Plinius and Stēphānus call this town Tāmāseus; but both Ptolēmaeus and Strābo write Tāmāssus. Adj. Tāmāseus, a, um. Tāmāseus ager (Ov. Met. x. 644).

Tāmēsis, v. Thāmēsis, is, m. the Thames, one of the largest rivers of England; rises in Cotswold hills, in the western extremity of Gloucestershire; runs eastward, and, after passing through London, falls into the German Sea. With respect to commerce, this is the first river in the world. It is navigable about 130 miles, and the tide flows up as far as Richmond in Surrey, which, taking the course of the river, is 70 miles. A canal upwards of 20 miles long, completed in 1793, joins the Thames with the Severn. By means of canals too, a communication is opened not only with the Trent, but also with the Mersey. Caesar is generally supposed to have crossed this river at Coway Stakes, 7 or 8 miles above Kingston; but Horsely seems to be of opinion, that he forded it near that town. The water of the Thames is esteemed exceedingly wholesome, and is fit for the longest voyages, during which it will work itself perfectly fine.

Tāmīāni, orum, m. were among the Rhodian auxiliaries, in 199 B. C., and fought in the battle at Alabānda, in which Diocritates and the troops of Phlōppus, king of Mācedōnia, were routed (Liv. xxxiii. 18).

Tanyæ, arum, f. a town of Eubœa (Herod. vi. 101).

Tāna, æ, v. Tānāis, is, m. the Wed-el-Thaine, a river of Africa Propria, or Bysacium, which falls into the sea to the north of Syrtis minor, the Gulf of Kabes (Sol. Jug. 90).

Tānager, v. Tānāgrus, i, m. the Negro, a river of Lucania, which has its rise in Mount Albūnus, Alborno. It is but a small stream, and is frequently dry in the summer months, hence Virgilius, Sicci ripa Tānāgrī (G. iii. 151).

Tānāgra, æ, v. Tānāgrē, es, f. a town of Boeotia, built by Penamirus, son of Cheresilius, and grandson of Iäsius, and called by the name of his wife, Tänägra, daughter of Äösius. The neighbouring people changed the name into Graa, which occurs in Hömürus (Il. ii. 499), and, at an after period, the town regained its former appellation. Inh. Tänägrai, orum (Siag. Tänägricus, i). m. Adj. Tänägricus, et, Tänägricus, a, um. Tänägricus Phikintus (Stat. Th. ix. 137). Tänägrici gulli ad praliandum inter se maxime idonei (Var. R. R. iii. 9). Tänägricum gæus (gallinarum) (Colum. R. R. viii. 2).

Tänäis, is, acc. in, m. the Don, anciently a river of Scythia, now of Russia, which is, for many leagues, the boundary between Europe and Asia, to which Ovidius elegantly alludes, Quique duas terras Asian Cæduntque söræm (i. e. Europam) sëpärat (Ep. Pont. iv. 10. 55). Its length is about six hundred and sixty-six miles, and its mouth, thirteen in number, bear a great resemblance to those of the Nile. The waters of this river are unwholesome, particularly to strangers, causing flatulence, violent pain in the bowels, and dysentery. Many of the Russian rivers have the same hurtful quality. Canoes are used on the Don. It falls into Pälüs Meötis, the Sea of Asoph. Lücänus makes it originate in the summit of the Rhipæan mountains (Phar. iii. 273). The Scythians called it Silis (Plin. i. 661). Gëlidus Tänäis (Claud. iii. 324).

Tänäquil, äis, f. a woman of high birth, a native of Tärquiniä, where she was married to Tärquinius Priscus; advised her husband to quit her native city, and to fix his residence at Rome. Her pride stimulated to this removal, because her husband, being of foreign descent, was treated by people of her rank with neglect, if not disrespect. She had a knowledge of augury, as Livius informs us, and her declaration, that the eagle which took off the hat of Tärquinius, as he drew near to the gates of Rome, and placed it again on his head, portended that he would one day wear the crown, probably first excited the ambition of her husband, and made him direct his whole conduct, with a view to his obtaining that dignity, on the death of Ancus Märcius. Tua Tänäquil, your Tänäquil, i. e. your wife (Juv. Sat. vi. 566). Tänäquil präscia fätürum (Claud. xxix. 16).

Tänäus, i, m. a king of Scythia, who extended his conquests as far as Egypt, but did not keep possession, being satisfied with the victory (Just. i. 1). Nothing further respecting him has been transmitted. Some suppose, that Tänäis, the Don, derived its name from this monarch, a conjecture supported by no classical authority.

Tanëtum, i, n. Tanedo, a small town on the Po, at which L. Mänlius, prætor, formed a temporary fortification, in 220 B. C., when he marched against the Gauls, then besieging the Roman ambassadors in Mütina, Modena (Liv. xxi. 25). Inh. Tanëtäni, orum, m. (Plin. i. 367).

Tänäusa, æ, f. a goddess worshipped by the Märsi, with great veneration, whose temple Germänicus levelled with the ground in the year 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 51).

Tänätäus, seldom, Tänäläus, i, m. a son of Jüpiter, and king of Phrygia, who was admitted to the table of the gods, and said to have been the only mortal who ever had that honour. For betraying their secrets, or, according to the more generally received opinion, for killing his son, Pëlöps, and serving up to the gods his mangled body to try their divinity, he was condemned in the Infernal Regions, to suffer perpetual thirst, though standing up to the chin in water, which, whenever he attempted to taste it, fled from his lips. He was also condemned to constant hunger, though the most beautiful fruit hung around him; but, like the water, fugitive to his touch. This is Homer's account, and therefore most commonly adopted. But Euripides, Pindärus, and Pläto, represent him under a rock which every moment threatened his destruction. Tänätlädes, æ, m. Pëlöps. Ebürnus Tänätlädes, ivory Pëlöps, son of Tänätläus; referring to that part of one of his shoulders which Cëres was said to have eaten, and Jüpiter to have afterwards filled up with a piece of ivory. Fabulous history ascribed to this ivory shoulder, the wonderful power of curing all kinds of diseases by the touch. Tänätlädes, Agämënon, grandson of Tänätläus (Ov. Met. xii. 626). Tänätläis, äis, f. Niöbë, a daughter of Tänätläus (Ov. Met. vi. 211). Adj. Tänätläus, e. Tänätläicus, a, um. Tänätlä labra, the lips of Tänätläus (Claud. xxxv. 336).—2. The man who succeeded to the command of the army in Spain, after the Romans had accomplished the death of Viriäthius by assassination (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 297).

Tänuslus Gëminus, Tänusli Gëminä, m. a Roman historian, whose writings are lost (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 9).

Tëphra, orum, n. a town of Arabiä Fëlix (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Täphus, i, f. one of the Echinädes, called also Cëphällëniä q. v. Inh. Tëläböë, arum, m. likewise called Tëphäi (Hom. Od. i. 105).

Täppo, önis, m. a man of nefarious practices (Catul. civ.).

Täpröbänë, es, f. Ceylon, an island in the Indian Sea, at the southeast extremity of Hindostan, and entrance into Gängëticus Sinus, the Bay of Bengal. It is separated from the continent, by Cölehiëus Sinus, the Gulf of Manara. This island is about two hundred and fifty miles in length, and two hundred miles in breadth. Its chief produce is cinnamon, but in it are found also other spices, gums, precious stones, and ores of different kinds. Numerous hills diversify the surface, and almost every one of its valleys has a rivulet of pure water, which adds both to their beauty and fertility (Ov. Ep. Pont. i. 5. 80). According to Plinius, it was anciently called Antichthönes, and seems to have been considered a part of the continent, until the expedition of Alexander into India. Onöseritus, who commanded his fleet, visited it, and Plinius has recorded the substance of his narrative respecting Ceylon, to which he has added a number of facts, communicated by ambassadors from that island in the reign of Claudius (i. 692—696).

Täpürli möntes, Suevia, a chain of mountains in the country called Scythia extra Imäum (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6). Inh. Täpürri, orum, m. (Curt. vi. 4).

Täränis, is, m. a name of Jüpiter, among the Gauls, said to be derived from a Celtic word denoting lightning, hence equivalent to the Ζεύς Περαιος of the Greeks, and Jüpiter Fálminans of the Latins. To this delthy human sacrifices were offered. Et Tárānis Scythica non mitior ara Diāna (Luc. Phar. i. 446).

Táras, ántis, m. a son of Néptūnus, and an Italian nymph, who founded Tárēntum, Taranto, and gave name both to that city, and to the river Táras. Antiquus Táras (Luc. Phar. v. 376).

Táras, ántis, m. a river in the vicinity of Tárēntum, Taranto. Both the river and town had their name from Táras q. v.—2. A river of Scythia (Val. Flacc. vi. 102).

Tárátalla, m. a fictitious name formed by Mártiālis (l. 51), from part of a line in the Iliad of Hómērus, by combining two words.

Tárbelli, arum, m. a people of Aquitania, whose country extended along the sea-coast, to the territories of the Cócōsutes, from Pýrēnei Mōntes, the Pyrenees. Their capital was Aquæ Augūste, Aqs. Adj. Tárbellicus, et, Tárbellus, a, um. Tárbellica area, the territory of the Tárbelli (Auson. ccccxvii. 125). Tárbella Pýrēnē, from the Tárbelli possessing part of that range of mountains (Lib. i. 7. 10).

Tárcho, óntis, v. Tárchon, óntis, m. a Tuscan commander, who assisted Æneas against Turnus. Virgilius describes him as a bold, active, resolute soldier (Æn. xi. 727).

Tárchōndimōtus, v. Tárchōndimōtus, i, m. a prince of Cilicia, or perhaps a commander of Tuscan pirates, whom Cn. Pōmpēius formerly subdued. He appears to have collected troops, on purpose to join him in the civil war, but too late; not until that noble Roman had fallen in Egypt, by the hands of the assassins of Ptolémæus (Luc. Phar. ix. 219. Flor. iv. 2).

Tárcon, óntis, m. son of Télēphus, who came with his brother Týrrhēnus into Italy, and is said to have built Tárquinii, Tarchina (Sil. Ital. xiii. 479).

Tárcondárius Cástor, Tárcondárii Cástōris, m. the grandson of Dējótáras, king of Gállōgræcia, v. Gállatia, who, with Doniānus, sent three hundred men to Pompey (Cæs. B. C. iii. 4).

Tárēntum, i, n. v. Tárēntus, i, f. Taranto, capital of Călābria, also of Apulia and all Lucania, famous for its walls, harbour, extent, and excellence of its situation, was founded by the Párthēniæ, under Phálānthus, who expelled the Mēssapii, the former inhabitants of that place. Lædæmōnium Tárēntum (Her. Od. iii. 5. 56), and Týndarion Tárēntum (Sil. Ital. xv. 320), refer directly to its founders. It was reckoned one of the three most luxurious cities in Italy, hence, Hórātius calls it effeminate, Mollē Tárēntum (Sat. ii. iv. 34), and unwarlike, Impbellē (Epis. i. 7. 45). Inh. Tárēntini, arum (Sing. Tárēntinus, i, m. were, in the early period of Roman history, bold, arrogant, and presuming. For plundering a Roman fleet, the senate sent ambassadors to demand restitution; but they added to their former offence, by beating the deputies, on which war was declared against them. Notwithstanding of the aid which they received from Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, and from the Carthaginians, Roman bravery compelled them to sue for peace. On joining Hannibal, they had no better success, and from that period they seem to have formed part of the Roman state. According to some authors, Táras, son of Hércules, founded their city, hence called Herculeum Tárēntum (Virg. Æn. iii. 551). Others make Táras a son of Néptūnus, on which account Hórātius has Sæcrum Tárēntum (Od. i. 28. 29). This account cannot be admitted; since, perhaps, no instance occurs of any of the deities being worshipped through their sons. Adj. Tárēntinus, a, um. Tárēntinus ager, the territory of the Tárēntini (Liv. xxvii. 40). Tárēntinus sinus, the Bay of Taranto, which had only one good harbour, that at the city. Tárēntinum cœcūm, Tarentine dye, i. e. purple (Hor. Epis. ii. l. 307). Tárēntinus, i, m. a powerful priest, in Asia Minor, Natolia, whom Claudius describes as directing his arms, according to common report, at one time against the Galatians, and at another, against the Bithynians. The poet intends to heighten the terror occasioned by his arms, and, therefore, it is not necessary to copy more of his description (Claud. xx. 466).

Tárichæa, v, f. a town of Gállia, in Judæa, on the south of the lake Genesareth. From Suetonius and Jósēphus, it appears to have been a place of great strength. Tarkiechæa, arum, m. (Suet. Tit. 4). According to Plinius, the lake Genesareth, or Sea of Tiberias, was known by the same name (i. 569).

Tárlus, i, m. a Roman killed by Cræxus in the battle at the foot of the Alps, between the Roman consul, Scipio, and Hannibal (Sil. Ital. iv. 252).

Tárnē, es, f. a town of Mædonia (Hem. ll. v. 44).

Tárpeia, v, f. daughter of the governor of the citadel of Rome, which stood on the Tarpeian rock. Silius Italicus charges her with betraying that fort to the Sabines (xiii. 843), and in this statement he has followed Livius, who adds, that, on entering the gates, they crushed her to death, by heaping their shields on her, either in fulfilment of their engagement, having promised her what they were on their left arms, by which she understood their bracelets, or to show, that faith was not to be kept with a traitor, or, what is more probable, to make it appear that the fort had been taken by storm (l. 11). Adj. Tárpeius, a, um. Tárpeius mōns.

Tárpeius, i, m. one of the hills upon which Rome was built. It is better known by the name of Cápitolinus, from the head of Tiba being found there, in digging the foundation of a temple to Júpiter, hence Cápitolium, the capitol. That noted edifice consisted of three parts, the nave sacred to the king of the gods, and two wings, the one dedicated to Jūno, and the other to Mīnerva. All treaties with foreign nations were kept in the capitol; that with Antióchus, written on brass (Ap. Bel. Syr. 113). Adj. Tárpeius, a, um. Tárpeium sâxum, v. Tárpeia rûpes, the Tarpeian rock, a precipice of considerable height on one side of the hill, over which criminals were frequently sentenced to be thrown. Its height is diminished by the falling down of the earth, it is now fifty feet. The Tarpeian rock had on one side an ascent of an hundred steps (Tac. Hist. iii. 71); sometimes simply called Saxum (Tac. Ann. iv. 29.) Tárpeius pater, Júpiter (Mart. ix. 104). Sp. Tárpeius, Sp. Tárpeii, m. the commander of the Roman citadel, which his daughter Tärpēa q. v. betrayed (Liv. i. 11).—2. (Surnamed in con. cal. Moutānus Cāpitolinus), a Roman who held the consulship with A. Atērius, in 454 B. C. Five years after, he was one of the three deputies sent by the senate to the army, which had taken post on Mōns Avēntinus, and, at a future period, he was chosen a tribune of the people (Liv. iii. 31—65). See A. Atērius.

Tärphē, es, f. a city of Lōris (Hom. Il. ii. 533).

Tärquīnī, orum, m. Tarchina, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, built by Thessalians (Just. xx. 1). Here Lūcūmo, afterwards called L. Tärquīnius Prīscus, and his wife, Tānāquil, were born. Adj. Tärquīnēnses, ium (Sing. Tärquīnēnsis, is), m. took up arms to restore the Tarquins, and, in the engagement which ensued, displayed great bravery; but, considering their enterprise hopeless, they went home during next night. They long retained an aversion to the Romans; for upwards of a century and a half after this date we find them engaged in acts of hostility, which provoked the resentment of the latter, who retaliated, in some instances, with great severity. Adj. Tärquīnēnsis, is, e. Tärquīnēnsis ager (Liv. vi. 4). Tärquīnēnsis lācus, the Lake of Bracciano (Plin. i. 241).

Arūns Tärquīnius, Arūntis Tärquīnī, m. the son, or grandson of L. Tärquīnius Prīscus, in the opinion of Livius, the son of that monarch, was the brother of L. Tärquīnius, afterwards surnamed Sūpērbus, and a youth of a very mild disposition. These brothers were married to the two daughters of Särvius Tūllius; the wife of Arūns had a fierce and ungovernable temper, and, at her instigation, L. Tärquīnius put his wife, her own sister, to death, in order to their being united in marriage. To accomplish this object, it was necessary to cut off her husband, and he soon after fell a sacrifice to their cruelty and ambition (Liv. i. 46).—2. A son of Tärquīnius Sūpērbus, whom his father sent with his brother Titus, to consult the oracle at Dēlphi, Castri, in consequence of a serpent sliding out of a wooden pillar, near the palace. These youths carried along with them their cousin, L. Jūnius Brūtus, as a subject of sport, rather than as a companion. After they had executed their father's commission, they inquired at the oracle, which of them should possess the sovereignty of Rome. The response of the priestess was, "The crown of Rome shall be his, who shall first kiss his mother." Of these words Jūnius formed a juster conception than the Tarquins. See L. Jūnius Brūtus. In the first engagement between the Romans and the Vējēntes and Tärquīnēnses, who adopted the interest of the Tarquins, Arūns Tärquīnius and L. Jūnius Brūtus, commander of the Roman cavalry, fell by mutual wounds, in 509 B. C. (Liv. i. 56 seq.).

L. Tärquīnius, L. Tärquīnī, m. surnamed Prīscus, a man of great spirit and wealth, was son of Dāmārātus, a native of Cōrīnthus, who quitted that city in consequence of intestine commotions, removed to Italy, settled at Tärquīnī, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, where he had two sons Lūcūmo and Arūns. The latter died before his father, leaving his wife pregnant, who bare a son called Egērius from his poverty, in consequence of his not having been mentioned in his grandfather's will. Lūcūmo survived his father, inherited all his property, and married Tānāquil, a woman of high rank, who prevailed on him to leave Tärquīnī, their native city, where he was despised as the son of a foreign exile, and to remove to Rome, where he took the name of L. Tärquīnius. On their approaching Jānicūlum, Monte Gianicolo, an eagle gently descended, took off his hat, flew round the waggon, screaming aloud, and put it on his head again. Tānāquil, like the rest of the Etrurians, being skilled in augury, interpreted this omen a certain presage of his future greatness, and it cannot be doubted, that this circumstance fired the ambitious minds of both, with a desire to obtain the crown of Rome. By hospitality, courtesy, and numerous acts of generosity, he obtained first the good will of his neighbours, and afterwards that of the king, of whom he soon became the chief confidant and adviser. Trusting to the sincerity of his professions, the monarch appointed Tärquīnius guardian of his children, whom he supplanted after their father's death, obtained the crown for himself, and retained, during the whole of his reign, the popularity by which he had gratified his ambition. To strengthen his authority, he added an hundred members to the senate, who were called minōrum gentium. His success against the Latins added to his wealth, and he exhibited games on a more extensive and splendid scale, than any of his predecessors. On that occasion, ground was marked out for the circus, afterwards called Māximus, areas for building round the Fōrum assigned to private persons, and porticoes with shops were erected. A deficiency of cavalry prevented him from overcoming the Sabines, in the first engagement. He, therefore, doubled the number in each century, so that the three centuries contained one thousand eight hundred men. After conquering the Sabines and the whole Latin race, from whom he took Cōrnēcūlum, Flēnlēa vētus, Cāmērii, Crūstūmērium, Amerīōla, Medullia, and Nōmētum, he began to distinguish himself in the arts of peace, and to resume the building of the city-wall, a work which the Sabine war had interrupted, and to form the common sewers, many parts of which still remain entire. Of the temple which he had vowed to Jūpiter in the capitol, he had formed the plan, and laid the foundations for enclosing a court around it, anticipating in his mind the future splendour and magnificence of the place, but had made no great progress in the work, when he was murdered by assassins hired for that purpose by the sons of Ancus Mārcius, in 578 B. C., and thirty-eighth year of his reign. His daughter, who was an only child, he married to Särvius Tūllius. From the Etrurians he adopted the fāces, trābea, citrūles, annūli, phālēres, pōlidāmēnta, toga pietas, tūnica palmāta, and all the badges and ensigns which gave splendour and dignity to the highest offices. Triumphant in a golden chariot drawn by four horses, was likewise borrowed from that nation. Sūpērbī fāces Tärquīnī, i. e. L. Tärquīnī Prīsci (Hor. Od. i. 12. 35).—2. Surnamed Sūpērbus, was the elder son, or grandson, of the former, whom he ought to have succeeded, but the crown of Rome been hereditary, but Särvius Tullius, son-in-law of L. Tārqūnius Priscus, supplanted him, and ascended the throne. From dread of the resentment of L. Tārqūnius and his brother Arūns, Sērvius attempted to conciliate their affections, by giving them in marriage his two daughters, Tullia maior and Tullia minor, for he had no son. Both these young men, and the daughters of Sērvius were of very different tempers, and the king thought to secure tranquillity, by giving his daughter, whose dispositions were mild and gentle, to Lūcius, who was of a violent temper; and his other daughter, who was bold, resolute, and ambitious, to Arūns, whose calm placid manners were a contrast to those of his brother. The union of these opposite tempers produced effects directly contrary to the expectation of Sērvius; for both Arūns and the peaceful Tullia were murdered by their consorts, who were immediately united by marriage without the opposition, rather than with the approbation, of the king. The ambition which prompted to these acts of atrocity, could only be gratified by obtaining the crown, and the death of Sērvius was a previous and necessary step, which his advanced age rendered not of difficult accomplishment. Having gained the influence of the patricians by artful solicitation, L. Tārqūnius, in his own name, convened the senate, and began a harangue of great bitterness against the aged monarch, who came into the house, blamed his son-in-law for usurping his seat, and was probably advancing to take possession of it, when Tārqūnius, taking him by the middle, threw him from the top to the bottom of the stairs, and sent persons after him, by whom he was killed. The first acts of his administration were marked by the same ferocity and cruelty, which distinguished the rest of his reign; he prohibited the burial of his father-in-law, put to death the principal senators, from suspicion of their being in the interest of Sērvius, and kept an armed band about him to awe his subjects; because he held the crown neither by appointment of the senate, nor by order of the people. Against all, whom he suspected, or disliked, he pronounced sentence of banishment, or death, having constituted himself sole judge, and, in many instances, had no other motive, but love of plunder. To secure his safety at home, he was at great pains to attach the nation of the Latins to his interest, formed connexions of hospitality and affinity with their chiefs, and gave his daughter in marriage to M. Octāvius Māmillus, a measure which procured the support of his numerous friends and relations. Although he gained no remarkable victory, nor extended the limits of the kingdom, yet his reign rather added to the reputation and character of the Romans. The brutal outrage of his son, which impelled Lūcrētia to self-destruction, was the immediate cause of the expulsion of himself and family in 510 B. C., on the 6th of March, which was held as a festival called Rēgifūgium. The Romans detested him for his cruelty, a quality inherited by his sons. This hatred of the king, added to an ardent love of freedom, induced them to submit to every species of hardship, and even to death, rather than re-admit Tārqūnius within their walls. After many fruitless efforts to regain the sovereignty, he at last fled for protection to Aristōdēmus at Cūmæ, where he spent the remainder of his life, and where he died in 495 B. C. (Liv. i. 47 seq.). Livius mentions three sons of Tārqūnius, Titus, Arūns, and Sēxtus, and one daughter, the wife of M. Octāvius Māmillus. To him Claudianus alludes (viii. 310), and in several parts of his writings. Māmillus excludes this tyrant from the regions of the happy, in which he places all the other Roman kings (i. 776). Adf. Tārqūnius, a. um. Tārqūniū reges, L. Tārqūnius Priscus, and L. Tārqūnius Sūpērbus (Virg. Æn. vi. 818).—3. Surnamed Cōlātinus, son of Egērius, brother of L. Tārqūnius Priscus, fifth king of Rome, and husband of Lūcrētia, daughter of Sp. Lūcrētius Tricipitinus. Aurelius Victor says, his mother was the sister of Tārqūnius Sūpērbus (Vir. ii. 9). When the Roman army was blockading Ardēa, Tārqūnius and other young noblemen happened one evening to sup together, when the conversation accidentally turned upon the excellence of their wives, each praising his own. Conscious of the superior merits of Lūcrētia, Tārqūnius proposed to end the dispute, by immediately mounting their horses, and unexpectedly paying a visit to their wives. The other gentlemen approved of the suggestion, and, after they had seen the whole, could not refrain from acknowledging that Lūcrētia surpassed the other matrons. Her unequalled excellence, however, instead of commanding the esteem of Sēxtus Tārqūnius, excited an unhallowed desire, which he afterwards violently gratified. See Lūcrētia. The expulsion of the Tārqūniū followed this brutal outrage, L. Jūnius Brūtus and Tārqūnius had first the honour of holding the consulship, in 509 B. C., an office which the latter, at the suggestion of his colleague and father-in-law, for no other reason, but because he had the name of Tārqūnius, soon resigned, and removed his property to Lāvīnium (Liv. i. 57—ii. 2). According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Tārqūnius wished to save the two Aquillii, sons of his sister, who had entered into the conspiracy for the restoration of L. Tārqūnius Sūpērbus, and his colleague Brūtus, having put his own sons to death for that act of treason, insisted on the Aquillii suffering the same punishment, and every other youth who had corresponded with the exiled monarch, or was privy to the plan for his re-establishment on the throne of Rome. To settle this matter, Brūtus appealed to the people, proposing that Tārqūnius should be banished, because he was an abettor of monarchy, and consequently an enemy of liberty. The commons supported the opinion of Brūtus, and the sentence of banishment was pronounced against his colleague, and carried into immediate effect (v. 9 seq.).—4. Master of the horse to L. Quinctius Cincinnātus, in 458 B. C. Of all the Roman youth he was accounted by far the first in military merit, although poverty compelled him to serve on foot (Liv. iii. 27).—5. A man who left Rome to join the army of Cātillina, after that traitor had put himself at the head of the rebels, and, having been apprehended, was brought back to the city. On his examination, he promised to make a complete discovery of the conspiracy, if admitted king's evidence, according to the law terms in Scotland. M. Tullius Cicero ordered him to proceed under that sanction, and his declaration coincided nearly with that of T. Volturnus q. v. On his mentioning P. Licinius Crassus amongst the conspirators, a murmur of disapprobation ran through the whole assembly. Some considered his evidence true, others, incredible; whilst a considerable number thought it would be imprudent to provoke the resentment of so powerful a citizen at that period. Besides, a majority of the senators, being in his debt, declared the charge a malicious calumny, and demanded the sense of the senate upon his evidence. With this requisition the consul complied, and a full house declared that the testimony of T. Tullius appeared unworthy of credit, that he should be confined in prison, and that he should not be heard again, unless he gave up the person at whose instigation he had told that falsehood (Sal. Cat. 48).

Sextus Tullius; Sēxti Tullii, m. the youngest of the three sons of L. Tullius Sūpērbus. His father, baffled in his attempt to take Gabii, sent him to that town, where, according to previous instruction, he informed the inhabitants that he had, on account of his father's cruelty towards him, fled to them for protection. After ingratiating himself with the leading men of the place, he prevailed on them to declare war against the Romans, obtained command of the troops, gained several battles, and then sent a trusty messenger to receive his father's orders. Mistrust is inseparable from treachery. The monarch, suspecting the fidelity of the man, continued silent, walked up and down the garden, cut off the heads of the tallest poppies, but refused to speak, on which the messenger returned to Gabii, and reported to Sextus the behaviour of the king. The youth understood perfectly what his father meant, and, one after another, cut off all the principal men of the state, so that Gabii soon after fell without a struggle under the dominion of Rome. To the brutal conduct of this prince, and the consequent death of Lūcētia q. v. wife of L. Tullius Calpurnius, may be referred the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome, and the establishment of the republic. At a future period, when his father and brothers went into exile at Cures, Sextus retired to Gabii, where, out of revenge for his former rapine and murders, he was killed about 500 B. C. (Liv. i. 53—60).

T. Tullius, T. Tullii, m. a son of Tullius Sūpērbus (Liv. i. 56 seq.).

Tarquitius Crāsēns, Tarquiti Crāsēns, m. a Roman centurion, who, in the reign of Nero, commanded a tower in Mount Taurus, which he defended with great bravery; but at last the besiegers set the works on fire, resistance then became vain, in the year 63 (Tac. Ann. xv. 11).

Tarquitius Priscus, Tarquiti Prisci, m. lieutenant-general of Statilius Taurus, whom he accused of extortion and magic arts, in the year 53. Statilius preferred a Roman death to falling by the malice of his enemies, and, in spite of the great influence of Agrippina, the senate expelled this infamous informer, whose treachery deserved a severer punishment. Eight years after, the people of Bithynia convicted Tarquitius of extortion, and the senate, remembering his violence against Statilius Taurus, had great pleasure in condemning him to make restitution, in the year 62 (Tac. Ann. xii. 59 seq.).

L. Tarquilius, L. Tarquiti, m. a patrician appointed master of the horse to L. Quinctius Cincinnatus. Poverty obliged him to serve among the foot, but of all the Roman youth he was reckoned, by many degrees, the first in military merit, in 456 B. C. (Liv. iii. 27).—2. An Italian, who wrote on the Tuscan art of augury, according to Pūnius, and Mācrōbius. From an ancient inscription he appears to have been a native of Tuscany, and he is believed to have been the person mentioned by Cicero (Att. vi. 8). Adj. Tarquitiānus, a, um. Tarquitiānūlibri (Amm. Mar. xxv. 2).

Tarquitus, i, m. son of Faunus and the nymph Drōpē, killed by Æneas (Virg. Æn. x. 550).

Tarrāco, ōnis, f. Tarragona, a large town and sea-port of Spain, about 30 miles N. of Ibērus, the Ebro. During the dominion of the Romans in that country, it was a place of great strength, and gave name to the northern division of Spain, Prōvincia Tarrāconēnsis. It was destroyed by the Goths and Moors. The harbour is safe, but only capable of receiving small ships. Hispania Tarrāco (Mart. x. 104). Fūlifera Tarrāco (Sil. Ital. iii. 369). Inh. Tarrāconēnses, ium, m. Adj. Tarrāconēnsis, is, e. Tarrāconēnsis (Hispania), i, e. Hispania Citerior, or the north of Spain (Plin. i. 489). Tarrāconēnsis (vina) (Plin. iii. 135).

Tarrātia. See Cāta Tarrātia. Tārsus, e, m. a Thracian chief, who plunged a penard into his own breast, rather than submit to the Romans, in the year 26 (Tac. Ann. iv. 59).

Tārsus, i, f. Tarsus, the most celebrated city of Cilicia, on Cūdus, the Tarsus, seventy stadia from the mouth of that river. Ancient authors have given various derivations of this name. One asserts that Tārsus v. Tērsos signifies dry, and that the town was so called, because in the formation of the earth the mountain Taurus first became dry ground; a second maintains, that Pēgāsus lost his hoof there, or that a part of his foot was called Tārsos; a third, that people there first dried grain, in order to preserve it for food during winter. Eratōsthēnes seems to have been of this opinion. According to Strābo, it was built by the Argīvi, and according to Lūcānus, by Pērsēus; hence he calls it Pērsēia Tārsos (Phar. iii. 225). Solinus likewise makes Pērsēus the founder of this celebrated city, renowned as a seat of literature. At Tārsus the Apostle Paul was born. Inh. Tārsēnses, ium, m. (Suet. Dom. 10). Adj. Tārsēnsis, is, e.

Tartānius, i, m. a river of Bithynia (Sal. Frag. 4).

Tartārus, i, m. the Tartaro, a river in the north of Italy, which falls into the Gulf of Venice (Tac. Hist. iii. 9).

Tartārus, i, m. Plur. Tartāra; orum, n. the place of punishment in the Infernal Regions, which, according to Hōmērus, is as much sunk below the mansions of the dead, as the heavens are raised above the earth (Il. viii. 16). Apollōdōrus states, that Tartārus is the darkest place of these regions, and as far below, as the heavens are above, the earth. Virgilian makes the distance double that of Hómērus and Apōllōdōrus. The diversity of opinion, among ancient writers, respecting the place of punishment in the other world might be both expected and tolerated. Where all was uncertainty, conjecture might be indulged without offence. But surely the speculations of the moderns, even in Gospel-times, respecting the locality of hell, merit reprehension rather than applause:

— Born in an age more curious than devout;
More fond to fix the place of heaven, or hell,
Than studious this to shun, or that secure.

YOUNG.

Adj. Tārtārēus, v. Tārtārinus, a. nm. Tārtārēus cūstos, Cērbērus (Virg. Æn. vi. 395). Tārtārea vox, infernal voice (Virg. Æn. vii. 514). Tārtārea sōrōres, the infernal sisters, i. e. Tisiphōnē and Mēgēra (Virg. Æn. vii. 328).

Tārtēssus, i. m. a Spanish youth, who competed for the prize in the foot-race, given by Scipio Africanus, at the termination of the war in Spain, in 208 B. C. (Sil. Ital. xvi. 465).

Tārtēssus, i. f. Tariffa, a town of Spain, which Sallustius calls a state, on an island formed by the two mouths of Bætis, the Guadalquivir, not unknown in the days of Hómērus. Tārtēssis, idis, f. the district belonging to the town Tārtēssus. Inh. Tārtēssii, orum (Sing. Tārtēssius, i.), m. In their woods the Titans are said to have carried on war against the gods (Just. xlv. 4). Herodotus makes Argæuthionius their king (l. 163).—2. Another near Câlpe, afterwards called Cārtēia, which Strabo, Pōmpōnius Mēla, Plinius and Applianus mention.—3. A third on Gades, Cadiz. Bochartus thinks the Phœnicians founded the last two, and discovered the first built by the natives, when they first sailed beyond Frētum Gāditanum, the Strait of Gibraltar. He refers the name of the first to Tārsis, son of Javan, mentioned in Scripture (Genesis x. 4). Stēphānus calls this a city of Iberia, but supposes it had its name from the river, and not the river from it, contrary to the opinion of Bochartus, who appears to be right. All ancient authors, who take any notice of these towns, mention the quantity of metals with which the country around them abounded. It may also be added, that these towns are often confounded one with another. Adj. Tārtēssius, et, Tārtēssiācus, a. nm. Tārtēssia littōra, the shore of Tārtēssus (Ov. Met. xiv. 416). Here the poets supposed the sun to set and darkness to arise. Tārtēssiācæ arēnæ, gold sands (Claud. iii. 101). Tārtēssiācū æquor, the Western, or, Atlantic Ocean (Sil. Ital. vi. 1).

Tārtēssus, i. m. the Guadalquivir, a river of Spain, afterwards called Bætis q. v., which anciently divided into two streams, before it ran into the sea, forming an island on which was a town of the same name (Strab. 199).

Tārsiātes, ium, m. a people of Aquitania. The Tārbēlli were between them and the Bay of Biscay. Their name is recognised in Teursan, or, Tursan, once their chief city (Cæs. B. G. iii. 23 seq.).

Tāsgētius, i. m. a nobleman of the nation of the Cārnūtes, whose forefathers had possessed the sovereignty of that state. Caesar, on account of his fidelity and merit, raised him to the throne of his ancestors; but his countrymen put him to death in the third year of his reign (Cæs. B. G. v. 25).

Tātianus, i. m. a prefect overpowered by Phraates in the Parthian war (Ap. Bel. Par. 159).

Tātius Grātianus, Tātū Grātianū, m. a Roman who had held the office of prætor. He was arraigned for treason, and condemned to die, in the year 35 (Tac. Ann. vi. 28).

T. Tātius, T. Tātū, m. king of the Sabines, made a formidable attack upon the Romans, in consequence of their seizing, by violence, the Sabine virgins. After he had fought several bloody battles with various success, at last he concluded a treaty with Rōmulus, at the intercession of the women on whose account he had taken up arms, and was admitted joint-sovereign of Rome. All his subjects, by this arrangement, became Roman citizens. From Livius it may be inferred, that jealousy existed between the two kings, and that Rōmulus willingly became again sole monarch; since he took no steps either to resent, or even to show his displeasure at the death of Tātius, who was killed by the Laurēntes, in an insurrection at Lavinium. Persius, in derision, calls the Roman nobles Titi (Sat. i. 20). Tātianus v. Titēnses, ium, m. one of the three centuries of horsemen, or knights, who had been enrolled after the union of the Romans and Sabines, and had this name from T. Tātius (Ov. Fast. iii. 131). Adj. Tātius, a. nm. Titū sodāles, an order instituted by T. Tātius to perpetuate the religious observances of the Sabines. In honour of Augustus, a similar order was established, in the year 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 54).

Taulāntii, orum, m. a people of Illyricum, according to Livius and Stēphānus but of Mācedōnia, according to Thūcýdides and Ptolēmeus. L. Anicius Gāllus, prætor, by authority of the Roman senate, granted not only liberty, but exemption from taxation, to the Taulāntii, because they had revolted to the Romans, when Gēntius, king of the Illyrii, was in full power, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 26). Adj. Taulāntius, a. nm. Taulāntius incolā (Luc. Phar. vi. 16).

Taulas, āntis, m. a son of Illyrius, from whom the inhabitants of Illyricum were, according to some authors, called Taulāntii. Valērius Flāccus describes him as a man of distinction, probably from his personal bravery; but whether the poet invented the name, or obtained his information from sources now unknown, it were now vain to inquire (vi. 222).

Taunus, i. m. Heyrich, a mountain in Germany, near Moguntiacum, Mayence (Tac. Ann. i. 56).

Taurānus, i. m. a man in the Roman army, killed by Sýchæus, in the battle at Trisimēnus, the Lake of Perugia, when the Romans were entirely routed by the Carthaginians (Sil. Ital. v. 472).

Taurāntes, ium, m. a people of Armēnia Māior (Tac. Ann. xiv. 24).

Taurāsia, v. f. a town of the Gauls, in the north of Italy, which Hannibal took by storm, and put the prisoners to the sword, on purpose to intimidate the other tribes in that country (Ap. Bel. An. 316).

Taurāsini, orum, m. a people who must have lived in the territory of the Saurāsates.

into which the Apŭāni Ligŭres were inducted, in 182 B. C. (Liv. xl. 38). Their chief town was Taurāsium, Taurasi. Adj. Taurāsīnus, a, um.

Taurēa. See Cērrinus.

Taurica, ie, f. (Chersōnēsus) the Crimea, or, Crim Tartary, a peninsula of Europe, bounded on the south and west, by Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, and on the east by Pālūs Mæotis, the Sea of Azoph. It is remarkably level, and now belongs to Russia. Inh. Tauri, et, Taurici, orum, m. anciently Scythians of horrible barbarity, who used to sacrifice strangers to Diāna, whom they chiefly worshipped, hence Jūvénālis considered her the inventress of that horrible practice; Taurica inuentrix nefandæ sacri (Sat. xv. 116). Sallustius says, of all nations the Achaei and Tauri were the most ferocious, and attributes their ferocity to the sterility of their country, which obliged them to live by plunder. Adj. Tauricus, a, um. Taurica ara, the altar of Diāna in the Crimea (Ov. Trist. iv. 4. 63).

Taurini, orum, m. a people, who lived at the foot of the Alps. In their country, the Roman emperor Augŭstus planted a colony, and their capital received the name of Augŭsta Taurinorum, Turin. Ammianus Marcellinus makes them the conductors of Hāmūbal over the Alps (xv. 10). Adj. Taurinus, a, um. Taurina cōlōnia (Tac. Hist. ii. 66).

Tauris, a, um. Tauri lūdi, games in honour of the infernal deities, in which bulls were sacrificed; whence the name. Festus informs us, that, in the reign of Tārquinius Sŭpērbus, pregnant women were seized with a malignant distemper, in consequence of their eating the flesh of bulls offered in sacrifice, which it had become the practice to sell. Other accounts are given by Varro and Servius. These games continued two days, in 188 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 22).

Tauriscus, i, m. a tyrant of Gallia, France, killed by Hērēclēs (Amm. Mar. xv. 9).

Taurōis, entis, acc. ta, f. Caesar calls it a fortress of the Māssillēnses, and as Taurōnēlis pōrtus occurs in ancient authors, it must have been a maritime town. It was about twelve miles from Māssillia, Marseilles, and nearly at the same distance from the modern town of Toulon (Ces. B. C. ii. 4).

Taurōmēntum, e. Taurōmēntum, i, n. et, Taurōmēntos, i, f. Taurmina, a town on the eastern coast of Sicilia, Sicily, at Eurŭpus, the Gulf of Taurmina, and Taurus (mōns), whence the city had its name. It was founded by Andrōmāchus, the father of Timæus, stood on a very steep rugged part of the mountain, and was of difficult access, on one side looking down to the Sicilian sea, and on the other looking up to rocks of very great height. Near this town Augŭstus sustained a severe defeat from Sēxtus Pōmpēius (Vel. Pat. ii. 79). Inh. Taurōmēnti, orum, et, Taurōmēnti, orum, m. The Greeks called them by the former, and the Latins, by the latter name (Eutrōp. ii. 19). Adj. Taurōmēntānus, a, um. Taurōmēntāna rūpes (Juv. Sat. v. 83). Taurōmēntāna Chārēbōis (Luc. Phar. iv. 461).

Tauron, entis, m. a prefect of Alexander the Great, who made a successful attack on the Uxi, which enabled his commander to march the army over the heights, as he proceeded against India (Curt. v. 3 seq.).

Taurōpōlos, i, f. a name of Diāna amongst the Amphipōlitāni. To her temple in Amphipōlis, Senikei, matrons thronged, on the news of the defeat of Pērsēs, king of Mīcēdōnia, in 170 B. C., to implore her aid (Liv. xlv. 44).

Taurūbōla, arum, f. perhaps a small inconsiderable island near Cāprēa, Capri (Stat. Syl. iii. 1. 129). The word does not occur in the writings of any geographer, or historian, so that nothing certain respecting it is known.

Taurus, i, m. a Stoic philosopher, whose account of the manner of enduring pain, according to the opinion of that sect, Gēllius has recorded (xii. 5). His name occurs frequently in the pages of this author.

Taurus, i, m. Taurus, a very large range of mountains in Asia, which commence in Lŭcia and Cāria, near the shores of the Mēditerranean, and stretch in an eastern direction, through an immense tract of country. One of the highest peaks of Taurus is between six and seven thousand feet (ten thousand, Heude), above the level of the sea. The lower region is woody, chiefly oak (ilex), arbutus, lentisk, and various kinds of juniper. These mountains branch off in various directions, and have different names in different parts of that very extensive country. Some modern geographers wish to confine them to Asia Minor, Natalia. If allowed to include Caucasus, they must terminate either in Corasan, or at farthest at Sinus Persicus, the Persian Gulf. According to Plinius, the most eastern part is called Imāus, the next Emōdus, then Pārōpānīsus, Circius, Chamēades, Paryādes, Chōātras, Oreges, Orōāndes, Niphātes, and Taurus. Its greatest height Caucasus, afterwards Sārpēdon, Cōrācēsius, Crāgus, and again Taurus. Its different openings are called by the countries adjoining, as Porte Armēnie, Porte Caspiæ, and Porte Ciliciæ. Assuming the names of numerous nations on the right, it is called Hŭrcānīus and Cāspius, on the left, Paryādes, Mōschŭcus, Amāzōnŭcus, Cōrāxŭcus, and Scŭthŭcus. The Greeks include this prodigious range under the name Cēraunius (Plin. i. 590). Strābo limits it to the mountains which overhang the Caspian Sea. Adj. Tauricus, a, um.

Taurus, i, m. a river of Pāmphyliā, one of the branches of the Catārractes (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Taurus, i, m. the Bull, the second sign of the Zodiac. As the head of the Bull is to the east, his horns would be directly against Phāethon, as he proceeded westward with the chariot of the Sun; hence Adversus Tauri (Ov. Met. ii. 80), or from this sign rising and setting backwards. According to some, the Bull which carried Europa safely from Phœnicia to Crēta, Candia, was changed into this sign, and according to others, lō, after having been some time in the form of a cow (Ov. Fast. v. 603 seq.).

Taus, i, m. the Tay, a river of Scotland, which issues from Loch Tay, in Brīdalban. It passes Perth, and falls into the German Ocean. In its course, which is about an hundred and two miles, it receives a number of streams, some of them very considerable.

and at Dundee, it becomes a firth rather than a river. Ernestus confounds the Tay, with the Tweed, and Oberlinus has copied the mistake. Taum, i, n. the Firth of Tay (Tac. Agric. 22).

Taxes, is, m. a Scythian, who fought in the war between his countrymen and the Argonauts (Val. Place. vi. 252).

Taxiles, is, m. the father of Omphis q. v. (Curt. viii. 12).—2. An officer of Alexander the Great, who received the country between Hydaspes, the Behat, and Indus, the Sind, on the death of his sovereign (Just. xiii. 4).

Taxillus, i, m. a gymnasiarcha, who complained to Iason, that he had been struck by some young men. The monarch allowed him to demand three drachme from each, or to give each ten strokes. Taxillus inflicted the latter punishment, at which the youths were enraged, and put their king to death (Val. Max. ix. 10).

Tasimagilus, i, m. one of the four kings, or princes, who reigned over Cantium, Kent. They seem to have all been under the power of Cassivelaunus (Caes. B. G. v. 22).

Taygete, es, f. a daughter of Atlas and Pleione, who gave her name to the mountain, Taygetus, Pentadaktulos. Diana changed her into a stag, that she might escape the injury intended to her by Jupiter, but she was afterwards restored to her original form. From gratitude to the goddess, she sacrificed a stag with gilded horns, which Hercules was ordered to catch (Pin. Ol. iii. 58).—Taygete was one of the Pleiades, a constellation in the neck of the sign Taurus (Ov. Met. iii. 595).

Taygetus, i, m. c. Taygeta, orum, n. Pentadaktulos (from its five summits), by the moderns Makrynon, a mountain of Lacedaemon, on which the orgies of Bacchus were celebrated by Spartan virgins (Virg. G. ii. 487). The highest summit of it was called Talæton, now St. Elias, and was sacred to the Sun. It is partly occupied by the church of Elias. One of its highest summits is now called Milevo, from the Slavonic word Malé, a mountain, and likewise Korakolithi, i. e. a crow's stone. In ancient times, deformed children were precipitated down the barathron of this mountain. The gooseberry bush is a native of Pentadaktulos. Gelidus Taygetus (Luc. Phar. v. 52). Taygeta dilecta (Stat. Th. viii. 437).

Teanum, v. Thēnum, i, n. Tiano, the chief town of the Sidicini, surnamed Sidicium, to distinguish it from another town of the same name in Apulia, now Civita. Four Roman miles from this town, was a spring called Acidula, from the property of its waters which were salutary to persons afflicted with the stone. Plinius says, they cured that disease (iv. 779). Tēanēnses, v. Tēanātes, ium, m. the inhabitants of Teanum, in Apulia (Liv. ix. 20).

Tērus, i, m. the Tekedere, a river of Thracia, a branch of Contadesus, which falls into Agrianes, and their united streams run into Hēbrus, the Maritza. Its sources, thirty-eight in number, are partly warm, and partly cold (Herod. iv. 90).

Tēti, is, n. Tieti, the capital of the Mār-rūcīni, a people of Italy. Magnum Tēti (Sil. Ital. viii. 520). Ich. Tēti, orum (Singl. Tētinus, i), m. (Plin. i. 358).

Tēates, ium, m. a people of Apulia, to whom the Romans granted their protection, in 317 B. C. (Liv. ix. 20).

Tēmēssa, a, f. daughter of Tēthra, king of Phrygia, whom Ajax, son of Tēimon, according to Dictys of Crēta, took captive, after he had killed her father in single combat, and reduced the capital to ashes. The Greeks allotted to Ajax, Tēmēssa, as his share of the plunder (Har. Ol. ii. 4. 6).

Tēmon, ōnis, m. a town of Mēlissis, which, on the death of Cēphālus, who opposed the Romans, surrendered, in 100 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 26).

Tēton, ōnis, m. a Trojan artist, mentioned by Hōmērus (Il. v. 59). Some consider Tēton here as an appellative, and perhaps justly apply it to Phērēclaus.—2. A Phrygian, father of Pōllūceus, hence called Tētonides (Hom. Od. viii. 114).

Tēctōsāges, um, et, Tēctōsāgi, orum, c. Tēctōsāge, arum, m. a very valiant people of Gallia, France, a branch of the Vēlce, near Mōntes Pfrēnaei, the Pyrenæus. Jōstinus states that Tōlōsa was their native country (xxxii. 3). Vēlce Tēctōsāges possessed very fertile lands in the vicinity of Silva Hērēynia, when Cæsar wrote (B. G. vi. 24). A tribe of the Tēctōsāges, leaving their country, either from want of ground, or from hope of plunder, marched along Danūbius, the Danube, crossed Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, penetrated into Asia Minor, Natolia, and, according to Livy, seem to have conquered that country. They afterwards separated into three tribes, the Tōlōboii, the Trōcēni, and the Tēctōsāges. To the first, the coast of Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, was assigned; to the second, Iōula and Etōlla; and to the Tēctōsāges, the inland parts of Asia Minor. They settled on the bank of Hālys, the Kizil-irmek, and levied tribute from all the Asiatics to the west of mount Taurus. The country which they inhabited, was, from them, called Gāllogracia, contracted Gālātia, to the inhabitants of which, the apostle Paul addressed one of his Epistles. The Romans subdued the Tēctōsāges and overran the whole of Gālātia, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 24 seq.). Another party settled in Pānōnia (Just. xxxii. 3).

Q. Tēdus, Q. Tēdi, m. a favourite of Augustus, remarkable for his luxury. The readings in Tāctus vary (Ann. i. 10).

Tēgēa, e, v. Tēgēe, es, f. Phiali, called also Moklia, and Palaepiscopi, a town of Arcadia, about four miles south of Tripolitza. Ancient remains are still considerable; but the modern buildings cannot be called a town, not forming a very large village. It was founded by Tēgēates, a son of Lycion. The tusks and skin of the Calydonian boar were kept at this city, of which Augustus sent the former, and the statue of Minerva Alēa, to Rome, because the inhabitants had joined with his rival, M. Antōnius. Vēlce alumnus Tēgēs, Mērcūrius (Stat. Th. vii. 45). Tēgēatis, Idis, f. the district of Tēgēa, which was very small, but the plain of that town is rich arable land, and nearly surrounded with mountains; also applied to females, or to nouns feminine. Tēgēatis māter (Atālanta) sōgittifēri ēphēbi, the Arcadian mother of the arrow-bearing youth, i. e. Parthēnōpeus (Stat. Th. ix. 571). Tēgēatis cāpra (Sil. Ital. xiii. 329). Ich. Tēgēate, orum (Soc.

Tégætes, a), m. were brave and warlike from necessity, being situated between the territories of Lacedæmon and Mantinea. Adj. Tégæus, et, Tégæticus, a, um, of Tégæ, Arcadian. Tégæus juvenis, Pärthénopieus (Stat. Th. vi. 632). Tégæticus volucer, the swift native of Tégæ, i. e. Mërcurius (Stat. Syl. i. 2. 18).

Tela, a, f. a woman's name, which occurs in Propertius (iv. 8. 31).

Telamon, onis, m. a son of Æacus and Endëis, was king of Sälamôs, Colouri, an island on the south coast of Attica, nearly opposite to Athens. He was privy to Pélæus murdering their brother Phöcus, to which Ulysses refers (Ov. Met. xiii. 149); but others say, that he himself accidentally killed Phöcus, and being, in consequence of that action, compelled to quit Genöpia, afterwards Ægina, Egina, his native island, he went to Sälamis, Colouri, and became king of that island. Telamon was armourbearer to Hërcules in the Argonautic expedition, and assisted that hero when he took and destroyed the city Troy. Among the captives, were Læomëdon, the king, and his daughter Hësiônë. Hërcules rewarded the bravery of Telamon, by giving him in marriage that princess, by whom he had Teucer. He afterwards married Glaucë, who was the mother of Ajax. Telamônulades, a, m. Ajax. Adj. Telamônulus, a, um. Telamônulus (ñlius), Ajax (Ov. Met. xiii. 194), called also Telamônulus hëros (Virg. Cu. 314).

Telchines, um (Sing. Telchis, e, Telchin, inis), m. inhabitants of Rhödos, Rhodes, from whom the island was called Telchinis. Strabo and Pausanias mention Telchines in Crëta, Candia, who appear to have been the priests or worshippers of Rhëa, or, Cytële, and part of whom emigrated to Bœotia. Some ancient authors describe them as envious and malicious; whilst others maintain, that they were most ingenious artists (Stat. Th. ii. 274), and that their rivals traduced their character, by representing them as sorcerers, and prone to mischief. Diödorus Siculus, who makes them the original inhabitants of Rhodes, says, that they brought up Nèptünus, whom Rhëa committed to their care, and that, on his growing up, he married Hëlia their sister, by whom he had six sons and a daughter, called Rhödos, who gave her name to the island. Some make Telchines the children of Sol and Minërva; others, of Sätürnus and Aliopë, but Diödorus Siculus, of the Sea. Their history abounds with fable, of which a great part may be explained, by adopting the derivation of their name by Bochartus, from the Hebrew word denoting an enchanter, or, enchantment. Adj. Telchinus, a, um. Telchinia ades, the temple of Minërva in Bœotia.

Telëböæ, arum, m. inhabitants of part of Acarnania, which from them was called Telëböis, Idis, f. This district was formerly called Taphion, and afterwards Telëböis, according to Stëphänus, from Telëböas, but Eustatius says, from their driving to a great distance the oxen which they stole. The Telëböæ afterwards took possession of the island Cäprëe, Capri, to which Virgilius refers (Æn. vii. 735), and Stätius, dñmus Telëböüm, i. e. Cäprëæ, Capri (Syl. iii. 5. 100). Telëböides, um, f. islands off the promontory of Lëucadia, which were also called Taphlæ, according to Plinius, who includes the islands generally known by the name of Echinnades (i. 447).

Telëböas, a, m. one of the centaurs, killed in the battle with the Læpithæ, by Nèstor (Ov. Met. xii. 441).

Telëböas, a, m. the Akso (by the Turks), a river near the sources of Tigris, the Dejiliah.

Telëcöon, ontis, m. a native of Cýzicus, Chizico, killed by Anceus, one of the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. iii. 140).

Telëgönus, i, m. son of Ulysses and Circë, hence Silius Itällicus calls him grandson of Læertes (vii. 693). According to Hyginus, Ulysses had by Circë another son named Nausiphöus. On arriving at manhood, Telëgönus sailed from his native island Ææa, where he had been brought up, for Ithacæ, in order to make himself known to his father; but being shipwrecked on the coast without provisions, he plundered some of the natives. Ulysses and his son Telëmächus q. v. advanced against the foreigners, when a battle ensued, and Telëgönus unawares killed his father. When he came to the knowledge of the fact, by order of Minërva, he returned with Pënelöpë and Telëmächus into his native country, carrying with him the body of his father which he buried in Ææa. By the advice of the same goddess, Telëgönus married Pënelöpë, by whom he had Itälus, from whom, in the opinion of several authors, the country was called Itälia. Jüga Telëgöni parricide, the mountain tops of Telëgönus the parricide, i. e. Tuscülum, founded by Telëgönus on an eminence (Hor. Od. iii. 29. 8). Ææus, Telëgönus, either from Circë being born at Ææa, a town of Colchis, or from his being a native of Ææa which his mother was said to inhabit.

Telëmächus, i, m. son of Ulysses and Pënelöpë. He was an infant when his father went to the Trojan war. During that memorable siege, his mother was sought in marriage by many lovers, who, from Hömërus, seem to have possessed the house and lived on the property of her husband. Not returning with the other Grecian princes after the destruction of Troy, the fate of Ulysses became an object of anxious solicitude, both to his wife and son. The latter set out in order to obtain information respecting his father, visited the courts of several of the Grecian nobles, who had come home on obtaining the victory, and, after a fruitless inquiry, was obliged to give up the search, and retrace his steps. Soon after he landed in Ithacæ, he discovered his father, who had assumed a disguise, and they two concerted measures for the destruction of the lovers, which they immediately carried into execution. Afterwards, Telëmächus and his father took up arms against a foreigner who had lately landed on their coast, and was plundering part of the country. In the conflict which ensued, Ulysses fell by the hand of the stranger, who proved to be Telëgönus q. v. his own son by Circë. Telëmächus and his mother, by order of Minërva, who, under the appearance of Mëntor, had accompanied him on his travels in quest of his father, set out with Telëgönus for Ææa, where he married Circë, by whom he had Lätinus, from whom the Latins derived their name, in the opinion of some ancient authors. This Lätinus seems a different person from the father of Lavinia.

Télémaſtus, i. m. a Cretan, who commanded his countrymen in the engagement in which Philopomen, prætor of the Achei, defeated Nabis, tyrant of the Lacedæmonians, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 29).

Téléphus, i. m. son of Eurymus, a prophet who foretold to the Cyclops Polyphémus, the calamities which would befall him on the arrival of Ulyſſes. That Grecian verified the truth of the prediction, by depriving Polyphémus of sight (Ov. Met. xiii. 770 seq.).

Téléphus, i. m. the son of Hércules and Augé, was king of Mýſia. Being son-in-law to Priámus, king of Troy, he made a furious attack on the Greeks, when they landed on his territories, and would have defeated them, had not Bæchus, who espoused their interest, made a vine quickly spring up, which entangled his foot, and thereby caused him to fall. Achilles, taking advantage of this unfortunate accident, rushed on with great violence, and wounded him so severely that he was left for dead, and his men allowed to carry off the body. The pain arising from the wound was most excruciating, and baffled all medical skill. Téléphus was at last informed that it could be cured only by the spear which inflicted it. After repeated entreaties, Achilles, at the desire of Ulyſſes, who knew that Troy could not be taken without a son of Hércules, went and rubbed on the wound a little of the rust of his spear, by which it was instantly healed. To this, Ovidius alludes (Met. xii. 112 seq.). Téléphus reſectus Æoniâ arte, Téléphus recovered by Thessalian art (Stat. Syl. i. 4. 113). From gratitude to the Greeks in consequence of this cure, Téléphus joined them, and fought against his father-in-law.—2. A young man, the rival of Hércules, for the favour of Lýtia. He appears to have been a youth of a handsome figure and considerable accomplishments. The ode of Hércules, in which his name occurs, contains one of the most beautiful descriptions of jealousy any where to be met with (i. 13. 1).

Téléſarchus, i. m. a native of Egina, Egina, and father of Cléandrus (Pin. Ist. viii. 3).

Téléſia, w. f. Teſe, a town of Samnium, taken by Hannibal, in 220 B. C., and retaken by the Roman consul, Q. Fabius Maximus, four years after (Liv. xxii. 13 seq.).

Téléſicrates, is. m. a Cyrenian, whose praises Pindarus has sung, for his victory in the Pythian games (Pyth. ix.).

Téléſinus, i. m. a son of Crista, whom Hannibal killed at the battle of Cannæ, as he did also his father and four of his brothers (Sil. Ital. x. 148 seq.).—2. The commander of the Samnites and Lucani, in the Social war (Flor. iii. 18).

L. Téléſinus, L. Téléſini, m. was the consular colleague of C. Suetonius Paulinus, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xvi. 14).

Téléphorus, i. m. a youth of effeminate, if not vicious, habits (Mart. x. 83 seq.).

Téléphorus Renuus, Téléphori Famili, m. the father of Antilla, whom he outlived (Mart. i. 115).

Téléſtes, m. m. a native of Phœstus, a town of Cræta, Cræta, was the father of Ianthé, the wife of Iphis (Ov. Met. ix. 716).

Téléthusa, w. f. wife of Lygdamus, a Cretan, by whom she became the mother of Iphis, who was born a female, and afterwards changed by Isis into a male, and then married Ianthé, daughter of Téléſtes (Ov. Met. ix. 681 seq.).

Telgon, ónis. m. an inhabitant of Cýrené, and descendant of Pelops, killed by the Roman consul Scipio, at the crossing of Trébia, the Trébia (Sil. Ital. iv. 628).

Tellène, arum. f. a city of the Latins, near Ostia, taken by Ancus Március, who carried the inhabitants to Rome, and fixed their residence on Mōns Arēntinus, Mōnte Aventinus (Liv. i. 33).

Tellús, úrís. f. the goddess of the earth, and wife of Cœlus; often used by the poets, to denote the earth itself (Ov. Met. ii. 372).

Telmessus, v. Telmissus, i. m. Mæry, a city on the confines of Cária and Lýtia, in which account, it is sometimes considered as belonging to the one, and sometimes to the other, district. The Romans gave this town to Eumènes, king of Asia, in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 39). Telmessus, idis. f. Telmessus, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Telmessus unda (Luc. Phæ. viii. 248). Inh. Telmissii, orum (Sine. Telmissus, i), m. whom Cicero has celebrated as hârsuſpices (Div. i. 42). Adſp. Telmissus, u. un. Telmessus sinus, is bounded on the one side by Cária, and on the other by Lýtia (Liv. xxxvii. 16). Telmessus, i. m. a fort of Telmissus. Except the town, this fort, and the lands which had belonged to Póllimæus, all Lýtia was given to the Rhôdii by the Romans, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 66).

Telon, ónis. m. the father of Cebalus, by the nymph Sábēthis (Virg. Æn. vii. 734).

—2. A king of Cáprière, Cápri, wounded by Sábēthis, in a naval engagement in the second Punic war, and lost his life by the burning of the ship (Sil. Ital. xiv. 443 seq.).

Telus, i. f. an island in the Mediterranean, opposite Tríoſium, a promontory of Cária (Herod. vii. 153).

Tembrogus. See Thymbra.

Temnos, i. m. a place in Sýrèneſia, in which was an elegant statue of Apóllo, hence the surname Temnites (Suet. Tib. 74).

Temnos, i. m. one of the commanders of the Hérculide, the fourth in descent from Hércules (Vel. Pat. i. 2).—2. A native of Argos, and primogenitor of the Macedonian kings (Herod. viii. 137).

Témēsa, w. v. Témēsē. es. et. Témpea. v. Témpea. w. f. a town in the south of Italy, of which the site was near the lighthouse called Torre Loppa.

Ulyſſes landed at this town, and the inhabitants buried one of his companions under a heap of stones; because in a fit of intemperance, he had injured one of their young women. His shade continued to harass them to such a degree, that they purposed to quit their country, but first consulted the oracle of Apóllo, and the priestess commanded them to build a temple to him on the spot, where they had stoned him to death, and to sacrifice the most beautiful of their virgins to him annually. On complying with this order, the pest ceased, and from this horrid sacrifice Euthymus freed them, by encountering and defeating the demon, on which it plunged into the sea. Pausanias writes Témēsa, Hómērus and Strabo, Témēsē. The Latins contracted Témēsa into Témēsa, or, Témpea (Plin. i. 233). A colony of Roman citizens was planted at Tēmpsa, in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 45). Inh. Tēmpāni, orum, m. Adj. Tēmēseus, v. Tēmpseus, et, Tēmpānus, a, um. Tēmēsa ara (Ov. Met. vii. 207), the brass of Tēmēsa, for which it was famous in the time of Hōmērus (Od. i. 184). Tēmpānus ager, the territory of Tēmēsa, taken by the Romans, in 196 B. C., from the Brūtūi, who had expelled the Greeks (Liv. ibid.).

Tēmilla, n. m. a man who had grazed with a light spear Privēnus, before Cāpys killed him (Virg. Æn. ix. 576).

Tēmīsus, i, m. a Spaniard, who understood the tempering of steel, which Silius Itālicus ascribes to magic or incantation. Hānūbal fought with a sword of his making, at the siege of Sagūntum, Muriedro (Sil. Ital. i. 431).

Tēmūs, v. Tēmūlus, i, m. a town and mountain of Æōlia; from the latter rose the river Mēlus, one of the branches of Cāicus, the Grinakh. Inh. Tēmūi, orum, m. (Tac. Ann. ii. 47).

Sex. Tēmpānus, Sex. Tēmpānī, m. an officer in the Roman army, who commanded a body of horse. In an engagement with the Volscians, his bravery and presence of mind saved the army from a complete defeat in 422 B. C. He was afterwards a plebeian tribune (Liv. iv. 38, 42).

Tēmpē (plural and indeclinable), n. Lycostomus (Pouqueville) Tembi (Clark), or, Tempos, a large and most beautiful plain of Thessaly, watered by Pēneus, the Salampria, and surrounded by lofty mountains on all sides, except where it has forced a passage to the sea between Olympos and Ossa, Kissaro. These two celebrated mountains, and Pēllion form its eastern boundary, Othrys, Kata V' Othry, its southern, Pindus, Metzoro, its western, and a range which connects Pindus Metzoro, and Olympos its northern limit. At Trikala, this vale is about ten miles broad, and a few miles farther down the river widens to twenty. But a little to the E. of Kutzukuro, its breadth expands to fifty miles. Of this place Līvius has given a beautiful description (xlv. 6). The length of Tēmpē may be estimated at about fifty miles; but its whole extent has not been precisely ascertained by actual measurement. Some restrict the term to the defile, three or four miles in length, between Olympos and Ossa. Thessalica Tēmpē (Flor. iv. 2). Tēmpē is used by the poets to denote any very beautiful valley; hence Ovid has Helaria Tēmpē, expressive of the fine land on the banks of Hēlorus, the Atellaro, a river of Sicily, and, perhaps, in the vicinity of the town of that name.

Tēmplum, i, n. originally signified consecrated ground merely, and conveyed no idea whatever of a house built for religious worship. The Augur marked out the ground on which he was to take the omen, and within these sacred limits, for so they were held during the time of consultation, no person, except the Augur himself and the one who consulted him, was allowed to enter. The moment the omen was finished, the Augur said to the consultor, ex templo, i. e. out of the sacred ground. Hence these words came to signify forthwith, instantly, &c. At an after period, when religious houses were erected, the Romans gave to these edifices the same name which they had formerly employed to denote ground consecrated for taking omens in the open air. Templum then signified a temple, a church.

Tēmpsa. See Tēmēsa.

Tēmpyra, orum, n. a place in Thrācia, where the Trausi attacked the Roman army, under Cn. Mānlius Vūlso, returning from Asia, heavily loaded with spoil, in 190 B. C., but were repulsed (Liv. xxxviii. 41).

Tēnchthēri, orum, m. a people of Germany, on the river Rhēnus, the Rhine. Their country was bounded on the north by that of the Sigāmbri. They were conquered by D. Claudius Drūsus, together with the Chērusci, Catti, and other German nations on the east of the Rhine, in 13 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 108).

Tēndēba, orum, n. a town of Cāria; in Strātōnicēnsis ager, which Pausistrātus, the Rhodian general, took by surprise, in 199 B. C. Līvius calls it a place (xxxiii. 18).

Tēnedos, i, f. Tenedos, or, Tenedo, an island five miles off the coast of Troy, six miles in breadth, and upwards of eighteen in circumference. Tenedo has two harbours, both well sheltered. This island is well cultivated, and has a pleasing variety of hill and dale. There is only one town on the whole island, which contains about seven hundred families, of which four hundred are Mahomedans, the rest are Greeks. Its chief produce is wine, has few trees, little verdure, and its general appearance is parched and unpicturesque. No vestiges of its ancient capital, or of the temple of Apōllo remain. On Tēnedos, the Greeks, to persuade the Trojans that they had returned to their native country, concealed themselves, until that unfortunate and credulous people had carried the wooden horse within the walls. But this must be considered a poetical fiction of Virgilus, adapted to the machinery of the Æneid. Inh. Tēnedī, orum, m. Adj. Tēnedīus, n. um. Tēnedīorum libertas secūri Tēnedīdā p̄acta est (Cic. Ep. Quint. frat. ii. 11).

Tēnos, i, f. Tina, or, Tino, an island in the Archipelago, one of the Cyclādes, which Aristōteles calls Hēdrussa, from its being well supplied with water; others name it Ophlūssa. Perhaps these last two names are both derived from the Greek terms, denoting a serpent (ēgē and ēgēs) and, according to Hesychius, Teñia signifies a viper, so that the three names have the same origin (Ov. Met. vii. 469). Inh. Tēnī, orum, m. (Tac. Ann. iii. 63).

Tēnthrēdon, ōnis, m. the father of Prōthōus, who commanded the Magnesians in the Trojan war (Hom. Il. ii. 706).

Tēntyra, orum, n. Deulera, a town of Egypt, to the west of Nilus, the Nile, nearly opposite to Cānēpōlis, Kene, in lat. 26° north. Inh. Tēntyritas, arum, m. worshipped Itia, and lived in perpetual hostility with those who paid adoration to the Crocodiles. See Ombi.

Tēos, v. Tēios, i, f. Boadru (Sigayik, D'Anv.), a town of Iōlia, situated on a peninsula, of which the ruins are still visible. Anācrēon called it Athānāntis, from its founder, Athāmas. Ara, daughter of that prince, when he was deliberating on the site of a temple, laid a few stones together in the form of a house, and after she had finished it, said to her father, "Whilst (enac) you think of a situation, I have constructed a house;" hence, it was called Tuc. Anācrēon, the celebrated lyric poet, was a native of this town. Inh. Tēl, orum, m. (Liv. xxxvii. 12). Adj. Tēlus, a, um. Tēlā fidē, on the lyre of Anacreon, i. e. in lyric poetry (Hor. Od. i. 17. 18).

Tērdon, ōnis, f. Dorah, a town at the mouth of Euphrates, the El-Frat, called also Diridōtis (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Tērētia, æ, f. the wife of M. Tullius Cicero, the orator, to whom he addresses the 14th book of his Epistola ad Familiāres, was a woman of high birth, and uncommon talents. In her temper she was bold, imperious, haughty, and jealous. The powers of her mind enabled her to go deep into public affairs, which, added to the natural vigour of her understanding, gave her an absolute ascendancy over her husband, whom she governed with such capricious tyranny, that he resolved on a separation by divorce. Neglecting all female duty in her family, her household was managed without either regularity or economy; and thoughtless extravagance during the banishment of her husband, besides, being inattentive to his daughter, Tullia, disgusted the Orator, whose letters afford sufficient proof of his long forbearance. During his stay at Brindisi, after the battle of Pharsalia, she did not go to see him, and furnished his daughter with a mean equipage and scanty supplies, when she went to that place to meet her father. Tērētia afterwards was married to C. Crispus Sallustius, the historian, an inveterate enemy of her former husband, and after his death she became the wife of Messala Corvinus, the celebrated orator. Dio Cassius informs us, that she entered into a fourth marriage with Vibius Rufus, who held the consulship in the reign of the emperor Tiberius, and that he boasted of having what once belonged to two of the greatest men of their age, the chair of C. Julius Caesar, on which he had been stabbed, and the wife of M. Tullius Cicero. According to Valerius Maximus, she completed her 103d year (viii. 13).—2. The wife of C. Cilnius Macenas, to whom that statesman communicated the conspiracy of Murena. Dio says she was the sister of Murena (Suet. Aug. 66).

Tērētianus, i, m. a Roman who was præfect of Egypt, when Martialis wrote (Mart. i. 87).

Tērētilla, æ, f. a diminutive from Tērētia q. v. (Suet. Aug. 69).

C. Tērētillus Arsa, C. Tērētilli Arsa, m. a plebeian tribune, who, in the absence of the consuls, endeavoured, by violent harangues, to prevail on the people to limit consular authority, in 462 B. C. In Q. Fabius, præfect of the city, he met a powerful and successful opponent; nor was his next attempt at carrying the same law supported by the people. His motion was, that five commissioners be appointed to frame a set of laws for the regulation of the consular government. Had this measure been carried, it would have had the beneficial effect of defining the power of the consuls; on the one hand preventing them from holding their arbitrary decisions as a law; and, on the other, the people from encroaching on the just prerogative of the supreme magistrates (Liv. iii. 9, 10). Adj. Tērētillus, a, um. Tērētilla lēx (ib.).

Tērētius, i, m. a veteran, who had again entered the service, supposed by some to have given the mortal blow to the emperor Galla (Tac. Hist. i. 41).

Tērētius Lentinus, Tērētii Lēntini, m. a Roman knight, whom Valerius Festus induced to act in concert with him, in forging the will of Domitius Balbus. The fraud having been discovered, Tērētius, with Fabianus, and others of his accomplices, was condemned to suffer the punishment of the Cornelian law, in the year 62 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40).

A. Tērētius Vāro, A. Tērētii Vārōnis, m. was appointed to escort the ambassadors of the Aetoli out of Italy, when they were dismissed by the Roman senate, in 191 B. C. On being elected prætor, he obtained the northern part of Spain for his province, where his success in war procured him the honour of an ovation, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 49 seq.).—2. Sent by the Roman senate on an embassy to Gentius, king of the Illyrii, in 174 B. C.; and, five years after, he was one of the ten commissioners for negotiating the affairs of Macedonia (Liv. xli. 26 seq.).

C. Tērētius Istra, C. Tērētii Istræ, m. held the office of prætor with the government of Sardinia, in 184 B. C. Next year, he was one of the three commissioners for establishing a colony at Gravisce q. v. (Liv. xxxix. 56 seq.).

C. Tērētius Vārō, C. Tērētii Vārōnis, m. a Roman not only of low, but even of sordid, birth. He is said to have been the son of a butcher, who brought him up in the same mean employment. To him Mælius alludes (iv. 38). By trade his father acquired a considerable sum of money, which he bequeathed to his son, who, having turned his attention to public speaking, soon attracted the notice of the people by violent harangues in favour of the basest sort, in opposition to the respectable citizens. The favour of the populace gratified his ambition, by conferring on him the questorship, the plebeian and curule edileships, and afterwards the prætorship. In the following year, he supported the law for rendering the power of M. Minucius Rufus, master of the horse, equal to that of the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus, a measure justifiable on no good principle. The consulship he obtained by means of an inflammatory harangue of Q. Baebius Herennius, a tribune of the people, who was his relation, and his election was carried over three patrician, and two plebeian candidates. In his colleague L. Emilius Paullus, he had a determined enemy of the commons, and a soldier greatly his superior in military knowledge. In numerous presumptuous harangues, he inveighed against the nobles, and boasted that he would soon bring the war with Hannibal to a conclusion. The greatest animosity prevailed between the two consuls, who came at last to the resolution of commanding the army, each a whole day alternately. The rashness of Tērētius, added to his ignorance of military affairs, brought on the calamitous battle of Cannæ, in 216 B. C. From this memorable defeat, he effected his escape to Ventiola, Venus, with about seventy horsemen. On approaching Rome, he was met by citizens of all conditions, who returned him thanks, because he had not despaired of the state. Had he commanded the Carthaginians, says Livius, there is no degree of punishment to which he would not have been subjected. It appears wonderful, that the Romans continued him in command another year, after he had shown his total unsuitness for conducting military operations. They afterwards appointed him to some important stations, sent him as an ambassador to Philippos, king of Macedónia, in 205 B. C., and afterwards in the same capacity to Carthage. The reader of Roman history finds it difficult to account for the principle on which his countrymen acted, when they intrusted troops to a man so notoriously destitute of every military qualification, or sent on embassies a popular demagogue, who had risen to distinction by groundless calumny and coarse invective (Liv. xxii. 25 seq.).

Cn. Terentius Varro, Cn. Terentii Varronis, m. was a man of senatorian rank, held the office of prætor in Rome, in 66 B. C., and to him the traitor Q. Cæparius was given in charge (Sal. Cat. 47).

L. Terentius, L. Terentii, m. sent by the Roman senate on an embassy to Antiochus, king of Syria, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 35).

L. Terentius Mæssillota, L. Terentii Mæssillotæ, m. a plebeian edile, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 40).—2. A prætor to whom the lots gave the government of Sicília, in 189 B. C. In Spain, he held the rank of a military tribune, and was one of the deputation sent from that country to announce the success of the Roman arms, by which peace had been re-established, and Celtiberia reduced to submission (Liv. xxxviii. 42 seq.).

M. Terentius, M. Terentii, m. a Roman knight, who, after the fall of Scævius, avowed his intimacy with him, and defended himself with such firmness, that he not only preserved his own life, but procured sentence either of death or banishment against his prosecutors, in the year 32 (Tac. Ann. vi. 8 seq.).

M. Terentius Varro, M. Terentii Varronis, m. was, in the early part of his life, a lieutenant-general in Pompey's army, and served under him in the piratical war, in which he gained a naval crown. He favoured the interest of that general in the civil war, but, after the defeat of Petronius and Afranius, he became reconciled to Caesar, and spent the remainder of his life in literary pursuits. He was a perfect master of the Latin language, and possessed extensive information respecting the antiquities both of Greece and Rome. His writings, says Quintilian, contributed more to the knowledge, than to the eloquence, of his countrymen. To him Cicero, with whom he lived in habits of intimate friendship, dedicated his Academic Questions. He was the most learned and voluminous of all the Roman authors, and wrote no fewer than 490 vols., of which his three books on Agriculture, three (the 4th, 5th, and 6th) on the Latin language, and 7th, 8th, 9th, De Analogia, only remain. Even of these, some are far from being complete. He was proscribed by the Triumviri in his 84th year, but the friendship of Fulvius Kalenus preserved him. Caesar resolved to form as large a collection as possible of the literary works, both of the Greeks and Romans, and assigned to Terentius the care of purchasing and putting them in order. He died at the age of 88. Eutrópius calls him M. Varro (vi. 20). Adj. Varróniānus, a, um. Varróniāna legiōnes (Liv. Ep. 111).

M. Terentius Varro Lucullus, M. Terentii Varrónis Luculli, m. brother of L. Lucius Lucullus, was adopted by Varro. He held the consulship with C. Cæsius Varus, in 75 B. C., and two years after, when præconsul, subdued the Thracians (Liv. Ep. 97).

P. Terentius, P. Terentii, m. surnamed Afer, from his being born in Africa, to distinguish him from others of this name. He flourished between the second and third Punic wars, but the precise period of his birth, and place of his nativity, are unknown. The same uncertainty prevails respecting the disease which terminated his life, and in what part of the world he died. He came to Rome in the low situation of a slave, where the elegance of his form, and the excellence of his genius, not only procured him his freedom, but an excellent education from his master P. Terentius, whose name he assumed. He enjoyed the friendship of C. Lælius, whom some suppose to be the writer of his plays, on account of their elegance, and it is not improbable, that the poet was indebted to his friend for considerable improvements, both in their structure and diction. His style is pure, refined, elegant, and peculiarly his own; his characters, which are nicely discriminated, and well supported, discover an accurate knowledge and correct delineation of human nature. He makes few attempts at wit, but, when he does, he displays both delicacy and acuteness. Cicero considers the writings of Terentius as a standard of the Latin language. Six of his plays remain, and merit the particular study of the Latin scholar, whose attention the variety of circumstances, accidents, and characters, added to an involuntary and irresistible anxiety for the events, cannot fail to arrest, and whose style, and knowledge of the Latin language they cannot fail to improve. With the exception of Hecyra, all his plays have double plots, yet they are so ingeniously contrived, that the one serves as an underplot, and thereby keeps the unity of action inviolate. They carry with them so much appearance of nature and reality, that they seem rather to be representations of real occurrences, than the mere invention of the poet. He observes most strictly the unities of time and place, the action never ceases, and the spirit of the drama is preserved till the very end. In originality and vis comica he yields the palm to Plautus; but in every other dramatic excellence he surpasses him so far, as to set comparison at defiance. Fabula Terentii, a play of Terentius; Hæautontimorūmenos, i. e. the self-tormentor (Hor. Sat. i. 2. 20). Adj. Terentiānus, a, um. Terentiānus Phormio (Ausen. cecox. 10).

P. Terentius Tuscivēciānus, P. Terentii Tuscivēciāni, m. nominated a commissioner to Illyricum, by the Roman senate, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 17).

P. Terentius Varro, P. Terentii Varronis, m. surnamed Atacinus, from his being born at Atax, a village on Atax, the Aude river of Gallia NARBONENSIS, a poet of some eminence, who wrote elegies and epigrams with considerable ability, and Prætor Valerius, with other grammarians, have recommended his Argonautica; but he failed in satire. Quintilianus gives him little credit for originality, considering him as an author, that ought not to be despised, but who had obtained a name from translating the works of others; and thought him not sufficiently rich in expression, for improving the excellences of oratory (x. 1. 87). Ovidius commends Varro, and his poem on the Argonautic expedition (Amor. i. 15, 21: Art. Am. iii. 335).

Q. Tereñtius, Q. Tereñtī, m. one of the ambassadors sent by the Roman senate to C. Flaminius Nepos, consul elect, who had quitted the city secretly, and repaired to his province, contrary to former usage, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 63).

Q. Tereñtius Cullēo, Q. Tereñtī Cullēōnis, m. a Roman senator, who had been made prisoner by the Carthaginians, and liberated by Scipio Africanus, in 203 B. C. With the cap of liberty on his head, he followed the car of that conqueror, and afterwards obtained the office of foreign prætor, but failed in his canvass for the office of consulship. The senate nominated Tereñtius and other two to settle with Māsīnissa and the Carthaginians, respecting the troops which they were to furnish for the Macedonian war (Liv. xxx. 43 seq.).

Sergius Tereñtius, Sergī Tereñtī, m. an officer in the army of Decius Junius Brutus, who fled from Mūtina, and was pursued by cavalry, sent after him by M. Antonius. To save the life of his friend, Ser. Tereñtius threw himself in the way of the horsemen, declared that he was Brutus, and presented his body to their swords; but, being recognised by Furius, who commanded the party, his life was spared (Val. Max. iv. 7).

Tereñtus, i. m. a place in Cāmpus Martius, near Tiber, the Tevere, on which the secular games were performed (Ov. Fast. i. 501). Here Pluto and Proserpina had an altar, perhaps pitched upon from the grounds around it being higher than the other parts of the plain, and thus affording a better view to the spectators. Some derive Tereñtus from terēre, from the bank of the river at that place being much worn away by the current, and Festus, from its being less worn or beaten by the hoofs of horses and the wheels of the chariots, than the surface of ground in its vicinity, because it was sacred to Pluto. Romulus Tereñtus (Mart. iv. 1). Adj. Tereñtinus, a. um. Tereñtinus ludus, the secular games (Auson. cccxxvi. 34).

Tereñs, ēos, m. a king of Thracia, the son of Mārs and Bistōnis, who married Procnē, a daughter of Pāndion, king of Athens. His wife, to revenge his cruelty to her sister Philōmēla, put their son Itys, c. Itylus to death, that Tereñs might eat the flesh of his own child. During the time of dinner, he asked for his son, and Procnē informed him, that he was in the act of devouring his mangled limbs, which Philōmēla confirmed, by throwing his head on the table. As he was drawing his sword to plunge it into the bosom of both, he was metamorphosed into a hoopoe, Procnē into a swallow, Itys into a pheasant, and Philōmēla into a nightingale. Pausanias supposes that he was king of Daulis. After his cruelty to Philōmēla, he slew himself among the Megārensēs, who erected to his memory a tomb, at which they sacrificed yearly (Paus. i. 41).

Tergēmina, w. f. (porta) a gate of Rome.

On the outside of that gate, the silius X. Emilius Lepidus and L. Emilius Paulus built a portico, in 195 B. C., out of the tax paid by the farmers of the public games (Liv. xxxv. 10).

Tērīna, w. f. Martianensis, a city of the Brūtii, taken by Alexander, king of Epirus, in 323 B. C. (Liv. viii. 24). Id. Tarunorum, m. Adj. Tērīnus, a. um. Tērīnus, the Gulf of St. Eufemia.

Tērīōltes, w. m. a satrap of the Paphlagonians, accused of avarice and haughtiness, on which account Alexander the Great ordered him to be put to death (Curt. ii. 1).

Tērīāntia, w. f. a town of Spain, an. Nūmāntia. Inh. Tērīāntini, own. a (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 298).

Tērmes, ētis, f. Tiermes, or, Lerida, v. Castile, a province of Spain. Id. Tēmestini, orum (Sing. Tēmestinus), a. um. subdued by Q. Pōmpeius Nēpos, the Roman consul, in 143 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 34). Id. Tēmestinus, a. um. Tēmestina ciuitas (Liv. Ann. iv. 45).

Tērēssus, i. m. a city of Phlōnia. Id. Tērēssēsēs, ium, m. besieged the Lōdianses, in 191 B. C., when the Roman consul G. Mānlius Vūlso marched from Epēdēragia to the Gallōgræci. At the entreaty of the Lōdēsēs, he obliged the Tērēssēsēs to assist, and gave them peace on receiving 50 talents of silver (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Tērminus, i. m. the god of landmarks, to whom the Romans paid divine honors, because they considered the boundaries of fields or lands to be under his protection. The nation allowed this part to remain inviolated, and Nūma Pōmpeilius maintained that the man who ploughed it, and who his cattle, should be held accursed. The temple of Tērminus had an opening in the roof, immediately above the statue, from the Romans considering it unlawful to place him under cover, and to sacrifice to him unless in the open air. This practice naturally resulted from the use of landmarks, and the aperture in the roof appears to have been intended to avoid the incongruity of including a boundary within a house. Ennius calls him Terminus in imitation of the Greeks. When Terquinius formed the plan of enlarging the temple of Jūpiter in the capitol, and to include in it the site of several other edifices erected to the gods, among others that of Tērminus, he alone resisted the wish of the king, and would not allow his temple to be unhallowed, which the Romans reckoned an evident presage of the perpetuity of their empire. The statue of Tērminus had a human head only, but wanted both the hands and the feet. This form indicated his inability to move, and his permanency in the same place. Tērminālia, ium, n. annual festivals in honour of Tērminus, celebrated at Rome in the month of February, which, when first introduced into the calendar, was the last month of the year (Ov. Fast. ii. 68). Adj. Tērminālis, is, e.

Tērmissum, i. n. a large town in Spain, which was always unfaithful to the Romans, on which account T. Didius commanded the inhabitants to live on the plain, without fortifications. He probably destroyed the old town, as it possessed advantages of situation which added to its strength (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 311).

Tērpius, i, m. the father of the poet Phēmius, who is hence called Tērplādes (Hom. Od. xxii. 380).

Tēpnus, i, m. a harper, who gave instructions in music to the emperor Nēro (Suet. Ner. 20).

Tērsius, æ, et, Tērsiōn, ōnis, m. a Corinthian, the father of Erytīmus and Namērtidas, and brother of Pteōdōrus (Pin. Ol. xlii. 59).

Tērsichōrē, es, f. one of the muses, who presided over dancing, of which the invention has been ascribed to her. According to some authors, men were indebted to her ingenuity for the harp, hence her name sometimes denotes lyric poetry (Juv. Sat. vii. 35).

Tērrācina, v. Tarracina, æ, f. Tarracina, a town of the Volsi, in Lātium, a few miles distant from the sea, and south of Ufens, the Ausente. See Auxur. Inh. Tērrācinēnses, ium (Sing. Tērrācinēnsis, is), m. (Sal. Cat. 46).

T. Tērrāsidius, T. Tērrāsidii, m. one of Caesar's lieutenant-generals, whom he sent into the country of the Esulii (Cæs. B. G. iii. 7). Some editions of Caesar read Lēxōli, others Unelli.

Tērtia, æ, f. daughter of Sērvilia and sister of M. Jūlius Brūtus, with whom Jūlius Cæsar was said to have had unlawful intercourse, through the agency of her mother (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 50).

Tērtius Titius Jūliānus, Tērtii Titii Jūliāni, m. the commander of a Roman legion, who obtained consular ornaments. Apōnūs Sātūrnīnus, governor of Mesiā, attempted to murder him, but timely notice enabled him to effect his escape. From that time, he took no part in the civil war between Otho and Vespasianus, which then embroiled the state. For quitting his legion, he was deprived of his prætorship, which was afterwards restored to him, because it appeared, that he had intended to have joined Vespasianus (Tac. Hist. ii. 85 seq.). His name is written sometimes Tērtius Jūliānus, and sometimes Tērtius Jūliānus.

Tērtiulla, æ, f. wife of M. Licinius Crāsus, corrupted by C. Jūlius Cæsar (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 50).—2. A diminutive from Tērtia (Suet. Aug. 69).—3. The paternal grandmother of the emperor Vespasianus, under whose care he was educated (Suet. Vesp. 2).

Tērtullus, i, m. a Roman knight, and commander of the prætorian cohorts (Suet. Tit. 4). See Aricella Tērtiulla.

Tēstūdo, inis, f. a wooden tower, used by the Romans for protecting the soldiers, when employed in undermining the walls of a town, or in battering them with the ram (see Aries). It was erected of wood, and covered with hides, earth, or any other kind of substance which is with difficulty set on fire. The name must have been derived either from the roof, resembling the back of a tortoise (Tēstūdo), or from its strength in affording the soldiers both covering and protection, as the shell does that fish. When the soldiers of a company advanced to an assault, they frequently stood close together, and formed a shade or screen of their shields, to protect their bodies against the missile weapons thrown by the enemy from the walls. This defence they also called Tēstūdo, but it must not be confounded with the tower or mantlet just described. Tēstūdo is also used by the poets to denote the lyre; from the first having been made of the shell of a sea tortoise. Adj. Tēstūdinēus, Tēstūdinātus, v. Tēstūdinēātus, a, um, of, or like, a tortoise, arched like a tortoise shell; vaulted.

Tēthrōnium, i, n. a town of Phōciæ (Herod. viii. 33).

Tēthys, jos, f. a daughter of Urānus and Terra, was the wife of her brother Occānus, and mother of the Occānides, who were said to be 3000 in number. Tēthys is often used to denote the sea. Rubra Tēthys, the Red Sea (Stat. Th. iv. 388).

Tētrāphylla, æ, f. a town of Athāmānia, in which the royal treasures were wont to be kept (Liv. xxxviii. 1).

Tētrica, æ, m. Monte della Sibylla, according to Cluverius, but others make it Monte de St. Giovanni, hence its situation is doubtful. From Virgilius, it appears to have been rugged and precipitous (Æn. vii. 718). Adj. Tētricus, a, um. Tētrica rūpes (Sil. Ital. viii. 417).

Tētrīnus, i, m. a robber or highwayman, at whose trial the emperor Caligūla said, "All the prosecutors were Tētrīni" (Suet. Cal. 30).

Tēucer, v. Tēucrus, i, m. son of Scāmānder and Idæa. Others make him a Cretan, and state, that he migrated to Phrygiā, settled on the east shore of the Dardanelles, and reigned over that country, before Troy was built. From him the inhabitants received the name of Tēucri, orum, and Tēucra, æ, f. is a name of Troy. Of the Tēuceri, the Pæones were a colony, and the Gergethæ a remnant (Herod. v. 122 seq.). Adj. Tēucer, v. Tēucrus, a, um. Tēucer palæis, Trojan dust (Hor. Od. iv. 6. 12).—2. A son of Telāmon, king of Salāmis, Colours, and Hesiōnē, a daughter of Lāomædon, king of Troy. He was a brave soldier, and distinguished himself by his resolution and intrepidity, during the long and memorable siege of that city. Returning to Salāmis without his brother Ajax, who, on the Greeks adjudging the arms of Achilles to Ulysses, in preference to him, fell by his own sword, Tēucer was banished by his father, from an opinion that he had put him to death, on purpose to obtain the sovereignty of his native island. This prince then, with a few companions, went to Cyprius, and built a city, to which he gave the name of his native city, Salāmis, now Famagosta. In his first operation he is said to have had the assistance of Belus, the father of Dido, who was king of Sidon, vide. It is added, that on the death of his father, he returned to claim his paternal kingdom, but was repelled by Eury-saces, son of Ajax, on which he sailed to Hispānia, Spain, landed where Carthāgo Nōva was afterwards built, and settled in Gallacæa, which took that name from him and his companions (Just. xlv. 3).—3. A descendant of Telāmon, who, according to Silius Italicus, built Carthāgo in Spain (lil. 308). Pōmpōnūs Mela says, Hāsdrūbal founded that city, which appears more probable, giving it the name of the capital of his country, and adding Nōva, for the sake of distinction.—4. A man in the Carthaginian army, killed by Nōrbānus, towards the end of the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xvii. 426).

Tēumēssus, i, f. a place in Bēotiā, where his Argonautica; but he failed in satire. Quintilianus gives him little credit for originality, considering him as an author, that ought not to be despised, but who had obtained a name from translating the works of others; and thought him not sufficiently rich in expression, for improving the excellences of oratory (x. 1. 87). Ovidius commends Varron, and his poem on the Argonautic expedition (Amor. i. 15. 21: Art. Am. iii. 335).

Q. Terentius, Q. Terentii, m. one of the ambassadors sent by the Roman senate to C. Flaminius Nepos, consul elect, who had quitted the city secretly, and repaired to his province, contrary to former usage, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 63).

Q. Terentius Cullio, Q. Terentii Cullionis, m. a Roman senator, who had been made prisoner by the Carthaginians, and liberated by Scipio Africanus, in 203 B. C. With the cap of liberty on his head, he followed the car of that conqueror, and afterwards obtained the office of foreign praetor, but failed in his canvass for the office of consulship. The senate nominated Terentius and other two to settle with Masinissa and the Carthaginians, respecting the troops which they were to furnish for the Macedonian war (Liv. xxx. 43 seq.).

Sergius Terentius, Sergii Terentii, m. an officer in the army of Decius Junius Brutus, who fled from Mutina, and was pursued by cavalry, sent after him by M. Antonius. To save the life of his friend, Ser. Terentius threw himself in the way of the horsemen, declared that he was Brutus, and presented his body to their swords; but, being recognised by Furius, who commanded the party, his life was spared (Val. Max. iv. 7).

Terentus, i. m. a place in Campus Martius, near Tiber, the Terere, on which the secular games were performed (Ov. Fast. i. 501). Here, Pluto and Proserpina had an altar, perhaps pitched upon from the grounds around it being higher than the other parts of the plain, and thus affording a better view to the spectators. Some derive Terentus from terere, from the bank of the river at that place being much worn away by the current, and Festus, from its being less worn or beaten by the hoofs of horses and the wheels of the chariots, than the surface of ground in its vicinity, because it was sacred to Pluto. Romulus Terentus (Mart. iv. 1). Adj. Terentinus, a, um. Terentinus ludus, the secular games (Auson. cccxxvi. 34).

Tereus, eos, m. a king of Thrace, the son of Mars and Bistonia, who married Procné, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens. His wife, to revenge his cruelty to her sister Philomela, put their son Itys, v. Itylus to death, that Tereus might eat the flesh of his own child. During the time of dinner, he asked for his son, and Procné informed him, that he was in the act of devouring his mangled limbs, which Philomela confirmed, by throwing his head on the table. As he was drawing his sword to plunge it into the bosom of both, he was metamorphosed into a hoopoe, Procné into a swallow, Itys into a pheasant, and Philomela into a nightingale. Pausanias supposes that he was king of Daullis. After his cruelty to Philomela, he slew himself among the Megarenses, who erected to his memory a tomb, at which they sacrificed yearly (Paus. i. 41).

Teremina, e, f. (porta) a gate of Rome.

On the outside of that gate, the ediles M. Emilius Lepidus and L. Emilius Paulus built a portico, in 195 B. C., out of the tax paid by the farmers of the public pasture (Liv. xxxv. 10).

Terina, e, f. Martorano, a city of the Bruttii, taken by Alexander, king of Epirus, in 325 B. C. (Liv. viii. 24). Adj. Terinorum, m. Adj. Terinæus, a, um. Terinæsinus, the Gulf of St. Eufemia.

Teritotes, e, m. a satrap of the Paropamisadae, accused of avarice and haughtiness, on which account Alexander the Great ordered him to be put to death (Curt. ix. 8).

Termantia, e, f. a town of Spain, near Numantia. Inh. Termantini, orum, m. (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 298).

Termes, etis, f. Termea, or, Lernia, a town of Castile, a province of Spain. Inh. Termestini, orum (Seng. Termestinus, i), a subdued by Q. Pompeius Nepos, the Roman consul, in 143 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 54). Adj. Termestinus, a, um. Termestina natio (Tac. Ann. iv. 45).

Termessus, i, m. a city of Pisidia. Inh. Termessenses, ium, m. besieged the Ionienses, in 191 B. C., when the Roman consul C. Manlius Vulso marched from Ephesus against the Gallioeci. At the entreaty of the Ionodenses, he obliged the Termessenses to desist, and gave them peace on receiving fifty talents of silver (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Terminus, i, m. the god of landmarks, to whom the Romans paid divine honours; because they considered the boundaries of fields or lands to be under his protection. That nation allowed this part to remain uncultivated, and Numa Pompilius maintained, that the man who ploughed it, and also his cattle, should be held accursed. The temple of Terminus had an opening in the roof, immediately above the statue, from the Romans considering it unlawful to place him under cover, and to sacrifice to him unless in the open air. This practice naturally resulted from the use of landmarks, and the opening in the roof appears to have been intended to avoid the incongruity of including a boundary within a house. Ennius calls him Termo in imitation of the Greeks. When Terentius formed the plan of enlarging the temple of Jupiter in the capitol, and to include in it the site of several other edifices erected to the gods, among others that of Terminus, he alone resisted the wish of the king, and would not allow his temple to be unhallowed, which the Romans reckoned an evident presage of the perpetuity of their empire. The statue of Terminus had a human head only, but wanted both the hands and the feet. This form indicated his inability to move, and his permanency in the same place. Terminalia, ium, n. annual festivals in honour of Terminus, celebrated at Rome in the month of February, which, when first introduced into the calendar, was the last month of the year (Ov. Fast. ii. 669). Adj. Terminalis, is, e.

Terminus, i, n. a large town in Spain, which was always unfaithful to the Romans, on which account T. Didus commanded the inhabitants to live on the plain, without fortifications. He probably destroyed the old town, as it possessed advantages of situation which added to its strength (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 311).

Tērpius, i, m. the father of the poet Phēmius, who is hence called Tērpiades (Hom. Od. xlii. 390).

Tērpius, i, m. a harper, who gave instructions in music to the emperor Nēro (Suet. Ner. 20).

Tērpius, m, et, Tērpius, ōis, m. a Corinthian, the father of Er̄tūmus and Namētidas, and brother of Ptēōdōrus (Pin. Ol. xlii. 59).

Tērpiāchōrē, es, f. one of the muses, who presided over dancing, of which the invention has been ascribed to her. According to some authors, men were indebted to her ingenuity for the harp, hence her name sometimes denotes lyric poetry (Juv. Sat. vii. 35).

Tērrācīna, v. Tārrācīna, m, f. Tarracina, a town of the Volsi, in Lātium, a few miles distant from the sea, and south of Ufens, the Aufente. See Anxur. Inh. Tērrācīnēnses, ium (Sing. Tērrācīnēnsis, is, m. (Sal. Cat. 46).

T. Tērrācīdus, T. Tērrācīdū, m. one of Caesar's lieutenant-generals, whom he sent into the country of the Esulii (Ces. B. G. iii. 7). Some editions of Caesar read Lēvelli, others Unelli.

Tērtia, m, f. daughter of Sērvilia and sister of M. Jūlius Brūtus, with whom Jūlius Caesar was said to have had unlawful intercourse, through the agency of her mother (Suet. Jul. Ces. 50).

Tērtius Titius Jūliānus, Tērti Titii Jūliāni, m. the commander of a Roman legion, who obtained consular ornaments. Apōnūs Sātūrnīnus, governor of Mēsia, attempted to murder him, but timely notice enabled him to effect his escape. From that time, he took no part in the civil war between Otho and Vēspāsianus, which then embroiled the state. For quitting his legion, he was deprived of his praetorship, which was afterwards restored to him, because it appeared, that he had intended to have joined Vēspāsianus (Tac. Hist. ii. 85 seq.). His name is written sometimes Titius Jūliānus, and sometimes Tērtius Jūliānus.

Tērtiūla, m, f. wife of M. Licinius Crāsus; corrupted by C. Jūlius Caesar (Suet. Jul. Ces. 50).—2. A diminutive from Tērtia (Suet. Aug. 69).—3. The paternal grandmother of the emperor Vēspāsianus, under whose care he was educated (Suet. Vesp. 2).

Tērtullus, i, m. a Roman knight, and commander of the praetorian cohorts (Suet. Tit. 4). See Aricidia Tērtiūla.

Tēstūdo, nis, f. a wooden tower, used by the Romans for protecting the soldiers, when employed in undermining the walls of a town, or in battering them with the ram (see Ater). It was erected of wood, and covered with hides, earth, or any other kind of substance which is with difficulty set on fire. The name must have been derived either from the roof, resembling the back of a tortoise (Tēstudo), or from its strength in affording the soldiers both covering and protection, as the shell does that fish. the poets to denote the lyre; from the first having been made of the shell of a sea tortoise. Adj. Tēstūdinēus, Tēstūdinātus, v. Tēstūdinēatus, a, um, of, or like, a tortoise, arched like a tortoise shell; vaulted.

Tēthrōnium, i, n. a town of Phōciā (Herod. viii. 33).

Tēthys, ōis, f. a daughter of Urānus and Tērra, was the wife of her brother Ocēānus, and mother of the Ocēānides, who were said to be 3000 in number. Tēthys is often used to denote the sea. Rubra Tēthys, the Red Sea (Stat. Th. iv. 388).

Tētrāphylla, m, f. a town of Athāmānia, in which the royal treasures were wont to be kept (Liv. xxxviii. 1).

Tētrica, v. m. Monte della Sibylla, according to Claverius, but others make it Monte de St. Giovanni, hence its situation is doubtful. From Virgilius, it appears to have been rugged and precipitous (Aen. vii. 713). Adj. Tētricus, a, um. Tētrica rūpes (Sil. Ital. viii. 417).

Tētrīnus, i, m. a robber or highwayman, at whose trial the emperor Caligūla said, "All the prosecutors were Tētrīni!" (Suet. Cal. 30).

Tēucer, v. Tēucrus, i, m. son of Scāmānder and Ideā. Others make him a Cretan, and state, that he migrated to Phrygia, settled on the east shore of the Dardanelles, and reigned over that country, before Troy was built. From him the inhabitants received the name of Tēucrī, orum, and Tēucrīa, m, f. is a name of Troy. Of the Tēucrī, the Pēōnes were a colony, and the Gērgithae a remnant (Herod. v. 122 seq.). Adj. Tēucer, v. Tēucrus, a, um. Tēucer pulvis, Trojan dust (Hor. Od. iv. 6. 12).—2. A son of Tēlēmōn, king of Sālāmīs, Colours, and Hēcāionē, a daughter of Lāōmēdon, king of Troy. He was a brave soldier, and distinguished himself by his resolution and intrepidity, during the long and memorable siege of that city. Returning to Sālāmīs without his brother Ajax, who, on the Greeks adjudging the arms of Achilles to Ulysses, in preference to him, fell by his own sword, Tēucer was banished by his father, from an opinion that he had put him to death, on purpose to obtain the sovereignty of his native island. This prince then, with a few companions, went to Cyp̄rus, and built a city, to which he gave the name of his native city, Sālāmīs, now Famagosta. In his first operation he is said to have had the assistance of Bēlus, the father of Dido, who was king of Sidon, Scile. It is added, that on the death of his father, he returned to claim his paternal kingdom, but was repelled by Euryclēs, son of Ajax, on which he sailed to Hīspānia, Spain, landed where Carthāgo Nōva was afterwards built, and settled in Gālācia, which took that name from him and his companions (Just. xlv. 3).—3. A descendant of Tēlēmōn, who, according to Silius Italicus, built Carthāgo in Spain (iii. 308). Pōmpōnius Mēla says, Hāsdrūbal founded that city, which appears more probable, giving it the name of the capital of his country, and adding Nōva, for the sake of distinction.—4. A man in the Carthaginian army, killed by Nōrbānus, towards the end of the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xvii. 425).

Tēumēssus, i, f. a place in Bēōtia, where Jupiter is said to have concealed Eurōpa. Were this statement well authenticated, it would afford an easy solution of the uncertainty respecting the name of this division of the globe (Paus. ix. 19). Adj. Teumēssius, a, um. Teumēssius vulpes (Paus. ibid.).

Teus. See Tros.

Teutē, a, f. the stepmother of Pinchus, king of the Illyrii, and, after the death of his father, the guardian. With the Romans, on the decease of her husband, Agnon, she formed a treaty, on certain conditions, which Polybius has recorded (ii. 4 seq.). To it Livius refers (xxii. 33).

Teutagōnus, i, m. a Scythian, who commanded the Bästärne in the war carried on by his countrymen against the Argonauts and Colchians (Val. Flacc. vi. 97). Some MSS. have Teutagenus.

Teutalus, i, m. a Roman, killed in the first battle which was fought with Hannibal, on his invading Italy (Sil. Ital. iv. 199).

Teutamus, i, m. a Pelagian, the father of Lethus. Teutamides, a, m. Lethus (Hom. II. ii. 843).

Teutana, v. Teuta, a, f. a queen of the Illyrii, by whose order that nation butchered the ambassadors of the Romans, an act of extreme barbarity which the latter severely resented (Flor. ii. 5). This is probably the person called Teuta q. a.

Teutates, v. Thēutates, is, m. a god worshipped by the Gauls and Spaniards, adopted from the practice of the Egyptians, who called him Thoth, or, Thēth. Bochartus and others, consider this deity the same with Mercurius; and Lactantius informs us, that human victims were offered at his altar, to which Lælius alludes (Phar. i. 445).

Teuthras, antis, m. a king of Mysia, a district of Asia Minor, Natolia, bounded on the N. by Propontis, the Sea of Marmara, on the E. by Bithynia and Phrygia, on the S. by Lydia, on the W. by Mære Egæum, the Archipelago, and Hæliospontus, the Dardanelles. Tros formed the western part of this country. The river Cæcis, the Grimakli, has its source in Mysia, hence Teuthrantēus Cæcis (Ov. Met. ii. 243), and, after running some miles, becomes the boundary between it and Lydia, and falls into the Archipelago. But others place the southern boundary of Mysia to the south of the Grimakli.

Adj. Teuthrantēus, a, um.—2. A native of Cume, skilled in music (Sil. Ital. xi. 288).—3. A Grecian of great bravery, killed by Hector (Hom. II. v. 705).—4. A native of Arisba, and father of Axylus, hence called Teuthrantides (Hom. II. vi. 13).

Teuticus, i, m. an ambassador sent by Gentius, king of the Illyrii, to L. Anicius Gallus, the Roman prætor, in 170 B. C., to request a truce, after that monarch had been defeated at Scodra (Liv. xlv. 31). See Bellus.

Teutobodus, i, m. the commander of the Cimbri and Teutones, whom C. Marius made prisoner, in 106 B. C. (Eutrop. v. 11).

Teutoburgium, i, n. a town of Germany, according to some now called Varendorp, but others, near the town of Hora. Adj. Teutoburgiēnsis, is, e. Teutoburgiēnsis at siltus, Teutberg. Near it Tacitus informs us, the bones of Vārus and his legions were said to remain unburied (Ann. i. 60).

Teutomālius, i, m. king of the Sallæi, who, when he had been defeated by the Roman proconsul, C. Sextus Calvianus, in 111 B. C., fled to the Allöbriges, who supported him with all their power. On this account, as well as from their ravaging the lands of the Adii, the Romans made war on the Allöbriges, and defeated them at Vindalim, in 123 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 61).

Teutomātus, i, m. the son of Olivis, king of the Nitöbriges, who joined Varrigötörix in the Gallic wars, with a great number of his own cavalry, and those whom he had hired from Aquitania (Cæs. B. G. vi. 31 seq.).

Teutoni, orum, v. Teutones, um, a. a German nation, who inhabited Zeehuland and Funen, islands at the entrance of Mære Suevicum, v. Sinus Cōdānus, the Baltic Sea. In conjunction with the Cimbri, they invaded the territories of Rome (109 B. C.), defeated the Roman army commanded by both consuls, and killed 80,000 of them. Seven years after that unsuccessful battle, C. Marius, in his second consulship, met them at Aque Sextie, put 200,000 to death, and took 60,000 prisoners. Some time after, he engaged these fierce barbarians on Atheds, the Adige, and left 140,000 dead on the field of battle, which put a final period to that dreadful war. These numbers are most probably exaggerated, since it is not easy to imagine how so great an army could be supported at that remote period, when agriculture was in Germany, and some of the neighbouring countries, almost wholly neglected. Besides, a conquering army is more apt to magnify than diminish the enemy's loss; and the account of these defeats has been transmitted by Roman historians. Adj. Teutonicus, a, um, e. of the Teutones, Teutonic, German. Teutonica opes, the power of the Teutones (Prop. iii. 3. 44). Teutonicus rōmer, the Teutonic, or German ploughshare (Claud. xviii. 408).

Tēxēna, a, f. an Egyptian, wife of Apthoëles, tyrant of Sicilia, Sicily, to whom she behaved with the greatest affection (Jest. xxiii. 2).

Thabūstion, v. Thabūstium, i, n. a part of Phrygia, which overhangs the river Indus (Liv. xxxviii. 14).

Thaiphāli, orum, m. a people who inhabited part of the province north of the Danube, after the conquest of Dacia, during the reign of Ulpus Crinitus Trajanus (Eutrop. vii. 2).

Thais, idis, f. a native of Alexandria, who went to Athens, for the purpose of prostitution. In that infamous character she rose to great distinction, lived with Ptolemæus, a general of Alexander the Great, who, after the death of that great warrior, obtained the crown of Egypt. Curtius represents her as addicted to drunkenness (v. 7). She accompanied the Grecian army in the Asiatic expedition; at her suggestion, Alexander, when drunk, burned the palace at Persæpolis. Mênander published a play under her name, which is lost. Her being so great a favourite with that poet, and his having celebrated her personal and mental excellences, makes Propertius call her Mênandrea. Thais, besides Mênander having written the play already mentioned (ii. 6. 2). See Scenalis.

uses her name to denote a courtesan (Sat. iii. 93). Mārtiālis frequently mentions Thāis, but with him, perhaps, at least in many instances, a fictitious character, and in others, he alludes to the Grecian above-mentioned (xiv. 187).

Thāla, æ, f. Feriana, a town of Nūmīdia, which some consider the same as Telepte, Ferre-anach, although this seems doubtful. It is certain that this name does not occur until Thāla had been destroyed and rebuilt. Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Nūmīdiæ took it during the Jugurthine war (Sal. Jug. 89), and Tacitus mentions it as affording a place of refuge to the Romans, who retired into the desert, when Tacfarinas, a Numidian chief, had raised a rebellion (Ann. iii. 21).

Thālāssius, i, m. the god of marriage, the same with Hymen, or Hymēneus (Catal. lxi. 134). Thālāssio, v. Thālāssio q. v. onis, f. the nuptial word (Liv. i. 9. Mart. i. 96).

Thāles, ōis, m. son of Exāmius and Clēōbūla, was born at Milētus, a town of Iōnia, in Asia Minor, Natolia, about 640 B. C.

His remote ancestors were not Greeks, but Phœnicians. Like other philosophers who wished to obtain extensive information, he travelled into Egypt, Phœnicia, and other countries. The knowledge which he acquired by study, and conversation with learned men, in the different places which he visited, raised him high in the estimation of his countrymen. He cultivated the science of astronomy with great assiduity and success.

In this branch of useful learning, he made many important discoveries, and was the first Greek who foretold eclipses of the sun. He founded the sect of philosophers, called, from the place of his birth, the Ionian. Some of his opinions have been transmitted; but all his writings are lost. He lived, according to some, to the ninetieth, and according to others, to the ninety-sixth year of his age. It does not appear that he ever married. To the mildness of his temper Juvēnālīs alludes (Sat. xiii. 184).

Thālēstris. See Minthia.

Thālīa, æ, m. one of the muses, who were the daughters of Jūpiter and Mnēmōsīnē (Virg. B. vi. 2).—2. A sea nymph, one of the attendants of Cýrenē (Virg. G. iv. 338).

Thālīarchus. See Taliarchus.

Thāllus, i, m. a man of an impure mind, and of dishonest as well as lewd practices, whom Cātūllus holds up to infamy (xxv).—2. A driver or charioteer of great celebrity (Mart. iv. 97).—3. A secretary of Augustus, whose leg the emperor broke; because, for a bribe, he had discovered the contents of one of his letters (Suet. Aug. 67).

Thālpius, i, m. the commander of the Epēi at Troy (Hom. II. ii. 620).

Thālpylus, i, m. a Trojan, the father of Echēpōlus. Thālpylides, æ, m. Echēpōlus q. v. (Hom. II. iv. 458).

Thānani, orum, m. a people of Asia, supposed to have lived near the Sārāngæ, although their exact position cannot be determined (Herod. iii. 93).

Thānimasīdas, æ, m. the Neptūnus of the Scythians (Herod. iv. 59).

Thāmīras, æ, m. a Cilician, who introduced the science of divination and augury into Cýprus. His family kept secret the art, and thus secured the priesthood to themselves for a succession of years; but afterwards resigned it into the hands of the monarch (Tac. Hist. ii. 3). See Cingras.

Thāmīrus, i, m. a man in the Theban army under Crēon, killed by Thēseus (Stat. Th. xii. 741).

Thāmýris, idis, m. a native of Sāgūntum, Muriedro, killed by Ashvīc, during the siege of that town (Sil. Ital. ii. 177).

Thāmýras, æ, v. Thāmýris, idis, m. a Thracian poet, and musician, distinguished by the elegance of his person, was the son of Phlāmmon and the nymph Argiōpē, who, according to Apollōdōrus, had the infamy of inventing or first practising a crime before unknown. Eminent for his skill in music, he challenged the muses in their own art, and being surpassed, they deprived him of sight at Dorion, a town of Mēssēnia, and the power of playing on the harp. To this Prōpērtius alludes, fata Thāmýra, the fate of Thāmýras, i. e. loss of sight (ii. 22. 19), and Ovidius, caput Thāmýra (lb. 272). Stāsius, in place of his proper name, uses the words Gēlco vātī (Th. iv. 181).—2. A man in the army of Ænēas, killed by Tūrnus (Virg. Æn. xii. 341).

Thāmýrus, i, m. a man who lost his life in the Theban war by Actor (Stat. Th. x. 308).—2. A native of Cýzicus, Chizico, supposed to have been a captain, or commander, of a band of pirates (Val. Flacc. iii. 128).

Thāpsacus, i, f. Dar (El-Der, according to others), a town on the western bank of the Euphrātes.

Thāpsus, i, m. a native of Cýzicus, Chizico, killed by Pōllux, in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. iii. 191).—2. A man in the army of Hānnibal, whom Thēron killed at the siege of Sāgūntum, Muriedro (Sil. Ital. ii. 160).—3. Another in the same army, whose dead body floated down Trēbia, the Trebia, into the Po (Sil. Ital. iv. 635).

Thāpsus, i, f. Demsas, a maritime town of Africa Prōpria, Tanis, between Adrūmētum and Tisdrus, taken by Māsīnissa, in 206 B. C., immediately before the arrival of P. Cōrnelius Scīpio Africānus in that country (Liv. xxxix. 30). Here Cæsar defeated Scīpio and Jūba. Inh. Thāpsitūni, orum, m. Adj. Thāpslācus, a, um. Thāpsitūca pūgna (Luc. Sop. iv. 4).—2. L' Isola delli Manghisi (i. e. the island of Manghisi), a peninsula of Sicilia, Sicily, but from the isthmus being narrow and low, is often overflowed, hence the name. Thūcýdides states, there was a cognominal town on this peninsula (vi. 4 seq.). Jācōns Thāpsus, low-lying Manghisi (Virg. Æn. iii. 689).

Thara, æ, f. a village of Pārthia, at which the subjects of Dārius seized him, and, to procure the favour of Alexander the Great, proposed to give him up to the conqueror, bound with golden chains. His treachery did not end here; for, by the time Alexander saw him, he had been stabbed in so many places, that life scarcely remained, and the Macedonian king only beheld him as he breathed his last (Just. xi. 15).

Thārros, i, f. a town of Africa, of which nothing certain is known. The conjecture of Ortelius seems unfounded, and, therefore, unworthy of notice (Sal. Frag.).

Thāsos, i, f. Thāspo, or, Thaso, an island in Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago, separated from the coast of Mācēdōnta by a narrow channel. The Phœnicians are supposed to have had a settlement in this island, which produced excellent wines, and had quarries of excellent marbles. Herodotus says, it was first peopled by Phœnicians, and had its name from Thāsus, probably the head of the colony (vi. 47). Nēmōroa Thāsos (Stat. Th. v. 182). Ioh. Thāsī, oram (Sing. Thāsīus, i), m. Adj. Thāsīus, a, um. Thāsium vinum, the wine of Thāsos, highly commended by Plineus (iii. 135). Thāsia vites, the vines of Thāsos (Virg. G. ii. 91). Thāsīus lapis, Thasian marble. It was of a dark hue, and variegated by spots of different colours (Suet. Ner. 50).

Thaumāci, oram, m. et, Thaumācia, æ, f. Thaumaco, a town of Magnēsia, near Sinus Mālīcus, the Gulf of Zeiton, which had this name from the wonderful view which it commanded. Philippus, king of Macēdōnia, attempted to carry it, but without success; it submitted to the bravery of the Romans, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 4 seq. Hom. Il. ii. 716).

Thaumas, āntis, m. son of Pōntus and Tēra, and brother of Phōrcus, Nēreus, Eurybea and Cētō. He married Electra, daughter of Oceanus, by whom he had Iris, Hārpyiæ, Aëtiō and Ōcypētē. Thaumantis, iadis, et, Thaumantis, idis, f. a daughter of Thaumas, chiefly Iris, the rainbow (Ov. Met. iv. 479 seq.). Adj. Thaumantēus, n, um; Thaumantia virgo, Iris (Ov. Met. xiv. 845).—2. A centaur, who fled from the battle with the Lāpithæ at the marriage of Pirithōus (Ov. Met. xii. 303).

Thēstētus, i, m. an Athenian, who made a speech in opposition to that of Euthymon, who wished to remain in Asia, and with whom the majority agreed (Curt. v. 5).

Thēandrus, i, m. a native of Ægina. Thēandridæ, arum, m. the descendants of Thēandrus (Pin. Nem. iv. 118).

Thēanō, ūs, f. a Trojan woman, wife of Amīrys, and mother of Minas (Virg. Æn. x. 703).—2. Priestess of Minēra, was the wife of Antenor, and daughter of Cisseus, hence called Cissēis (Hom. Il. vi. 299 &c.).

Thēarton, ōnis, m. a native of Ægina (Pin. Nem. vii. 10).

Thēarion, i, n. a temple of Apōllo, in the island Ægina (Pin. Nem. iii. 122).

Thēbæ, arum, v. Thēbē, es, f. Theba, the capital of Bœotiā, stood on the banks of the river Ismēnus. It is said to have received this name from Thēbē, wife of Zēthus, the daughter of Asōpus, a relation of Amphion.

But the date of its foundation, and the name of its founder are uncertain. Theba was first governed by kings, many of whom were remarkable for their misfortunes. It became a republic about 1190 B. C., and retained that form of government until destroyed by Alexander the Great. It was rebuilt by Cāssander about twenty years after, and fell under the power of the Romans, 146 B. C.

The modern town contains about 500 houses, chiefly of wood, and possessed by Turks. Theba was anciently called Kadmeis, until it was conquered by the Bœoti, a Thessalian people, from whom it was called Bœotiā.

Curtius says it was built by Phœnicians (iv. 4). The Acropolis Kadmeia was joined to the lower town by Amphion and Zethus, by whom it was called Thēbæ. The magnitude of the ancient city is uncertain. The air was pure, springs copious, fertility remarkable, besides which, it possessed other local advantages. It now retains no traces of its former magnificence, and occupies only part of the old Acropolis.

The seven leaders against Thēbæ, Theba, according to Æschylus, Sōphocles, and Euripides (in Suppl.) were Amphiarāus, Cāpāneus, Etēocles, Hippomēdon, Pārthēnōpeus, Pōlyñices, and Tēdēus. Euripides (in Phœnis.), Apollodorus and Hyginus make them Adrāstus, Amphiarāus, Cāpāneus, Hippomēdon, Pārthēnōpeus, Pōlyñices, and Tēdēus. They were all connected with each other by relationship.

This town had seven gates, Nēis, Hōmōlōides, Prætidēs, Electrās, Durās, Hysistæ, and Ogŷgæ (Stat. Th. viii. 381 seq.). Funesta Thēbē (Stat. Th. v. 740). Thēbais, idos, f. of Thēbæ, or Bœotiā, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine.

Thēbais chelys, a Bœotian harp (Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 61). Adj. Thēbais, Thēbanus, æ, Thēbæus, a, um, Theban, or, Bœotian. Thēbanum enigma (Mart. i. 91). Thēbanus rex (Claud. xlv. 91).—2. A city of Nylia, at the foot of Mount Placus, which Achilles took and destroyed during the Trojan war (Ov. Met. xiii. 173).—3. Habon, a splendid city of Egypt, called also Diospolis, from the worship of Jupiter, and Hēdōm-pyllos, from its hundred gates. The circumference of the space on which this city stood, is not less than twenty-seven miles. The Nile passed through Thēbæ, and many stupendous monuments are found amongst its ruins. Some idea of its magnitude may be formed, from its containing within the walls seven hundred thousand men, capable of bearing arms (Tac. Ann. ii. 60).

From this city the district was called Thēbais, sometimes Ægyptus Superior (Amm. Mar. xvii. 4).

Thēbais, idis, f. an Epic poem on the Theban war, written by P. Pāpilius Stātus. Etēocles and Pōlyñices, sons of Ōdipus and Iocāsta, entered into an agreement, that each should reign one year alternately. Etēocles, from being the elder brother, got first possession of the crown, which he afterwards refused to resign, and Pōlyñices, having fled to Adrāstus, king of Argos, married Argia, daughter of that monarch, and obtained from him troops to compel Etēocles to fulfil the engagement.

The Argives, commanded by seven able officers, marched against Thēbæ, Theba, and each division attacked a gate, with the expectation of obtaining possession of the city. A vigorous and successful resistance was made by the Thebans, and, after both parties had displayed great bravery, and much blood had been shed, it was agreed by the hostile armies, that the two brothers should decide it by single combat. A dreadful contest ensued, in which both the brothers fell, and their bodies having been burned on the same funeral pile, their ashes separated, as if retaining the resentment which influenced the two brothers when alive. The fable of this Epic falls, in point of interest, greatly short of that on which the Æneid is formed. The descent of the offspring, from being unnatural, disgusts, and consequently destroys, or, at least, injures, the effect of the poem. The character of the hero wants elevation, but unity of design is preserved, and the greatness of the action will not be denied. The author has divided his poem into twelve books, probably in imitation of Virgilus, whom, in several instances, he has copied too closely, and of whose manner he too frequently reminds the reader. Still, for excellence of sentiment, harmony of numbers, and grandeur of description, the Thēbāis has a much higher claim to general favour, than has hitherto been allowed.

Thēbē, es, f. the wife of Alexander, king of Phēnā q. v. (Val. Max. ix. 13).—2. The daughter of Asōpus, and sister of Ægina (Herod. v. 80).

Thēbē, es, f. Thēbes cāmpus, the plain of Thēbē, a rich tract of country, celebrated in a poem of Hōmērus. It must have been near Adrāmītium, and was plundered by Antiochus, king of Syria, in the year 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 19).

Theches, is, m. Teke, a mountain, part of the chain Mōschī, two days' journey to the S. E. of Trebisonde, about a mile and a half above the level of the Black Sea, from which the 10,000 Greeks first saw the Euxine.

Thēcla, as, f. a martyr to the doctrines of the Scriptures. Of her country, relations, and period of martyrdom, history gives no account (Claud. lxxvii. 10).

Thēum, i, a. a town of Athāmānia (Liv. xxxviii. 1).

Thēlēstilla, as, f. a woman of unpleasant appearance (Mart. xi. 98).

Thēlēstina, as, f. a woman of a lewd and immoral life (Mart. vi. 7).

Thēlēsius, i, m. the man who struck the younger C. Marius, as he came out from the lurkingplace, after the attack on Prenestē (Val. Max. vi. 8).—2. A poet, to whom Juvēnalis addresses his seventh satire, supposed by some to be the same person mentioned by Mārtialis, in several parts of his writings (liv. 40 &c.). This, however, appears very doubtful (Mart. vi. 50).

Thēlis, is, m. a eunuch on whom Mārtialis writes an epigram (x. 52).

Thēmīs, is, e. Idos, acc. Thēmim, v. in, voc. Thēmi, f. a daughter of Cōelus and Tērta, or, of Urānus and Tītea, the eldest sister of Sātūrnus and Hūpērion. She had an oracle on Pārñāsus, Liakura, which Dēuchlōn and Pūrrha, after the flood, consulted, to obtain information by what means they might repair the loss of mankind (Ov. Met. i. 379 seq.). From the place of her residence, she is called Pārñāsia Thēmīs (Ov. Met. iv. 642); and Fatidica Thēmīs, from possessing the gift of prophecy (Ov. Met. i. 321). Thēmīs afterwards resigned to Apōllo the half of the temple on Pārñāsus, Liakura, which belonged to her; the other half was the property of Tēllūs. According to ancient fable, she had by Jūpiter, Justice, Law, and Peace. Hōmērus makes her the goddess of civil law or justice, whom Jūpiter employed to judge the gods, when sentence was to be pronounced against the unjust (Il. xx. 4 seq.).

Thēmiscyra, as, v. ē, es, f. Phanagorea, a town built by the Amāzōnes, at the mouth of the river Thērmōdon, the Termeh (Diod. Sic. ii. 45). Adj. Thēmiscyrian, a, um. Thēmiscyri cāmpus (Just. ii. 4).

Thēmison, ōnis, m. a physician mentioned by Pīnolus with approbation (iii. 150).—2. A man of infamous conduct (Mart. xii. 20).

—3. An empiric (Juv. Sat. x. 221).

Thēmistius, i, m. a native of Ægina, the father of Lāmpōn, and grandfather of Pūthēas (Pin. Nem. v. 91).

Thēmistōcles, is, m. son of Nēōcles, whom Cōrnēlius Nēpos calls a gentleman, and Plūtārchus, an inferior citizen of Athens. According to some authors, his mother's name was Abrotonon, a Thracian, according to others, her name was Eutēpē, a native of Cūria. The latter appears to have been the opinion of Cōrnēlius Nēpos, who writes, that she was a citizen of Hāllcārassus, Bodran, one of the principal cities of Cūria. When a boy, he was bold, lively, quick of apprehension, and gave proofs of those qualities which constitute an eminent statesman. The bent of his mind was towards political knowledge, and the management of public affairs; to the fine arts, and to ethics, he showed little inclination, although he studied philosophy, and attended lectures on subjects connected with political economy. Love of glory occupied his mind, and this passion involved him in disputes with men of the first rank, particularly with Aristides, son of Lūsimāchus. A total dissimilarity of life and manners, marked the characters of these two eminent men. Aristides, of a mild temper, and of spotless integrity, managed the affairs of the state with inflexible justice, and unsullied reputation, not to promote his own fame, but the advantage and prosperity of the community; Thēmistōcles, solicitous to distinguish himself by some brilliant action or enterprise, attempted great innovations, and excited the people to unnecessary and dangerous resolutions. Moral principle had less influence on his mind, than on that of Aristides, for, if he gained his end, he was little scrupulous about the means. Plūtārchus says he was irregular, unsteady, without moral restraint, living in extremes, and these often of the worst kind. For neglect of business and extravagance, Cōrnēlius Nēpos says, his father disinherited him, an assertion which Plūtārchus does not believe, nor that his mother killed herself, in consequence of that disgrace. Perceiving that the Athenians were unequal to the other states on land, he persuaded them to build a fleet, with which he maintained, they would conquer all Greece. The success of this counsel justified the plan of Thēmistōcles, since with it he fought the Persian fleet at Artēmisium, and conquered it at Sālāmis, Coloura. By profusion, amusements, and other means adapted to captivate the vulgar, he gained the favour of the populace, and the first effect of the ascendancy of his party, was the banishment of the virtuous Aristides. Possessed now of the supreme power, the citizens readily went into his measures, nor will his greatest enemies deny, that he showed considerable naval skill, in the management of the fleet, although opposed by the Spartan general Eurūblades. The latter claimed the supreme command, scarcely deigning to listen to Thēmistōcles in a council of war, but lifted his staff in a threatening attitude, when Thēmistōcles said, "Strike if you please, but hear me." Dreading the departure of the Spartans, Thēmistōcles sent Sicinus, a Persian captive, whom he had appointed the tutor of his children, to inform Xerxes, that unless he engaged them where they lay, the Lacedæmonians would depart.

which would prolong the war, but if immediately attacked, he might crush the whole at once, and believing that the intimation proceeded from friendship, the Persian monarch immediately commenced an action with them in the straits, which compelled the Greeks to fight. The result was, one of the greatest victories obtained by the arms of Greece. Before the engagement, Themistocles sacrificed three Persian captives, sons of Antarcus, and Sandaue, sister of Xerxes, to Bacchus, in order to propitiate that god. Aristides, of whose assistance and counsel he had the benefit before and during the engagement, prevented him from cutting down the bridge over the Dardanelles, lest Xerxes, excluded from returning to his native country, might redouble his exertions, and overrun, or destroy part of Greece; for he had still a formidable armament remaining. The Persian monarch accelerated his retreat, on being informed by Themistocles, that it was their intention to break down his bridge, soon quitted Europe, and crossed into Asia. Themistocles then rebuilt and fortified the city Athens, and greatly improved Piræus, Porto Leonis, which he connected with the city by walls, called from their form, horns. The high distinction which he had attained, excited against him the fury of envy, which delights in the disgrace of superior merit, and which it was necessary to pacify by his banishment. In a foreign country, he met with Pausanias, like himself exiled, who wished that he would join him in a plan for punishing the ingratitude of his countrymen, a proposal which the patriotism of Themistocles rejected, yet the Athenians condemned him for treason. On hearing of this sentence, he fled to Corcyra, Corfu, and afterwards to Admetus, king of the Molossi, his avowed enemy, whose protection he secured, by taking the king's son, a child, in his arms, and kneeling down before the household gods, a mode of supplication which that nation considered unlawful to reject. Cornelius Nepos says, he was in friendship with that king, that he took his little daughter, with whom he entered into a temple regarded with the greatest veneration, and that he refused to come out, until he obtained the king's promise of protection, which he confirmed by giving his right hand, and which he fulfilled. This dread of danger seems opposed to their being on terms of friendship, and rather justifies the narrative above given, which is that of Plutarchus. From this period, the accounts of this unfortunate exile are very different, until his introduction to the Persian monarch whom some make Xerxes, others Artaxerxes. Thucydides is of the latter opinion. At this court, he had a gracious reception, and the king gave him two hundred talents, the sum offered to any one who should seize him, and, as he had delivered up himself, the monarch considered him entitled to the reward. In one year he learned the Persian language so accurately, as to converse with the king without an interpreter. His winning address, uncommon quickness, and extensive knowledge, rendered him a particular favourite with that monarch, who gave him three cities, Magnesia to supply him with bread, Lampascus, Lampsacæ, with wine, and Myus with fish, or other provisions. To these, some add Percotæ, for his chamber, and Phalæstus for his wardrobe. He fixed his residence at Magnesia, where he lived in tranquillity and splendour, until the king called on him to fulfil his promise, the conquest of Greece. Neither resentment against the Athenians nor the honours bestowed on him by the Persian monarch, could induce him to command an expedition against his native country. Determined not to tarnish the lustre of his own achievements, by an act of treason, he put an end to his life, either by drinking the blood of a bull, or by swallowing an active poison, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, about 468 B.C. By Archippe, daughter of Lysander, or Alopée, Allopæa, he had five sons, three of whom survived him, and by a second wife he had four daughters. The Magnesians erected an elegant monument to his memory, in the marketplace, and granted various honours and privileges to his descendants. Thucydides states, that his relations privately conveyed his bones to Attica, since the laws prohibited a traitor being buried publicly within the Athenian territory; and Pausanias, that he was buried at Piræus (i. 1). Arg. Themistocles Latin. Themistocleum consilium, F. & G. quod libet, cum necesse rerum pletur (Cic. in x. 8).

Themistus, i. m. a nobleman of Syracuse, married to Hieronima, a daughter of Gelo, who was the eldest child of Hiero. He engaged in a counter-revolution after the death of Hieronimus, with Andranodorus, and was killed with him in the senatehouse by order of the prators (Liv. xxiv. 24).

Themon, onis, m. brother of Sargis and Clarus, who, with the latter, went from Lycia. Many editions of Virgilus improperly read Hemon (En. x. 126). In this place, Hemon violates the laws of Hæmister verse.

Theoclymænus, i. m. son of Polyphides, who foretold the death of the lovers of Pæloppé, taking the advantage of an eclipse of the sun (Hom. Od. xv. 256 seq.).

Theodectes, is, m. was, according to some authors, a native of Pamphylia, and, according to others, of Cilicia. He is said to have written fifty tragedies, nor was he less celebrated for his talents as an orator. His name occurs in the writings of Cicero and Quintilianus. Alexander the Great did not pass his tomb without showing his respect for the memory of the poet (Val. Max. viii. 14).

Theodora, æ, f. daughter of the empress Eutropia, wife of Maximianus Herculius, by a former husband. The emperor Constantinus Chlorus strengthened his connection with Maximianus Herculius, by marrying his step-daughter, and by him Theodora had three sons, Dalmatius, Julius Constantinus, and Annibalianus, besides three daughters, Constantia, Anastasia, and Eutropia (Eutrop. ix. 22).

Theodorus, i. m. a native of Syracuse, whom Hieronymus put to death by torture (Val. Max. iii. 3).—2. A native of Cyrene, whom king Lysimachus threatened with death, on which he replied, "You seem very mighty, because you have obtained the strength of the madard." Enraged at this expression, the monarch ordered him to be fixed to a cross; Theōdōrus calmly said, "The cross may be terrible to nobles, but to me it is a matter of indifference whether I rot on ground, or on high" (Val. Max. vi. 2).—3. A freedman, put to death by Sēxtus Pompeius (Ap. Bel. Civ. 749).—4. A rhetorician, born at Gadāra, Om Keiss, a city of Syria, to the east of Iōrdānes, whence he is called Theōdōrus Gadārēus. Anxious to conceal the place of his birth, he wished to be considered a native of Rhōdos. In that island, he taught rhetoric with great celebrity, and amongst his numerous disciples, who were called Theōdōrēi, was Tibērius Caesar. He first discovered the true character of that monster, and in his reproofs called him "dirt mixed with blood" (Suet. Tib. 57).—5. A native of Sāmos, the first statuary mentioned in history. Several of the efforts of his genius are recorded by Hērōdōtus, Plinius and others.—6. A silly writer (Mart. x. 74 seq.).—7. See Rhacrus.

Theōdōsia, s. f. Caffa, a town on Cimmērius Bōsphōrus, to which it now gives name. History records that Daudacē, Eupātōria, and Theōdōsia, with some other towns of less extent in Chērsōnēsus Taurica, the Crimea, were unpolluted by human sacrifices (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Theōdōsius, v. Theudōsius, i. m. the father of a line of emperors, was a native of Spain, and born, if not at Itālica, certainly in its vicinity. Under Valēntinīanus, his military achievements, both in Britain and Africa, form a very distinguished part of the annals of that monarch. From the barbarians, who had nearly overpowered the Roman forces, he recovered the former, not more by his military skill, than by his high reputation, and crushed the revolt of the latter, by the defeat of Firmus, whose life atoned for his rebellion. After the merits of this brave commander had regained Africa, lost by the vices of the Romans, he was beheaded at Carthage, on the mere suspicion that his rank was superior to that of a subject, in the year 376.—2. Son of the former, surnamed the Great, was born on the estate which belonged to his father, lying between Segovia and Valladolid. That district is very fertile, and remarkable in modern times for an excellent breed of sheep. This Theōdōsius, whom Aurēlius Victor, by mistake, makes the son of Hōnōrius and Thērmāntia, received an education suited to his rank, and to the offices which his father intended he should fill in future life. The virtues which procured him esteem and promotion on reaching manhood, appeared in his earlier days; for, by his valour, when young, he preserved the province of Mœsia, of which he was appointed governor. Of his rank and honours, the death of his father necessarily deprived him, as the suspicion which unjustly cost the former his life, was not likely to be detached from the latter. Whatever depression of spirit he might suffer on account of the emperor's conduct to his father, he had none on the loss of office, and retired to his patrimonial estate, which he cultivated with the contentment and satisfaction of one who had never enjoyed higher employment. But his eminent virtues and high qualifications were not forgotten in the imperial court, and in the hour of distress, when the Goths threatened the destruction of the empire, Grātianus associated him as his partner in the throne of the east. The caution and prudence of Theōdōsius gained him a complete victory over the Goths, and the measures which he adopted strengthened the imperial army, by the accession of a large body of Visigoths. Rashness would have continued to keep the latter enemies, but the excellence of his character, and the judiciousness of his schemes, converted them to friends. His father appears to have been a Christian, although probably not baptized. After the success of his arms had secured tranquillity to the empire, Theōdōsius had this ordinance administered by Acholius, bishop of Thēssālōnica. From that period he became the enemy of Arianism, and published severe edicts against that heresy. The fugitive family of Valēntinīanus, driven out of Italy by Māximus, received protection from him, and he married his sister Gālla. After the defeat and death of Māximus, who had revolted against his sovereign, in Britain, and afterwards invaded Italy, Theōdōsius visited Rome. Wherever he went, the bent of his mind led him to do good; and notwithstanding the massacre at Thēssālōnica, Saloniki, for which he did penance, in the most suppliant manner, by order of St. Ambrose, severity and cruelty were repugnant to his natural disposition. In war, he was uniformly successful, and love of conquest cannot be reckoned amongst his vices. To protect, not to enlarge the empire, was his object, and taxes were imposed merely for the support of the government, not for the accumulation of wealth, or the gratification of luxury. The prohibition of Pagan rites necessarily resulted from his embracing the Christian faith, and he procured a senatorial decree for the abolition of Paganism. He died at Milan, 17th January, in the year 395, in the sixteenth year of his reign, and fiftieth of his age, leaving two sons, Arcādīus and Hōnōrius. Theōdōsius the Great was the last who possessed the whole Roman empire.—3. Son of Arcādīus and Eudōxia, and grandson of Theōdōsius the Great. At the age of seven, Theōdōsius lost his father, and his sister Pulchēria, only two years older than himself, directed the measures of government, it may be said, during the whole of his life. From a careful and excellent education, the weakness of his mind prevented him from reaping any considerable benefit, and exertion did not attempt to supply the defects of nature. Through the schemes of his sister, he married Athēnās, daughter of Lēontius, an Athenian philosopher. On renouncing Paganism, she assumed the name of Eudōsia. Her abilities were great, her education excellent, and her knowledge uncommon; yet, either in policy, or in mental ability, she was surpassed by Pulchēria, with whom, after some time, she disputed the right of government. The empress then left Constantinople, and retired to Jerusalem, where she spent the remainder of her days in exile, and died in the sixty-seventh year of her age, protesting with her last breath, that the imputations thrown on her chastity were unjust. After a war of little interest, marked by no decisive or important event, with Persia, Theōdōsius formed a dishonourable treaty with the Huns, stipulating to pay an annual tribute of three hundred and fifty pounds' weight of gold. After this transaction, Attila defeated his armies, and necessity compelled him to accept of peace, on such conditions as the conqueror chose to offer. Tame submission was necessarily followed by the repetition of injuries, and, to get rid of his oppressor, he entered into a scheme for the assassination of Attila, which being discovered, saved the life of the king of the Huns, and the emperor had to make submission to his haughty superior, who condescended to pardon him on certain conditions. Theodōsius did not long survive this humiliating event. A fall from his horse terminated his life, in the year 450, in the fiftieth year of his age, and forty-third of his reign.—4. Obtained the purple on the resignation of Anastasius, in the year 716, an honour which he only enjoyed for about two years, as the success of Leo III., the first of the Isaurian dynasty, compelled him to retire, on which he adopted a clerical profession.

Theodōtus, i. m. an officer under Alexander the Great, whose bravery in the battle at Haliēcarnāssus was honourably rewarded, in 331 B. C. (Cant. v. 2).—2. A prefect of a thousand cities, who revolted from the Parthians about 255 B. C., and assumed the title of king. Bactriāna, Sogdiāna, and Chorasmia formed his kingdom. He did not live long, and was succeeded by his son, of the same name, with whom Arsāces made peace (Just. xli. 4).—3. A Syracusan, who entered into the plot against the life of the young king, Hieronimus. Torture could not extort from him the names of the other conspirators, who had all such confidence in his fortitude and fidelity, that not one of them fled, although he was long on the rack. In a feigned story, he gave up Thrāsō as the author of the conspiracy, to whom he added the most worthless of the tyrant's intimates, on which account, they were all, although guiltless of the crime, put to death, in 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 5).—4. Likewise a conspirator, who, on Hieronimus being killed, went with Sōsis to Syracūsae, to take the king's party by surprise, but one of his servants had arrived with the news before them, yet this previous intelligence did not prevent the completion of a revolution, and that too without bloodshed, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 21 seq.).—5. A commander of the Rhodian fleet, who was sent at the head of an embassy to Rome, in 169 B. C., with a golden crown of great value. The senate had previously declared, that the Rhodians were not to be considered friends, nor yet declared enemies, and their deputies wished nothing respecting their proposals for an alliance to be committed to writing, that in the event of a refusal the ignominy might be less conspicuous (Liv. xlv. 25).—6. A chief man in Passāro, a particular friend of Persēs, king of Mācedōnia, and an enemy of the Romans. He and Antinōus advised the inhabitants to shut their gates against the latter, in 199 B. C., mounted the walls, and exposed themselves to the weapons of the enemy, by which they were killed, and the town then surrendered (Liv. xlv. 26).—7. A young nobleman in Passāro, who advised the inhabitants to open their gates to the Romans, in 169 B. C. The populace approved of his opinion, and surrendered, on Antinōus and Theodōtus, above-mentioned, being killed (Liv. xlv. 26).

—8. A rhetorician, a native of Sāmis, preceptor of Ptolēmæus, king of Egypt, who had great influence with his pupil, and by whose advice, conjoined with that of Pothinus, the Egyptian monarch put Cn. Pompeius Magnus to death, in 50 B. C. To C. Julius Caesar, on his landing, he presented the head and ring of that noble Roman (Liv. Ep. 112). Cassius found Theodōtus in Asia, who had fled from Egypt, and put him to death by crucifixion (Ap. Bel. Civ. 484).

Theōgēnes, is, m. one of the three commanders of five thousand Macedonians, sent by Persēs to garrison the mountains Pythium and Pētra, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 32).—2. An astrologer, who appears to have lived at Apollōnia, or in the vicinity of that town. On Agrippa and Augustus applying to Theōgēnes, to know their fortunes, he foretold to the former, that his destiny was very great, and to the latter he paid adoration (Suet. Aug. 94).

Theōgnētus, i. m. a native of Ægina (Pia. Pyth. viii. 49).

Theōgnis, is, m. a poet of Mēgara, who flourished about 550 B. C. Of his writings only a few sentences have been preserved, from being quoted by the philosophers and poets of Greece. His verses are valuable for the moral sentiment which they contain, yet it is said, he did not exemplify in his life, the parity which he commended (Amm. Mar. xxix. 1).

Theōgōnūs, v. Telegōnūs, i. m. the name of a low and infamous man. Tibullus often had this man's name in his mouth, which his biographer mentions, as a proof of the vulgar expressions frequently used by that emperor (Suet. Claud. 40).

Theon, ōnis, m. a man greatly addicted to slander. Adj. Theōnūs, a, um. Theōnō dēntē, with the tooth of Theon, i. e. with the bitterest malice, the most malignant calumny (Hor. Epis. i. 18. 82).

Theōndas, v. m. a man of Sāmōthrācia, whom Persēs, king of Mācedōnia, killed to tell the people, that Evānder of Crēta, whom that monarch murdered, had laid violent hands on himself, 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 3).

Theōphānes, is, m. a native of Mitylēne, who wrote a history of Pompey's transactions, for which he was presented with the freedom of the state, and a large sum of money. Caesar says, that in the most important affairs, Scribōnūs Libō, L. Lucceius, and Theōphānes, were the chief advisers of that illustrious Roman (B. C. iii. 18). After his death, the Greeks paid Theōphānes divine honours (Tac. Ann. vi. 18).

Theōphānes, is, v. Theōphānus, i. m. the Eia, a river in the territory of the Sarmātæ (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Theōphīla, v. f. a woman instructed in Grecian literature, highly extolled by Martial. She was betrothed to Cāntus Rufus (Mart. vii. 68).

Theōphīlus, i. m. a man condemned by the court of Arcōpāgus for forgery (Tac. Ann. ii. 55).

Theōphrastus, i. m. son of Mēlāntas, was born in Lēsbo, and studied under Aristōteles, whom he succeeded in the Lyceum. That philosopher changed his name, which was originally Tyrtāmus, to Theōphrastus, on purpose to express the excellence of his speaking. Diōgēnes Lāërtius has written a life of this philosopher, which contains some of his sayings, and a list of his writings, amounting to upwards of two hundred treatises, of which about twenty only remain. He died, at the age of eighty-five, complaining of the shortness of human life, and to him the world is indebted for the works of his master, Aristotèles (Diog. Laert. in Vit.). Many important particulars respecting his opinions and writings, are found in the works of Cicero.

Thēōpōmpus, i. m. a king of Spārta, son of Lyncander, and grandson of Lyncurgus. He lived about 761 B. C. Valerius Maximus has borne testimony to his moderation, and just principles of government (iv. 1).—2. A Greek historian and orator, was born in the island of Chios, Scio, and flourished in the age of Philipppus, and his son, Alexander the Great. His attention had been long turned to oratory, before he thought of historical composition. This may perhaps account for the flowery and elevated style in which he wrote, as the declaimers of that period abounded in language highly figurative, far removed from the chaste simplicity of historical narrative. He had the advantage of studying under Isocrates, whom Quintilianus commends for the intelligence with which he wrote, and the success with which he taught. Ephorus was the fellow-scholar of Thēōpōmpus, and their preceptor characterized their different talents, by saying, that Ephorus needed the spur, and Thēōpōmpus the rein. His quickness of genius appears to have been accompanied with a corresponding quickness of temper, which may account for his proneness to censure, and the severity of his remarks. Cornélius Nepos calls him most abusive. Cicero characterizes his writings in a similar manner, and adds, that they were somewhat fabulous. He began his history where Thucydides ended. The work extended to twelve books, and included a period of seventeen years. None of his writings now remain. Quintilianus considers him as bearing a greater resemblance to an orator, than to an historian (ii. 8. 11: x. 1. 74). Adj. Thēōpōmpicus, et, Thēōpōmpinus, a. um. Thēōpōmpicus mos, the manner of Thēōpōmpus; a poetic, or measured style (Cic. Orat. 62). Thēōpōmpium genus, a sarcastic, or satirical style (Cic. Att. ii. 6).—3. A boy of great beauty, commiserated by Mætilis, because he had become a cook (x. 66).

Thēōtīmus, i. m. a man mentioned in the verses of Q. Lutatius Catulus q. e. (Gel. xix. 9).

Thēōxēna, æ. f. a daughter of Hērōdicus, a Thessalian nobleman, whom Philipppus, king of Mæcēdōnia, put to death, as he did also his sons-in-law, the husbands of Archo and Thēōxēna, who had each one son. During her widowhood, Thēōxēna refused every offer of marriage, until the death of her sister, who had become the wife of Pōris q. v. That the children of her sister might be brought up under her own eye, she accepted the hand of Pōris, and educated his children by her sister, with the same affectionate care as her own. Being informed that Philipppus had resolved to put to death the children, whose fathers he had killed, she declared that it was her determined resolution, that they should all fall by her own hand rather than come under the power of the king, to whose vices and those of his guards they would be rendered subservient. Shocked at this idea, Pōris proposed taking them to Athens, and at night went on board, but next day, from contrary winds, was only at a little distance from the shore. When on the point of being taken by one of the king's ships, which had been sent after them, she produced swords and dissolved poison, urged them to despatch themselves in the way they preferred, and having thrown their bodies, when expiring, into the sea, she embraced her husband and companion in death, and plunged into the waves, so that when Philip's men took possession of the ship, not one of the family of Pōris was in it, in 184 B. C. (Liv. xl. 4).

Thēōxēnia, orum, n. a festival day, chiefly celebrated in Sicily (Pin. Ol. iii).

Thēōxēnus, i. m. an Achean commander, who marched against the Rhodians, at the time they attempted to recover from Philipppus, king of Mæcēdōnia, Persea, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 18).

Thēra, æ. f. Santorin, an island, one of the Spōrādes, in the southern part of Mære Egæum, the Archipelago, which, according to Plinius, rose from the sea in the fourth year of the 135th Olympiad (i. 236). Justinus says, in 199 B. C. (xxx. 4), and was at first called Cālistē, from its beautiful appearance (Plin. i. 459). Thēras peopled it with a Grecian colony, and from him it received the name of Thēra (Herod. iv. 147, 148). Inh. Thēræi, orum (Sing. Thēræus, i.), m. of whom a colony founded Cŷrēnē, Caren. Colonia Thērēnē contracted for Thēræorum (Sal. Jug. 19).

Thērāmēnes, is, m. a citizen of Athens, and one of the thirty whom Lysander, the Lacedæmonian, appointed to govern that town, and who are known in history by the name of the thirty tyrants. He condemned the cruelty of his colleagues, which had procured them that appellation, and they punished his disapprobation of their measures, by sentencing him to drink the juice of the hemlock. On the cup being presented, he swallowed the poison with cheerfulness, after he had, smiling, said, "I drink this to the beautiful Critias," the bitterest of his enemies, and the one who had been most active in procuring his death. This expression contains something prophetic, as the Greeks, while the cup went round, named the person who next received it; so mentioning Critias, he insinuated, that it would be his turn next to die, and the event justified the inference, as Critias was killed in battle against the citizens whom he had unjustly banished, about 403 B. C. We are indebted to Cicero for all the information which we possess respecting the writings of Thērāmēnes, who excelled both as an orator and a politician. The former commends the wisdom with which he both acted and spoke. The works of Thērāmēnes were lost before the age of Cicero (Cor. Nep. Alcib. 5. Just. v. 9).

Thērāpnæ, arum, æ. Thērāpnæ, et, Thērāpnæ, es. f. Voriania, a town in the territory of Lacedæmon, Mistra, on Eurōtas, the Vasiliptamo, at which Hēlēna is said to have been born; on that account, she is called by Ovidius Thērāpnæ (Art. Am. iii. 49). It was sacred to Apōllo, hence Apōllōnēa Thērāpnæ (Stat. Th. iii. 422). Antinōna Thērāpnā (Sil. Ital. vi. 303). Adj. Thērāpnēus, a, um, of Thērāpnas, of Lacedæmon. Thērāpnas sanguis, Lacedæmonian blood, i. e. the blood of Hylæanthus (Ov. Fast. v. 223).—2. A town of Cræta, Candia (Plin. l. 432).

Thērāsta, æ, f. Apronisi, an island near Thera, Gozzo. Between them another island appeared, during an earthquake, in 199 B. C. (Just. xxx. 4).

Thērādamas, āntis, m. (Tamer of wild beasts), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 233).

Thērma, æ, f. afterwards Thēssalōnica, Saloniki, q. v. Adj. Thērmaeus, et, Thērmaeus, a, um. Thērmaeus, et, Thērmaeus Sinaus, the Gulf of Saloniki (Tac. Ann. v. 10).

Thērma, arum, f. a town of Sicilia, Sicily, afterwards called Himera q. v. To distinguish it from another of the same name, it was generally written Thērma Himērēnses.

Inh. Thērmaeus, ium, m.—2. Thērma Sēlūntiās, Seyuca, a town on the southern coast of Sicilia, Sicily, towards the western extremity of that island. Inh. Thērmitāni, arum, m. Adj. Thērmitānus, a, um. Thērmitānus hōis, i. e. Sthēnius (Cic. Ver. ii. 34 seq.).

Thērmitūia, æ, f. daughter of Silicheo, and second wife of the emperor Hōnōrius, whom he married after the death of his first wife Māria, who was her sister (Claud. x. 339).

Thērmodōn, ōntis, m. the Termeh, a river of Pōntus (sacred to Mars, Val. Flacc. v. 123), which empties itself into Pōntus Euxīnus, the Black Sea, to the W. of Cape Vona (Ov. Met. ii. 249). The Amāzōnes, or,

Amāzōnides, a famous nation of warlike women, lived near this river; hence it was called Amāzōntis. Adj. Thērmodōntēus, Thērmodōntiūs, et, Thērmodōntiācus, a, um, of Thērmodōn; Amazonian. Thērmodōntiātēum aurum, Amazonian gold (Ov. Met. ix. 189). Thērmodōntiācus bipēnnis, an Amazonian axe (Ov. Met. xii. 611). Thērmodōntiācus triūmphas, the triumph over the Amazons, obtained by Thēsēus (Stat. Th. xii. 164).—2. A river of Beōtia, which runs between Tānagra and Glisas (Herod. ix. 44).

Thērmodōntiācus, arum, f. Therma, a strait, or pass, between Thēssālā, Thessaly, and Griecia Propria. It had this name from the gates (pylæ), in a wall which was built across it, and from the hot springs (thērma), in the very entrance of the defile. The ancients accounted Thērmodōntiācus one of the keys of Griecia; from its not exceeding sixty paces in breadth, and where narrowest but a few feet, so that a single carriage only could pass. The brave defence of Lēonidas, king of Spārta, who, with a small body of men, thrice repulsed the numerous army of Xērxes, has rendered this pass famous in history. The noble

Spartan would have prevented the inroad of the Persian monarch, had not Ephialtes, a treacherous Trachinian, conducted that armament over the mountain. The perfidy of

Ephialtes proved fatal to Lēonidas and his men, but has immortalized the glory of the Spartans, and consigned his own name to perpetual infamy. Here too, the Roman consul M. Acilius Glābrio completely defeated Antiochus, king of Syria, in 193

B. C., although supported by the Attali, and some other Greeks (Liv. xxxvi. 15 seq.).

Thērō, æ, f. an Arcadian nymph, one of the attendants of Diāna (Claud. xii. 250).

Thērōn, ōnis, m. a companion of Hēracles killed by Hippomēdon, in the Theban war (Stat. Th. ix. 304).—2. The priest of Hēracles at Sāgūntum, Marciatro, who killed Juba, Thāpsus, Micipsa, Sāces, Idus, Cōthas, Rōthus, Jūgūrtha, and the nymph Aspū, and was afterwards himself killed by Himēbal. From Sāgūntum having been enlarged by a colony of the Rūtūli, and Danus, the father of Tūrnus, having been their king, Silius Itālicus calls him Danulus jēnitis (ll. 149 seq.).—3. A Spaniard, born on the banks of the Lēthē, one of the competitors for the prize in the foot-race, given by P. Cōnēlius Scipio Africanus, in Spain, when he had brought the war in that country to termination, in 208 B. C. (Sil. Ital. xvi. 476).

Thērōn, ōnis, m. (Hunter), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 211).

Thērōndrus, i, m. See Thērōndrus.

Thērōnōn, ōnis, m. son of Sol and Lēlōnōē, was, according to Hygīnus alone, one of the Argonauts.

Thērōs, is, m. a native of Beōtia, and friend of Aulus, the priest of Apōlo in Dēos, and king of that island, to whom he had given a cup curiously engraved by Aleus, which that monarch gave to Ænēas (Ov. Met. xii. 683).

Thērōllōchus, i, m. a son of Antēnor, who, with his brothers Glaucus and Mēdon, lost their lives in the Trojan war (Virg. Æn. vi. 483).—2. A man in the army of Ænēas, killed by Tūrnus (Virg. Æn. xii. 363).

Thērōppus, i, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, who sent him with a letter to Dārius after the battle at Ison (Curt. iv. 1).

Thērōs, æ, m. one of the Grecian commanders in the Trojan war. The disadvantages of personal deformity, he heightened, by an immoderate propensity to sarcasm and abuse. He delighted to provoke the other chiefs, by opposing their measures, and holding up their opinions and conduct to ridicule and contempt. His own ideas he never failed to express in language the most irritating and offensive. Achilles deprived him of life; because he had laughed at that hero's shedding tears over the body of Penthesilæa, whom he had killed. Ancient authors have given different reasons for this act of Achilles; but unworthy of being recorded.

Thērōngi, arum, m. a people adjoining to the Thaiphāli. These two nations, with the Victālī, inhabited the new province formed on the north bank of the Danube, on the conquest of Dacia (Eutrop. viii. 2).

Thērōscus, i, m. a man whom Percūs turned into stone, by showing him Medusa's head (Ov. Met. v. 182).

Thēsēus, ēos, m. a son of Ægēus q. v. and Æthra, the tenth king of Athens, was brought up at the court of Pitthēus, king of Troezen, his maternal grandfather. The actions of this celebrated hero, which are equally numerous and astonishing, have been minutely described both by the poets and historians of antiquity. In boldness of enterprise and difficulty of execution, they resemble the labours of Hēracles, and, like the exploits of that hero, are probably much indebted to fiction and embellishment. Of his death various accounts have been transmitted, consequently all uncertain (Paus. i. 17). He was the first who carried off Hēlēna, and Hērōdōtus says he took her to Aphidna (ix. 73). In the Infernal Regions, he was tormented by Tisiphōnē, because he had attempted to carry off Prōserpina from her husband. Hērēkles rescued him. (Val. Flacc. ii. 193 seq.). From his father, he is called Ēgēdes, æ, m. Thēsēides, æ, m. Hippōlytus, the son of Thēsēus (Ov. Ep. Her. iv. 65). Thēsēide, arum, m. the Athenians. Thēsēida pōsōrē prēmia, the Athenians offered rewards (Virg. G. ii. 383). Thēsēis, idis, f. a poem, in which the achievements of Thēsēus were attempted to be sung, which Jūvenālis mentions with a sneer (Sat. i. 2). Adj. Thēsēus, et, Thēsēus, a, um. Thēsēum cērtāmen, games in honour of Thēsēus (Gel. xv. 20). Thēsēa lingua, the tongue of Thēsēus (Tib. iii. 6. 39). Thēsēus hēros, Hippōlytus (Ov. Met. xv. 492).

Thēspla, æ, v. Thēsplē, arum, f. Neochorio (D'Anv.). Kakosi (Meletius), a town of Bœōtia, burned to the ground by Xērxes (Just. ii. 12). Dodwell supposes he saw its ruins, at the foot of the hill on which stands Erema Kastro, about three miles from the base of Hēlicon, Zagara, and up the mountain a little is a village called Neochorio, at which Wheeler discovered an inscription containing the word Thēspla. This writer considers, that both D'Anville and Meletius have mistaken the site of Thēspla, and that neither Neochorio nor Kakosi corresponds with its situation. He has evidently pitched on a spot too remote from Hēlicon, Zagara, to agree with the descriptions and allusions contained in ancient authors, with respect to the town in question. Hōmērus calls it Thēsplea (Il. ii. 498). Thēsplādes, um (Sing. Thēsplās, adis, f. the Muses. Inh. Thēsplēsēs, ium (Sing. Thēsplēsēs, is, m. (Liv. xxxvi. 21. Just. xi. 3). Adj. Thēsplācus, et, Thēsplūs, a, um. Thēsplācus ager (Stat. Th. vii. 341). Thēspla rūpes, Hēlicon (Catal. lxi. 27).

Thēsplādes, æ, m. a name of Argus, the builder of the ship Argō, from his having been born at Thēsplea, a town in Bœōtia (Val. Flacc. i. 124 seq.). Vālērīus Flāccus calls Tiphys by the same name (ii. 368 seq.).—2. Twin son of Thēsplūs, who fell in the Theban war by Hippōmēdon (Stat. Th. ix. 293).

Thēsprōtia, æ, v. Thēsprōtis, idis, f. a district of Epirus, Lower Albania, along the sea coast. From the rivers in this country, Hōmērus, in the opinion of Pausānias, assumed the names of these in the Infernal Regions (Paus. i. 17). Inh. Thēsprōti, et, Thēsprōtiē, orum, m. Rēgnum Thēsprōti, the coast of Pūtēōli, which the Thēsprōti anciently possessed (Prop. i. 11. 3). Adj. Thēsprōtiūs, a, um. Thēsprōtiūs sinūs, receives the river Achēron from Mōlōssis into the infernal lakes (Liv. viii. 24). Thēsprōtia arca (Sil. Ital. xv. 297).

Thēsālīa, æ, f. Thessaly, a district to the north of Greece, bounded on the west by Epirus; on the south by Phōcis and Ētōlia; on the east by Sinus Thērmaicus, the Gulf of Saloniki; and on the north by Mācēdōnia. The present population is estimated at 300,000; and in ancient times it had mines of all kinds of metal, but principally of gold. Thessaly and the eastern parts of Bœōtia, are, says a late traveller, the most fertile districts of Greece. The killing of a stork (cicōnia), in Thessaly, was a capital offence, because that bird makes such havoc among the snakes (Plin. ii. 412). The Egyptians venerated the Ibis for destroying the flying serpents, animals long considered fabulous, but which Belon saw in Egypt. Thēsālīs, idis, f. of Thessaly, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Pūchra Thēsālīdes, fair Thessalian women (Claud. xx. 201). Thēsālīs ara, a Thessalian altar (Ov. Ep. Her. xiii. 112). Inh. Thēsālīt, orum (Sing. Thēsālūs, i, m. the Thessalians. Adj. Thēsālīcus, et, Thēsālūs, a, um, of Thessaly; magical, because that country abounded with herbs used in charms. Thēsālīcus axis, the axis of the chariot of Achilles, king of Thessaly (Ov. Trist. iv. 3. 30). Thēsālā vox, her Thessalian voice, i. e. her magical charm or incantation (Hor. Epod. v. 45). Thēsālī ignes, Thessalian fires, i. e. the watches or guards of Achilles (Hor. Od. i. 10. 15). Thēsālūs victor, Achilles (Hor. Od. ii. 4. 10).

Thēsālōnica, æ, v. Thēsālōnicē, es, f. a daughter of Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia, married to Cāsānder, and by him became the mother of Antipāter, who caused her to be killed. Jūstinus inaccurately makes her the daughter of Arīdeus (xiv. 6). See next article.

Thēsālōnica, æ, f. Saloniki, one of the most considerable towns in European Turkey. In population and trade, some reckon it next to Constantinople; but, perhaps, it ought to be placed after Adrianople. Its ancient name was Thērma, and hot springs are still found along the coast. Cāsānder enlarged it greatly, and changed its name from Thērma to Thēsālōnica, in honour of his wife. (Claud. v. 280). Inh. Thēsālōnicēsēs, ium (Sing. Thēsālōnicēsēs, is, m. in modern times amount to about seventy thousand. C. Marcus Figūlus, who commanded the Roman fleet in the Archipelago, in 171 B. C., gave up the idea of besieging Saloniki, in consequence of the engines which the Thēsālōnicēsēs raised on the walls, from which they threw stones that wounded his men at a great distance. They surrendered next year, to the Roman consul L. Ēmilius Paulus, on the defeat of Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia (Liv. xlv. 10 seq.).

Thēsālōrus, i, m. a commander of the Gauls under Brēnnus, who, with Emānus, attempted to plunder the temple of Dēlphi (Just. xxiv. 7).

Thēsālūs, i, m. a son of Hērēkles, who had two sons commanders in the Trojan war (Pin. Ol. xiii. 48).—2. A native of Thēsprōtia, who quitted that district, accompanied by a number of his fellow-citizens, and took possession of that part of Græcia called from him Thēsālīa q. n. Others, however, are of a different opinion, and derive Thēsālīa from the son of Hērēkles (Vel. Pat. i. 3).

Thēsānder, v. Thēsāndrus, i, m. son of Pōlyuices and Argēa, daughter of Adrās-tus, according to Hēgēnus, who writes his name Thēsānder. He was one of the Epigōnī (i. e. descendants), who fought against Thēbæ, Thēva. Pausānias states, that he went to the Trojan war, and was killed in Mýsia by Telēphus; but the Scholiast on the Iliad says, that none of the Epigoni went in the expedition against Troy, except Sténēlus and Diómēdes. Hence the reading in Virgilius (Æn. ii. 261) has been disputed; since, either Thēsāndrus, mentioned there, was not the son of Pōlyñices (for, even adopting the account of Pausānias, he was killed soon after the beginning of that memorable war), or the name should be differently written. He hung at his mother's breast, when she entreated her father, Adrāstus, to comply with the wishes of her husband, and the Argives to declare war against Etēocles and the Thebans (Stat. Th. iii. 683).

Thēstius, i, m. king of Pleuron, who married Eurythēmis, daughter of Clēobœa, by whom he had four sons, Iphiclus, Euippus, Plexippus, and Eurypylus, and two daughters, Althea and Hýpermnēstra. Ovidius calls one of his sons Tōxēus (Met. viii. 441). Thēstias, ādis, f. a daughter of Thēstius; Althea (Ov. Met. viii. 452 seq.). Thēstlades, æ, m. a son of Thēstius; Thēstlāda, Plexippus and Tōxēus (Ov. Met. viii. 454 seq.).—2. r. Thēspius, i, m. a king of Thēspia, Neochoria; who, according to tradition, had fifty daughters, and these all, one excepted, suffered injury from Hērēcles in one night, and each had by him a son. The oldest and youngest had twin sons. Pausānias discredits the whole narrative as improbable, because Thēstius was his friend, and impious, because the Thēspīenses had built him a temple; and that the man who wished to be worshipped as a god, could not be guilty of such irreligious and immoral conduct. Statius alludes to this story; but, in place of Thēstius, calls him Thēspius, which is, perhaps, an error of the transcribers. Thēspīades, um (Sing. Thēspias, ādis), f. the daughters of Thēstius. Thēspīades, arum, the descendants of Hērēcles, and the daughters of Thēstius, of whom a colony settled in Sardinia under Iōlāus. Diōdōrus Siculus adds, that, after retaining for some time, possession of Sardinia, they were driven from it, and settled in Cūmæ (iv. 29 seq.).—3. The son of Agēnor, and grandson of Pleuron. He was the father of Lēda (Paus. iii. 13).

Thēstor, ōris, m. son of Idmon, and father of Cālchas; a celebrated soothsayer in the Grecian army during the Trojan war. Thēstor also excelled in that art. Thēstōrides, æ, m. a patronymic of Cālchas (Ov. Met. xii. 19. Stat. Ach. i. 497).—2. Son of Enōps, and father of Alemāon. Thēstōrides, æ, m. Alemāon (Hom. II. xii. 334).

Thēstylus, i, m. a boy beloved by Anulus (Mart. viii. 63).

Thētīdium, i, m. a temple of Thētīs, in Pharsālia tēra, at which the Roman commander, T. Quinctius Flāminius, was encamped, when Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia, was at Mēliambium, and neither knew the position of the other, in the year 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 6).

Thētīs, is, v. idos, acc. Thētim, v. in, f. one of the goddesses of the sea, the daughter of Nērēus and Dōris, whom Jūpiter loved, and with whom he was dissuaded, by Prōmēthēus, from having intercourse, because it was ordered by fate, that her son would be more powerful than his father. This advice procured for Prōmēthēus, his release from chains and punishment on mount Cāucāsus. She was, therefore, given in marriage to Pēlēus, king of Thessaly, by whom she became the mother of Achilles. From her possessing the gift of prophecy, Thētīs knew that Troy would prove fatal to her son, and, therefore, to conceal Achilles from the Grecian princes, she sent him to Lycāmēdes, king of the island Scyros, where he resided, disguised in a female dress. This plan failed of the end proposed. For, being discovered by the ingenuity of Ulysses, he was obliged to join the standard of his country, and march against their common enemy. The circumstance of Thētīs dipping her son at his birth in the river Stýx, which rendered his whole body invulnerable except the heel, which she held in her hand, since it does not occur in Hómērus, must be regarded as a fiction of later times. From her having been married to Pēlēus, before the Argonautic expedition, Valērius Flāccus represents her as friendly to the Argonauts, a natural consequence of her husband being one of the daring adventurers in quest of the golden fleece (i. 636). Thētīs is often used by the poets to signify the sea.

Thēudōria, æ, f. Theodouria, a city of Athāmānia, which Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia, had held two years; but his garrison was driven out by Amyñāder, the lawful king, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 1).

Thēuma, orum, n. a village of Thēssalia, Thessaly, which the Etōli took by assault, and plundered, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Thēmēsus, i, m. a mountain in Boētia, which appears to have been at no great distance from Cithæron. Statius represents Tisiphōnē shaking her hair from the top of this mountain (Th. viii. 344). Adj. Thēmēsius, a, um, of Thēmēsus, Thēban, Boētian. Thēmēsia Tēmpē, a very pleasant tract of land, near this mountain (Stat. Th. i. 485). Thēmēsius iuvēnis, Pōlyñices (Stat. Th. ii. 331).

Thēutates. See Tēutates.

Thēutōbōchus, i, m. king of the Tēutōnes, a man of extraordinary height, whom C. Marius defeated, and took prisoner. Flota mentions, that he used to vault over four or six horses together, and that his uncommon appearance added greatly to the interest of the triumphal procession (iii. 3).

Thēutrāntus, i, m. a town of Attica. Adj. Thēutrāntius, a, um. Thēutrāntia tēra (Ov. Ep. Her. ix. 51).

Thia, æ, f. the mother of the sun, moon, and Aurōra, by Hýpērion (Hes. Th. 571 seq.). Clara progētes Thia, the luminous offspring of Thia, i. e. the sun (Catul. lxi. 44).

Thieus, i, m. a conqueror at the Nemean games (Pin. Nem. x).

Thiāsi, orum, m. bacchanals, or priests of Bācchus (Claud. xxxiii. 284).

Thilsaphāta, orum, n. Tellanfar, a town of Mēsopotāmia (Amm. Mar. xxv. 8).

Thilutha, orum, n. a fort on an island in Euphrātes, the El-Frat (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 2).

Thimaram, i, n. a fortress of Thēssalia, which surrendered to Amyñāder, king of the Athāmānes, in 200 B. C., after Gēmph had fallen into his hands (Liv. xxxii. 14).

Thiōdāmas, āntis, m. a king of the Drýōpes, whom Hērēcles, when exceedingly hungry, met, with a waggon drawn by two oxen, one of which that hero killed and devoured. Hercules afterwards conquered the Dryopes. From Ovidius, Thiodamas appears to have resented the conduct of Hercules, by making war upon him, in which he was defeated, and put to death, by that hero, who carried off his son Hylas (Ib. 488). Adj. Thiodamantus, a, um. Thiodamantus Hylas (Prop. ii. 20. 6).—2. A descendant of Melampus, whom the Grecian chiefs, in the Theban war, appointed to the office of Amphiarus, whom the earth, having opened, admitted alive into the Infernal Regions. He instantly made preparation for propitiating the earth, and also to do honour to the shade of Amphiarus. His address to the earth forms one of the most beautiful hymns, contained either in ancient or modern poetry (Stat. Th. viii. 279 seq.).

Thimida, æ, f. Thimida, a town of Nubia, the situation of which cannot be precisely ascertained. Dr. Shaw places it near the shore. Here Hiempsal was murdered by persons whom Jugurtha employed for that purpose (Sul. Jug. 12).

Thibæ, es, f. a young woman of Babylon, beloved by Pyramus, who killed herself with the same weapon which he had employed against his own life. Their story is beautifully related by Ovidius (Ov. Met. iv. 55 seq.).

Thibæ, es, f. a town of Bœotia, abounding with pigeons (Hom. Il. ii. 502). It had this name from Thibæ, daughter of Asopus. Inh. Thibæi, orum (Sing. Thibæus, i), m. joined Etæcles in the Theban war (Stat. Th. vii. 261). Adj. Thibæus, a, um. Thibæa columba (Ov. Met. xi. 300).

Thibis, is, f. Thabe, a town of the Delta, in Egypt (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Thiotes, is, m. the armourbearer of Cepheus, king of Æthiopia, killed by Perseus (Ov. Met. v. 147).

Thos, antis, m. a son of Bacchus and Ariadne, who was king of the island Lemnos. Lemnos. His daughter Hyaspyle, to whom he had previously resigned his crown, preserved his life at the time the Lemnian women put all the males to death. He received presents from merchants, before he allowed them to trade in his port (Hom. Il. xxiii. 745). Thoantis, idis, et. Thoantis, idis, f. a patronymic of Hyaspyle (Stat. Th. v. 700. Ov. Ep. Her. vi. 163).—2. A man in the army of Etæcles, killed by Tydeus, in the Theban war (Stat. Th. viii. 696).—3. Son of Andremon and Gorge, a prince of Etolia, who brought forty ships to the Trojan war, and was put to death by Antiochus (Hom. Il. vii. 168 seq.).—4. A noble Trojan, killed by Menelaus (Hom. Il. xvi. 511).—5. A king of Chersonesus Taurica, the Crimea, so called from his swiftness of foot (his, celer) (Eurip. Iphig. Taur. 32 seq.). Adj. Thodanteus, a, um, of Thos, of Taurica, of Scythia. Thodante Diāna (Sil. Ital. iv. 769).

—6. A prætor of the Etolii, in 195 B. C. He was the brother of Diæarchus, and anxious for a war with the Romans. Through his interest, it was carried, in an assembly at Naupactus, that ambassadors should be sent to solicit the assistance of Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, Philippus, king of Mæcedonia, and Antiochus, king of Syria. From the court of the last, Thos returned, bringing with him Menippus, a Syrian ambassador; and he procured the appointment of that monarch as commander of their forces, in opposition to Phameas, who wished to employ him as a mediator between them and the Romans. In a second embassy to the Syrian king, on purpose to excite him to greater activity, both for the defence of Greece and Asia, he appears to have produced some effect; but he is to be blamed, for exciting suspicions in the mind of Antiochus against Hannibal, who was so far from favouring the Romans, that he may be reckoned the most inveterate enemy that nation ever had. Scipio Africanus demanded that Thos should be delivered up to the Romans, in 192 B. C., as he had been the fomentor of the war between the Etolians and Romans (Liv. xxxv. 12 seq.).

Thōs, es, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. Il. xviii. 40).

Thōs, es, f. one of the horses of Admētus, to which Stätus joins the epithet junālis, denoting that Thōs did not run in the shafts (junālis); but may either have been abreast with the horse which did so, or before him. In the latter case, Thōs would be what is called in Britain a leader, and in the former, a wheel horse (Th. vi. 462).

Thōgāra, æ, f. Ouchapou, a town of Scythia, or Sérica (Ptol.). Inh. Thōgārī, orum, m. on whom Artabanus II. made war, in 124 B. C. (Just. xlii. 2).

Tholūs, ūtis, f. anciently a town of Africa, which Syphax took by treachery (Ap. Bel. Pun. 10).

Thōmas, æ, m. one of the twelve Apostles, and probably the person alluded to by Claudianus (lxxvii. 3).

Thon, ōnis, f. a town of Africa, to which Hannibal fled, after his defeat by Scipio (Ap. Bel. Pun. 26).

Thōon, ōnis, m. a nobleman of Troy, a son of Phenops, and twin-brother of Xanthus. Diomedes killed both these brothers, which left their father childless (Hom. Il. v. 152 seq.).—2. A man in the Trojan army, whom Ulysses put to death at the time he slew Ennomus (Hom. Il. xi. 422).

—3. An officer in the Trojan army, killed by Antiochus (Hom. Il. xii. 140 seq.).—4. A Phæacian, a competitor in the games exhibited by Alcinoüs in presence of Ulysses (Hom. Od. viii. 113).—5. c. Thōnis, is, m. a king of part of Egypt, near Canopus, keenly addicted to the study of medicine (Hom. Od. iv. 228 seq.). From him the Egyptian city Thōnis, and the month Thoth had their names.

Thōsa, æ, f. the daughter of Phœreus, c. Phœreus, and mother of Pölyphemus by Neptünus (Hom. Od. i. 71).

Thōranus, i, m. a celebrated slave-dealer (Suet. Aug. 69).

C. Thōranus, C. Thōranli, m. a questor mentioned by Sallustius (Frag.).

Thōus, i, m. (Swift), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 220).

Thraciā, c. Thracæ, æ, et, Thracē, c. Thracē, es, f. Roumelia, or, Romania, a country of very different extent at different times. At one time the Thracian territories included Attica. But by Thraciā, in general, is meant a barren and mountainous tract to the north of Greece, which forms part of European Turkey. Thraciā Asiatica. See Bithynia. Thracē sortita (est) Martem colum (Manil. iv. 689). Inh. Thrāces, um (Sing. Thrāx, ācis), m. the Thracians, were, by the ancients, considered as a brave, but cruel, people, addicted to intemperance, and prone to revenge. On the altars of their gods, they offered their enemies whom they had taken in war. Thrāx, the son of Mars, from whom the country received its name, was their favourite god. Thrēssa, et, Thrēssa, ae, f. a Thracian woman. Adj. Thrācius, v. Thrēcius, Thrēssus, et, Thrācius, a, um. Thrācius, i. e. Tereus (Ov. Met. vi. 661). Thrēcia cithāra, a Thracian harp (Virg. Aen. vi. 120). Thrēssa puella (Ov. Ep. Her. xix. 100).

Thrāsēa. See Patus Thrāsēa.

Thrāsēus, i, m. a noble Peonian, killed by Achilles (Hom. Il. xxi. 210).

Thrāsīmēnus. See Trāsīmēnus.

Thrāsippus, i, m. a prefect in the Macedonian army, in the year 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 51).

Thrāso, ōnis, m. a companion of Hērōnōymus, king of Syracūse; whom Thēōdōtus, one of the conspirators against that king, falsely named as concerned in the plot, on which account he was put to death, in the year 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 5).

Thrāsībūlus, i, m. a celebrated Athenian, was the son of Lēcus, and distinguished among his countrymen by his military skill, and knowledge of government. Grieved at the oppression of the Athenians, by the thirty tyrants set over them by Lysander, the Lacedæmonian, he first proclaimed war against them, fled to Pylus, a very strong fort in Attica, and afterwards marched to Piræus, Porto Leonē, and fortified Mūnēchia.

Twice the tyrants attempted to take it, and twice he compelled them shamefully to flee back to the city, without either their arms, or their baggage. Crīstas, the chief of the tyrants, fell in the second battle, when fighting with great bravery against Thrāsībūlus. This victory increased the number of his forces, for before it, even good men, says his biographer, fought more gallantly for their liberty with their tongues, than with their swords. Pausanias, king of the Lacedæmonians, came to the assistance of the Athenians, but found it prudent to enter into a treaty with Thrāsībūlus, who, on regaining possession of Athens, in 403 B. C., passed an act of indemnity, declaring that no person should be called in question, or punished, on account of what was past. This law restored public tranquillity and mutual confidence. In return for these eminent services, the people presented him with a crown made of two sprigs of olive, and, as it was the spontaneous gift of his countrymen, neither extorted by force nor obtained by stratagem, it reflected on him the highest honour, unaccompanied with its usual attendant, envy. The Athenians at an after period having fitted out a fleet for Asia Minor, Natolia, they gave the command of it to Thrāsībūlus, who landed, according to Xēnōphon, at Aspēndus, a town of Pāmphyliā, and, according to Cōrnēlius Nēpos, in Cilicia. His soldiers, unknown to him, plundered the natives, who made an unexpected attack on his camp, in which he lost his life, about 390 B. C. (Cor. Nep. Thras.).

Vālērīus Māxīmus praises the valour and prudence of Thrāsībūlus, in expelling the tyrants, and restoring the constitution to its former stability and vigour, which had not only been shaken but destroyed (iv. 1).—2. Son of Xēnōcrātes (Pā. Pyth. vi. 15 seq.).—3. King of the Mōedi (Herod. i. 20).

Thrāsīdeus, i, m. a son of Thēron, called also Arīdeus (Pā. Pyth. xi. 21).

Thrāsīyllus, i, m. a very celebrated mathematician, who was the companion and instructor of the Roman emperor, Thērius, in astrology. According to some authors, he wrote books on medicine, which Plinius commends. The Scholiast says, that he professed a knowledge of many arts, afterwards attached himself to the Platonic, and gave the greater part of his time to the study of mathematics. He is frequently mentioned by Suetonius, Tacitus, and Da Cāssius. His son appears to have been adept in astrology (Tac. Ann. vi. 20—22).

Thrāsīmāchus, i, m. a native of Chlōdon, who settled at Athens, as a rhetorician. The Scholiast says, he hanged himself (Quint. iii. 1. 10). Sūidas states, that he laboured under great poverty, to which, and to his death, Juvēnalis alludes (Sat. vi. 204).

Thrāsīmēdes, is, m. a brave warrior, son of Nēstor, hence called Nēstōrīdes (Hom. Il. ix. 81 seq.).

Thrāsīmēlus, i, m. a charioteer of Sēpēdon, king of Lēcia, killed by Pērodes (Hom. Il. xvi. 463). From this author it appears to have been a man of considerable merit, and distinction.

Thrausi, orum, m. See Thrausi.

Thrināeria. See Trināeria.

Thrōnium, i, n. a town of Lōeria, on the river Bōagrus (Liv. xxxii. 93).

Thrōēssa, ae, f. a town of Pylus, of high situation (Hom. Il. xi. 710).

Thrōyon, i, n. a town of Mīssēnia, which Strābo says was called Epitalium. It was near Alphēus, the Rosēia, and had its name from the reeds which grew near it, and from which it was also called Thrōyōis and Thrōēssa. Hōmērus mentions this city, and calls it Thrōyon (Il. ii. 592), as does also Sūidas (Th. iv. 180).

Thūbūscum, i, n. Tuburb, a town of Maritīmā, on Bāgrāda, the Mējēda, besieged by Tācīrinus in the year 24 (Tac. Ann. v. 24).—2. Another town of this name in Maritīmā; now Tuberno.

Thūcīdīdes, is, m. the celebrated historian of the Peloponnesian war, was born at Athens, in the fifth century B. C. His father's name was Olōrus, and his mother's Hēgēsīpīlē. Amongst his ancestors he reckoned Mīlīades and Cimon; but in what degree of propinquity he stood to these illustrious characters, history does not inform us. From his parents he inherited a very considerable estate, which procured him the advantages of an excellent education. In philosophy, he had Anāxāgōras for his master, and in rhetoric, Antiphon. The latter disliked democratic government, which might contribute to strengthen that partiality for monarchy, which Thūcīdīdes inherited, from being a descendant of the Thracian king. His grandfather married a daughter of that family. His property lay chiefly in Thēria, to which he made no inconsiderable addition, by marrying a royal princess. His aversion to the turbulence of a popular government, and the situation of his estates induced him to live in the island Thiños, Thaso. During his residence there, the Athenian general sent him orders to levy troops, he being one of those who had authority to raise soldiers for the defence of government, in order to attack Brásidas the Lacedæmonian, who was besieging Amphipólis. On his arrival at this town, he found it had surrendered, but he next day defeated Brásidas, and preserved the town, Eion, to his countrymen. The Athenians banished him, for his coming too late to Amphipólis, and he took up his residence amongst the Lacedæmonians, from whom he received minute information respecting their affairs, on which he retired to Ægina, Egina, where he composed his history of the Peloponnesian war. He died in the twenty-first year of that war, which continued six years after his death. The last book of his work is imperfect. His predilection for historical composition, ancient authors inform us, he discovered by sweeping, when he heard Hérodótes read his history at the Olympic games. Thucydides used the Attic, Hérodótes the Ionic, dialect. "The latter," says Cicéro, "glides gently on like a still river, which meets no obstruction, the former flows with a more impetuous current." In this opinion, Quintiliánus agrees with the orator. According to him, Thucydides represents best the passions in motion, Hérodótes describes them best in a calm; Hérodótes excels in a long, Thucydides in a short, oration. The force of the latter, and the gentleness of the former, command the reader's assent. His style is distinguished by brevity and energy, his opinions are sound and judicious, and he relates the truth with the most scrupulous exactness, not allowing his mind to be biased in favour of either of the contending parties. Sallústius imitated his manner, and his style is more compressed. In many passages, he almost translates from the writings of Thucydides. The reader familiar with the history of the Peloponnesian war, will find many resemblances in the pages of Sallústius, too close to be considered accidental.

Thiú, es. f. an island which Plinius locates, on the authority of Pýthéas of Marseilla, Marseilles, was six days sailing to the north of Britain (i. 229). Now, if a day's sailing of the ancients be taken at thirty-five miles, that island would be situated two hundred and ten miles north of Scotland, nearly double the distance of Shetland, which D'Anville supposes to be the Thiú of the ancients. Besides, it does not agree with the length of the days at that island, as stated by Plinius, which would require a situation at least as far north as that of Iceland (i. 482).

The same may be stated with respect to the account which Pompónius Mela gives of this island. Both these authors mention, that, at the summer solstice, there is no night at Thiú. Tácitus says, that Thiú is in sight when one sails round Britain. Now, if this statement were correct, Thiú can never be Iceland, because its distance from the north of Scotland is about five hundred miles, consequently, not to be seen from the northern shores of Scotland. But that historian adds, that it has hitherto been covered with snow, and has perpetual winter; assertions very remote from the truth (Agrie, 10). Strábo whose information respecting Thulé was derived from Pythæus already mentioned, states, that the Arctic circle passed through it according to his authority, in which he does not agree with him, thinking the island was much farther south. His reasons for differing from Pythæus are, that much to the north of Britain man could not live, and that the accounts given by Pythæus were often falsified. He allows, that Thulé was in the vicinity of the Frozen Sea, which can only apply to Iceland, and he admits, that its distance had rendered every thing regarding it uncertain (93 seq.). Ptolemaeus places it in 63° N. Lat., and makes the longest day twenty hours. This is upwards of five degrees farther north than any of the Shetland isles, and one degree south of Iceland. Bochartus considers the name to be Phœnician, and says, that it signifies shade, or darkness. This etymology agrees with the description of Thulé in the writings of the Greeks and Romans, and must be considered not inappropriate, supposing the Iceland of the moderns to have been the Thulé of the ancients. Thulé imperia rōtibus (Claud. vii. 53).

Thūlis, Idis, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, killed by Q. Fabius Maximus, when Hannibal had enclosed the troops of M. Minucius Rufus. He was a head taller than any one in the Roman or Carthaginian army (Sil. Ital. vii. 602).

Thūri, orum, m. Thūrin, arum, f. a. Thūrium, i. n. El-Cupo, anciently Sybaris, a sea-port town of Lucania in Italy, Italy, on Sinus Tarentinus, the Gulf of Taranto, built by a colony of the Athenians, among whom were Herodotus and Lyones. In the temple of Apollo at Thūrii, were preserved the arrows destined for the destruction of Troy (Just. xx. 1). Ioh. Thūrin, orum, m. From Tāctus it appears, that they invented the amusement of horse-races (Ann. xiv. 21), which were exhibited at Rome, in 614 B. C. (Liv. i. 35). Adj. Thūrinus, a. um. Thūrinus ager, the country of the Thūrin (Liv. xxxiv. 53). Thūrinus sinus, the bay of Rossano (Ov. Met. xv. 52).

Thūris, Idis, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, whom Q. Fabius Maximus, the Roman dictator, killed; when Hannibal had drawn his troops round the army of M. Minucius Rufus, and would have either put to the sword, or made prisoners the whole, had not Fabius come to his assistance (Sil. Ital. vii. 598).

Thūrus, i. m. the most powerful of all the Spanish princes, whose two sons and a daughter fell into the hands of Tib. Sēmpronius Grāchus, the Roman propator, at the taking of Alci in 181 B. C. On obtaining a passport, he came into the camp of the propator, asked if his own life and those of his subjects would be spared. He was answered, they would, on which he inquired, if he would be allowed to fight on the side of the Romans. To this Sēmpronius likewise assented: "Then," said he, "I shall follow you against my old allies, because they disregarded me." He continued the faithful ally of the Romans, and showed both his courage and integrity on many occasions (Liv. xl. 40).

Thūamis, i. n. the Kalamas, a river of Thesprotia (Plin. i. 405).

Thūatira, sc. f. e. Thūatira, scens

Thūra, or. Abūthra, a river of the formerly Pelöpia and Euhippa, on the river Lycus. Here Antiochus, king of Syria, was conquered by L. Cornélius Scipio, the Roman consul, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 37 seq.). Inh. Thyätirēni, orum, m. (Plin. i. 611). Adj. Thyätirēnus, a, um.—2. An island off the coast of Ætölla (Plin. i. 447).

Thydrum, i, n. a town of Africa Pröpria, at which Gordianus was declared emperor by the army (Aur. Vic. Cas. 26).

Thyëa, æ, f. daughter of the river Cephisus, conjectured to have been the first who obtained a knowledge of the mysteries of Bacchus. Thyas, v. Thyias, adis, f. a worship of Bacchus, a Bacchanal (Hor. Od. ii. 19. 9. Virg. Æn. iv. 302). See Thia.

Thyene, es, f. one of the Hyades. Ovidius calls her Dödonis (Fast. vi. 711).

Thyestes, æ, m. son of Pelöps and Hippodamia, who is said to have had children by the wife of his brother Atreus, for which Atreus banished him from the kingdom. Wishing, however, to be more severely revenged, he pretended to be reconciled to his brother, invited him to return, and served up to him Tantalus and Plisthenes, his own sons. After Thyestes had eaten part of them, Atreus informed him, he was feeding on his own children, and, to convince him of the fact, ordered their faces and arms to be brought in. At that horrid act, the sun is said to have driven back his chariot. He instantly fled to king Thesprotus, and thence to Sicyon, where his daughter Pelöpia lived, who was afterwards married to her uncle Atreus, believing her to be a daughter of Thesprotus, who did not undeceive him. She was then pregnant to her father, without the relationship being known to either, and afterwards gave birth to Agisthus, whom she exposed; but Atreus ordered him to be sought for, and brought up as his son. Thyestes having come to Delphi, Castrü, was seized by Agamemnon and Menelaus, who brought him to their father Atreus, who sent Agisthus, believing him to be his own son, to put him to death. Pelöpia, having taken from Thyestes, at the time of their intercourse, a sword, which she afterwards gave to Agisthus, and which he wore at the time he went to deprive his father Thyestes of life, the latter recognised it, and learning how it had come into the possession of Agisthus, he sent for Pelöpia, who informed him when she received it, and that Agisthus was the son of its owner. She then plunged it into her own breast, and Agisthus presented it bloody to Atreus, who, believing it to be his brother's blood, rejoiced at his death, but Agisthus soon after put him to death, when he and his father Thyestes ascended the throne of their grandfather. Olla Thyeste, the pot of Thyestes, referring to his children being served up to him at table (Pers. Sat. v. 8). Thyestades, æ, m. a patronymic of Agisthus (Claud. xxviii. 113). Adj. Thyestæus, a, um. Thyestæa mēsa, the entertainment of Thyestes, i. e. the eating of his own children (Claud. i. 171). Pythagoras calls animal food, Thyestæa mēsa (Ov. Met. xv. 462), from the souls of our nearest relations, in his opinion, having inhabited it. See Pythagoras.—2. The name of a character in a tragedy, perhaps a representation of Thyestes (Juv. Sat. viii. 228).

Thyia, æ, f. a country in Greece, where was a temple in honour of Thyëa q. v. daughter of Cephisus, from whom the place had its name (Herod. vii. 176).

Thymber, v. Thymbrus, i, m. a Ramulus, son of Daucus, and twin-brother of Lirius, who were so like, that their parents could not distinguish them. Pallas cut off the head of Thymber. Dauca præles, Lirides and Thymber (Virg. Æn. x. 391).

Thymbra, æ, v. Thymbræ, es, f. a town of the Troad, built by Dardanus, hence Trojāna Thymbra (Stat. Th. viii. 202). The work was executed by his friend, Thymbræus, from whom the name was probably derived. Strabo makes it a plain traversed by the river Thymbræus, one of the branches of Scamander, the Meinder. Adj. Thymbræus, a, um. Thymbræus Apollo, so called from that god having a temple on the bank of the river, near its junction with the Scamander (Virg. G. iv. 323).

Thymbræus, i, m. a Trojan who killed Ostris (Virg. Æn. xii. 458).

Thymbræus, i, m. a man, who in the second Punic war killed his father, lest he should have fallen by the hand of a Carthaginian (Sil. Ital. ii. 633).

Thymbres, ëtis, m. the Parsæe, one of the branches of Sagaritis, the Sakaria (Liv. xxxviii. 18). Ptolemy calls it Tembresus (i. 648), and Ammianus Marcellinus, Thuris (xxii. 8).

Thymbris, is, m. a man in advanced life, in the army of Eneas (Virg. Æn. x. 124).

Thymelæ, es, f. wife of Lætinus, a celebrated mimic, in great favour with the Roman emperor, Domitianus, who, dreading an accusation against him by M. Régulus, sent her to that celebrated informer, to procure his favour by personal violation. Some derive that Thymelæ was married to Lætinus, and the term employed by Juvénalis (subintrat) may be understood either in a good or a bad sense. The satirist, most probably, intended it to convey the latter meaning (i. 36).

Thymodes, v. Thymoidas, æ, m. son of Mëntor, and nephew of Mëmnon, the Rhodian, whom Darius, in 333 B. C., ordered to receive the foreign troops, i. e. the Grecians, &c., whom he commanded at the battle of Issus (Curt. iii. 3 seq.).

Thymotes, is, m. a Trojan, son of Hicetion, hence called Hicetionius Thymotes, who was killed by Turnus. He was the first who advised that the wooden horse should be brought within the Trojan walls, for which Servius gives this reason, that he was an enemy of Priamus, who had caused one of his children to be put to death, at the suggestion of the soothsayers. As the horse itself, and every circumstance connected with it, are mere fictions, it is unnecessary to point out the absurdity of Servius (Virg. Æ. iii. 32 seq.).

Thynia, æ, f. a district of Asia Minor, Natolia, bounded on the north by Pöntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, on the west by Thracius Bosphorus, the Strait of Constantinople, and Pröpöntis, the Sea of Marmora, and on all other sides by Bithynia q. v., in which it is frequently included (Catal. xxxi. 5). Inh. Thyni, orum (Sing. Thynus, i), m. Catagrophü Thyni, the painted Thyni, i. e. the Thyni, wearing embroidered clothes, or upper robes (Catal. xxv. 7). Thyni Thracæ erat quæ nunc Bithynia fertur (Claud. xx. 247). Some editions of Classica, Cur erant, read arant. Adj. Thynus, Thynnus, et, Thynacus, a, um. Thyna mero (Hor. Od. iii. 7. 8). Thynnaealitra (Val. Flacc. iv. 424). Thyniaci sinus, the bays of Thynia (Ov. Trist. i. 9. 35).—2. v. Thynias, adis, f. Aineada, an island and promontory on the southwest coast of Pontus Euxinus, the Black Sea, called also Thynis and Thynis. Plinius mentions, that the barbarians called it Bithynia, from its being inhabited by the Bithyni, and, for the same reason, Pömpönius Mela says the town on it had the name of Bithynis, Farnasia. It occurs frequently in Apollonius Rhodius (ii. 4 &c.). Thynias, adis, f. of Thynia, applied to females, or nouns feminine (Prop. i. 20. 34).

Thyonē, es, f. a name of Sēmēlē, mother of Bæchus (Pin. Pyth. iii. 177).

Thyonēus, eos, m. a name of Bæchus, which some derive from Thyonē, an appellation of Sēmēlē, and others, from bo, I boil; I rage; I rush with impetuosity (Hor. Od. l. 17. 23). Adj. Thyonianus, a, um. Thyonianus mero (Catul. xxvii. 7).

Thyotēs, a, m. the priest of Sāmōthrāce, Samothraki, who received the Argonauts, as they sailed for Colchis, and initiated them into the mysteries, by which some have understood, he instructed them in navigation, at least as far as respected their perilous voyage (Val. Flacc. ii. 438).

Thyrēa, a, f. v. Thyrē, n. Paleokastro, a town of Messēnia, on the boundary between Argos, and Lacedæmon, called by Hómērus Anthēa. Thyrēatis, idis, f. of Thyrēa, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Thyrēatis terra, the lands belonging to Thyrēa, which having been claimed both by the Argives and Lacedæmonians, the dispute was referred to an equal number of combatants on both sides, by the Amphictyons, who afterwards adjudged it to the Lacedæmonians, from an artful device of Othryades q. v. Inh. Thyrēate, arum, v. Thyrēates, ium, m.

Thyrium, i, n. Trypho, a town of Acarnānia, of which Antiochus, king of Sýria, endeavoured to obtain possession, in 193 B. C., but failed, although he had in his interest Clytus the prætor, and Mnēsillochus, a nobleman of considerable influence. Inh. Thyrienses, ium, m. adhered to their alliance with the Romans, and shut their gates against the king of Sýria (Liv. xxxvi. 11 seq.).

Thyrnis, idis, m. a man in the Carthaginian army in Spain, killed by the troops under Scipio Africanus (Sil. Ital. xv. 721).

Thyrsagētæ, a, m. a colony of Scythians, according to Vālerius Flaccus, planted by Bæchus (vi. 135). They fought against the Colchians and Argonauts. Hērōdōtus states, that they were a singular but numerous nation, who lived by hunting; that they lived beyond the Būdini, and that the rivers Lycus, Oārus, Sýrgis, and Tānāis, the Don, had their sources in the country inhabited by this people (iv. 123). Supposing this statement to be accurate, they would possess part of the country about Moscow. Pömpönius Mela informs us, that they and their neighbours, the Tūrce, occupied extensive woods, and maintained themselves by hunting (i. 19).

Thyrsis, idis, m. the name of a herdsman (Virg. B. vii. 16).—2. A man of Stübēra, who, with Alexander of Berea, suffocated Dēmētrius, the younger son of Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnia, after Didas had given him poison by order of his father at Hērāclēa, in Mæcēdōnia, in 183 B. C. (Liv. xl. 24).

Thyrus, i, m. a man in the army of Hānñibal, whom Möpsus killed in Spain (Sil. Ital. ii. 110).

Thysdrus, i, m. a Carthaginian killed in Spain, by Māro, who served under Scipio Africanus (Sil. Ital. xv. 448).

Thyssus, i, f. a town on mount Athos (Herod. vii. 22).

Thyus, i, m. a governor of Pāphlōgōniā, under the king of Persia, who traced his descent from Pylæmēnes, who fell by the hand of Mēnelāus, in the Trojan war. Cōrnēlius Nepos, in opposition to Hómērus, says, Pātrōclus killed Pylæmēnes. Datāmes was the cousin of Thyus; his mother was sister of the father of Datāmes. Thyus having become rebellious, the Persian king resolved to harass him by war, of which he gave the command to Datāmes. The latter, averse to extremities, and unsuspicious of danger, went singly to his relation, on purpose to persuade him to return to his allegiance. Thyus, in place of listening to his counsel, formed a design to take away his life, which Datāmes having learned from his mother, he saved himself by flight, proclaimed war against Thyus, and took him alive with his wife and children (Cor. Nep. Dat. 2).

Tiarāntus, i, m. a very large river of Scythia, which empties itself into the Danube (Herod. iv. 48).

Tibārcēniā, a, f. a district of Pontus, on the coast of the Black Sea, to the E. of Sidēnus, the Bulama. Inh. Tibārcēni, orum (Sing. Tibārcēnus, i), m. had for neighbours on the S. the Chālcybes. According to Pömpönius Mela, they considered the supreme good to consist in laughter and sport (i. 19). The Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius informs us, that they had so strong a love of justice, that they would not attack their enemies, even in war, without giving them previous notice, both of the place and hour of combat. Vālerius Flaccus mentions a particular custom, which prevailed amongst their matrons, at the time of their confinement (v. 148).

Tiber, eris, v. Tēbēris, Tibēris, Tībris, Tībēris, is, et, Tībris, v. Tūris, is, v. Idos, v. Tibērinus, i, m. the Tevere, a large river of Italy, which takes its rise in Apēnninus, the Apennines, and, running nearly in a south-west direction, flows by Rome, and falls into the Mediterranean, about fifteen miles below that city. It was anciently called Albōla, from Ænēas finding on its banks a white sow with thirty young, and afterwards Tibērinus, of which Tiber is a corruption, from a king of the country of that name being drowned in attempting to cross it. It is said to receive forty-two tributary streams in its course. At Rome it is thirty-three feet above the level of the sea, from ten to twenty feet deep in the middle of the channel, when it is lowest; water turbid, of a dull yellowish colour, from being loaded with sand, and therefore not generally used for domestic uses. Its course from its fountain to Rome, is about an hundred and sixty British miles. Cuique fait verum promissa potentia Tībrin, and the Tevere, to which the government of the world was pro- ruised, i. e. the Tevere, on the banks of which Rome was to be built, and to become the seat of universal empire (Ov. Met. ii. 259). Domina Tiber, from Rome, the mistress of the world (domina orbis terrarum), standing on its banks (Mart. x. 7). Lydus Thybris, Lydian, i. e. Tuscan Tevere, from a colony of Lydians settling on its banks (Virg. Aen. ii. 782). Flavus Thybris, yellowish Tevere (Virg. Cat. v. 23). Most of the rivers of Italy are of a dirty white colour, from their running over clay soils. This colour the Latin poets called Flavus. Tibricola, v. Tibricola, n. m. one who lives near the Tevere. Tiberinis, idos, f. a nymph of the river Tevere (Ov. Fast. ii. 597). Adj. Tiberinus, Tybrinus, Tybrinus, v. Tybrinus, a. um. Tiberina ostia (Ov. Fast. iv. 329). From this poet, it appears that the ancients gave that name to the place at which the Tevere divides into two streams. Tiberinum vādum (Suet. Tib. 2).

Tiberias, ādis, f. a large town on the west of the lake of Genesareth, of which the original name was Cenere, but changed by Herod, in honour of the emperor Tiberius, with whom he was in great favour. The sea was also called by the same name (Plin. i. 569). Pausanias travelled in Canaan, and visited both this lake and the Dead Sea. Of the latter he narrates several fictitious unworthy of being repeated (v. 7).

Tiberinus, i. m. a king of Alba Longa, who was drowned in attempting to cross the river Albula, which from that event was afterwards known by his name (Liv. i. 3).—2. The pilot of the ship which Persēs commanded, and which, in an engagement with the Carthaginians near the coast of Sicily, Sicily, grappled with Is, commanded by Crantor, a Sidonian (Sil. Ital. xiv. 517).

Tiberias, i. m. a prænomen among the Romans, which, according to Valerius Maximus, was first given to those who were born on the banks of Tiber, the Tevere. Adj. Tiberianus, et. Tiberianus, a. um. Tiberiana aula, the court of the emperor Tiberius (Stat. Syl. iii. 3. 60). Tiberiana domus (Tac. Hist. i. 27).

Tiberius, i. m. a son of L. Junius Brutus, who, with his brother Titus, and his wife, a sister of the Vitellii, entered into a conspiracy for the overthrow of the Roman republic, and the restoration of the Tarquini. The plot having been discovered, their father, one of the consuls, pronounced sentence of death upon Tiberius and Titus, and witnessed their execution (Liv. ii. 5).—2. One of the Roman emperors. See Claudius.

Tiberius Alexander, Tiberii Alexandri, m. a Roman knight of considerable distinction, who obtained the government of Egypt, his native country, in the year 69. In him Vespasianus had an active friend, who both espoused his cause, and obliged his soldiers to take the oath of allegiance to that prince (Tac. Ann. xv. 28 seq.).

Tiberius Gemellus, Tiberii Gemelli, m. son of Drusus Cæsar and Livilla, born at the same birth with his brother Caius, in the year 18. Their grandfather, the Roman emperor, Tiberius, named them his successors. From Tiberius, Tiberius appears to have hesitated about appointing a successor, and left to chance what he wanted resolution to decide. Caligula began his enormities by putting Tiberius to death (Suet. Calig. 2. Tac. Ann. vi. 48).

Tibicines, um, m. trumpeters, whose duty it was to play at sacrifices, that the worshippers, or those who offered the sacrifices, might not hear words of inauspicious omen, by which the solemn duties might be interrupted, or broken off. On this account, the trumpets were blown in the ears of the sacrificers, so that it was almost impossible that any other sound could be perceived. The censors, Ap. Claudius and C. Plautius in the year 311 B. C., prohibited the trumpeters from eating in the temple of Jupiter, a disgrace which they resented, by quitting the town in a body, and retiring to Tibur, from which they did not return, until they had been plied with wine, of which, says Livius, such people are always fond. They were thrown insensible into waggons, and brought back to the city, where they agreed to remain, on condition, that they were allowed three days annually, to ramble with great freedom about the city, in full dress (i. e. masked, and in long party-coloured robes), with music, and the right of being fed in the temple, to those who played at the sacrifices, restored. In the arrangements of Servius Tullius, the trumpeters, hornblowers, and extraordinary, were divided into three centuries (Liv. i. 43 seq. Ov. Fast. vi. 633—692).

Tibiscini, orum, m. supposed to be the same people whom Plinius calls Tibiscini, and places in Galatia (i. 627). Of Valerius Flaccus, the MSS. vary greatly; on which account some suppose the adjective Tibiscinus, a. um (Tibiscina ostia), to be derived from Tibiscus, v. Tibiscus, the Theiss. The singular formation of the adjective in this case, seems to oppose this conjecture, and probably the reading should be Tibiscina (vi. 50).

Tibisis, is, m. the Cera Lom, a river, which has its source in Hæmus, and falls into the Danube. Atlas, the Tubernacula, Auras, the Taban, and Athrys, the Jacta, flow from the same range, and their waters augment the same river (Herod. iv. 49). Some consider the former article, a derivative from Tibisis.

Tibullus. See Albius.

Tibur, ūris, n. Tivoli, a town of Italy, about seventeen miles from Rome, pleasantly situated on Anio, the Teverone, which forms a romantic cascade in the vicinity. This city was built by Tiburtus, Cōrus and Catillus, sons of Amphiaraus, and received its name from the eldest of the three brothers. Their father was a native of Argos, hence Horatius says, it was built Argo colōnō (Od. ii. 6. 5), and Ovidius calls it Argyrum Tibur (Amor. iii. 6. 46). Dionysius of Halicarnassus says, the Siculi were the founders of this town. Herculeum Tibur, from Hercules being worshipped there (Mart. i. 13). Ench. Tiburtes, um (Sing. Tiburs, ūrtis), m. Fines Tiburtum (Tac. Ann. xiv. 22). Adj. Tiburs, ūrs, ūrs; ūrtis, et. Tiburtus, Tiburtinus, v. Tiburnus, a. um. Tiburs Rōmulus (Virg. Aen. ix. 360). Tiburtia mœnia, the walls of Tibur (Virg. Aen. vii. 670). Tiburtina terra, the territory of Tivoli (Prop. iv. 7. 85). Tiburnus Anio, the Teverone, flowing by Tivoli (Prop. iii. 22. 23).

Tiburna, e, f. wife of Murrus, a native of Sīgūntum, Marcedro. She raised a fire to consume the body of her husband, after he had fallen by the hand of Hannibal, on which she threw herself, and expired. Tisiphōnē assumed the appearance of Tibūrna, when she excited the unhappy inhabitants of that town, to destroy themselves (Sil. Ital. ii. 566 seq.).

L. Tibūrtius, L. Tibūrti, m. a centurion, who was wounded at the time Labiēnus was conversing across Apsus, the Aspro, to Caesar's men, who were speaking in favour of peace (Ces. B. C. iii. 19).

Tibūrtus, c. Tibūrtus, i, et, Tibūrs, ūrtis, m. son of Amphīlārus of Argos, who, with his two brothers Cōras and Cāillus, built Tibur, Tivoli, on Anio, the Treverone, to which he gave his name, from being the eldest of the three (Virg. Æn. vii. 671).

Tichūs, ūrtis, m. one of the two highest summits of mount Cēta; Cālidrōmos was the other. At the request of Antiochus, king of Syria, the Ætoli took possession of Tichūs, with eight hundred men, whom Vālērīus Flācius, a Roman lieutenant-general of consular rank, failed in his attempt to dislodge (Liv. xxxvi. 16-19).

L. Tichū, L. Tichid, m. a Roman knight, taken on board one of Caesar's galleys, in the second fleet sent from Sicilia, Sicily, with corn to him in Africa. Scipio, who commanded the republican forces, spared his life, and to him Ovidius has been supposed to refer (Trist. ii. 433). He wrote verses not recommended either by purity of idea, or delicacy of language. To him Suetonius is conjectured to allude (Il. Gram. 4), where by mistake the common reading is Sigida, which the best critics acknowledge to be wrong.

Ticinum, l, n. Pavia, a town of Italy, on the north bank of Pādus, the Po, where Ticinū, the Tessino, falls into that river. Pavia is the capital of the district in which it is situated, is of great antiquity, and contains a number of magnificent castles (Tac. Ann. iii. 5). Adj. Ticinēnses, lum, m. Adj. Ticinēnsis, is, e. Ticinēnsis (ager) (Plin. iii. 331).

Ticinū, i, m. the Tessino, a river of Italia, Italy, which has its source near the summit of St. Gothard, runs through Verbānus lācus, Lago Maggiore, and falls into Pādus, the Po, at Ticinum, Pavia. Near this stream, the Gauls, under Bellōvēsus, defeated the Tūsci, and over it P. Cōrnēlius Scipio, the Roman consul, threw a bridge, on which he erected a fort for its security, after he had crossed the Po to attack Hānnibal, in his descent from the Alps, in 220 B. C. Here that consul not only suffered a complete defeat, but would have lost his life, or fallen into the hands of the enemy, had not his own son, then a youth, afterwards surnamed Africānus, rescued him from his perilous situation (Liv. v. 34-xxi. 45). Pūlcher Tīcīnus (Claud. xxviii. 195). Adj. Tīcīnus, a, um. Tīcīna flūmina (Sil. Ital. ix. 432).

Tifātā, orum, n. hills overhanging Cāpūa, which Plinius considers as part of Lātium. Livius mentions a plain between Cāpūa and these hills, so that the town must have been at some distance from them, and not situated at their very base, the idea conveyed by the word overhanging. Stātius is the only Latin poet, in whose writings this word occurs (Syl. iv. 4. 85).

Tifernus, i, m. a mountain in Sāmnium, to which L. Vōlūnnius, the Roman proconsul, compelled the Sāmnites to retreat, and, unalarmed by the difficulty of the ground, he there routed and dispersed them (Liv. x. 30).

—2. The Biferno, on which stood a town called Tifernum (Liv. ix. 44 seq.).

Tigellinus, i, m. an emissary of Nēro, for whose punishment the Roman people were very clamorous. Gālba protected him, and by a proclamation reprimanded the people for their cruelty (Suet. Galb. 15). Pōnd Tigellinū, make Tigellinus the butt of your satire (Juv. Sat. i. 155). Impūdicus Tigellīnus (Mart. iii. 20).

M. Tigellius, M. Tigelli, m. a native of Sārdīniā, who appears to have been a favourite with C. Jūlius Caesar and his successor Augūstus, from the excellence of his voice, not for the elegance of his manners, the intelligence of his conversation, or respectability of his character. He excelled in music, particularly in playing on the flute, and was a man of excessive prodigality. Hōrātius censures him with considerable severity, and Cicēro has shown by his opinion of Tigellius, that the strictures of the poet did not exceed the truth (Epis. Fam. vii. 24. Hor. Sat. i. 2 seq.).

Tigrānes, is, m. a king of Armēniā, who, by his conquests of some neighbouring countries, obtained a considerable name, not only as a monarch, but also as a warrior. He proclaimed hostilities against the Romans, at the instigation of Mithridātes, king of Pōntus, whose daughter Clēōpātra he had married. By her he had three sons, two of whom he killed, and the third, named Tigrānes, having made an attack on his father, was taken prisoner by the Romans, led in triumph, and afterwards put to death in prison (Ap. Bel. Mith. 243). A stranger both to the power and resources of the Roman state, he set at nought the armies which marched against him, but soon learned that Asiatic haughtiness and pomp afforded no protection against his formidable enemy. Instead of bringing the consul L. Licinius Lūcūllus alive into his hands, as he had given orders to his officers, his armies fled before that able general, and he sought safety by deserting his own capital, in 71 B. C. From Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus, who succeeded L. Licinius Lūcūllus in the command of the army, he obtained his peace by a sum which appears almost incredible, and acknowledged his submission to the Romans, by receiving a garrison into the chief city. This degradation, so humiliating to the king, the unnatural conduct of his son aggravated, by rebelling against his father, and persuading Cn. Pōmpēius to enter Armēniā. That noble Roman continued him on the throne, in opposition to the wish of his son, and thus fulfilled the treaty which Tigrānes had purchased at so high a rate (Claud. xxi. 370). Justinus mentions that the Syrians invited him to be their king, and that he enjoyed the sovereignty for eighteen years, when he was subdued by L. Licinius Lūcūllus (xxxviii. 3-xl. 2). —2. The son of the former, whose heart appears to have been a stranger to filial affection and patriotic principle. He raised the standard of rebellion against his father, and induced Pōmpeius, who commanded the Roman forces, to invade his native country. The lenity and fidelity of Pōmpeius to his father, whose throne he wished to usurp, most probably by the crime of parricide, thwarted his plans of ambition, on that account he exerted himself to rouse the Parthians against the Romans. For this misconduct, Pōmpeius sent him to Rome, led him in triumph through the city, and afterwards put him in prison, from which he effected his escape. Of his future history nothing is known.—3. A king of Armēnia, who suffered death from the hands of the public executioner at Rome. Commentators have not been able to ascertain with precision, either the genealogy or history of this prince. Josēphus mentions his fate, and Tacitus has introduced him into his history, probably as an instance of the impartiality of the Roman laws (Ann. vi. 40). May another reason not be assigned for his public execution; that it confiscated his property?—4. Brother of Vōlōgēsus, and grandson of Archēlaüs, king of Cappadōcia, by birth a Cappadocian, was by Nēro appointed king of Armēnia. The length of time which he had resided at Rome as a hostage, sunk his spirits, and gave him a servility of manner, unbecoming a prince. The arrangements made by the Roman commander of that country, kept in check the Parthians, and those who felt dissatisfied with a king of Roman appointment. He desolated the country of the Adiabēnians, who saw with indignation their lands laid waste, not by a Roman commander, but by the rashness of a hostage, who had, for so many years, lived among slaves (Tac. Ann. xiv. 26 seq.).—5. Tigrānes III., whom Vēlleius Patērcūlus calls Artāvāsdes, was the son of Artāvāsdes I., succeeded his brother Artāxius II., in the throne of Armēnia, by appointment of the emperor Augūstus. Tiberius Nēro conducted him to the capital of his dominions, but his reign was short, his children who succeeded him, died, and his family became extinct (Tac. Ann. ii. 3).

Tigranocerta, oram, n. Serec, a town of Armēnia, founded by Tigrānes from whom it received that name (Eutrop. vi. 9).

Tigris, idos, m. (Tiger), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 217).

Tigris, Idis, m. (called by the ancient Persians Teer, i. e. an arrow, from its flowing with great rapidity), the Dejilah, or Shat Bagdad, i. e. the river of Bagdad, a large and rapid river of Asia, has its rise in the mountains of Armēnia, about an hundred and fifty miles south of the sources of Euphrātes, the El-Frat, not from the same springs, as Lūcānus erroneously states (Phar. iii. 256), runs in a southeast direction, till after a course of about eight hundred miles, it joins the El-Frat, about fifteen miles above Bassora, at Kornah. After its junction with the Euphrātes, it was called Pasitigris, now Shatul Arab. These two rivers in ancient times, ran into the sea by different channels. It is navigable for boats of twenty or thirty tons burden to the mouth of Odarnah. Above that to Mosul, it is navigated by rafts, supported by blown sheep skins, of which the wood is sold at Bagdad without loss, and the skins are carried back on camels. The average breadth between Bagdad and Kornah, is about two hundred yards. The banks are steep, generally overgrown with brushwood, and haunted by lions and other wild beasts. It has two unequal swells annually, the greater in April, occasioned by the melting of snows in Armēnia, the less in November, caused by the periodical rains. The Dejilah is more rapid than the El-Frat, runs nearly at seven knots an hour, is late in its rises, and its waters are esteemed less salubrious. In its course it varies very considerably in a few years. There is a branch of this river of the same name. Hērōdotus says, that Armēnia has three rivers known by the name of Tigris, an assertion not supported by ancient authors (Herod. v. 2). Achaemenius Tigris, the Persian Djail (Claud. x. 224). Adj. Transgritānus, a. um, on the other side, i. e. the eastern side of the El-Frat. Transgritāna ripis (Amm. Mar. xxv. 7).

Tigris, is, f. the name of a ship, probably from the figure on her prow (Virg. Æn. x. 166).

Tigūrius Pāgus, one of the four cantons, or districts, into which Hēlvētia, Switzerland, was divided, according to Cæsar; and it comprehended the modern cantons of Zurich, Schwitz, Schaffhausen, and the lands of the Abbey of St. Gall (Cæs. B. G. i. 12). Adj. Tigūrii, orum, m. Adj. Tigūrius, a. um. L. Tillius Cimber, L. Tilli Cimbrī, a. one of the conspirators against C. Jūlius Cæsar, whom he had previously supported with all his influence, and to whom he was indebted for the province of Bithynia. In the arrangement entered into against the life of that usurper, Tillius had engaged to commence the onset, a promise which he fulfilled by seizing Cæsar's toga, on which one of the Cæsars, c. Cæsar, wounded him in the throat, and was followed by the rest, who soon despatched him, almost without resistance (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 82).

Timeus, i. m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, whom he protected at the imminent risk of his own life, in 337 B.C. (Curt. ix. 5).—2. A Greek historian, who was a native of Taurōmēnium, Tauris, and lived during the reign of Agathodotus. Of the numerous works which he composed, none has reached modern times. His history of Sicily, Sicily, which, from the expression of Cicero, appears to have been a connected work, and not a collection of detached pieces, like Sallust's history, would, if accurate, have been a valuable acquisition; since so little is known respecting that island in the early ages. Ancient authors differ respecting his merits. According to Cicero, he was the most eloquent and learned of all the Greek historians; and Diodorus commends him both for his knowledge and his accuracy. Plutarchus allows him neither learning nor fidelity, and what Cicero praises as elegant, Longinus condemns as cold and puerile. Diodorus Siculus blames the severity of his strictures, in which he is joined by Polybius and Cornēlius Nepos (Alcib. 11).

Timāgēnes, is, m. a native of Alexandria, who was taken prisoner by Gabinius, and brought to Rome, where Faustus, the son of Sūlla, bought him, and, on account of his splendid talents, set him free. Naturally addicted to sarcasm and railery, he spared neither age nor rank, on which account Augustus, offended at the freedom of some of his strictures, forbade him the palace. Affronted by this disgrace, besides the loss of the emperor's friendship and intimacy, with which he had been honoured, he burned the history which he had written of the life of that prince. Seneca says, he was a man of keen satire, without restraint, eloquent and loquacious, who said many things improperly, but elegantly. At Rome, he taught rhetoric, and wrote history with great judgment and taste. He lived to an advanced age, with Asinius Pollio, in whose house he probably died (Sen. de Ira iii. 23). It was the opinion of Timægenes, that poetry was the most ancient of all kinds of composition. Ammianus Marcellinus commends his diligence and accuracy, but censures his obscurity (xv. 9).

Timanor, ðris, m. a Dolopian, to whom Persæus gave the joint command of the slingers and javelin bearers, with Ion, of Thesalonica, q. v. (Liv. xlii. 58).

Timarchus, i. m. a Syrian nobleman, put to death as a rebel (Ap. Bel. Syr. 117).—2. A tyrant of the Milesians (Ap. Bel. Syr. 130).

Timasterates, is, m. a Rhodian, sent with two four-banked ships from Samos to L. Æmilius Regillus, telling him, that he had been sent by C. Livius Salinator to conduct him safely to Samos, where he was to receive the command of the fleet from his predecessor, Livius, because the sea was rendered dangerous by the ships of Antiochus, king of Syria, in the year 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 14).

Timasitheus, v. Thymasitheus, eos, m. the highest magistrate at Lipara, who protected the commissioners sent from Rome with a golden bowl to Apollo, when they were taken by Liparean pirates. He sent them under a convoy to Delphi, Castri, and thence safe to Rome, in 393 B. C., for which the Romans received him with hospitality, and gave him presents (Liv. v. 28).

Timævus, i. m. the Timavo, issues at once a river, from a rock, and, after a short course of three miles, falls into Mare Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, by one mouth, in the neighbourhood of Tergestë, Trieste. The Timavo has the appearance of having run in caverns. Virgilius says, it has nine mouths, i. e. springs or sources (Æn. i. 244), in which he is followed by Claudianus (xxviii. 197), and Pömpönius Mela (ii. 4). Strabo says, it had seven springs of drinkable water, which form a deep and broad river, but Pölybius, that except one, all the springs were salt, and adds, that the natives called that place the fountain and mother of the sea; the latter name is still given it by the Italians, La Madre del Mare. Pösidönus has recorded, that Timævus takes its rise in the mountains, afterwards runs one hundred and thirty stadia below ground, and, appearing again, is soon after lost in the sea. Stagna Phrëgi (i. e. Trojani) Timævi, from its being in the territory of Antenor, who was a Trojan (Claud. vii. 120). Martialis calls it Eugænus Timævus, from being in the country of the Eugænæi (xlii. 89); Lidæus, from Cæstor, son of Leda, having been supposed to have sailed up the Gulf of Venice, or rather up the Danube (iv. 25), and Müllifidus, from the number of its mouths (viii. 28). Antenoræus Timævus (Luc. Phar. vii.

194). Livius calls it a lake, and mentions, that the Romans encamped on it, when they made war on the Istri (Liv. xli. 1).

Timochæres, is, m. a native of Ambracia, and friend of Pyrrhus, who offered to the Roman consul, C. Fabricius, that, for a reward, he would cut off that monarch by poison. On the senate being informed, they sent ambassadors to Pyrrhus, warning him to be on his guard against his intimates. This is the account of Valerius Antias, others call him Nicias q. v. (Gel. iii. 8).

Timocætes, is, m. a native of Pellene, to whom Pöthægöras gave the command of Argos, when he left that city and went to Lacedæmon, to assist his father-in-law, Nabis, tyrant of that town. When the Argivi drove out the garrisons of the Lacedæmonians, they allowed Timocætes to retire without injury, in consequence of the mildness of his government (Liv. xxxiv. 29—40).

Timocritus, i. m. a native of Ægina, and father of Timasarchus (Pin. Nem. ix. 22).

Timodæmus, i. m. an Athenian celebrated by Pindarus. Timodæmide, arum, m. the descendants of Timodæmus (Pin. Nem. ii).

Timöläus, i. m. a man who wished to double the work of Hömærus, by inserting a new line between each two of the original.

Timöleön, öntis, m. a Corinthian, who, from his earliest years, discovered great mildness of temper, and so strong a love of country, that he was present when his brother Timöphänes was put to death, because he had perverted the authority with which he was invested, and declared himself absolute. After recovering from the depression of mind, occasioned by witnessing that act which kept him in retirement for twenty years, his fellow-citizens gave him the command of troops, sent to aid the Sicillians. On his arrival in that island, the natives, having been betrayed by former officers sent from Corinth, did not give him that open and hearty reception which he expected, and the nature of his mission required. The rectitude of his conduct soon gained their confidence, and his future success released the natives from despotic power. Every measure was directed for the public good, uninfluenced alike by ambition, or a desire of revenge. The petty princes submitted to his arms, and liberty was bestowed on every city which he conquered. After framing an excellent code of laws, he spent the remainder of his days among a grateful people, whom he had rescued from tyranny, enjoying every mark of public distinction, and private respect. As soon as his valour in the field, and wisdom in the cabinet, had given tranquillity to the island, his wife and children sailed for Sicily, where they likewise continued to live. In advanced life, his sight almost wholly failed, not, however, before the state had ceased to require his active services. He died about 337 B. C., was buried with the utmost magnificence, at the public expense, and annual games appointed in honour of the man, who had conquered despots, subdued barbarians, and re-peopled the cities which tyranny had desolated, and restored their former privileges and laws. Cornélius Nepos has given a short, and Plütarchus a long life of this illustrious Corinthian. Timöleöntëum, i. e. the monument erected in honour of Timōlēon. It stood in the market-place of Sýracusa.

Timon, ōnis, m. a leading man of Thēbe Phthiōtica, whom the Roman proconsul, T. Quinctius Flāminius, expected would betray the city into his hands, in 199 B. C. The patriotism of Timon led him to adopt a very different line of conduct, and the valour of the inhabitants compelled the Roman commander to retire from the city (Liv. xxxiii. 5).—2. A person set over Lýdia by Antíochus, king of Sýria, after the battle of Thýāfira; but the people disregarded his authority, and agreed to send deputies to the Roman consul L. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 44).

Timōnōus, i, m. the father of Timōdēmus (Pin. Nem. ii. 16).

Timōphānes, is, m. a noble Corinthian, eldest son of Timōdēmus and Dēmāristē, and brother of Timōlēon, whom he resembled in nothing. Imprudent and rash, he associated with profligate companions, to whom his contempt of danger had recommended him. The Corinthians kept a mercenary corps of four hundred men, of which they gave the command to Timōphānes. Regardless of honour, and infuriated by ambition, he put many of the citizens to death without trial, and then declared himself king of Corinth. Timōlēon entreated him to renounce his madness; but he rejected his advice with disdain. Then persisting in the same infatuation, he took with him Æschýlus, whose sister Timōphānes had married, and a soothsayer called by some Sātýrus, by others Orthógōras, who earnestly entreated Timōphānes to listen to reason, to give up the usurped title, and make to his fellow-citizens some compensation for his crimes. At first he laughed at their proposal, and then gave way to violent passion, on which the other two transfixed him with their swords, whilst Timōlēon stood, at a little distance, weeping. Cōrnēlius Nēpos relates this matter differently, does not mention Æschýlus, and makes the soothsayer, whose name he suppresses, the brother-in-law of Timōphānes and Timōlēon (Timol. 1).

Timōsthēnes, is, m. a native of Egīna, and brother of Aleimēdon (Pin. Ol. viii).

Timōthēus, i, m. a distinguished Athenian, whose father's name was Cōnon. Athēneus makes his mother a native of Thrācia, and she, most probably, like other natives of that country, would in Greece be a slave, and subjected to all the indignities peculiar to that degraded condition. The historian, just quoted, adds, that she became a model of female delicacy. Few facts respecting the history of Timōthēus, have been transmitted. Military valour forms the most prominent feature of his character, as given by Cōrnēlius Nēpos. After he had subdued, by war, Olynthus and Byzantium, Constantinople, plundered the territory of Cōtys, to the value of twelve hundred talents, which he paid into the treasury, and raised the siege of Cýzicum, Chizio, he went to the assistance of Ariobārzānes, in return for which service he received the towns Crithotē and Sēstos, on Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles. He was so very fortunate, that the painters represented him sleeping, and Fortune bringing to him taken cities in a net. He next received the command of a fleet, and, sailing round Pelōpōnēsus, the Morea, he ravaged Lācōnia, put the Lacedæmonian fleet to flight, subdued Cōrēfira, Corfu, to the government of the Athenians, and added as allies the Epidæ, Athāmānes, Chāōnes, and all the nations who live upon that coast. This expedition secured to the Athenians the empire of the seas, for which they had long contended with the Lacedæmonians. After he had attained a great age, and had retired from public business, they appointed him and Iphicrātes councillors to Mnēsthēus, son of the latter, and son-in-law of the former, whom the Athenians had appointed prætor, in consequence of the revolt of Sāmos, the wavering of Hēllēspōntus, and the ambition of Philip, king of Mācēdōnia, then attempting many things. From the rash conduct of Chien, at Sāmos, of which these aged commanders disapproved, they were brought to trial for treason, and Timōthēus was fined in a hundred talents. The injustice of his country thus forced him into banishment, and he retired to Chālceis, Egripo, a city of Eubœa, Negropont, where he died. The Athenians repented of that iniquitous sentence, remitted nine-tenths of the fine, and accepted of ten talents from his son Cōnon (Cor. Nep. Tim.).—2. An Athenian, descended from the Eumolpidae, who were the priests of Cēres (Id. Hist. iv. 83).—3. An officer under Pēlos, king of Mācēdōnia, whom he left at the head of some troops at Phila, as he retreated to Mācēdōnia, in 174 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 67).

Tingis, is, f. et. Tingi, m. Tingis, where Tangier, a town of Africa, built by Antæon, on Frētum Gāditanum, the Strait of Gibraltar, and nearly opposite to the fort which gave name to the strait in modern times (Sil. Ital. iii. 258). Tingitānia, æ, f. the district of Africa to which the town just mentioned gives name. Plinius makes this province a hundred and seventy miles in length (l. 32). Adj. Tingitānus, a, um. Tingitānus (Lat. Sup. vi. 13).

Tinla, æ, m. the Tivino, a small stream which runs into Tiber, the Tevere (Sil. Ital. viii. 452). Strābo, who writes Tēnos, mentions, that small boats plied upon it, bringing the inland produce of the country down to the capital (324).

Tios (Teios, Strabo), i, f. Tilisa, m. Tio, a city on the borders of Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Tipāta, æ, f. a town of Maurītānia (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Tiphys, is, m. son of Phōrbus and Hymānē (Hyg. 14), was the pilot of the ship Argō. He died in the house of Lysus, king of Prōpōntis, Marmora, and Ancæus, uncle of Nēptūnus, was appointed to his office, who navigated that ship to Cōlchis. The Tiphycōses, who maintained that they excelled all the Boeotians in nautical affairs, claimed Tiphys for their countryman, and pretended to show the place near their town, at which the Argō arrived after that famous expedition. After erit tum Tiphys, then there will be another Tiphys, i. e. another pilot; navigation will then be revived (Virg. B. iv. 34). Vāllērus Flaccus, Apollōdorus, Apollōnīus Rhōdius, and Orpheus make him the son of Hēgēlus, hence Tiphys Hēgēlōides (Val. Flacc. l. 487).

Tirēslas, æ, m. a native of Thēba. Tirēslas was the son of Evērus and Chāriolō. He is said to have been one of those who sprang from the serpent's teeth which Cædms sowed. In early life, he was changed into a girl, in consequence of his striking two serpents closely united. About seven years after that mutation of sex, he recovered his original form, by again striking other serpents similarly situated. Jupiter and Juno referred to him the decision of a subject worthy of the infamous characters of both. Having determined in favour of Jupiter, Juno, in revenge, deprived him of sight. To alleviate his punishment, the king of the gods ordained him to live for seven ages, and conferred on him the gift of prescience. Liriope, the mother of Narcissus, first consulted him with respect to the fate of her son, and the event confirming his prediction, rendered him famous as a prophet. Tirésias was afterwards considered as the infallible oracle of Greece, and appears to have been one of the most celebrated soothsayers of antiquity. His name occurs frequently in the writings of Cicero, and Horace's fifth satire of book 2d, is a dialogue between Ulysses and Tirésias, in imitation of Lucianus. The former, by the advice of Circe, descended to the Infernal Regions to consult Tirésias (See Hom. Od. x. 492, seq.). Some critics consider this dialogue as a continuation of the interview between Ulysses and Tirésias in the shades, and others, perhaps with more probability, as a second interview, in which the spirit of Tirésias was conjured up by Ulysses, on finding that the predictions of the prophet were true, and on his wishing to know, by what means he might repair the loss of his estate, which the suitors of his wife had destroyed. Statius describes Tirésias as a necromancer, and in terrific strains sings the power which he possessed over departed spirits. Of that infernal art, a more forcible delineation cannot be found in all the writings of antiquity, than that of Statius (Th. iv. 408, seq.). His tomb was near the mountain Tiphosium, according to Strabo and Pausanias.

Tiribæzus, i. e. governor of Sardes, Sart, about 304 B. C., who, according to Cornelius Nepos, discovered the design of Cönon to restore Ionia and Æolia to the Athenians. Diodorus Siculus writes, that Tiribæzus envied the reputation of Cönon, and formed an unjust pretext for apprehending him (xiv. 85). Isocrates too justifies the character of Cönon, and condemns his unjust imprisonment. From Xenophon's account, Cönon did nothing unbecoming his character (Hist. Græc. iv. 8).

Tiridates, i. e. a Parthian nobleman, who obtained the government of his native country, about 27 B. C., when the cruelties of Phraates had excited his subjects to drive him from the throne. The tyrant, however, having obtained the aid of a powerful Scythian tribe, recovered his kingdom, and compelled Tiridates to fly. The latter contrived to get one of the sons of Phraates into his power, with whom he escaped to Rome. The Parthian king demanded from Augustus the restoration of his son, and the giving up of his rival; the emperor complied with the first, but refused the second demand. The negotiations, thus entered into, ended in confirming Phraates on the throne, and his giving up the standards, which the Parthians had taken from the army of Crassus. Nothing further respecting the life of Tiridates is known.—2. A Parthian, descended from the family (perhaps the grandson) of Phraates IV., son of Vónones I., whom the emperor Tiberius set up as a rival to Artabanes, and placed him on the throne of Parthia in the year 35. Possessed of little fortitude, he shrunk from danger, and fell back before his enemy, so that his retreat had the appearance of a rout. A general defection followed, and Tiridates, with a handful of men, passed into Syria, the year after he had received the crown (Tac. Ann. vi. 32–44). Of his history nothing further is known.

3. Brother of Vologeses, became king of Armenia, and carried on continual war with Rhadamistus. At that time the Armenians were divided into two factions, the weaker took part with the Romans, and the stronger with the Parthians. Tiridates privately sent succours to the latter, and, at last, made open war on Armenia, in which failing of success, he desired an interview with Corbulo, and that having terminated without any favourable effect, he attempted to arrest Corbulo's march to Artaxata. At last, from necessity, he complied with the wishes of his brother, and in fulfilment of his agreement with Corbulo, he went to Rome, and laid his crown at the foot of the emperor Nero. Plineus informs us, that Tiridates, being one of the Mægi, wished to travel to Rome by land, because his religion did not allow him to spit into the sea, nor to defile that element with any kind of pollution. The great retinue which he took along with him, including his wife and children, proved expensive to the provinces, by the great preparations made for his reception; and must have been fatiguing to himself and family, since both he and his wife rode the whole way on horseback. At Naples, he joined Nero, whence they proceeded together to Rome, when the emperor placed the crown on his head, made him a number of valuable presents, and allowed him to rebuild Artaxata, which he did on returning to Armenia, and changed its name to Neronia (Tac. Ann. xii. 50, seq.).

Tiro, önis, m. first the slave, and afterwards the freedman, of the orator, M. Tullius Cicero. From the frequent mention of Tiro, in the writings of his master, the reader naturally infers, that he must have possessed many estimable qualities, which had endeared him to the son and brother of the orator, as well as to himself. He attended Cicero during the time he held the consulship of Cilicia, and probably wrote a life of that illustrious Roman, since Tacitus quotes him as his authority, with respect to the murder of Cicero, which Tiro mentions took place on 7th November, during the consulship of Hortius and Pansa, i. e. in 43 B. C. (Tac. Orat. 17). Adj. Tironianus, a, um. Tironiana cura (Gel. l. 7).

Tiryns, thi, f. Palæo Nauplia (Palæo-Naupoli, Leake), a town of Argolis, situated in a plain which encircled its Acropolis. Of this fort time has not left one vestige. The town took its name from a son of Argos, and brother of Amphitryon; but Eustatius asserts, that its original appellation was Hahæis, which Stephanus says, it received from fishermen being there. Herodotus was native of this city. The walls, built by the Cyclôpes, were of uncommon strength and solidity, part of which still remain, and Pausanias mentions, they were the admiration of all Greece. Hómērus states, that the town was "well fortified" (Il. ii. 559). Stēphānus says, it was called from Tīrŷus, a daughter of Alo, who was the sister of Amphitrŷon. Sūs deus exiit antiquam Tirynthu, its own god (i. e. Hērclēs) rouses ancient Tīrŷus (Stat. Th. iv. 147). Adj. Tīrŷnthlus, a, um. Tirynthius hēros, Hērclēs (Ov. Met. vii. 410), who is sometimes simply called Tirynthlus, his proper name being understood (Stat. Th. v. 390). Tirynthia prōles, Q. Pāblius Māximus, from the Fābii tracing their descent from Hērclēs and Viudūna, daughter of Evānder (Sil. Ital. ii. 3). Tirynthia cūbūna, i. e. Sāgūntina monia, from being built by Hērclēs (Sil. Ital. i. 661). Tirynthia tela, the weapons, i. e. the arrows of Hērclēs (Ov. Met. xiii. 401). Tirynthia (Alemēna), wife of Amphitrŷon, and mother of Hērclēs, whom she bore at Tīrŷus, her native city; hence the adjective Tīrŷnthlus is applied to that hero, and he was reckoned the god of that city (Ov. Met. vi. 112).

Tisæum, i, n. a promontory of Māgnēsia. Adj. Tisæus, a, um. Tisæa Diāna, from her having a temple, and receiving adoration on that promontory (Val. Flacc. ii. 7).

Tisæus, i, m. a mountain of prodigious height in Māgnēsia, a district of Thessaly. There was a beacon on its summit, during the Macedonian war (Liv. xxviii. 5).

Tisāgōras, æ, m. brother of Miltiādes (Cor. Nep. Milt. 7). Hērōdōtus writes Stēsāgōras q. v.

Tisāmēnus, i, m. son of Orēstes and Hērmonē, daughter of Mēnclāus and Hēlēna. He succeeded his father, but the descendants of Hērclēs expelled him from Argos and Lacedæmon, and the descendants of Nēstor, from Mēsēniā. He then went to Achāia. His extraction and virtues gave him great celebrity among the Grecian states. The Iōnes, from jealousy of his merits, lest he should be made king by the Achæi, appealed to the sword, and Tisāmēnus fell. The Achæi buried him at Hēlēcē, but the Lacedæmonians, by the advice of the oracle of Apōllo at Dēlphī, removed his bones to Spārta. Pāter Tisāmēni, Orestes (Ov. Ib. 348).—2. Son of Thersānder and Dēmōn-āssa, sister of Amphilōchus (Paus. iii. 15).

Tisā, æ, f. a town of the Brūtii in Italy. Inh. Tisātæ, arum (Sing. Tisātēs, æ), m. (Ap. Bel. An. 339).

Tisidum, i, n. a town of Africa, not far from Bāgrāda, the Mejerda, mentioned by no ancient author except Sāllustius; and its situation is unknown in modern times (Sal. Jug. 62).

Tisiphōnē, es, f. one of the three Furies, who held a lash in her hand, and, instead of hair, had serpents encircling her head. For an admirable description of this pest, see Ov. Met. iv. 480—508, and Stat. Th. i. 88—130. The Furies were three in number, accounted by some the daughters of Achēron and Nox, by others of Plūto and Prōserpina; but Apōllōdōrus states that they sprang from the mutilated parts of Urānus, v. Cælus, on their falling into the sea, and Hērōdōtus, that they, as well as the giants and nymphs, owed their birth to the drops of blood from the same parts, after they had been some time in contact with the earth. Besides these foolish accounts of the birth of these unreal beings, others occur in the writings of the ancients, equally imaginary, and equally absurd. Adj. Tisiphōneus, a, um. Tisiphōna tēmpora (Ov. Trist. iv. 9. 6).

Tisippus, i, m. a man of great courage, who, in conjunction with Lŷciens, put an hundred and fifty of the chief men in Achāia to death (Liv. xlv. 28).

Tiso, ōils, m. a native of Pātræ, who commanded the Achæan fleet in 194 B. C. From the ship in which he sailed being dashed to pieces, in the first engagement with the Lacedæmonian fleet, he was made prisoner (Liv. xxxv. 26).

Tissa, æ, v. Tissē, es, f. Ravdazzo, a small town near the foot of Mount Etna (Sil. Ital. xiv. 267). Stēphānus writes the word in the plural number. Inh. Tissēus, æ. Tissēnēs, ium, m. Cicēro commends the Tissēnēs for their great industry and uncommon frugality (Ver. iii. 38).

Tissāphēnes, is, m. a prefect of Lŷdia, under Dārŷus Nōthus, king of Pērsia, in 414 B. C. (Just. v. 1). To him Alabādis fled, when he understood that the Lacedæmonians watched an opportunity to put him to death (Cor. Nep. Alcib. 5).—2. A prefect of Artāxērcēs Mnēmōn, and a man of respectability, who lost the favour of his sovereign through the misrepresentations of his colleague, Phārnābāzus, in 399 B. C. (Just. vi. 1).

Titan, ānis, v. Tītānus, i, m. the elder brother of Sātūrnus, was the son of Cælus and Terra. He resigned to Sātūrnus the sovereignty of the world, on condition that he should not bring up any male children. To fulfil the terms of agreement, Sātūrnus devoured his sons as soon as they were born. But Ops, or, Rhēa, concealed the births of Jūpiter, Nēptūnus, and Plūto, or, according to some authors, gave him a stone, which he swallowed in place of them. The Titans having been informed of this breach of the treaty, and grieved at the prospect of losing the government of the world, made war on Sātūrnus, whom they conquered, and put in prison, where he remained, until they were defeated by Jūpiter, who restored his father to the throne. The war of the Titans must not be confounded with that of the giants. The former was against Sātūrnus, the latter against Jūpiter. According to Pausanias, Hómērus was the first who mentioned the Titans in verse, and describes them as inhabiting Tārtārus (viii. 37). Titan is often used as synonymous with Apōllo, or the sun. Nūllus Titan, no sun (Ov. Met. i. 10). Rōsēs Titan, rosy, or, red Titan (Stat. Th. i. 717). Titan finxit, Prōmēthēus hath formed (Juv. Sat. xiv. 35). Tītānia, æ, f. Pŷrrha (Ov. Met. i. 385); Diāna (Ov. Met. iii. 173); Lātōna (Ov. Met. vi. 346); Circē, because descended from the Titans (Ov. Met. xiv. 382 et 438). Tītānis, idos, f. a daughter, or descendant of Titan, also, of Titan, in relation to nouns feminine; Lātōna (Ov. Met. vi. 185); Circē (Ov. Met. xiii. 968, et xiv. 14, et 376). Tītānia pūna, battle of the Titans (Juv. Sat. viii. 132). Adj. Tītānicus, Tītānicus, et, Tītānulus, a, um. Tītānīci drācōnes, dragons received from the sun (Ov. Met. vii. 336). Tītānia astra, the sun (Virg. Æn. vi. 725), where the poet uses the plural for the singular. Tithonus Æles, the phoenix (Claud. xlv. 7).

Tithræus, v. Tithræus (Hom. Il. ii. 751), i. m. the Saranta Poros, called also Eurōtos and Orēos, a river of Thessalia, which flows into Pénēus, the Salampria, on the N. bank of that river. Pínius states, that its waters like oil float on the surface, and do not mix with those of the Salampria, for which he assigns this fanciful reason, that it had its origin in the Infernal Regions, on which account, the stream of the Salampria refused mixing with that of the Tithræus, and after running a short way threw it off (i. 430). To the quality of this river, and the fiction above related, Lúcanus alludes (Phar. vi. 376). Adj. Tithræus, a. um.

Tithonus, i. m. a son of Læmædon, king of Troy, by Strymō, a daughter of Scamander, hence Ovidius calls him Phryx Tithonus (Fast. vi. 473). Aurōra, goddess of the morning, fell in love with him, in consequence of his uncommon beauty, and carried him through the air to Æthiopia, by whom she had Emithion and Memnon. The goddess obtained from Jupiter immortality for her husband, but forgot to ask that he might continue in perpetual youth, on which account, he experienced all the inconveniences of extreme old age, hence Höratius, Lōga senectūs minuit Tithonium, a protracted old age diminished Tithonus, i. e. rendered his body shrunk and decrepid (Od. ii. 16. 80). Worned of life, he prayed he might be taken from it, and was transformed into a grasshopper according to Sërvius. Diódorus Siculus says, that he made war in Asia, as far east as Æthiopia; hence the fiction of his being the husband of Aurōra, and father of Memnon, which Höratius has expressed by venotus in auras, i. e. carried to the skies, scilicet, by Aurōra (Od. i. 28. 8). Tithonus, adj. f. Aurōra (Stat. Syl. v. 1. 34). Adj.

Tithonus, a. um. Tithonia cōnjux, Aurōra (Virg. Æn. viii. 384), who is frequently called Tithonia, in which case cōnjux seems to be understood.

Tithoræa, æ. f. one of the tops of Parnassus g. v. (Herod. viii. 32). Under this name were included both a town and district around it. Ins. Tithoræenses, iom. m.

Tithraustes, is. m. a captain in the guards of the king of Persia, who, by order of his sovereign, cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and obtained the government which the latter possessed (Xen. Ages. i. Hist. Græc. iii. 4).

Tithanus. See L. Săltus Otho.

Titidius Lăbdo, Titidi Lăbdonis, m. the husband of Véstilla, whom the Roman senate summoned to appear before them, and assign a reason why he had not brought so abandoned a woman to punishment. In vindication of his conduct, he maintained, that the law allowed sixty days for deliberation in such cases, and that the legal period had not yet expired. With this answer the senators declared themselves satisfied, and proceeded against the adulteress (Tac. Ann. (iii. 85), on which see also Titidius).

Titinius, i. m. a centurion under C. Căssius Lőnginus, whom that officer sent to obtain information respecting the condition of M. Jūnius Brūtus. From the lateness of his return, Căssius inferred the worst, and put himself to death. On beholding his dead body, Titinius killed himself (Val. Max. ix. 9).

C. Titinius, C. Titinii, m. a plebeian tribune, in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 8).

L. Titinius, L. Titinii, m. a Roman appointed a military tribune, with consular authority, in 399 B. C. Four years after, he held the same office, when he and Cn. Gēnūcius marched against the Fălisci, but, displaying more bravery than conduct, were defeated (Liv. v. 12—18).

M. Titinius, M. Titinii, m. a plebeian tribune, in 448 B. C. (Liv. iii. 54).—2. Appointed master of the horse to C. Jūnius Būbūlcus, dictator, against the Volsi, in 303 B. C. (Liv. x. 1).—3. A plebeian tribune, in 195 B. C. He and C. Titinius declared they would enter their protest, if the senate decreed a triumph to L. Cōrnēlius, consul, for his success in Spain (Liv. xxxv. 8).—4. Elected prætor in 180 B. C., and obtained the north of Spain for his province, which he retained next year, as M. Lăcinius Crăssus, who was appointed to succeed him, excused himself on account of religious obligations. The Cēlōbēri continued tranquil during the time he held that province. Ambassadors from Spain complained of the cruelty and avarice of the Roman magistrates, on which account, M. Titinius was brought to trial, and, after two adjournments, was, on the third day, acquitted, in the year 173 B. C. (Liv. xli. 5 seq.).

M. Titinius Cūryus, M. Titinii Cūryi, m. a Roman prætor, who gave an audience to Tib. Sēmprōnius Grăcehus and L. Pōstūmus Albīnus, in the temple of Bellōna, that they might relate the services which they had performed in Spain, and demand such honours as they merited, in 180 B. C. (Liv. xl. 59 seq.).

P. Titinius, P. Titinii, m. a lieutenant-general under the prætor L. Fūlius Pūrpurēo, in the year 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 21).

Sex. Titinius, Sex. Titinii, m. a plebeian tribune, who complained of the unmerited death of Sp. Măllius g. v. (Liv. iv. 16).

Titius, i. m. a Roman, whom some surname Sēptimius, who wrote several lyric poems and tragedies, all of which are lost. Höratius gives him high praise, which may have proceeded from the partiality of friendship, rather than from a just estimate of his merits. The silence of Quīntiliānus certainly favours, if it does not confirm, this conjecture (Hor. Epis. i. 3. 9).—2. A man of virtue, praised by Jūvenalis (Sat. iv. 13).—3. A debtor of Afer (Mart. iv. 57). Perhaps he is the person whom Mărtiālis again mentions in other of his epigrams.

Titius, i. m. the Kerka, a river which Flōrus makes the boundary of Illýricum on the east (ii. 5).

Titus Prōcūlus, Titii Prōcūli, m. a Roman of some rank, whom, Tăcētus states, C. Sīllus had appointed to guard Măssălina, and who, imitating the example of Sīllus, attempted no defence, asked no delay, preferring instant death (Tac. Ann. xi. 25).

Titus Săbinus, Titii Săbini, m. a Roman knight of great distinction, and a steady friend to the family of Gērmăneus, an attachment which cost him his life. To Agrīpina and her children, after the death of her husband, he continued to pay the same attention, both in public and private, which he did during the lifetime of Gërmānīcus, after all her other attendants had forsaken her. Four men of patrician rank, Lātīnus Lātīaris, Pōrcus Cato, Pēllius Rūfus and M. Opilius, whose names deserve to be mentioned, in order to be held up to the detestation of succeeding ages, entered into a design against his life. After forming the plot, Lātīaris became the active agent, threw himself frequently in the way of Sābīnus, pretended great respect for Gërmānīcus and Agrippīna, wrought on the tender affections of this steadfast friend, and, at last, prevailed on him to discover his undisguised sentiments respecting Sābīnus. Deceived by pretended friendship, and similarity of sentiment, Sābīnus at last disclosed his inmost thoughts to Lātīaris, while the other three lay concealed in the cavity between the roof and the ceiling of the room, and heard his conversation, which they immediately formed into an accusation, and transmitted to Tiberius. The emperor charged him with treason, on 1st January, and the innocent Sābīnus was immediately seized and dragged through the streets to execution, in the year 28 (Tac. Ann. iv. 18-70).

M. Titius, M. Titli, m. son of Titius, who, on being proscribed, had fled to Sex. Pōmpēius. In Gallia Nārbōnēnsis, he procured a considerable fleet, but was taken by Mēnōdōrus, and set at liberty by Pōmpēius, from respect to his father. He deserted Pōmpēius, joined Antōnius, and afterwards put his benefactor to death, by order of Antōnius (Vel. Pat. ii. 77-79).

Titullus, i. m. a man whom Mārtiālis advises to take the use of his property, and not leave it to ungrateful heirs (viii. 44).

Q. Titūlius Sābīnus, Q. Titūli Sābīni, m. a lieutenant-general in Caesar's army. He and L. Aurūncūleius Cōtta had the command of the troops which were stationed among the Mēnāpiī, and in other parts of Gallia Belgica. When in their winter quarters, on the frontiers of the Eburōnes, 56 B. C., the artful stratagem of Ambīōrix, king of half that tribe, to cut off these officers and their two legions, succeeded, through the credulity and obstinacy of Sābīnus. A few of the private soldiers escaped the sword of the Gauls. See Aurūncūleius. This officer is sometimes called simply Titūlius, or Sābīnus (Flor. iii. 10). Adj. Titūlianus, a. um. Titūliāna clādes (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 67).

Titus, i. m. a common prænomen among the Romans.

Titus, i. m. a son of L. Jūnius Brūtus, alluded to by Līvius (ii. 5). See Tiberius. —2. A man who urged Mārtiālis to practise at the bar (Mart. i. 18).

Tityrus, i. m. a herdsman. Under this character, Virgilius is supposed to have described himself, and it must be admitted, that at least one principal event of his life seems alluded to in the first Eclogue; but there are many particulars in the life of Tityrus, which will not apply to Virgilius. Not to enter into minute discrimination, it will be sufficient to observe, that Tityrus was a slave, Virgilius was never in servitude; Tityrus herds the cattle of his master, the lands possessed by our poet's father were his own; Tityrus was an old man, when Virgilius wrote his first eclogue; he was under thirty years of age. These particulars, to which others might be added, sufficiently prove, that the poet did not intend to give a correct delineation of his own character and circumstances under the name of Tityrus.

Titŷus, i. m. the son of Terra, a celebrated giant, of prodigious size, whose body is said to have covered nine acres of land. Apollōdōrus says, he was the son of Jūpter and Elāra, whom that god, to protect from the cruelty of Jūno, hid in the earth, &c. in a cave, hence he is called Terra schēnus (Virg. Æn. vi. 595). Elāra died in childbirth, and Terra was appointed his nurse, which gave rise to the fiction of his being her son. For offering to insult Lātōna, according to Hōmērus, in the beautiful plains of Pānōpē, a town of Phōciā, as she went to Phthia, Apollō killed him. But Pindarus says, that Dīāna transfixed him with her arrows, and Hŷgīnus, that Jūpter put him to death by lightning. In the Infernal Regions, he was tormented by a vulture, preying continually on his liver, which grew as fast as it was devoured, to render his punishment eternal, to which Hōrātius alludes (Od. iii. 4-77), and Ovīdīus (Met. iv. 456). Titŷus appears, from ancient history, to have been a man of great strength, cruelty, and rapacity. Titŷus risit invito cultu, Titŷus sniled with unwilling countenance, &c. the anguish caused by his punishment appeared in his face, even when he smiled (Hor. Od. iii. 11-21).

Tlēpōlēmus, i. m. son of Hērēclēs and Astŷōchē, daughter of Phŷlas. He quitted Pelōpōnnēsus, the Morea, in consequence of unintentionally having killed Lēgimēlus, and with a small number of men went to Rhōdos, Rhodes, where he fixed his residence. From this island he went with nine ships to the Trojan war (Hom. Il. ii. 636 seq. i. in which he fell by the hand of Sārpēdon, king of Lycia (Ov. Ep. Her. i. 20)). —2. A man in the Trojan army, killed by Pātērclēs clad in the armour of Achilles. He was son to Dāmāstor, hence called Dāmāstōrīdes (Hom. Il. xvi. 416).

Tlēptōlēmus, i. m. an officer of Alexander the Great, at whose death he obtained the kingdom of Pērsia (Just. xiii. 4).

Tmārus, i. m. a man in the army of Tŷrus, resolute and forward, who with others fell into the snare laid for them by Pāndīrus and Bitias (Virg. Æn. ix. 685).

Tmārus, i. m. Tomour, or, Tomarth, a mountain of Dōdōna in Epīrus, which has a hundred springs about its base. Pīnīus and Strābo write Tōmārus. The latter contends, that the proper name was Tōmīrus (476 seq.). This mountain was covered with wood to the top. Adj. Tmārius, a. um. Tmārius Jūpter, Dodonian Jūpter (Chad. xxvi. 18).

Tmōlus, a. Tŷmōlus (Ov. Met. xi. 86), i. m. Bouz-dag (D'Auvillē), a mountain in Lŷdia, on which grew the best saffron (Virg. G. l. 56). From it there issued a river of the same name, in the channel of which were found excellent whetstones. The god of this mountain adjudged the palm of victory to Apollō, when Pan disputed with him in playing on the pipe (Ov. Met. xi. 156 seq.). There was also a town of this name, mentioned by Tācītus (Ann. ii. 47). Adj. Tmōlius, a. um. et, Tmōlitis, is, e. Tmōlitē cinus (Plin. iii. 133).

Tōchāri, arum, m. a people of Scythia.

Strābo calls them Tāchāri (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Tōgōnūs, Gāllus, Tōgōnū Gālli, m. a man of low birth, who proposed, that out of a number of senators chosen by the emperor Tiberius, twenty should be drawn by lot, who should guard him whenever he came to the senate. To this the prince made an ironical reply, without saying any thing which had a tendency to prevent the motion, and whether it passed into a law or not, Tacitus has not recorded (Ann. vi. 2).

Tōlbiacum, i. n. Zulpich, a town of Gāllia Belgica (Tac. Hist. iv. 79).

Tōlēnus, et, Tōlēnus, i. m. the Turano, a river of Italy, which has its source in the country of the Mārsi, and waters that of the Sābini. Adj. Tōlēnus, a, um. Tōlēnum flūmen (Ov. Fast. vi. 565).

Tōlētum, i. n. Toledo, a town of the Cārpētāni, in Hīspānia Tārrācōnēnsis, which stood on the river Tāgus, and was strong from situation. Inh. Tōlētāni, orum, m. received a powerful reinforcement from the Vētōnes, when their town was assaulted by the Roman proconsul M. Fūlvius Nōbīllior, in 194 B. C.; but that did not prevent him from taking it by means of his works (Liv. xxxv. 7-22).

Tōlētōboii, orum, m. one of the three tribes or clans of the Gāllogrēci, which obtained Iōnia and Æolia. In 191 B. C., the consul Cn. Mānlius Vūlso marched from Ephēsus, against this warlike people, who betook themselves to Olympos, in Natolia, thinking themselves secure, as it is one of the highest mountains in that country, steep and uneven. This advantageous position they supposed the Romans would either not attack, or, if they did, they would be easily repulsed. In addition to natural advantages, they added a trench and other fortifications, and trusted to the rocky ground for an abundant supply of stones. On surveying the mountain, the consul found there were only three places by which it could be ascended. The Tōlētōboii neither had stones in readiness, nor had they been accustomed to throw them, so that their only armour was the sword, which they could not use at a distance. Besides, their shields were both too narrow to protect their bodies, and flat, consequently of almost no benefit. They fought naked, were plump, and had white skins, which rendered blood more conspicuous. Enraged at being hit, without being able to return the injury, like wild beasts when wounded, they rushed in blind fury at random upon their own party. Sometimes provoked by the point of an arrow or a ball entering their bodies, and observing so small a wound, yet unable to extract the weapon, they threw themselves on the ground, in a fit of frenzy and shame.

Their advance was easily checked by showers of darts, or the charge of the light infantry, by which they were cut in pieces. The surviving few fled to their camp, and the Romans occupied the hill which they had abandoned. The legions then advanced, drove them from their ramparts, and entered at the gates which they had purposely left open to effect their escape. Instead of plundering their camp, the consul ordered the troops to pursue the enemy, those under L. Mānlius obeyed, but, in spite of every remonstrance, the party under C. Hēlvius sacked the camp, which the bravery of the pursuers had won. The number of the killed is doubtful (Liv. xxxviii. 15-20).

Tōlōsa, v. f. Thoulous, or, Toulouse, a town of Aquitānia, beautifully situated on the north bank of Gārūnna, the Garonne, over which it has a noble bridge, and the royal canal joins that river a little below the town. Tōlōsa was one of the most flourishing cities of Gāllia, afterwards the residence of a Roman colony, and, at a later period, the metropolis of the Visigoths. Ausōnius calls it Pallādīa, either from its being a seat of learning, or from its olive groves, or from the worship of Minerva. The modern town is large, but not regularly built. It contains a university, several academies, and fifty thousand inhabitants. Inh. Tōlōsātes, ium, m. Adj. Tōlōsās, as, as; ātis, et. Tōlōsīnus, a, um, v. Tōlōsēnsis, is, e. Tōlōsās cāsūs, cheese of Toulouse, i. e. bad cheese (Mart. xii. 32). Tōlōsānum aurum, gold plundered from the temples of Tōlōsa, which caused the death of every one who took it (Gel. iii. 9). Tōlōsēnsis lācus (Just. xxxii. 3). There was a city of this name in Spain.

Tōlūmnius, i. m. the friend of Tūrnus, celebrated for his skill in augury, who broke the league between the Trojans and Rutulians, and was killed in the first skirmish (Virg. Æn. xi. 429).

Lar, v. Lārs Tōlūmnius, Lārtis Tōlūmniū, m. a king of the Vēientes, hence Vēiens Tōlūmnius (Prop. iv. 10. 25), killed by A. Cōmēlius Cōssus, the Roman general, who thus obtained the second Spōlia Opima (Liv. iv. 19 seq.).

Tōmos, i. v. Tōmi, orum, et. Tōmis, idis, f. Tomesar, sometimes called Baba, a town of Māsia, on the western coast of Pōntus Euxīnus, the Black Sea, which has acquired distinction by the banishment and death of Ovidius. Here he spent the last eight years of his life, and composed the elegant but mournful poems, the Tristia, and epistles from Pōntus. Inh. Tōmītā, arum, m. (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 9. 97). Adj. Tōmītānus, a, um. Tōmītāna rēgio (Ov. Trist. v. 7. 9). Tōmītānus āger (Ov. Ep. Pont. iii. 8. 2).

Tōmŷris (Tāmŷris, Just.). v. Thōmŷris, et. Thāmŷris, is, f. a Scythian queen, who sent her only son Spārgābīsēs, with a third part of her forces, against Cŷrus, who had invaded her country. The youth having allowed his troops to drink to excess, Cŷrus attacked them in that condition, put them all to the sword, and left Spārgābīsēs among the slain. Grieved for the loss of her only child, she meditated instant revenge, and adopted a plan, by which she induced Cŷrus to pursue her into straits, when she cut him off with two hundred thousand men, not a single Persian having escaped, to relate the calamity to his countrymen. In contempt for his cruelty, she caused his head to be cut off, put into a bladder filled with human blood, adding, "Glut thyself with the blood for which thou thirstedst, and of which thou hast always been insatiable" (Just. i. 8).

Tōnāus, āntis, m. a name of Jūpiter, as presiding over thunder.

Tōnglānus, i. m. a man whose house had been destroyed, and ten times its value given him by his clients (Mart. iii. 52).—2. A man ridiculed by Mārtialis, and the wit of the epigram consists in using the word nāsus in very different senses (xii. 90).

Tōngillus, i. m. a man of great luxury and gluttony, whom Mārtialis satirizes (ii. 40). Juvēnalis represents him as having ruined himself, by assuming an appearance and state beyond his means (Sat. vii. 130). Some editions read Tōngillii.

Tōrānūs, i. m. an orator contemptuously mentioned by Tācītus (Orat. 21). The readings are here various; some editions want the name altogether.

C. Tōrānūs, C. Tōrānū, m. an infamous Roman, whose father the triumviri proscribed, and his son furnished to them the information, by which he was discovered and assassinated, in 44 B. C. (Val. Max. ix. 11).—2. The guardian of Augūstus, with whose father he had formerly held the edileship. After the emperor had engaged in the proscription, he proscribed Tōrānūs, acting on his merciless principle, that no quarter should be given (Suet. Aug. 27).

Tōrbōlēta, arum, m. a people of Spain, who appear to have been in the vicinity of Sāgūntum (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 259).

Tōrni, orum, m. a Scythian nation, who appear to have subsisted chiefly on honey, and to have been neighbours to the Sātārchae (Val. Placc. vi. 145).

Tōrōna, e, v. Tōrōnē, es, f. Toron, a town of Macedōnia, inhabited by fugitives from Thēba Phthiōtica, when Philippus, king of Macedōnia, took it, in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 7). Adj. Tōrōneus, v. Tōrōnāicus, a, um. Tōrōneus Sinus, et, Tōrōnāicum Mārē, the Gulf of Aiomani, or, the Gulf of Cassandria (Tac. Ann. v. 10. Liv. xlv. 11).

Tōrquāta, e, f. sister of C. Jūlius Silānus, a vestal virgin of distinguished sanctity (Tac. Ann. iii. 69).

Tōrquātus, i. m. a Roman consul of great wealth, whom Otāciū, a poor man, foolishly attempted to equal in expense and grandeur (Mart. x. 79).—2. See Mānlius.

L. Tōrquātus, L. Tōrquātū, m. an officer in Pompey's army during the Civil war. He was governor of Oricum, Ric, in which he had a guard of the Pārthini. The inhabitants of the town declaring for Cæsar, he made an unconditional surrender to that general, who preserved his life. He appears to have continued for some time with Cæsar, from whom he received every mark of respect and esteem. He afterwards crossed into Africa, joined Scipio, and fell at the same time with that noble Roman, and Dāmāstippus. Cicēro, in his Brūtus, has drawn the character of this eminent man in the following terms: "He was a man of general and elegant literature, though somewhat metaphysical and abstruse. The powers of his memory were astonishing, and the dignity and beauty of his language were of the highest order. All these qualities derived an additional splendour from the dignity of his deportment, and the spotless integrity of his life." Adj. Tōrquātus, a, um. Tōrquātū nōmīnē (Luc. Phar. vii. 584).

Tōtōrdānes, is, m. a river in the country of the Sātōrdmāte (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Tōxāndri, orum, m. a people who lived near the mouth of Scāldis, the Scheldt. Adj. Tōxāndrius, a, um. Tōxāndria rēgiō.

Tōxēus, ēs, m. a son of Thēstus and Eurythēmis, daughter of Clēobēa, whom Mē- læger killed, at the hunting of the Calydonian boar (Ov. Met. viii. 441). Apollōni- rus does not mention Tōxēus among the sons of Thēstus.

Tōxāndra, e, f. Tōxāndri, a, f. Tōxāndri- loo, a town of the Tōxāndri, a people of Bēglum, who had the Mēnāpi on the N. The territory now forms part of the marquisate of Antwerp.

Trāchas, is, f. called also Tarrācina, v. Terrācina, and Trāchīna, a city of Italy, be- longing to the Volsce, in whose language the name was Anxur q. v. (Ov. Met. xv. 717).

Trāchis, v. in, inis, et, Trāchys, ius, f. the metropolis of Trāchīnia, v. f. a small district of Thessaly, of which Cēyx was king. This city was also called Hērāclēa, from Hēracles, who, according to some, was the founder, and, according to others, went there after he had killed Eunōmus. Hence Hērāclēa Trāchis (Ov. Met. xi. 627). Inh. Trāchidē, orum, m. Adj. Trāchīnius, a, um. Trāchī- nius (vir), Cēyx (Ov. Met. xi. 282).

Trāchōnitis, is, v. Idis, f. a district on the frontiers of Arabia and Syria, rough and mountainous, as the name imports. In ancient times, it was possessed by the half-brother of Manasseh. It contained Batana, v. Is- shan, Gaulanitis and Gessuri (Aur. V. Cæs. 28).

Tragōnēē, es, f. a town of Pērsia, which, from Amulānus Mārcellinus, appears to have been of some note, and probably at a great distance from Persēpolis; but its exact situation is unknown (xxii. 6).

Trāgus, i. m. the Turēiko, a perennial stream in Arcādia, very useful in irrigating the Kōlambokki. It emerges at a place called Nai near the village Reunos (Pans. viii. 23).

Trājānus, i. m. the father of the Roman emperor M. Ulpius Trājānus Crīstus, who raised by Vespāsiānus to patrician rank, and was the first of his family who received any honour at Rome. The name of his wife has not been transmitted, but we know that both the parents of the emperor were of Italian extraction. In the war with the Jews, he commanded the tenth legion, and his conduct on all occasions, procured him respect and distinction. He had the honour of being elected to the consulship, and his bravery in war procured him the distinction of a triumph. Eutrōpius alludes to him (viii. 2).

Trājānus. See Ulpian.
Trālles, ium, v. Trāllis, is, f. Saturni- lio, a town of Lydia, according to Stēphānus of Iōnia, says Strābo, and of Caria, says Ptole- mæus, called also Euanthia, from the number of its flowers, stood on the north bank of Mæander, the Meander. It surrendered to the Romans, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 45). Inh. Trālhiāni, orum, m. Adj. Trālhiānus, a, um.

Trālīa, e, f. a part of Illyriūm. Inh. Trālīi, orum, v. Trālles, ium, m. who formed part of the army of Philippus, king of Macedōnia, when he went to assist the Achei against the Etoli and their allies, in 210 B. C. Their name occurs frequently in Livy (xxvii. 32—xxxvii. 40).

Trānquillina, e, f. wife of the Roman emperor Gordianus, was the daughter of Myr- thus, a man of great learning (Eutrop. ix. 7).

Trānsfūgi, is, m. a deserter. The Germans hanged deserters on a tree, in order to give publicity to this and every other crime.

which affected the state (Tac. Mor. Ger. 12). Cæsar mentions, that the Germans reckoned deserters and traitors infamous (B. G. vi. 23). According to the British laws, desertion is to be punished by death. In the Roman army, they were first beaten with rods, and then beheaded (Liv. xxiv. 30). This historian mentions, that deserters of the Latin confederacy were beheaded, and the Romans were crucified, in 203 B. C. Both in ancient and modern times, desertion has been accounted an ignominious act. Livius makes Indibilis, a Spanish nobleman, say, "That the name of a deserter is held dishonourable by a man's old associates, and liable to suspicion by the new" (xxvii. 17).

Trānjūgātāni, orum, m. a people who lived beyond the mountains of the Sarmatæ (Amm. Mar. xvii. 12).

Trānspādānus, a, um, north of Pādus, the Po, because beyond the Po, with relation to Rome. Trānspādāni, orum, m. people who lived beyond, or north of, the Po.

Trāpēzūs, ūtis, f. Trébizonde, a town of Pontus, situated on a peninsula, and most probably had its name from its form. It was a colony of Sinopē. Sinab, near the river Pēxides. Scilāx, in his Periplus, calls the inhabitants Mācroōphāli, probably a nick-name. At one period it was a place of considerable note; but in 1460 it fell under the power of the Turks, in whose possession it still continues (Tac. Ann. xiii. 39). Inh. Trāpēzūtī, orum, m.—2. A town of Arcādia, near the river Alphēus, so called from a son of Lēcāon, the ruins of which are near Mavria. A colony from this town founded that of the same name on the Black Sea (Paus. viii. 27).—3. Another, near Sinus Arābiæ, the Red Sea (Steph.).—4. Tchetirdagh, a mountain in the south coast of the Crimea, nearly 1300 feet in height (Strab. 447).

Trāsmēnus, e. Trāsmēnūs, a, um. Trāsmēnūs lūcus, the Lake of Perugia, in Etruria, Tuscan, ten miles in length, and about seven in breadth, containing three islands, one near the southern extremity, called Polense, and the other two about a mile from the northern shore, of which the larger bears the name of Maggiore, and the lesser Minore. This lake has acquired distinction, from the dreadful slaughter of the Roman army under C. Flāminius, in its vicinity, by Hannibal, in 217 B. C., and a small stream which waters the plain has, from that bloody battle, received the appellation of Sanguinetto, or, Fossa del Sanguine. A village near that fatal spot is called Osaia. Trāsmēna littōra, the shores of the Lake of Perugia (Ov. Fast. vi. 765).

Trāsmēnus, i, m. son of Tŷrrhēnus, who gave his name to the lake. The poets represent him as a man of surpassing beauty, on which account the Nāids of that lake carried him off, and detained him in their caverns (Sil. Ital. v. 8).

Trāsmēchus. See Trāsmēchus.

Trāulus Mōntānus, Trauli Mōntāni, m. a Roman knight, of an elegant person, and ingenious manners, had the misfortune to be loved by Mēssālina who, having passed one night with him, became disgusted, and dismissal was the consequence. This unlawful intimacy cost Traulus Mōntānus his life, in the year 48 (Tac. Ann. xi. 36).

Trauos, e. Trauos, et. Trauos, i, m. the Curatch, a river of Thrācia, which falls into the lake Bistōnis (Herod. vii. 109).

Trausi, orum, m. a Thracian nation, who attacked the Roman army, returning from Asia, heavily loaded with spoil, near Tēmpyra, in 180 B. C.; but were defeated (Liv. xxxviii. 41).

Trēba, e, f. a town of Italy, near which Aulo, the Teverone, has its rise. Inh. Trēbāni, orum, m. (Plin. i. 361).

Trēbātius, i, m. a commander of the Sīmnites, who lost his life in the civil war (Ap. Bel. Civ. 381).

C. Trēbātius Tēsta, C. Trēbātī Tēstēs, m. a lawyer of great eminence, who stood high in the favour, both of C. Jūlius Cæsar and his successor. From the mention which Cicero has made of him, in different parts of his writings, and from his recommending him to Cæsar, when proconsul of Gallia, France, it cannot be doubted, that he had a very favourable opinion of his abilities and character. In consequence of their intimacy, Cicero wrote him a number of jocund and humorous letters. His paternal property was at Vēlia, which the orator dissuades him from selling (Epis. Fam. vii. 20). He formed no favourable expectation of the consequences of the civil war, and the event proved the accuracy of his judgment. Hōrātius, to justify his satires against the charge of excessive severity, introduces Trēbātius, who must then have been a very old man, dissuading him from writing more poems of that kind (Sat. ii. 1). In this spirited composition, Hōrātius supports the dialogue with great ability, and contrasts the two speakers, by opposing the grave solemnity of Trēbātius to his own playful levity.

Trēbelliēnus Rūfus, Trēbelliēni Rūfi, m. a Roman of prætorian rank, who was appointed guardian to the children of Cōtys, king of Thrācia, on their father's death, and afterwards regent of their kingdom. Accused of treason, Trēbelliēnus fell by his own hand, in the year 34 (Tac. Ann. ii. 67 seq.).

Trēbellius Cālca, Trēbelli Cālca, m. a man who claimed the property of Clōdīus, under a false pretence; but the integrity of the judges withstood his claim, although he was supported by the favour of the populace (Val. Max. ix. 15).

Trēbellius Māximus, Trēbelli Māximi, m. was appointed commissary, to take a census of Gallia, France, in the year 61. Q. Volūsius and Sextus Africānus were his colleagues in that office, men proud of their birth, who despised the meanness of their associate. In the government of Britānia, Trēbellius succeeded Pētrōnius Tŷrpiliānus, a command for which he was every way unqualified. Without experience as an officer, and naturally indolent, it can excite no surprise, that the troops mutinied, and that he avoided the fury of his own men by seeking safety in flight. Having been some time in concealment, he again resumed the command with diminished authority, and deep depression. The soldiers allowed him to remain unmolested, and he allowed them to remain uncontrolled. The commotion at last ceased, without causing the loss of a single life. Vēstius Būlānus succeeded him as commander in Britānia (Tac. Hist. v. 33. Tac. Agric. 16).

M. Trēbēllius, M. Trēbēllii, m. of Frēgille, an officer in the Roman army, under L. Clodius, in Illyricum, in 171 B. C. By order of his commander, he marched at the head of a strong force in Penēstia, to receive hostages, and also from the Parthiniāns (Liv. xliii. 21).—2. An officer under Vitellius when governor of Syria. The Cilae revolted, and Trēbēllius, having enclosed them within lines of circumvallation, reduced them to submission, partly by the sword, and partly by famine (Tac. Ann. vi. 41).

Q. Trēbēllius, Q. Trēbēllii, m. a centurion of the fourth legion in the Roman army, who disputed the honour of the mural crown at the taking of Carthāgo Nōva, with Sēxtus Dīgītius q. v. (Liv. xxvi. 43).

Trēbia, ae, m. the Trebia, a river of Itālia, Italy, which has its source in Apēnninus, the Apennines, and falls into Pādus, the Po, near Plācēntia, Placenza, hence Plinius, Trēbia Plācēntiāns (i. 363). On the banks of this stream, the Carthaginians, under Hānibal, defeated the Romans, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 54—56). Trēbia insignitū Sidōnitis tropaeis, Trēbia distinguished by a Carthaginian victory (Sil. Ital. vi. 109).

Trēbia, ae, f. Trevi, a town of Umbrīa, near the confines of Etrūria, Tuscany. Inh. Trēbiātes, iun, m. (Plin. i. 365).—2. Another, in Lātium, taken by Cōrdōlānus, and given to the Volsi, in 491 B. C. (Liv. ii. 39).—3. Another in Cāmpānia. Adj. Trēbiānus, a, um. Trēbiānus ager, the district belonging to Trēbia. Some editions of Līvius read Trēbiānus (xxiii. 14).

Trēbius, i, m. the fictitious name of a dependant and parasite, whom Jūvēnālis endeavours to dissuade from frequenting the tables of the great, where he would be treated with the utmost indignity and contempt (Sat. v. 19).

M. Trēbius Gāllus, M. Trēbii Gālli, m. a praefect, or tribune of the soldiers, sent by P. Crassus to forage among the Cūriōsōlites (Ces. B. G. iii. 7).

Stātius Trēbius, Stātii Trēbii, m. a native of Cōmpsa, a man of family, but overpowered by the faction of the Mōpsi. He promised to deliver his native city into the hands of Hānibal, which he easily effected (Liv. xxvii. 1).

Trēbōnūs, i, m. an adulterer, who had been surprised in the commission of that crime, and most probably severely, if not disgracefully, punished; the common fate of detected seducers (Hor. Sat. i. 4. 114).

Trēbōnūs Gārūciānus, Trēbōni Gārūciāni, m. the procurator of Africa, who, by order of the emperor Gālba, put Clōdus Mācer to death in that country, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. i. 7).

C. Trēbōnūs, C. Trēbōni, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who supported Trēbōnia lex, which he alleged had been subverted (Liv. v. 11).—2. A lieutenant-general under the Roman consul L. Pāpius Cūrsor, who, with C. Cædicius, commanded the cavalry in the engagement with the Sāminites, near Aquillōnia, in 295 B. C. (Liv. x. 40).—3. A tribune, by whom the first triumphate were enabled to get the law passed, which granted Gālbia and Gērmānia to Cæsar, Syria and the Parthian war to Crassus, and the two Spains to Pompey, for five years. He served as a lieutenant-general under Cæsar in the Gallic wars, was afterwards city praetor (praetor urbiūsus), pro-consul of Spain, and consul for three months. Although he owed all his preferment to Cæsar, he entered into the conspiracy which was formed against his life. The senate conferred on him the province of Asia, after the assassination of that ambitious and unprincipled general. He was killed at Smyrna by P. Cōrnēlius Dōlābella, in 45 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 119), and was the first of the conspirators against Cæsar, who suffered death. Adj. Trēbōnūs, et, Trēbōniāns, a, um. Trēbōnia lex, the law above-mentioned.

L. Trēbōnūs, L. Trēbōni, m. a tribune of the people, a violent enemy of the Fabriāns, whom he distressed by every possible means, on which account he received the surname of Asper. By his agency, a law passed in 447 B. C., that whoever took the votes of the commons, in the election of plebeian tribunes, should continue the proceedings, until he had completed the number ten (Liv. iii. 65).

M. Trēbōnūs, M. Trēbōni, m. a military tribune with consular authority at Rome, in 382 B. C. (Liv. vi. 21).

Trēbūla, ae, f. a town of Cāmpānia, which revolted to the Carthaginians, and was taken by Q. Fabius Māximus, the Roman consul, along with Hannibal's garrison, and a number of the Cāmpāni, in 217 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 39). Inh. Trēbūlāni, orum, m. whom Plinius surnames Bālinēnsēs (i. 360).

Trēbūla Mūtūscā, Trēbūle Mūtūscā, f. Monte Leone della Sabina, a town in the territory of the Sabines, which appears, from Mārtiālis, to have been exposed both to damp and cold (v. 72). Inh. Trēbūlāni Mūtūscāi, orum, m. received the right of Roman citizenship, in 504 B. C. (Liv. x. 1). Notwithstanding of their local disadvantages, the Trēbūlāni made good cheese, which Mārtiālis commends (xiii. 33). Plinius makes Mūtūscāi a surname, and mentions Trēbūlāni Sūffēnātes, inhabitants of Trēbūla Sūffēna, Montorio di Romagna, a town in the territory of the Sābini (i. 360). Adj. Trēbūlānus, a, um. Trēbūlānus ager, the territory of the Trēbūlāni (Cic. Leg. Agr. ii. 25). Trēbūlāna cina (Plin. iii. 135).

Trēchus, i, m. a native of Etōlia, killed by Hēctor (Hom. II. v. 706).

C. Trēmēllius, C. Trēmēlli, m. one of the ten commissioners for dividing large tracts of land in the north of Italy, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 4).

Cn. Trēmēllius, Cn. Trēmēlli, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who, provoked at not being chosen into the senate, protested against the petition of Tib. Sēmprius Grāchus and C. Clāudius Pūlicher, censors in 170 B. C., that the year and half, the time allowed, according to custom, for enforcing the repairs of buildings, and for approving the works which had been contracted for, should be lengthened (Liv. xlv. 15).—2. A tribune of the Roman people, was fined for contending unjustly with M. Aemilius Lēpidus, pōntifex māximus, by which the authority of the priesthood was rendered superior to that of the magistrate, in 161 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 47).

Cn. Trēmēllius Flāccus, Cn. Trēmēlli Flācci, m. a Roman of quaestorian rank, one of the five ambassadors sent to Attalus, king of Asia, in 207 B. C. He afterwards obtained the office of a plebeian edile and prætor. In the latter office he was governor of Sicilia, Sicily (Liv. xxix. 11 seq.).

L. Trēmellius, L. Trēmelli, m. a Roman quaestor, who killed a second Pseudophilippus in Macedonia, and cut off his army, in 146 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 53. Eutrop. iv. 15).

Trēviri, orum (Sing. Trēvir, iri), m. the Trevirians, a nation of Gallia Belgica, between Mosella, the Moselle, and Silva Ardennæ. Tacitus states, that they were ambitious of being thought of German origin (Mor. Ger. 28). C. Julius Caesar conquered them, in 55 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 107). Their chief city, Augusta Trēvirorum, afterwards from its inhabitants, Trēvir, now Triers, or Treves, stands on the east bank of the Moselle, over which it has a large bridge. Treves is one of the most ancient towns in Europe, is but thinly inhabited, and not well fortified. Adj. Trēverus, et, Trēvērius, a, um. Trēvēricus tumultus (Tac. Ann. iii. 42).

Triāria, æ, f. the wife of L. Vitellius, a woman cruel beyond her sex, who took a deep interest in the destruction of Dolabella, and exulted in the carnage and desolation of Terracina (Tac. Hist. ii. 63 seq.).

Triārii, orum, m. veteran soldiers of approved courage, who formed the third line of battle in the Roman army. Whilst the contest was sustained by the Hastati, or after they had been obliged to fall back, by the Hastati and Principes, the Triārii continued kneeling i. e. resting on their right knee, with their left leg stretched forward, holding their shields reclining on their shoulders, their spears fixed in the ground, with their points elevated to a certain height. As their shields did not cover their left limb, it was secured by a greave, and from the expression of Juvénalis, Crūisquē stolidi dimidium tegimen (Sat. vi. 256 seq.), it appears, that only the one half, or that part of the limb exposed to the enemy, was covered. When the Hastati and Principes were overpowered, they fell slowly back into the spaces between the Triārii, or veterans, hence the expression "Rem ad Triarios redisse", things are in the greatest danger. The Triārii then rose up, and received them into the intervals of their ranks, and having closed their files shut up as it were every opening. In one close body, the whole army advanced with a firm and dignified step against the enemy. This was the last resource, and if unsuccessful the battle was lost (Liv. viii. 8).

C. Triārius, C. Triārii, m. a noble Roman, who is said to have advised Pompeius to order his men to receive Caesar's charge without moving out of their place. He had been a lieutenant-general of Lucullus against Mithridates, and was killed during the Civil war (Cæs. B. C. iii. 5 seq.).

Triballi, orum, m. a people of Mœsia (Plin. i. 386). Eutropius makes the Triballi a people of Macedonia (iv. 27). They met Philip, king of Macedonia, returning from the Scythian war, took from him the whole spoil, and left himself severely wounded (Just. ix. 3). Adj. Triballicus, a, um.

Triboei, v. Tribœi, orum, et, Tribœes, um, m. the Tribœians, a people, originally of German extraction, who settled in the east of Gallia Belgica, near Rhœnus, the Rhine (Cæs. B. G. i. 51 seq.).

Tribūci, orum, m. a Roman fort in Germany, near Concordia q. v.; Ammianus Marcellinus places both Concordia and Tribūci in the territory of the Tribœi (xvi. 12).

Tribūni, orum (Sing. Tribūnus, i), plēbis. Tribunes of the people; Plebeian Magistrates, whose duty it was to defend the commons against the severity of the usurers, the oppression of the great, and the infringement of their liberties by the senate or consuls. To procure a remission of debts, and redress of certain grievances, the plebeians quitted the city, in 494 B. C., and refused to return, until their request was granted, and magistrates from among themselves appointed, to protect them from cruelty and oppression for the time to come. The number of Tribunes at first was only two, afterwards five, and in 456 B. C., it was augmented to ten, which continued ever after, without alteration. As the office of the tribunes was chiefly to redress the wrongs of the people, the election at first would necessarily be restricted to their own order. The great power which they afterwards enjoyed, induced Patricians to sue for the office. Previously to their becoming candidates, it was necessary they should be adopted by a Plebeian family, a degradation to which many of the nobles submitted. A law was passed, in 139 B. C., restricting the election of tribunes of the people to those of senatorian dignity, which seems to have regulated the election during the continuance of that magistracy. It was contrary to law, for a man to accept either the office of tribune of the people, or plebeian edile, during the lifetime of his father, if his father had sat on a curule chair (Liv. xxx. 19). The tribunes were at first chosen at the Comitia Curiata, and from 471 B. C. at the Comitia Tributa. A peculiarity in the election of these plebeian magistrates, is deserving of notice. None of the former tribunes, or of the magistrates then in office, presided, but he, who was first chosen of the ten new tribunes, placed himself at the head of the Comitia, until his nine colleagues were elected. The first tribune having been created on 10th December, custom or law fixed that day for their induction in future. No particular dress distinguished these magistrates from the other citizens; but their persons were sacred. When out of doors, a Plator preceded them, and every person rose, as a mark of respect, when they passed. In administering justice, they did not sit on a tribunal, but on benches. For a considerable time after the appointment of this office, it was so very humble, that tribunes were not even accounted magistrates, or permitted to enter the senate—honours which the increase of power afterwards secured them. Supported by the commons, and ambitious of great influence in the state, they aspired at authority incompatible with Roman privileges. They put a negative on the decrees of the senate, prevented the collection of the revenues, the creation of magistrates, and the proceedings of all the courts of law. Nor did their claims stop here. Their interference kept the consuls from leaving Rome to take the command of their provinces, arrested the course of justice, and rendered the sentence of the other magistrates void. They sometimes forced a victorious general to descend from his triumphal car, and even ordered the consuls to be imprisoned. To make laws binding on their constituents might have been tolerated, since the remedy was in their hands; but they claimed the power of holding and dismissing the senate, of fixing the length of time any member, even the consuls, should speak, of commanding silence, and of hindering the censors to fill up the vacancies which occurred in that illustrious assembly. They had by law the power of apprehending, but not of summoning (Gel. xiii. 12). C. Licinius Stolo, and L. Sextius, tribunes of the people, prevented the election of the curule magistrates, for five successive years after, 375 B. C. (Liv. vi. 35). In these cases, unanimity was probably necessary. M. Porcius Cato, tribune of the people, prohibited L. Manlius Acidinus from entering Rome in an ovation, about 201 B. C., after it had been granted by the senate (Liv. xxxii. 7). This extravagant power of the tribunes could only be resisted two ways; either by procuring one of themselves to oppose the rest, or by investing the consuls with the authority of a dictator. From their number, the former mode would, in most cases, be easily accomplished, and therefore was more commonly resorted to. The other colleagues might bring the opposers to trial before the people, for interposing their negative; but matters were seldom carried to that height. The law restricted the jurisdiction of the tribunes to Rome, and one mile around. They could not be a single night out of the city, except at Feria Latiua: (a festival celebrated on the Alban Mount, by the Romans and Latins, in proof of their friendship), or when sent to any particular place by the senate or people. In that case, they enjoyed, wherever they went, the same authority as in Rome. It cannot be denied, that the turbulence of the tribunes greatly agitated and embroiled the state, and gave birth to more violent animosities and contentions between the nobility and the commons, than those they were created to allay. The love of power and aggrandizement, stimulated them to aspire at authority and dignity which the senate strenuously resisted. In most instances, the rights of the commons formed the ostensible plea, but on gratifying their own vanity, they consented readily, that the other should be withdrawn. To their exertions, however, the plebeians were indebted for admission into the senate, and all the offices of state. Luxury, which corrupted the morals of the Romans, and overturned the constitution, converted the tribunes from being guardians of the rights of the commons, to be the creatures of the wealthy, and the tools of the ambitious. Sulla greatly weakened the power of the tribunes, which Pompey restored (Ap. Bel. Civ. 445). C. Julius Caesar nearly annihilated the power of these magistrates, which they had most unlawfully prostituted to his aggrandizement. Augustus artfully procured that office for himself, and, from the date of his election, may almost be reckoned the abolition of the tribuneship. Still it continued, though a nominal office, till the time of C. by whom it was finally suppressed. tribunus, us, m. the office of a tribuneship. Adj. Tribunicius, icius, a, um. Tribuniciū tribus or gore of the tribunes (Luc. Ph. Robora in this line, should begin ital letter, to mark the distinct robora, oak, and a place in the which a certain kind of male precipitated, which is the near term here. See Tullianum. Trib (Tac. Ann. i. 2).

Tribuni, orum (Sing. Tribunum, Tribunes of the soldiers; of Roman army, who had the command of a legion. To take works and camp, to communicate word to the guards, and to give certain cases, formed the duty of tribunes. Their office, in sure, corresponded to that of British army. Romulus first a tribunes, to whom he gave that their being only three in number, each tribe. But afterwards, each six tribunes. The right of nom longed first to the kings, then to or dictators, and, at a later people. To prevent dissension, and people agreed to share the right; hence those chosen by them; hence those chosen by were called Ritili, or, Ritili, for Ritus, who passed a law on power of election on the consuls chosen by the latter Comitia, appointment by the votes of the Comitia. They wore gold the common soldiers iron rings (Pun. 63). To mark their rank the epithets Laticlavii, or, A from the distinguishing badges of tors and knights. Some, not supposed that these epithets were not to those who were of senatorial rank; but to those made tribunes with the view of mitted into these orders. Tribuni consulari potestate, tribunes of with consular authority, were elected of the consuls in 444 B. C. number was three, and not regular for the Romans frequently retook old magistrates, the consuls. In 4 number of military tribunes was to four, and in several succeeding number varied, sometimes three, four; but in 404 B. C. six were 402 B. C. eight, next year six, tinued without variation till 366 the military tribunes were also continued (Liv.).

Tribus, us, m. a division of I zens, instituted by Servius Tullius he had divided the city into four cording to its situation, he called "I suppose" says Livius, "from with him originated the mode of paying his share of public burdens to the valuation of his property." This division of the people was merely local, and conveyed no than a certain space of ground and inhabitants. The arrangement referred to the origin of the people the meaning conveyed by the word different under the first, and the sixth king of Rome. Afterwards, when the tribes increased, as they did at last, to thirty-five, the original idea was lost, and it then denoted not any particular district of the city, but a body of citizens connected by an equal participation of the rights of the tribe, and had not the slightest reference to their residence. From the business of agriculture being held in greater estimation by the Romans than that of the trades, the rustic were reckoned more honourable than the city tribes, on which account the poorest and lowest of the people were enrolled in the latter (Liv. i. 13 seq.).

Tricāstini, orum, m. a people of Gallia, France, on the east bank of Rhodanus, the Rhone. Augusta, St. Paul-Trois-châteaux, seems to have been their chief town, and the Scālauni their neighbours on the north. Hannibal marched through their country, on his route from Spain to Italy (Liv. xxi. 31), and, from an expression of Silius Italicus (faciles campos), it appears to have afforded an expeditious passage, interrupted neither by mountains nor rivers. Adj. Tricāstinus, a, um; Tricāstinī fines (Sil. Ital. iii. 466).

Tricca, a, f. Tricca, a town of Thessaly, to which Philip, king of Macedonia, hastily marched, in 200 B. C., after he had been defeated on Aōus, the Pollonia, by the Roman consul, T. Quinctius Flamininus. Amyndar, king of the Athamānes, took possession of Tricca, in 193 B. C.; but it was retaken the same year, by the combined army of the same monarch and M. Baebius Tamphilus (Liv. xxxii. 13 seq.).

Tricēsima, arum, f. Kellen, a town of Germany. It was otherwise called Cōlōnia Trōjana, the former name from the thirtieth legion being in garrison there. This town stood near the Rhine (Amm. Mar. xviii. 2).

Trichāces, um (Sing. Trichāx, icis), m. a Grecian people, in the opinion of some authors, found in Crete, Euboea and Peloponnesus. Commentators on Hōmērus are divided with respect to the meaning of this word, which occurs only in Od. xix. 177. In the best editions, Trichāces is not considered a proper name, a reading in some degree supported by Strābo (693).

Tricōrii, orum, m. a people of Gallia, France, through whose country Hannibal marched, on his route from Spain to Italy (Liv. xxi. 31). They appear to have lived near the junction of Rhodanus, the Rhone, and Isāra, the Isere. Adj. Tricōrius, a, um; Tricōrii saltus (Amm. Mar. xv. 10).

Tridentum, i, n. Trente, a town of Rhaetia, on Athēsis, the Adige, about a mile in circumference, surrounded by a wall, adorned with many princely palaces, and elegant churches. Here was held a famous council, which began in the year 1545, and ended in 1563. According to Justinus, it was built by the Gauls (xxi. 5). Inhab. Tridentini, orum, m. Adj. Tridentinus, a, um; Tridentina jūga (Flor. iii. 3).

Trīentius, a, um. Trīentius ager, land which the Roman citizens received, in 202 B. C., for the last third payment due to them for the gold, silver, and brass which they had contributed to the treasury, when exhausted, hence the name (Liv. xxxi. 18).

Trītērīcus, a, um. Trītērīca sēra, festivals in honour of Bācchus, celebrated chiefly by the Thracians, at the completion of every third year, from which the word is derived (Ov. Met. vi. 587).

Trifānum, i, n. a place in Lātium, between Sinūessa and Mintūrna, at which the Roman consul, T. Mānlius Tōrquātus, completely defeated the reinforcements collected by the Latins, soon after he had conquered them at Cāpua, in the year 339 B. C. This victory crushed the power of the Latins, and compelled them to submit to the power of the Romans (Liv. viii. 11).

Trifōlinus, a, um. Trifōlinus ager, probably a part of Cāmpānia, for it does not appear certain, that there was either a town or mountain of this name; the latter, some suppose, is now called Monte di St. Martino, not far from Naples (Juv. Sat. ix. 56). Trifōlina vīna, commended by several of the Roman writers, but a doubt remains as to the meaning of the word, Trifōlinum, whether denoting the herb trifol, produced in great quantities in that district, or, that the vines were not fit to be drunk before tērtius fultōrum exōrtus, the third breaking of the leaf, i. e. the third year (Plin. iii. 135).

Trigecini, orum, m. a people of Spain (Flor. iv. 12).

Trimērus, i, f. Tremiti, an island in the Gulf of Venice, near the Italian coast, anciently included in Insula Diōmēdē (Tac. Ann. iv. 71). It is sometimes written Tremitus.

Trinacris, idis, et, Trinacria, Triquetra, e, f. Triquetra, a, f. the island of Sicily, so named from its triangular form. Justinus makes it the original name of the island (iv. 2).

Trinobāntes, um, m. a nation of ancient Britain, inhabiting the counties now called Essex and Middlesex. Cassivellaunus was their king, at the time Caesar invaded this island (Cæs. B. G. v. 20 seq.).

Tricāla, a, f. Troccoli, an inland town of Sicily, Sicily, in the southwest part of that island, which Sālvius, or Tryphon, at the head of a body of fugitives, founded. According to Diōdorus Siculus, who mentions it as a fort, or castle, rather than a town, it had this name from possessing three beauties (τρεῖς καλῆς); first, it abounded with springs of uncommonly fine fresh water; secondly, the lands around it, planted with vines and olives, were remarkably adapted for cultivation; and, thirdly, it was a place of uncommon strength, standing on a steep and impregnable rock. That author makes its circumference eight stadia. Stephanus writes Tricālon, i, n. et, Tricāla, orum, n. It was destroyed during the Servile war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 270). Inhab. Tricālani, orum, m. (Plin. i. 348).

Triones, um, m. two constellations, near the N. pole, called also Ursa Major, the Greater Bear, and Ursa Minor, the Less Bear (Ov. Met. ii. 171).

Triōpa, et, Triōpes, a, m. the youngest son of Nēptūnus and Cānicē, daughter of Eōlus, and brother of Opīeus, Nereus, Epōpeus and Alōeus. He had one son, Erichthon, and one daughter, Iphimēdia. Apollōdorus calls him Triōps (i. 7). Triōpis, idis, f. a female descendant of Triōpa; Mēstra, daughter of Erichthon, and granddaughter of Triöpa (Ov. Met. viii. 872). Adj. Triöpēus, a, um. Triöpētus (älius), Erichthon (Ov. Met. viii. 751).

Triöpa, w. f. a town of Cäria. Adj. Triöpūs, et. Triöpūs, a, um. Triöpium promontorium, Cape Krio, the promontory upon which the town stood. Triöpūs Apölla, from that god being worshipped at Triöpa. Triöpium säcrum, the temple of Apölla at Triöpa (Herod. i. 144).

Triphýlia, w. f. a district of Arcädia, between Elis and Mëssënia, so called from the union of three nations, or from Triphýlus, a son of Arcas, restored by Philippus, king of Macëdönia, to the Achæi, in 209 B. C., to whom it appears to have both before and afterwards belonged (Liv. xxviii. 8 seq.).

Tripölis, is, f. Trinoli, a maritime district of Africa, between Sýrtis Minor, the Gulf of Kabes, and Sýrtis Major, the Gulf of Zudic. It began at Sýrtis Minor, and extended to the east of Léptis Magna, Lebida. From this town, Cæa, and Sabrâta, Sabart, it received the name of Tripölis (i. e. the three cities). Adj. Tripölitānus, a, um. Tripölitāna prövincia (Eutrop. viii. 18).—2. A district of Læcönicus ager, next to the frontiers of the Mëgälopölitæ (Liv. xxxv. 27).—3. Called by the natives Tripölis Scëa, probably from its being on the left bank of Pëncus, the Salampra; a district of Thëssälia. Here the Roman consul, P. Licinius Crässus, encamped in 173 B. C., as he advanced against Persëus, king of Macëdönia (Liv. xlii. 53 seq.). The readings vary, some making Tripölis a town. Inh. Tripölitāni, orum, m. (Amm. Mar. xxviii. 6).

Adj. Tripölitānus, a, um. Tripölitānus ager, desolated by Mënippus, a general of Antiöchus, king of Sýria, in the year 193 B. C., when that king invaded Thessaly (Liv. xxxvi. 10).—4. Tarabolus, a town of Phënicia (Curt. iv. 1).

Triptölëmus, i, m. was the son of Elëüsīnus, king of Elëüsis and Cöthonea. Cëres, in search of her daughter Prösërpina, came to the house of this monarch, and, assuming the appearance of a wet nurse, the queen gave to this goddess her son to suckle. Wishing to render her foster-child immortal, she fed him with the milk of a divinity, through the day, and secretly covered him over with fire during the night, in order to destroy every part that was human. The consequence was, that his growth greatly exceeded that of ordinary mortals. The goddess, enraged at the fear exhibited by the father, deprived him of life, and taught the son the art of sowing grain. Cælius wished to put Triptölëmus to death, because he instructed men how to cultivate the ground, but, understanding it was by the order of Cëres, he resigned to him his kingdom. The youth instituted the rites of Cëres, which the Greeks called Thësmöphöria; and he gave the kingdom the name of his father. This is the account of Hygīnus, who seems to make a distinction between Cælius and Elëüsis, v. Elëüsīnus, perhaps only two names for the same person. Apöllödörus makes his mother Mëtänira, and says, according to Panyasis, his father was Elëüsis, and Phërcydes maintains that he was the son of Ocëüsus and Tërra. He adds, that the boy Dëmöphon, whom Cëres nursed, was burned to death, in consequence of the fright of the parents, and that the goddess taught the art of husbandry to Triptölëmus, who was his oldest son (i. 5).

Trítæn, w. f. Kastrítza, a town of the Achæi. Only the vestiges of a fortress are remain. Inh. Trítæncës, ium, m. (Herod. i. 145).

Trítëa, arum, f. a city of Phöcis (Herod. viii. 33).

Trítön, önis, m. one of the gods of the sea, who was trumpeter to Nëptünus, hence Triton cänörus (Ov. Met. ii. 8). From Ovidius, his trumpet appears to have had the power of calming the sea when agitated by a tempest. Virgilius describes him as having the human form to the middle, and the rest of the body that of a fish. This is the figure of him on the prow of the ship of Aulëstes (Virg. Æn. x. 209 seq.). According to Pausänias, Triton was in form wholly a fish, except in some part of the head, in which there was a slight resemblance to the human countenance (viii. 21). He is generally considered the son of Nëptünus by Amphitrinë; but there seem to have been more than one of this name. Trítönis, idos, f. of Triton, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Adj. Trítönilus, et. Trítönilëus, a, um.

Trítön, önis, m. a ship belonging to the Carthaginians or Sicilians, which was taken by the Romans in a naval engagement, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 578).

Trítön, önis, m. the Cabes, a large river of Libýa, which falls into an extensive lake named Trítönis, the Lake of Farnasi (Herod. iv. 178. Pin. Pyth. iv. 36).

Trítöna, w. v. Trítönis, idos, f. a name of Minërva, either from a Cretan word signifying the head, because she sprang from the brain of Jupiter, or from the lake Trítönis, in Libýa, where she was first seen, and where she spent the early part of her life. Alma Trítönis Pallas (Lucr. vi. 750). Trítönis, idos, f. of Minërva, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Adj. Trítönilus, et. Trítönilëus, a, um. Trítönis, v. Trítöna pinus, the Argö, from Minërva giving the plan of that ship. Trítöna cirpa, Minërva (Virg. Æn. xi. 483). Trítönilet arundo, a musical instrument invented by Minërva (Ov. Met. vi. 384). Trítönilëa pälus, a lake in Thräcia, in which he who immersed himself nine times, was changed into a bird (Ov. Met. xv. 358).

Trítönon, i, n. v. Trítönus, i, f. an inconsiderable town of Döris, taken by Philippus, king of Macëdönia, in the year 209 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 7).

Trívia, w. f. a name of Diäna, who presided over the places where three ways met, in which her statues were frequently erected with three faces, one looking along each of the roads. The word is, properly speaking, the feminine of the adjective Trívius, a, um.

Triümphus, i, m. a triumph, or military procession, in which the victorious general paraded the streets of Rome, in a splendid chariot drawn by four horses, generally white, preceded by musicians, behind whom were led oxen with gilded horns, and their heads ornamented with fillets, which were to be offered on the altar, next the spoils taken from the enemy; afterwards the name of the vanquished nations, with the representations of the conquered cities, behind which were the captive commanders, with their children and attendants. The lieutenants followed, with their fasces surrounded with laurel, and behind them a great number of musicians and dancers, habited like satyrs, and wearing crowns of gold. In the midst of this group, was a person in female dress, who acted the part of a pantomime, insulting the conquered by looks and gestures. Behind them, but before the general, was a great crowd of people carrying perfumes. Besides a crown of laurel on his head, and a branch of that tree in his right hand, the general held in his left an ivory sceptre, with an eagle on the top, and a golden ball, suspended from his neck, hung on his breast. In resemblance of the statues of Jupiter on festival days, his face was covered with vermillion. In order to appear more majestic, he did not sit, but stood in the chariot, in which were frequently his children, and always behind him a slave holding a crown, whose duty it was to whisper often into his ear, "Remember that thou art a man." His relations and friends, as well as a vast concourse of citizens, attended him. Under the emperors, the consuls and senators followed the triumphal car on foot, previously to the age of Augustus they went before it. The troops whose valour had gained the victory, closed the procession. Besides the gifts which they had received for their bravery, they were ornamented with laurel, went singing sometimes the praises of their general, at other times throwing out against him the most bitter sarcasms, indulging in every kind of humour without restraint. As the procession advanced, the common exclamation was "Io triumphe," in which they were joined by the spectators. In general, this pompous exhibition of military success, began at Campus Martius, passed along Via triumphalis, afterwards along the most public streets of Rome, and terminated at the capitol. On leaving the Forum, at one period of the Roman state, the general ordered the kings and commanders whom he had made prisoners, to be led to prison, and to be put to death. This barbarous practice appears to have ceased, as the Romans became more civilized, for we find that after such persons had adorned the conqueror's procession, they were sent to Alba, as Siphax in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 17). He was afterwards removed to Tibur (Liv. xxx. 45). Guntius, king of Illyricum, was kept in confinement at Igurivium (Liv. xlv. 43).

After the conqueror had ascended the capitol, and expressed his gratitude to Jupiter, for the victory which he had won, he commanded the victims, which were always white, to be sacrificed, and generally presented a golden crown to that god, to whom part of the spoils were dedicated. A sumptuous entertainment was then given to the relations and friends of the hero, besides a great number of the distinguished citizens. That the conqueror might be the chief man of the party, the consuls, although invited, were not expected to attend, and, after the feast, the general was conducted home in torch light, with music and a crowd of attendants. The gold and silver taken from the enemy, were sometimes wholly assigned to the treasury, at other times part was given to the troops.

Opulio, was an inferior triumph, in which the general was not crowned with laurel, but myrtle, and instead of oxen, sheep were sacrificed, hence the name. Victory only was necessary to obtain an ovation, the commander might have returned without his army, left the country unsubdued, and neither troops nor captives appeared at the procession. A victory at sea was sometimes honoured with a triumph, of which the first was decreed to C. Duilius, consul, for having defeated the Carthaginian fleet, in 262 B. C.

No commander was entitled to a triumph, unless he had killed five thousand of the enemy in battle, and he was bound by law to make oath before the city quaestors, that the numbers, both of the enemy killed, and of the Roman soldiers who had fallen in battle, were correct. The honour could only be claimed by a dictator, a consul, or a praetor. To L. Cornélius Lentulus, governor of Spain, for many years, a triumph was refused, in 202 B. C., because he was a pro-consul, although the senate allowed that his actions merited that honour, but they granted him an ovation. It was not enough that the enemy was defeated, they must have been subdued, and the country reduced to tranquillity, the commander brought off his troops, and he still in office. The success of L. Manlius Acidinus entitled him to a triumph, but, because the Celtiberi were not completely conquered, it was refused. The pages of Livius, however, prove that these regulations were not always observed. L. Furius Purpureo, praetor, had the honour of a triumph for his victory over the Gauls, after he had given the army over to C. Aurelius, in 201 B. C. Before his chariot, no prisoners were led, no spoils were carried, and no soldiers followed him. The tribunes of the people could prevent two from putting in a joint claim for a triumph, as was done by C. Atilius Labio, and C. Ursanius, in the case of C. Cornélius Cethegus, and L. Minucius Rufus, in 199 B. C.

Two commanders, by uniting their forces, might be permitted to triumph for the victory gained over the same people, in the same battle. C. Calpurnius Piso, praetor, in the south of Spain, and L. Quinctius Crispinus, praetor, in the north of Spain, united their forces, and conquered the Lusitani and Celtiberi, were both present in the engagement, and for that single battle, both had the honour of a triumph, in 186 B. C., but not on the same day.

M. Baebius Tamphilus, and P. Cornélius Cethegus, pro-consuls, to whom in the former year, when consuls, Liguria had been decreed their province, were the first who triumphed without defeating the enemy in battle. To them the Apulian Ligures surrendered, without striking a blow, and were settled in lands among the Samnites. In their procession, there were no spoils, no hostages, no prisoners, and they gave no money to the soldiers.

For some time after the establishment of the republic, the senate possessed the sole power of granting or refusing a triumph; but in 448 B. C., M. Horatius Barbatus, and L. Valerius Potitus triumphed by order of the people, without the authority of the senate. A stronger instance is that of L. Postumius Megellus, who triumphed not only in opposition to the senate, but also to the protest of seven of the plebeian tribunes, being supported only by three of the latter, in 296 B. C. Many similar instances occur in Roman history.

Ancient authors have not recorded, with sufficient minuteness, the nature of the triumph on Mōns Albānus, whether it agreed in every particular with the just triumph, or in what circumstances it resembled or differed from it, so that the term communicates merely a general idea of a triumph. From Vālerius Māximus, it may be inferred, that in the processions on the Alban mount, myrtle and not laurel was used (iii. 6). That it was held inferior to the regular triumph, admits of no doubt, but it had one important advantage, in not requiring either a decree of the senate, or an order of the people. Personal and party feuds, to say nothing of the turbulence of the plebeian tribunes, too often intervened, and deprived, or attempted to deprive, a successful commander, of his merited honours, which sometimes rendered it necessary to show the proofs of his victory on the Alban mount. The first who triumphed on this mountain, was C. Pāpius Māso, consul, in 233 B. C. Others followed his example. Sometimes, when the conqueror was allowed only an ovation, he triumphed on the preceding day on this mount. On returning from Sicily, M. Claudius Mārcellus, triumphed on Mōns Albānus, and next day entered Rome in an ovation, in 213 B. C. For the conquest of Sicily he was refused a triumph, because he had not brought away his army.

For victory in civil wars, or for the recovery of territory which had belonged to the Romans, no triumph was granted; addition to the empire was requisite to entitle to that honour (Val. Max. ii. 8).

1. Triūmviri capitāles, v. Triūmviri cārēris, three Roman judges, who had the charge of punishments and prisons, hence their name. They were first appointed in 291 B. C. Like the cōdiles, they seem to have had a certain charge of the streets, to prevent any thing uncommon being done on them, and also to prohibit any kind of sacrifice in a new or foreign manner. The Roman religion and rites appear at this time to have been almost discontinued, and observances adopted previously unknown at Rome (Liv. xxv. 1).

2. Triūmviri Essulōnes, were first created at Rome in 198 B. C. It was their duty to regulate the feasts of the gods, and the law allowed them, as well as the pontiffs, to wear the tōga pretēxtāta, i. e. a purple-bordered gown. The idea of this office seems to have originated with C. Licinius Lācillus, a tribune who made the proposal for their creation. He had the honour of the first appointment (Liv. xxxiii. 42). 3. Triūmviri noctūrni, had the charge of the night watches.

Trōas, adis, f. a daughter of Nēoptōlēmus, king of the Molossi, who was married to Arrūbas, and her sister Olympias, to Philippus, king of Macedōnia (Just. vii. 6).

70. Trōcmi, orum, m. one of the three tribes of Gauls who emigrated to Asia, to whom the coast of Hellēspōntus, the Dardanelles, was allotted (Liv. xxxviii. 16). See Tectō- ridges and Tolistoboi.

71. Træzen, enis, f. supposed to have been a tragedy which Sābinus had begun to write, but left unfinished at his death. The readings in Ovidius, where Træzen occurs, differ much, and nothing certain, either respecting the word, or the idea intended to have been conveyed by it, has yet been ascertained (Ep. Pont. iv. 16. 15).

Træzen, enis, et, Træzēnē, es, f. Damula, a maritime city of Argōlis, a country of Peloponēsus, the Morea. Pithēus lived there; hence Pithēia Træzen (Ov. Met. vi. 418). The plain of Damula is only partly cultivated, from want of population, which renders the air unhealthy in the summer months. Both the wine and water of this city the ancients considered bad, and they retain the same character. The port was called Pogon, i. e. the beard, from the long tongue of land by which it is formed being narrow and beading like a scythe. It is about a mile and a half from the present village, is shallow, and admits only small boats. The town was called Thēcia, from its being the birthplace of Thēseus; hence Stātius, Thēcia Træza (Th. iv. 81). Inh. Træzēni, orum, m. They and the Epidaurii built Hallēcōnium (Herod. vii. 99). Adj. Træzēnius, a, um. Træzēnius hēros, Lēlex (Ov. Met. viii. 565).

Træzēnus, i, m. a Thracian prince, the father of Euphēmus (Horn. ii. li. 847).

Trōgilos, i, f. a small town on the east coast of Sicilia, Sicily, to the north of Syracuse, which appears to have been exposed to the south wind; hence, Trōgila inquit Austris (Sil. Ital. xiv. 259). Inh. Trōgilli, orum, m. Portus Trōgillōrum (Liv. xxv. 23).

Trōglōdytæ, arum, m. a tribe of *Ethiopi*ans, who lived near the Arabian Gulf, and whose name is said to signify "dwellers in caverns" (Cart. iv. 7). Adj. Trōglōdytæ, a, um.

Trōgus Pōmpēius, Trōgi Pōmpēi, a Gaul who traced his descent from the Vōcōntii. His grandfather received the privileges of Rome, through Cn. Pōmpēius, in which he assumed his name, and his father fought under C. Julius Cæsar. Trōgus wrote a general history of the world, in forty-four books, to which he gave the name of Philippicæ, from his having treated chiefly the Macedonian empire. Justinus abridged his writings. The age in which he lived is doubtful, and of his history the Epitōmē only remains (Just. xliii. 5).

Trōilium, i, n. a town of Etrūria, Tuscany, taken by Sp. Cārvilius, consul, in the year 295 B. C. (Liv. x. 46). As nothing of Trōilium is known, we think the reading should be Trōssūlum q. v.

Trōilus, i, m. a son of Priāmus and Hēcuba, who fell by the hand of Achilles in the Trojan war. Virgilius has celebrated his bravery, and described him as represented in the Trojan battles, pourtrayed on the doors of Juno's temple at Carthage (Æn. i. 474).

Trōja, æ, f. Troy (Eng.), one of the most celebrated cities of antiquity, founded at the foot of Ida, a lofty chain of mountains, of which the highest summit is said to have been called Gārgārus, Kardighy, in Asia Minor, Natolia, by Dārdānius, the son of Jupiter and Elēctra, from whom it was called Dārdānia, æ, f. and the inhabitants Dārdāniæ, arum, m. At the death of this prince, Erichthōnius mounted the throne, and was succeeded by Tros, in honour of whom the city received the name of Trōja, and the natives were denominated Trōes. Ilus next assumed the reins of government, and Ilum became the common appellation of his capital. The sceptre afterwards passed into the hands of Lāomēdon, whose successor, Priāmus, was the last of the Trojan kings. Of the strength and resources of this city, some idea may be formed, from its baffling the united efforts of all Greece for ten years. That destructive war is celebrated in the Iliad of Hōmērus, and Æneid of Virgilius, two of the noblest productions of human genius. Cātullus has beautifully described the enormous carnage of that bloody siege, in a single line—"Iniquitous Troy, the common grave of Europe and Asia" (lxviii. 89). According to Dares it had six gates, Antēnōris, Dardāniē, Ilia, Catumbria, Trōjana, and Scæa. Lāomēdon tēta Trōja, Troy, of which Lāomēdon was king (Virg. Geor. i. 502). Nēptūnia Trōja, from the Trojan walls having been built by Nēptūnus and Apōllo (Virg. Æn. ii. 625), for a certain sum which they were to receive from Lāomēdon, but of which he defrauded them; hence Perjūra Trōja (Virg. Æn. v. 811). Trōjagēna, w. c. g. a descendant of the Trojans (Juv. Sat. i. 100). Trōas, ādis, f. dat. plur. Trōasin (Ov. Ep. Her. xiii. 137). Viga, the territory of Troy. Ager Trōidis (Cic. Nep. Paus. 3). Trōias, iādis, f. Trojan, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Trōias hūmus (Ov. Ep. Her. xiii. 94). Pērsās calls the Romans, in contempt, Trōiādes (l. 4). Iah. Trōjāni, orum, m. Trōes, un. (Sing.) Trōs, ōis, m. Adj. Trōjānus, Trōicus, Trōius, et. Trōus, a, um. Trōjana tēpora, the Trojan times, i. e. the time of the Trojan war (Hor. Od. i. 28. 11). Trōjānus rex, the Trojan king, i. e. Ænēas (Virg. Æn. xi. 230). Trōica Vēsta, Trojan Vēsta, i. e. the statue of Vēsta, or the Pallādium, which Ænēas carried from Troy with the sacred fire and household gods (Ov. Met. xv. 730). Non scripsit Trōica (carmina), he did not write verses on the destruction of Troy (Juv. Sat. viii. 221). The poet means as Nēro did. Trōius hēros, Ænēas (Virg. Æn. vi. 451). Trōia pēcēdos, the Trojan priestess, i. e. Ilia, who was a vestal virgin, and of Trojan descent (Hor. Od. iii. 3. 32). Trōa agmina (Ov. Met. xii. 74).—2. A city on the coast of the Gulf of Venice, in the territory of the Eugānēi, built by Antēnor (Liv. i. 1).—3. A town in the Laurentian territory, founded by Ænēas, where he first landed on reaching the Italian coast (Liv. i. 1). Trōjānus pōgus, the district in which the city of Antēnor stood (Liv. i. 1). Trōphōnius, i. m. a distinguished architect of antiquity, who built the temple of Apōllo at Dēlphi, in which he had the assistance of his brother Agāmēdes. Instead of giving him a reward, for the time which he had spent in erecting that edifice, the priests advised him to live so many days in the greatest hilarity, before the end of which, both he and his brother were found dead in bed. It is not improbable, that the priests had accomplished their death. Spēcius Trōphōnū, a cave in Boētia, in which Trōphōnius was worshipped with great solemnity (Liv. xlv. 27). His responses were long held in high estimation. Of his cave, sacrifices, and of the manner in which he was consulted, Pausānias, from personal observation, gives a detailed account (ix. 39). Adj. Trōphōnius, a, um. Trōphōnius Jūpiter.

Trōpēus, a, um, tropical; relating to the tropics. Trōpica (signa), Aries, Cancer, Libra, and Capricornus, so called by Mānilius, from the equinoxes and solstices occurring when the sun is in these signs (iii. 617). Trōpici cīrculī, the tropics of Cancer and Capricorn, which have this name from the sun turning back, as soon as he has reached either of them. These circles are at the distance of 23° 28' from the Equator, and the space between them, from having the sun vertical twice a-year, and consequently very hot, is called the Torrid Zone. See Zōna. Trōpica, orum, n. changes, alterations, conversions.

Tros, ōis, m. son of Erichthōnius, and father of Ilus, Assāricus, and Gānymēdes, was king of Trōja, and from him the city received that name (Hom. Il. xx. 230).

Trōmis, is, f. a city of Lower Mýsia, on the south bank of Ister, the Danube, not far from Pōntus Euxīnus, the Black Sea, which the Scythians took from the Romans, and Græcīnus recovered by force of arms (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 9. 79).

Trosobores, is, m. commanded the Cilices Clitæ, who revolted in the year 53. Antīochus, having gained the favour of the people, got into his hands Trosobores with his chief adherents, whom he put to death (Tac. Ann. xii. 55).

Trōssūlum, i. n. Monte Fiascore, a town of Etrūria. Iah. Trōssūlī, orum, m. Adj. Trōssūlus, a, um. Trōssūlī equites (Liv. x. 46).

Trūentum, i. n. the Tronto, a river of Picēnum, with a cognominal town (Plin. i. 361). Pōmpōnīus Mēla calls the town Trūentinum, and adds, that it is likewise the name of the river which flows past it (li. 4). According to some, the town is now called Porto d'Ascoli, or, Torre di Seguro. Strābo writes Trūentinus annis, subjoining, that the town is of the same name (345). Adj. Trūentīnus, a, um. Trūentīnæ turres (Sil. Ital. viii. 433).

Trūtūlensis pōrtus, in Tacitus (Agric. 38), ought to be Rūtūpēnsis, or, Rūtūpānus; portus, Sandwich, since no harbour of this name is known.

Trūphana, w. f. a daughter of Ptolēmæus Phýscon, and wife of Antīochus Grýpus. She killed her sister Clēopātra, wife of Antīochus Cýzicēnus, who in turn put her to death (Just. xxxix. 2 seq.).

Trūphērus, i. m. a man who publicly taught the art of carving meat, in the Sūbūrra. Stāpylton calls him "Master of the carving academy," and adds, that he had wooden figures of the birds and beasts, on which his scholars practised (Juv. Sat. xi. 137).

Trūpho, ōnis, m. a Syrian, who had prevailed on the people to appoint him tutor to Antīochus, whom Jūstinus erroneously calls the stepson of Dēmētrius, instead of the son of Alexander Bala, and, having killed his ward, usurped the crown, which he held for five years, whilst Dēmētrius was detained a kind of prisoner in Hýrcānia (Just. xxxvi. 1 seq.).

Trūphon, ōnis, m. a muleteer (Virg. Cat. viii. 6).—2. The name of a slave (Cic. Att. iii. 8).—3. A bookseller (bibliōpōia) (Mæc. iv. 72).

Týdrus, i. m. a Colchan, son of Caucásus, born on the river Phásis, the Faoz, hence Válerius Flaccus calls him Phásiades. He had been appointed priest of Phásis, and lost his life by the hand of Cólaxes, in the war of the Argonauts and Colchans against the Scythians. Like others intended for the priesthood, his hair had been allowed to grow (Val. Flacc. vi. 639).

Týndárium, i. n. v. Týndáris, Idis, f. Tyndari, a town of Sicília, Sicily, on the north coast of that island (Liv. xxxvi. 2).

Týndárus, v. Týndárus, i. m. the son of Cébárus and Bática, was king of Lacedæmon, and married Leda, daughter of Théstius. Júpiter, having assumed the form of a swan, had by Leda, Póllux and Héléna; Cæstor was the son of Týndárus, her husband. On Héléna being courted by so many of the Grecian princes, her father was alarmed, lest, on her preferring one, the rest should enter into a combination against him, and, therefore, by the advice of Ulysses, he bound them by an oath, to allow her a free choice, and afterwards to protect her against every act of violence. She preferred Ménélæus, to whom Týndárus soon after resigned the kingdom. Hyginus asserts, that Cæstor and Póllux were the sons of Júpiter and Leda (14); but in another place he says, that Clýtémnéstra and Héléna were the daughters of Týndárus and Leda, immediately after he had informed us, that Póllux and Héléna were the children of Júpiter, and Cæstor and Clýtémnéstra of Týndárus (78). In fiction, authors are apt to fall into contradiction and absurdity, of which the origin and parentage of the children of Leda, are a sufficient proof. Týndáris, Idis, f. a patronymic of Héléna, from Týndárus, the husband of her mother Leda (Ov. Met. xv. 233); of Clýtémnéstra (Juv. Sat. vi. 657). Týndáridæ, arum, m. Cæstor and Póllux (Ov. Met. viii. 301); also a name of their descendants. Hórátius may be supposed to use this masculine patronymic, to denote both the descendants of Týndárus, although it may be understood to have a particular reference to Clýtémnéstra; fortissima Týndáridarum (Sat. i. l. 100). Adj. Týndárus, a. um. Týndárii fratres, Cæstor and Póllux, i. e. the sign Gémíni (Val. Flacc. l. 571). Týndárium Thérntum, from that town being built by a colony from Lacedæmon (Sil. Ital. xv. 320).

Týphœus, gös, a son of Terra, the youngest, according to Hésiodus, who surpassed all her sons in magnitude and strength. He was a native of Sicily, and united the human form with that of a beast. In height, his limbs overtopped the summit of the mountains, and his head often touched the stars. He had one head, according to Ovidius (Met. v. 352); a hundred, according to Pindárus. The one hand reached the east, and the other the west, over which rose a hundred dragon heads. Serpents of enormous size entwined his limbs; rose above his heads, and hissed tremendously. His body was wholly covered over with feathers, fire blazed from his eyes, and his uncombed hair and beard hung floating in the wind. He is the same with Týphon q. v. (Manil. ii. 873). Júpiter deprived him of life by thunderbolts, and buried him in Sicily, his right hand under Pélórus, Cape Ferro, his left under Páchýnus, Cape Pasaro, his feet under Libæum, Cape Boeo, and his head under Ætna, the most remarkable volcano in the world (Ov. Met. v. 348 seq.). Týphœus, hák, f. Týphœus, applied to females, or more feminine. Týphœis Ætna (Ov. Ep. l. xv. 11). Adj. Týphœus, a. Týphœus, um. Tela Týphœa, thunderbolt, from his being made in Ætna, which was on his head, or from his having been killed by them (Virg. Æn. i. 665). Týphœus, the neck of Týphœus (Claud. xxxv. 100).

Týphon, v. Týpho, ónis, m. the son of Týtárus and Terra, was in form a monster, being partly that of a man, and partly that of a wild beast. Sicília, Sicily, gave birth to Týphon, who, in size of body, and aspect of strength, surpassed all the other sons of Terra. The calf of his leg was at a great distance from the ground, than the top of the highest mountain; his head often touched the stars, the one hand extended to the east, and the other to the west at the same time. From his hands (Hyginus says from his shoulders, 152), issued a hundred heads of snakes, and his legs were entwined with huge rolls of vipers, which extended to his head, and emitted a tremendous noise. Feathers covered his whole body except his head, which produced hair; and he was allowed to remain filthy and unclean. Fire blazed from his eyes, and he drove the gods from their celestial mansions, by throwing burning stones into heaven. They fled to Egypt, whither he pursued them, and where Júpiter struck him with lightning, frightened him with an adamantine scepter, pursued him flying into Sýria, and knowing that he had been wounded, engaged him in close fight. Týphon surpassed the king of the gods in strength, cut the nerves of his feet and hands, carried him to Cíffia, and hid him in Córýceum Antrum, and appointed Dölphiné his keeper. Mécrochus and Égepan released Júpiter, who, having recovered his former strength, yoked winged horses to his chariot, mounted it, and drove by lightning Týphon to mount Nýsa. Observing Júpiter still pursuing him, he fled to Thracia, where he threw entire mountains against the sovereign of the skies, which were dispersed by strange lightning, and flowed with blood, whence its name (Ætna). He next attempted his escape into Sicília, when Júpiter laid Ætna, Monte Gibbo, upon him, by which it became a volcano. Some authors consider Týphon, the same with Týphœus. Týphónides, um (Soc. Týphónis, Idis), f. the Harpies, from their father Týphon (Val. Flacc. iv. 428).

Týra, v. Týras, m. the Dniester, called by the Turks the Turlac. This river was also called Danister; whence the common modern name, as that of the Turks, is perhaps from Týra, a river anciently of Sarmátia, which flows from a lake near Leubory in Poland, runs in a southeast direction, dividing Poland from Moldavia, and Russia from Turkey, and falls into Póntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, after a course of six hundred miles. On this river stood a town of the same name, which Ammíanus Márcellinus calls Týros, and adds, it was built by a colony of Phenicians, in opposition to ancient authors (xxii. 8. Plin. i. 467. Ov. Ep.

Tullius Tiro, Tullii Tironis, m. the freed-man of Cicero. He appears to have written a number of books on a variety of subjects. Incidents in his life are scattered over the pages of Cicero. See Tiro.

Tullius Valentinus, Tullii Valentinii, m. a native of Treves; a man of daring resolution, and possessing considerable powers of oratory, which rendered him a favourite with the vulgar. He excited his countrymen to revolt, when Cerealis marched against them, took Valentinus prisoner, who, on being told in his last moments, that his country was reduced to subjection, calmly replied, "Then death is my solace" (Tac. Hist. iv. 68-85).

M. Tullius, M. Tullii, m. a *dūm*vir, whom Tullius commanded to be sewed up in a bag, and thrown into the sea; because, for a bribe, he had given the book containing the secrets of the civil rites, to be copied by Petronius Sabinus (Val. Max. i. 1).—2. (Surname) Longus in con. cal., held the office of consul, in 500 B. C. (Liv. ii. 19).

M. Tullius Cicero, M. Tullii Ciceronis, m. was born at Arpinum, Arpino, a town of the Volsce, in Latiū, on the 24 of January, in the year 107 B. C. His father, although of equestrian rank, had not obtained any curule magistracy, and, on that account, Cicero frequently calls himself a new man, an appellation which his enemies used in reproach. Plutarchus refers his surname to one of the family having a flat excrescence on the nose, resembling a vetex (cicer), and Plinius supposes that the name was first given to one remarkable for the culture of vetices. It is recorded by Plutarchus, that the Orator, when questor in Sicily, consecrated an offering, in one of the temples, of a silver vase, on which he caused M. Tullius to be engraved, and, in place of Cicero, the resemblance of a vetex. In early life, Cicero gave proofs of those talents which afterwards procured him the highest offices in the state, and conferred honour on the nation to which he belonged. Poetry formed his chief study, and his proficiency in that kind of composition, when only a boy, showed a strength of mind, and a precocity of genius of very rare occurrence. Not one of his poetical works has been transmitted. He wrote a poem called Glancus, translated Aratus into Latin verse at the age of seventeen, sung the praises of C. Marius, and, in the latter years of his life, he recorded in verse the history of his own consulship. These formed the whole of his poetical works, and, notwithstanding the sneers of Juvenal and others, that they have wholly perished, must be accounted a loss of considerable magnitude, since many important facts both with respect to the civil wars, and the conspiracy of Catilina, would have been transmitted, which must now remain for ever unknown. Cicero acquired his knowledge of oratory under Philo the academician, of law under Mucius Scaevola, and of military affairs under Sulla. Disgusted with the tendency of the civil wars, he retired into private life, spending his time in the study of philosophy, and in conversation with men of learning, chiefly natives of Greece. His defence of Roscus procured his first mark of distinction as an orator, and prudence dictated the propriety of his travelling immediately into Greece, under pretence of delicate health, in order to escape the resentment of Sulla, whose indignation was roused by the acquittal of the man whom he had accused. Here he attended the lectures of Antiochus of Asculum, whose eloquence he admired. An unbounded desire of knowledge rendered his application indefatigable, and he attended the great masters both in Greece and in the islands. At the suggestion of Apollonius of Rhodus, he declaimed in Greek, and received high approbation from all present, except Apollonius himself, who remained for some time thoughtful and silent. At last, to remove the uneasy feeling of the young orator, excited by his conduct, he said, "Cicero, I admire and praise you, but I am concerned for the fate of Greece. She had nothing left her but the glory of eloquence, and you are carrying that likewise to Rome." On returning home, he applied himself to public affairs, and his eloquence soon raised him far above all the Roman orators. Justice, moderation, and attention to business, distinguished his questorship in Sicily, where he obtained information on which he formed the accusation against Verres. At thirty-one he obtained the questorship; at thirty-seven, the edileship; at forty, the praetorship; at forty-three, the consulship; and he informs us, that his appointment to each of these offices was in the very year in which he was eligible by law (Agrar. ii. 2). His wife, Tereñtia, brought him a considerable fortune, the only advantage resulting from that connexion. His society consisted chiefly of literary men, and he lived in a genteel, but frugal, manner. To a frame naturally slender, weakness of stomach added other disadvantages, which he overcame by regularity in study and exercise, and by moderation in eating and drinking. His house stood on Mons Palatinus, and he held a levee every day, which the greatest men in Rome attended, amongst whom was Cn. Pompeius Magnus. His integrity in the administration of justice during his praetorship, was rewarded by the approbation of his fellow-citizens, who united in raising him to the consulship, to crush the conspiracy of Catilina q. v. The ability with which he formed, and the vigour with which he executed, the measures of administration at that dangerous conjuncture, would have placed him high as a statesman, although no other action of his life had entitled him to distinction. Vanity, the inherent failing of this great man, now appeared in its most offensive form, and excited greater enmity than so trivial a weakness should have provoked. P. Clodius and others, amongst whom history mentions C. Julius Caesar, wished for his banishment, which they accomplished, chiefly by exciting odium against him, because he had put Leutullius, Cethegus, and other conspirators to death without a formal trial. To excite the commiseration of the public, he allowed his hair to grow, put on mourning, and in this manner went about supplicating the people. Although most of the equestrian order assumed the same dress, and twenty thousand young men of the first families attended him, bribery and powerful interest prevailed, and he was banished to a distance of five hundred miles from Rome. Even the senate proposed a law appointing the people to change their dress, as in cases of public mourning, but the consuls, secured by the artifice of Clodius, forbade it. He settled at Dyrrachium, Dur- razzo, and the cities of Greece vied with each other in showing the exile the greatest civility. Here his fortitude deserted him, and his spirits sunk in deep depression. By the exertion of Cn. Pompeius Magnus, and a decree of the senate, that no business should be done until Cicero was recalled, it was proposed to the people that they should invite Cicero to return. The citizens, in some degree, effaced the stigma of their former decision by their unanimity in his recall. The senate decreed their thanks to all the cities which had treated with respect the illustrious exile, and ordered his town and country houses, which Clodius had destroyed, to be rebuilt at the public expense. Such multitudes accompanied him from his landing, that he says, Italy carried him on her shoulders to Rome, an expression which Plutarchus considers short of the truth. Soon after his return from banishment, Cicero, with numerous attendants, destroyed the tribunical tables, in order that no record of the administration of Clodius should remain. He next undertook the defence of T. Annius Milo, who had killed P. Clodius, in which he did not display his usual eloquence, being intimidated by the military who stood around. On the death of P. Licinius Crassus, son of the triumvir, Cicero succeeded to the appointment of augur, and afterwards obtained the province of Cilicia. Instead of making war, on purpose to obtain wealth, with the powerful armament assigned him, he effected all the objects of his commission by conciliation, treated every person with civility, refused all presents from the natives, supported himself at his own expense, and thereby relieved the province from furnishing him with a public table, caused all guilty of fraud to make restitution, but branded them with no mark of infamy, nor sentenced any one to be beaten with rods nor to have his clothes rent. The senate ordered a public thanksgiving for his routing a band of robbers who infested Mount Amanus, Amanus, and his army, for that victory, saluted him Imperator. On his way home from Cilicia, he visited Rhodus and Athens. The flames of civil war were ready to burst forth when he reached Rome, and the declaration which he made on the senate decreeing him a triumph, reflects honour on his patriotism. "I had rather," says he, "follow the chariot wheels of Caesar in his triumph, if that would bring about a reconciliation between him and Pompeius." Both these great men counted on his friendship, and he repented of having joined the republican army, for he would have benefited that cause more by remaining neutral at Rome. On the republican army being routed at Pharsalia, M. Porcius Cato wished him to take the command of the remaining forces, which he declined, and, on that account, the sons of Pompeius called him traitor, and would have put him to death had not Cato interfered. Cicero then withdrew from the war, waited at Brindisi until C. Julius Caesar returned from Egypt, and having defended Q. Ligurius, whom Caesar had marked out for destruction, he withdrew from public business, spent his time in teaching philosophy to the young men of the first families, and in translating from the Greek. For reasons mentioned in the life of Terentia, he now divorced her, and married a young woman of great wealth. In the conspiracy against C. Julius Caesar, it does not appear that Cicero had any part. Dreading the power of M. Antonius, he would have gone into Syria with Dolabella, had not the consuls, A. Hirrius and C. Vibius Pansa, dissuaded him. After embarking for Athens, unfortunate circumstances prevented his sailing, and he returned to Rome in consequence of having heard a favourable account of the conduct of M. Antonius. Distrust on the part of Cicero, and hatred on the part of Antonius, proved an obstacle not only to reconciliation, but even to their meeting together. The Orator then took part with Octavius, afterwards called Augustus, and excited such indignation against Antonius, that the consuls marched against him at Mutina, Modena, where both fell in battle, after gaining the victory. Ambitious of honour, Cicero readily formed an intimacy with Octavius, and allowed himself to be duped by this artful youth, who had no more established himself in power, than he formed a confederacy with M. Emilius Lepidus and M. Antonius, in which the Orator was sacrificed to the resentment of the latter. Think one of the many indelible stains in the character of Augustus, which even the excellence of his government, in the latter years of his reign, can neither remove nor lessen. It must not be denied, that hatred of Antonius and love of glory, induced Cicero to espouse the cause of Augustus; still the guilt of ingratitude remains undiminished, and nothing can extenuate his criminality in giving up assassination one of the greatest men to whom Italy ever gave birth. Hearing of the proscription, Cicero and his brother Quintus solved to take shipping, and join Brutus in Macedonia. After being on board, he landed and many places having suggested themselves to his mind, but none fixed upon, his servants at last, to prevent his murder, partly by persuasion, and partly by force, got him into a litter, and were carrying him to the shore when Herennius, a centurion, and Popilius a tribune, whom Cicero had defended against for parricide, came up with the litter, in which the Orator stretched out his neck, as Herennius severed his head from his body. He likewise cut off both his hands, which Antonius fixed up over the rostrum, and the Romans gazing on these parts of the Orator's body, thought they did not so much see a face and hands of Cicero, as the soul of Antonius. Philologus, a freedman of Q. Tullius Cicero, whom the Orator had taught liberal arts, instead of exerting himself to preserve the life of his benefactor, pointed to the assassins the track by which they would overtake him before he reached the ship. For this act of treachery, Antonius gave him Pompeia, wife of Q. Tullius Cicero, who besides other horrible punishments, made him cut out his own flesh piece-meal, which, as he had roasted, she compelled him to eat. Augustus took the son of the Orator for a colleague in the consulship, and during that year conquered M. Antonius, on which the senate, by the direction of young Cicero, destroyed the statue of M. Antonius, effaced every vestige of his honour, and decreed that none of his family should in future bear the name of Marcus. Thus the divine justice, says Plutarchus, reserved the completion of the punishment of M. Antonius to the last of M. Tullius Cicero. Adj. Cicéronianus, et, Tullianus; a, um. Cicéroniana simplicitas (Plin. l. 8). Tulliana sententia (Amm. Mar. xv. 5).

Q. Tullius Cicero, Q. Tullii Cicéronis, m. the brother of Marcus Tullius Cicero, the celebrated orator, was, after the expiry of his praetorship, proconsul of Asia for three years. He gained considerable reputation as one of Caesar's lieutenant-generals in Gallia. At the commencement of the civil war, he, in opposition to the advice of his brother, attached himself to Pompeius. After Caesar had defeated the republicans at Pharsalia, both Quintus and his son solicited the favour of the conqueror, by unjustly imputing their misconduct to the orator. So far was Cicero from resenting this injustice, that he used his utmost efforts for their safety and interest. Both perished in the proscription of the second triumvirate. The rack could not force the son, who was first discovered by Antony's assassins, to point out the spot where his father lay concealed. But his paternal affection set death at defiance, and, to alleviate the torture of his son, he made a voluntary surrender. Each then requested of their murderers to be put first to death. The assassins, in admiration of their fortitude and mutual affection, were willing to gratify both, and, therefore, despatched them at the same instant.

Sextius Tullius, Sextii Tullii, m. a brave Roman, who was the first centurion of a legion for the seventh time, in 357 B. C. From what Livius has recorded of him, he appears not to have possessed less prudence and discernment, than courage and military valour (Liv. vii. 13 seq.).

Tullus, i., m. a man in the army of the Roman consul Scipio, killed by Cræxus in an engagement with Hannibal, at the foot of the Alps, on the latter invading Italy. He was born on the banks of Velinus, the Lake of Velino (Sil. Ital. iv. 189).—2. The brother of Lucianus, between whom there existed the strongest affection (Mart. i. 37). To the same brothers, Martialis alludes (iii. 20 seq.).

Tullus Hostilius, Tullii Hostilii, m. the grandson of that Hostilius who distinguished himself in the last engagement with the Sabines, succeeded Numa Pompilius in the government of Rome, receiving the crown as the reward of his merit. In disposition, he was more warlike than even Romulus, and the Alban first furnished him with a pretext for hostilities. Clastus, the Alban king, died in the camp, upon which they created Metus Fuffetius their dictator. This prince proposed to Tullus, that, in place of two nations connected by consanguinity and situation, engaging for their mutual destruction, they should adopt some plan which would save the blood of their fellow-citizens. They then agreed to refer the matter to three combatants on each side. Victory having declared for the Romans, Metus Fuffetius incurred the ill-will of the Albans, in consequence of the loss of their independence, and, therefore, took the earliest opportunity of joining with the enemies of their present masters. The Fidæates and Veientes, encouraged by the Albans, made war on Tullus, and although they were on the Roman side, they did not engage, but waited an opportunity to join the enemy, and to overwhelm the Romans. On observing their treachery, and alarmed at the danger of his situation, Tullus vowed twelve Sali and temples to Paleness and Fear. The bravery and ingenuity of Tullus at last succeeded, and he showed the cruelty of his disposition, by the barbarous manner in which he put Metus to death. He removed the Albans to Rome, levelled their city with the ground, and thus annihilated their name as a nation. The Sabines, alarmed at this increase of strength on the part of the Romans, looked round for foreign aid; but although a number of the Veientes voluntarily entered their ranks, the state did not join them. Resolved on war, as considerable advantage would accrue to the first in arms, Tullus made an inroad on the Sabine territory. A furious battle ensued at the wood Malicosa, in which the Romans were victorious. Soon after this engagement, a shower of stones fell on the Alban mount, which not appearing credible, persons were sent to examine into the prodigy. In their sight, a number of stones like hail compacted into lumps, dropped from the sky, when they heard a voice, from the grove, ordering the Albans to perform religious rites, according to the custom of their native country, a practice which they had entirely neglected from the time of their removal to Rome. The Romans instituted a festival of nine days in obedience to that injunction, and the same observance was uniformly kept, whenever the same prodigy again occurred. The king afterwards fell into a lingering disorder, and the fierceness of his temper abating with the strength of his body, he, who considered nothing more unworthy of the attention of a king than matters of religion, became at once a slave to every kind of superstition. The people, too, during a pestilence, on comparing their present situation with their enjoyments during the reign of Numa, were of opinion, that their only hope of deliverance was from the pardon and favour of the gods. After a reign of thirty-two years, highly renowned for his military achievements, Tullus Hostilius, with his house, was reduced to ashes by lightning, in consequence of his having provoked the resentment of Jupiter, by attempting the performance of certain secret solemnities, not in the form prescribed by the commentaries of Numa (Liv. i. 22–31). Valerius Maximus states, that he spent his early life in herding cattle (iii. 4). Pignæ Tullus (Juv. Sat. v. 57). To him Claudianus alludes (iii. 114 &c.).

Tunes, etis, m. afterwards Tunis, now in ruins, a city of Africa, about fifteen miles from Carthage. It was a place of great strength both by nature and art, could be seen from Carthage, and had an extensive view of the surrounding sea. P. Cornélius Scipio Africanus took it, in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 2–36).

Tünger, gri, m. a Moor in the army of Hannibal, remarkable for the blackness of his armour and chariot, killed by Cato; in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. vii. 682 seq.).

Tüngri, orum, m. a German nation, who afterwards settled in Gallia Belgica. Adductuca, Tongres, was their chief city. In an engagement with Claudius Civilis, a cohort of the Tungrians acted treacherously, by going over to the enemy. In Britain, they failed, in a single instance, to give to each its distinctive touches and shades. How greatly in ideas, arrangement, and language, does the speech of Ulysses not only differ from, but surpass, that of Ajax? The persuasive eloquence, and profound knowledge of the human heart, which distinguished the Grecian, appear with peculiar force and effect in the artful arrangement, appropriate sentiment, and elegant numbers of the Latin poet. The insinuating address and specious arguments of Ulysses gradually overcome the boisterous and indignant philippic of Ajax, interest and sway more and more the minds of the judges, until the orator had wound up their feelings to the highest pitch, when he made a well-timed and irresistible appeal at once to their eyes and judgments, and a universal burst of applause proclaimed him victorious.

P. Umbrēnus, P. Umbrēni, m. a freedman, who entered into the conspiracy of L. Sērgius Cātīlina, and endeavoured to prevail on the Allobrogian deputies to take part with that traitor, in order to procure from their state reinforcements to the rebel army. Cicero states, that Umbrēnus was the man who first brought the Allobrogian deputies to P. Gābīnīus Cāpito, an active conspirator. For his treasonable conduct, this enfranchised slave was committed to prison with the other traitors, and most probably suffered the same punishment (Cic. Cat. iii. 6).

Umbria, ae, f. a district of Italy, which anciently seems to have extended the whole breadth of the country on the north of the Tevere. The Etrūsci obtained possession of that part lying on Mārē Tŭr-rhēnum, and the Sēnōnes Gālli settled on that part of Umbria, which was washed by Mārē Hādriātīcum, the Gulf of Venice. Under the Roman government, Umbria had Etrūria on the west, Picēnum and the country of the Sēnōnes on the east, consequently lay chiefly on the Apennines. Inh. Umbri, orum (Sing. Umber, bri), m. the Umbrians, the most ancient people of Italy, according to Flōrus (i. 17). The Boii gained considerable advantages over them in 390 B. C. Besides engaging in frequent hostilities with the other neighbouring nations, they often took up arms against the Romans, and, although uniformly compelled to an unconditional surrender, yet, either from love of war, or inveterate hatred, they did not fail, on the first opportunity, to repeat their hostile attacks, until their means of resistance became so unavailing, that as a nation they sunk in the name of their conquerors. One act, on the part of the Romans, deserves to be mentioned for its atrocity. The Umbrians from a cave made inroads on the adjacent country, and the place of their retreat having been discovered, the Romans filled the two entrances with wood which they set on fire, when two thousand of the Umbrians were either burned, or suffocated to death, in 304 B. C. (Liv. v. 35 seq.). Adj. Umber, bra, brum, et. Umbricus, a, um. Umber aper (Hor. Sat. ii. 4. 40). Vieldus Umber (cānis), the keen Umbrian dog. From their country being woody, hunting necessarily formed a considerable part of their employment, and attention to the proper kind of dog for that purpose, hence the Umbrian breed became celebrated (Virg. Aen. xii. 783). Umbricus (colla) (Plin. v. 259).—2. Cāmērtus Umbrī, Cāmērtium Umbrōrum, m. a tribe of the Umbri, with whom Q. Fabius, the Roman consul, sent a person to treat, in 310 B.C., offering friendship and alliance, which they embraced. This was the greatest disaster in that direction which the Romans had penetrated at that time (Liv. ix. 36).

Umbrīcius, i, m. an haruspex, who resided in a knowledge of that art. To him, sacrificing at the temple of Apōllo, he told dismal presages from the entrails, reasonable plots impending, and a foe within his own house. These predictions made such impression on the emperor, but their truth was soon established (Tac. Hist. i. 27). To him Jūvēnālīs addresses his third satire, in which the poet introduces him quitting Rome in disgust, at the prevalence of vice, and neglect of modest unassuming virtue. Pithicus was he was the most skilful of all the haruspices of that age (ii. 395).

Umbro, ōnis, m. a man of great power, who was the priest of Mārōbīum, S. deo detto, and commanded the Mīrā. He was skilled in incantation, could charm serpents to harmlessness, and cure their bite. Being the ally of Tūrnus, he opposed himself to Aenēas, and fell by the hand of that hero (Virg. Aen. vii. 752 seq.).

Umbro, ōnis, m. the Umbro, a river of Italy, which runs through the middle of Etrūria, Tuscany, and had its name from the Umbri, who anciently possessed the country on both its banks.

Ummīdīus, i, m. (written also Unīdīus, Nūmīdīus, Vinīdīus, Unīdīus and Unīdīus), a miser of prodigious wealth. In place of counting, he measured his money; and lived in constant terror of poverty. His slaves were not better than those worn by slaves, and he appears to have been hated by his servants; since his freedwoman cleft him in two with an axe. Nothing further respecting him is known (Hor. Sat. i. 1. 95).

T. Ummīdīus Quādrātus, T. Ummīdīus Quādrātī, m. a governor of Sŷria, in the year 52 (Tac. Ann. xii. 45).

Unchae, arum, f. a place in Sŷria, distant two days' march from Pŷlāe Sŷriae, supposed to be otherwise called Sochi (Curt. iv. 1).

Unēlli, orum, m. a people of Gāllia Bētica, on the N. W. of what is now called Normandy. Their country was bounded on three sides by the sea. Their chief town was Coriāllum, Gouril. Off the coast of the Unēlli, lay the islands of Cēsārēa, Jerny, Sārnia, Guernsey, and Redūna, Alderney, which have long been in possession of the British (Cæs. B. G. ii. 34 seq.).

M. Unīcus, M. Unīci, m. an elegiac poet to whom Mārīālīs writes an epigram (xi. 44).

Unīngis, is, m. the Hunsing, a river of Germany, which falls into the sea near Traingen (Tac. Ann. i. 70).

Ur, n. a city of the Chaldeans in ancient times, afterwards of Persia, which Ammianus Mārcellinus calls a fort (xxv. 8).

Urānla, ae, et. Urānīc, es, f. the muse who presided over Astronomy. Gēaus Urānīson of Urānla, i. e. Hŷmēneus (Cat. b. 2).

Urānīus, i, m. the father of Cūrētīus q.

on the stage, which delighted those on the first row, but particularly those who were at the greatest distance from him (de Senect. 14). Tacitus speaks of his acting as antiquated, and unsuited to the period in which he lived (Orat. 20).

C. Turranius, C. Turrani, m. praefect or comptroller of the public grain at Rome, in the year 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 7 seq.).

Turrilius, i. m. one of the conspirators against C. Julius Caesar, afterwards a quaestor in the army of Cassius. In the battle of Actium, he was in the army of M. Antonius, where he fell into the hands of Augustus, by whose order he was carried to the island Cos, and killed in the place where he had, at a former period, cut down a grove of Æsculapius to repair his fleet (Val. Max. i. 1).

Turullus Cerealis, Turulli Cerealis, m. a centurion of principal rank, who had served under Alienus Cæcina, and joined him, after he had raised the siege of Placentia, Placentia (Tac. Hist. ii. 22).

Tuscia, v. Tuscila, m. f. the name of Etruria q. v., as written in later Latin authors, whence it is now called Tuscany. Inh. Tusci, orum (Sing. Tuscus, i.), m. the Tuscans, originally from Lydia. Having been expelled from a part of their territory by the Gauls, they formed a settlement in the Alps, and were known by the name of Rhaeti (Just. xx. 1 seq.). From them the Romans assumed most of the badges of authority (Sal. Cat. 51). Adj. Tuscus, Tuscianus, et Tuscianus, a. um. Tuscum mûrî (Liv. v. 33). Tuscus amnis, the Tevere (Sil. Ital. viii. 362). Tuscana columna, the Tuscan column (Vitruv.), which Plinius calls columna Tuscana (v. 338). Tuscana stâtua (Quint. xii. 10. 1). This is one of the five orders of architecture, and the only one not of Grecian origin, but invented by the Tuscans.

Tuscûlum, i. n. Frascati, a free town of the Latins, which has its name from Frache branches, with which the inhabitants covered their houses, on the destruction of their town by the Romans, in the year 1191. In the cathedral is an epitaph to the memory of CHARLES EDWARD STUART, by his brother JAMES, CARDINAL of York, and bishop of Tuscûlum, Frascati. Inh. Tuscûlani, orum (Sing. Tuscûlanus, i.), m. sent voluntary troops to aid the Romans, when the capitol had been seized by Appius Hærdonius, and in return, they received reinforcements from Rome, when the Æqui had, by surprise, taken their town during the night. They afterwards revolted, and excited the Privernates and Velliterni to make war on the Romans. The latter pardoned the state, but imputed the blame to a few individuals, who, M. Flavius, a tribune of the people, proposed, in 321 B. C., should be punished. As soon as they heard of this determination, the whole, including wives and children, put on mourning, went to Rome, and begged forgiveness, which they obtained, more from compassion than justice of their cause (Liv. iii. 18 seq.). Adj. Tuscûlus, et Tuscûlanus, a. um. Tuscûla umbra (Stat. Syl. iv. 4. 16). Tuscûla tellûs (Mart. ix. 61). Tuscûlanus ager (Plin. i. 242). Tuscûlani siccus (Mart. x. 30).

Tuscus, i. m. son of the woman who nursed the Emperor Néro. When governor of Egypt, he had gone into a bath constructed for the Emperor, against the time he went to that country. For that act of presumption, Néro banished him (Suet. Ner. 35).

Tütia, m. f. a town of Spain (Flor. iii. 22).

Tütia, m. m. a small stream, one of the branches of Tiber, the Tevere. On the bank of this rivulet, Hannibal encamped, which gives some distinction to this inconsiderable rill, otherwise undeserving of notice (Sil. Ital. xiii. 5).

Tüticanus, i. m. a man to whom Ovidius addresses two of his epistles from Pöntus (iv. 12. 14).

Tÿäna, orum, n. et, Tÿäna, m. f. a town on the confines of Cilicia and Cappadocia, near Cilicæ portæ. According to Strabo, it was also called Euscbia, and had the honour of giving birth to Apollonius, the famous Pythagorean philosopher. Tÿänistis, Idis, f. the district or prefect, of which Tÿäna was the capital. Inh. Tÿänenses, ium, m. Adj. Tÿänicus, a. um. Tÿänicus incolæ, an inhabitant of Tÿäna (Ov. Met. viii. 719).

Tÿchn, m. f. a part of the city Syracûse (Liv. xxiv. 21).

Tÿchius, i. m. the fabricator of the shield of Ajax, which consisted of seven bulls' skins covered with brass (Hom. Il. vii. 220).

Tÿdæ, es, f. Tÿd, a town of Galicia, a province of Hispania, Spain, built, according to Silius Italicus, by Diomædes, who called it by his father's name. The poet seems to confound the king of Etolia with the king of Thracia (iii. 367 seq.).

Tÿdæus, cos, m. son of Cæneus, king of Calydonia, and Përibœa, a captive daughter of Hippönus, was a man of diminutive stature (Hom. Il. v. 801), but of great bravery, of which he gave many proofs in early life. Having killed his brother Ménalippus when hunting, he fled to Adrastus, king of Argos, where he arrived at the same time with Pölyñices; Tÿdæus covered with the skin of a bear, and Pölyñices, with that of a lion. Adrastus had been instructed by the oracle of Apollo, to marry his two daughters, Argia and Dëipylë, to a bear and a lion, which induced him to give Dëipylë, who was the younger, to Tÿdæus, and Argia to Pölyñices. This connexion induced Tÿdæus to engage in the Theban war, during which he had many opportunities of displaying his military prowess. At last, he fell by the hand of Ménalippus, a Theban. According to Valerius Flaccus, he was one of the Argonauts, and fought with great bravery against the Cÿziceni (iii. 103). By Dëipylë he had Diomædes, whose fortitude and military skill distinguished him as much at Troy, as the military actions of his father signalized him at Thëbæ, Thëbæ. Tÿdides, m. m. a patronymic of Diomædes, whom Virgilius calls Cræntus, from his having killed Rhæus, king of Thracia, asleep in his tent, and all the attendants of that monarch (Æn. i. 471); and Iapetus, because from that carnage he entered the temple of Minerva in Troy, and carried thence the Palladium, or statue of that goddess (Æn. ii. 164). Ulysses assisted him in both these actions. Hosta Tÿdida, the spear of Diomædes, with which he wounded Vënus (Ov. Met. xv. 700).

Týdrus, i. m. a Colchan; son of Caucæsus, born on the river Phāsīs, the Phaz, hence Valérius Flaccus calls him Phāsiades. He had been appointed priest of Phāsīs, and lost his life by the hand of Cōlāxes, in the war of the Argonauts and Colchans against the Scythians. Like others intended for the priesthood, his hair had been allowed to grow (Val. Flacc. vi. 639).

Týndārium, i. n. v. Týndāris, idis, f. Tyndari, a town of Sicily, Sicily, on the north coast of that island (Liv. xxxvi. 2).

Týndārus, v. Týndārius, i. m. the son of Cebālus and Bātia, was king of Lacedæmon, and married Lēda, daughter of Thēstius. Jūpiter, having assumed the form of a swan, had by Lēda, Pōllūx and Hēlēna; Cāstor was the son of Týndārus, her husband. On Hēlēna being courted by so many of the Grecian princes, her father was alarmed, lest, on her preferring one, the rest should enter into a combination against him, and, therefore, by the advice of Ulysses, he bound them by an oath, to allow her a free choice, and afterwards to protect her against every act of violence. She preferred Mēnēlaus, to whom Týndārus soon after resigned the kingdom. Hyginus asserts, that Cāstor and Pōllūx were the sons of Jūpiter and Lēda (14); but in another place he says, that Clýtēmnēstra and Hēlēna were the daughters of Týndārus and Lēda, immediately after he had informed us, that Pōllūx and Hēlēna were the children of Jūpiter, and Cāstor and Clýtēmnēstra of Týndārus (78). In fiction, authors are apt to fall into contradiction and absurdity, of which the origin and parentage of the children of Lēda, are a sufficient proof. Týndāris, idis, f. a patronymic of Hēlēna, from Týndārus, the husband of her mother Lēda (Ov. Met. xv. 233); of Clýtēmnēstra (Juv. Sat. vi. 657). Týndāridēs, m. m. a son of Týndārus. Týndāridēs, arum, m. Cāstor and Pōllūx (Ov. Met. viii. 301); also a name of their descendants. Hōrātius may be supposed to use this masculine patronymic, to denote both the descendants of Týndārus, although it may be understood to have a particular reference to Clýtēmnēstra; fortissima Týndāridarum (Sat. i. l. 100). Adj. Týndārius, a, um. Týndārii frātres, Cāstor and Pōllūx, i. e. the sign Gēmini (Val. Flacc. i. 571). Týndārium, Tūrentum, from that town being built by a colony from Lacedæmon (Sil. Ital. xv. 320).

Týphōeus, ēs, s. a son of Tērra, the youngest, according to Hēsiodus, who surpassed all her sons in magnitude and strength. He was a native of Sicily, and united the human form with that of a beast. In height, his limbs overtopped the summit of the mountains, and his head often touched the stars. He had one head, according to Ovidius (Met. v. 352); a hundred, according to Pindārus. The one hand reached the east, and the other the west, over which rose a hundred dragon heads. Serpents of enormous size entwined his limbs, rose above his heads, and hissed tremendously. His body was wholly covered over with feathers, fire blazed from his eyes, and his uncombed hair and beard hung floating in the wind. He is the same with Týphon q. v. (Manil. ii. 873). Jūpiter deprived him of life by thunderbolts, and buried him in Sicily, his right hand under Pēlōrus, Cape Farro, his left under Pāchýnus, Cape Pasaro, his feet under Lībōnum, Cape Boeo, and his head under Ætna, the most remarkable volcano in the world (Ov. Met. v. 348 seq.). Týphōis, idis, f. Týphōeus, applied to females, or more feminine. Týphōis Ætna (Ov. Ep. lxxv. 11). Adj. Týphōeus, et, Týphōeus, a, um. Tēla Týphōea, thunderbolts, from their being made in Ætna, which was over his head, or from his having been killed by them (Virg. Æn. i. 665). Týphōis tēra, the neck of Týphōeus (Claud. xxxvi. 169).

Týphon, v. Týphō, ōnis, m. the son of Týtārus and Tērra, was in form a monster, being partly that of a man, and partly that of a wild beast. Sicily, Sicily, gave birth to Týphon, who, in size of body, and superlative of strength, surpassed all the other sons of Tērra. The calf of his leg was at a greater distance from the ground, than the top of the highest mountain, his head often touched the stars, the one hand extended to the east, and the other to the west at the same time. From his hands (Hyginus says from his shoulders, 152), issued a hundred heads of snakes, and his legs were entwined with huge rolls of vipers, which extended to his head and emitted a tremendous hissing. Feathers covered his whole body excepting his head, which produced hair; and it was allowed to remain filthy and undressed. Fire blazed from his eyes, and he drove the gods from their celestial mansions, by throwing burning stones into heaven. They fled to Egypt, whither he pursued them, and where Jūpiter struck him with lightning, frightened him with an adamantyne scythe, pursued him flying into Sýria, and knowing that he had been wounded, engaged him in close fight. Týphon surpassed the king of the gods in strength, cut the nerves of his feet and hands, carried him to Cilicia, placed him in Cōrycūm Antrum, and appointed Dēlphic his keeper. Mērcūrius and Egepan released Jūpiter, who, having recovered his former strength, yoked winged horses to his chariot, mounted it, and drove by lightning Týphon to mount Nýsa. Observing Jūpiter still pursuing him, he fled to Thracia, where he threw entire mountains against the sovereign of the skies, which were dispersed by strange lightning, and Hamus flowed with blood, whence its name (Ætna). He next attempted his escape into Sicily, when Jūpiter laid Ætna, Monte Gibellu upon him, by which it became a volcano. Some authors consider Týphon, the same with Týphōeus. Týphōnides, um (Sing. Týphōnis, idis, f. the Harpies, from their father Týphon (Val. Flacc. iv. 423).

Týra, v. Týras, a, m. the Dniester, called by the Turks the Turlac. This river was also called Danaster, whence the common modern name, as that of the Turks, is perhaps from Týra, a river anciently of Sarmatia, which flows from a lake near Lemberg in Poland, runs in a southeast direction dividing Poland from Moldavia, and Russia from Turkey, and falls into Pōntus Euxinū miles. On this river stood a town of the same name, which Ammianus Mārcellinus calls Týros, and adds, it was built by a colony of Phœnicians, in opposition to ancient authors (xxii. 8. Plin. l. 467. Ov. lxxv.

Pont. iv. 10. 50). Týritæ, arum, m. a people living on the river Týra (Herod. iv. 51). The Týragétæ, arum, also, are mentioned by Strabo.

Týres, æ, m. a native of Arcádia, brother of Leuthras, who fought in the army of Túrus (Virg. Æn. x. 403).—2. A Nasamonian, of whose death at the battle of Trásménus, the Lake of Perugia, Silius Itálicus gives a horrid description (vi. 44).—3. A Scythian commander in the war against the Argonauts and Colchans. In that contest, he appears to have lost his life by an unknown hand (Val. Flacc. vi. 201).

Týrieum (Týriarium, Strab.), i, n. Kasan Hanah, i, n. a town about six miles to the east of Philómellum, Iguu.

Týridates, is, m. the keeper of the royal treasures at Persépólis, at the time that city fell into the hands of Alexander the Great. Under that monarch he retained the rank he had held under Darius (Curt. v. 5 seq.).—2. A man of low birth, but great wealth, from whose property Alexander the Great gave Eurýlóchus fifty talents, as a reward for discovering to him the plot against his life, in 328 B. C. (Curt. viii. 6).

Týriotes, is, m. a eunuch under Darius, who was made prisoner with the queen, escaped secretly from his keepers, and told his sovereign of the queen's death (Curt. iv. 10).

Týrō, ðs, f. daughter of Sálmonéus and Alcídée, who formed a strong attachment to Eulpéus, which Néptúnus having understood, assumed the form of her lover, and destroyed her innocence. By that god, she had two sons, Pélías and Néleus, whom she deserted on purpose to preserve her reputation. These children, having been brought up by shepherds, on their attaining manhood, avenged the cruelty which their mother had received from her stepmother. She afterwards married her uncle Crétheus, who, from compassion, had taken her from her father's house, and by him she had Amýtháon, Æson, and Phères (Hom. Od. xi. 234 seq.). From her father she was called Sálmonia (Val. Flacc. v. 479).

Týros, e, us, i, f. Tyre, or, Sor, a large and populous city of Phœnicia, which, in ancient times, was a place of great trade, and celebrated for a shell which dyes a very fine purple colour. Of this name there were two cities, the first, built the year before the destruction of Troy (Just. xviii. 3), and destroyed by the Assyrian princes, stood on the continent, the last, upon an island. The former was called Vetus, and the latter Nova (Just. xi. 10). Bochartus says, that Týrus signifies rock. Cadmēa Týros (Mart. vi. 11). The inhabitants, Týrii, orum, were the inventors of navigation, and planted a number of colonies along the south coast of the Mediterranean, which added greatly to their power. They were active and enterprising, but faithless and dishonest. The Tyrians were the founders of Carthage (Liv. xxxiii. 49). Hércules was their favourite god (Curt. iv. 1). Adj. Týricus, et, Týrius, a, Týrrhēnia, æ, f. the Greek name of Etrúria, Tuscany (Ov. Met. xiv. 452). Inh. Týrrhēni, orum (Sing. Týrrhēnus, i), m. A people of this name lived in Thrácia, near Creston (Herod. i. 57). Adj. Týrrhēnus, et, Týrrhēnicus, a, um. Týrrhēna corpóra, the Tuscan bodies, i. e. the bodies of the Tuscan sailors whom Bæchus, for their perfidy, turned into dolphins (Ov. Met. iv. 23). Týrrhēnica Týrráco (Auson. cccxvii. 88).

Týrrhēnus, i, m. was the son of Atys, king of Mæónia. His native country being overstocked with inhabitants, he left his brother Lýdus in the possession of the kingdom, put himself at the head of a body of emigrants, sailed to the western coast of Italy, and settled in the country to the north of Tiber, the Tevere, which from him was called Týrrhēnia, and the inhabitants Týrrhēni, whom he taught the use of the trumpet (Sil. Ital. v. 11).—2. A trumpeter in the Roman army, who was killed by Pélórus in the first engagement which the Romans fought with Hännibal in Italy. The name is probably fictitious, adopted by Silius Itálicus from the Týrrhēni being reckoned the first, who used the trumpet (iv. 167 seq.).

Týrrhēus, ðos, c. Týrrhus, i, m. the herdsman of king Látnus, to whom his daughter Lávinia fled after the death of Ænéas, and called his posthumous son, to whom she gave birth, Silvius, from his being born in a wood (Aur. Vic. Or. 16). A tame stag, brought up by Týrrhēus, and his children, was killed by Ascánlus, and this accident occasioned a war between the Trojans and Latins. Týrrhida, arum, m. the sons of Týrrhēus (Virg. Æn. vii. 484).

Týrteus, i, m. an Athenian schoolmaster, lame of a foot, whose merits as a poet, in the opinion of Quintiliánus, stood in a similar relation to those of Hómērus, as the bravery of Ajax or Diómēdes to that of Achilles. The Lacedæmonians, having engaged in war with the Messenians, after numerous defeats, consulted the oracle of Apóllo, who advised them to apply to the Athenians for a general. The latter, in derision, sent them Týrteus, whose ignorance of war afforded great advantages to the enemy, and had nearly proved the destruction of the Lacedæmonians. Dispirited by repeated defeats, the Spartans lost all hope of success, proposed to terminate hostilities by concluding a peace, which Týrteus opposed, and recited some of his own verses in praise of military fame, which animated the Spartans to another battle, in which they gained a decisive victory. To the effect produced by the poetry of Týrteus, Hórátius alludes (Art. Poet. 402).

Ucālēgon, ōntis, m. a noble Trojan, whose house was burned amongst the first, during the night Troy was taken by the Greeks (Virg. Æn. ii. 312).

Ufēns, ēntis, m. commander of the Æqui in the army of Turnus, whose name is probably derived from the river Ufēns, the Aufente. Neither as a soldier, nor as a general, did he, in the smallest degree, distinguish himself. His name is scarcely mentioned by Virgilius, from the time that he is introduced with Mēzēntius and Mēssāpus, until he falls by the hand of Gŷas (Æn. viii. 6 seq.).—2. A man in the Roman army, killed by Hännibal at the fort of the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 341).—3. A Roman, whose armour and body an elephant pierced with his teeth, and carried him bawling through the ranks, in the battle at Cānnæ (Sil. Ital. ix. 585).

Ufēns, tis, m. the Aufente, a river of Lātium, which joins Amāsēnus, the Toppia, to the south of Pōmptinæ pālūdes, the Pomptine marshes (Virg. Æn. vii. 802). From Claudŷanus its current appears to have been rendered slow by its windings, Tardātusquē sūts errōribus Ufēns (l. 257).

Uffūgum, i, n. Tagnano, a town of the Brūttili, which revolted from the Carthaginians to the Romans, in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 19).

Ulcillis Hirrus, Ulcillis Hirri, m. one of Pompey's officers. Flying from Cāmērinum, Camerino, he fell into the hands of Vibūllius, who joined his troops to the army which he was then raising for Cæsar (Cæs. B. C. i. 15).

feet, over the Danube, a little above the town Viminacium, Ram, in Hungary. The piers were of hevn stone, two of the arches were constructed of the same materials, all the rest were of wood, strongly and boldly executed. For his success against the Dacians, he returned to Rome in triumph, after securing the province by wise regulations. During the interval between the Dacian and Parthian wars, he made a noble causeway across the Pomptine marshes, besides beginning the square which bears his name, containing the pillar on which are represented almost all his martial achievements in bas-relief. To him the Italians were indebted for the harbour Centumcellæ, Civita Vecchia, as well as that at Ancona, built in the year 114. From a desire to reform the abuses, Trajānus appointed Plinius governor of Bithynia, and his letters to the emperor, and likewise his answers, have been transmitted to modern times. The application of the governor to the monarch for advice, with respect to the Christians, is a document of great value. Many suffered martyrdom during this reign, of whom the most distinguished were St. Ignātius of Antiochia, and St. Simeon of Jerusalem. Ambitious of military fame, Trajānus resolved on the conquest of Parthia, quitted Rome to take the command of the army, of which he gained the esteem, by sharing in their fatigues and privations, marching always on foot, and subsisting on the simplest diet. Armēnia and Iberia soon yielded to the bravery of his troops, on which he advanced into Parthia, but history has transmitted nothing certain respecting the Roman exploits in that country. After overrunning Assyria, he returned to Babylon, took Ctesiphon and Susa, when the senate gave him the surname of Parthicus. Elated with his success, he sailed down Tigris, the Dejlah, to the Persian Gulf, lamented that his advanced age prevented him from rivaling the fame of Alexander the Great, returned to besiege Atra, which baffled his best efforts, and obliged him to quit the place. This was his most unsuccessful and last campaign. The provinces every where seemed ready to revolt, but were suppressed by the activity of the governors. After spending the winter in Syria, in spring he entered Mēsopotāmia, Jezirah, where he fell sick, and having left the command of the army to Adriānus, he took ship in order to go to Rome by sea, but died at Selinuntium in Cilicia, according to some, of a second apoplectic fit, and according to others, of diarrhoea, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and twelfth of his reign. His wife Plotina attended him on his death-bed, when she planned every measure to accomplish her favourite object, the adoption of Adriānus, which, with the assistance of Titianus, the preceptor of Adriānus, she effected without opposition. As Trajānus never loved Adriānus, it is certain he had no intention of raising him to the imperial throne; besides, his attachment to the republican forms, the revival of ancient usages, such as prohibiting advocates from taking fees from their clients, and preventing candidates from suing for public offices, unless they had one-third of their property in houses or lands in Italy, &c., strengthen the conjecture, that it was his intention to leave to the senate the choice of his successor. Although not without some vices, his talents and virtues commanded the esteem of his contemporaries, and justice must reckon him one of the best and greatest princes, that ever obtained the purple at Rome (Eutrop. viii. 2-6). Ulpus bellipotens (Claud. xxviii. 335). Glōria Trājāni (Claud. viii. 316). Adj. Ulpus, a, um. Ulpia prōgenēs (Claud. viii. 19).

Ulūbræ, arum, f. a small town of Lātium, on Astūra or Stūra, the Astura, or, Stura. From Jūvenālis, it appears to have been very thinly inhabited, if not altogether deserted (Sat. x. 102). Inh. Ulūbrēnses, ium, m. Ulysses, v. Ulyxes, is, acc. en, voc. e, e, es, et, Ulysses, v. Ulyxeus (3 or 4 syl.), ei, m. a king of Ithaca, Theaki, and Dulichium, two islands to the west of Greece, between Céphallēnia, Cephalonia, and the continent. He was, according to some, the son of Lāertes and Anticlea, and, according to others, of Sisyphus, by whom Anticlea was pregnant at the time of her marriage with Lāertes. Whatever truth there might be in the latter assertion, it is certain that the behaviour of the Ithacan king towards Ulysses was that of a most dutiful and affectionate father, which was well repaid by the filial reverence and excellence of the youth. Having solicited the hand of Hēlena, but despaired of success, this prince advised Tyndarus, her father, to bind the lovers of that transcendent beauty by oath, to protect her against every insult, and obtained through him Pēnelōpē, the daughter of his brother Icārius. Unwilling to leave her and go to the Trojan war, Ulysses feigned madness, yoked a horse and a cow together, and sowed the ground with salt. Pālāmedes put his insanity to the test, by laying his infant son Tēlēmāchus before the cattle, on which he turned them aside, that they might not hurt the child. This detection he basely revenged at Troy, by accomplishing the death of that ingenious nobleman, as a traitor. To the qualities of a brave soldier, Ulysses joined the talents of a profound politician. His eloquence was forcible and persuasive, his address artful and winning, and his knowledge of the human heart accurate and extensive. To his bravery in the field, and to his wisdom in council, the Greeks were greatly indebted for their ultimate success. But it is not to be denied, that his wisdom was blended with cunning, and his oratory often employed for the basest and most dishonourable purposes. It was most probably from this insincerity, that Virgilius calls him fictor fandi (Æn. ix. 602), and pellax (Æn. ii. 90). His achievements during the Trojan war are neatly related in a very animated and masterly speech, which Ovidius has put into his mouth, in the thirteenth book of the Metamorphoses. The adventures of Ulysses after the taking of Troy, during his return to his native island, form the subject of an epic poem by Hōmērus, called, from its hero, the Odyssey. Ovidius excels not only in description, but also in the delineation of character. Of both these, the Metamorphoses furnish several remarkable and convincing proofs. Having first formed an accurate conception of the characters which he meant to portray, he has not perhaps wound up their feelings to the highest pitch, when he made a well-timed and irresistible appeal at once to their eyes and judgments, and a universal burst of applause proclaimed him victorious.

P. Umbrēnus, P. Umbrēni, m. a freed-man, who entered into the conspiracy of L. Sērgius Cātillina, and endeavoured to prevail on the Allobrogian deputies to take part with that traitor, in order to procure from their state reinforcements to the rebel army. Cicero states, that Umbrēnus was the man who first brought the Allobrogian deputies to P. Gābiniūs Cāpito, an active conspirator. For his treasonable conduct, this enfranchised slave was committed to prison with the other traitors, and most probably suffered the same punishment (Cic. Cat. iii. 6).

Umbria, æ, f. a district of Italy, which anciently seems to have extended the whole breadth of the country on the north of the Tevere. The Etruscæ obtained possession of that part lying on Mārē Tŷrrhēnum, and the Sēnōnes Gāllo settled on that part of Umbria, which was washed by Mārē Hādriāticeum, the Gulf of Venice. Under the Roman government, Umbria had Etrūria on the west, Picēnum and the country of the Sēnōnes on the east, consequently lay chiefly on the Apennines. Inh. Umbri, orum (Sing. Umber, bri), m. the Umbrians, the most ancient people of Italy, according to Flōrus (i. 17). The Boii gained considerable advantages over them in 390 B. C. Besides engaging in frequent hostilities with the other neighbouring nations, they often took up arms against the Romans, and, although uniformly compelled to an unconditional surrender, yet, either from love of war, or inveterate hatred, they did not fail, on the first opportunity, to repeat their hostile attacks, until their means of resistance became so unavailing, that as a Urbicua, w. f. a town of Hispania Tarracōnensis, which the Roman prætor Q. Fulvius Flaccus carried by storm, in 184 B. C. (Liv. xl. 16).

Urbicus, i. m. an actor of farces, who, from that species of composition abounding with mirth and humour, acquired a turn for sportive and ludicrous recitation, and, therefore, the Exōdīlārius of the Romans, corresponded, in some degree, with what we call a buffoon or mimic (Juv. Sat. vi. 71).—2. An indifferent poet (Mart. i. 42).—3. A man to whom Martialis addresses an epigram (vii. 50).—4. A child whose epitaph Martialis writes (vii. 95).

Urbīna, w. f. the mother of Clusinius Figulus. Adj. Urbīnīanus, a. um. Urbīnāna lis. The question was, whether Clusinius Figulus fled from battle, was made prisoner, and remained in captivity for a length of time, until he effected his escape into Italy: or, whether he had been a slave to two masters, medical practitioners at Pisaurus, and, having been manumitted, sold himself as a slave (Quint. vii. 2. 26. Tac. Orat. 38).

Urbīnum, i. n. Urbīno, a city of Italy, the birthplace of Raphael, the celebrated painter (Tac. Hist. iii. 62).

C. Urbīnus, C. Urbīni, m. a Roman questor under Mētellus in Spain (Sal. Frag. 2).

Urbs, Urbis, m. the Orba, a river of Ligūria. As Urbs was the common appellation of Rome among the Romans, Claudianus says, this river had a wonderful name (xxvi. 555).

Urgūlānia, w. f. a great favourite of Livia Augusta, whom L. Cālphurnius Piso prosecuted, and against whom he obtained sentence. Augusta paid the sum which Piso demanded. This haughty woman sent to her grandson Plautius Silvānus, a dagger, as her best present, on his being accused of the murder of his wife. This weapon was supposed to express the opinion of Tiberius, and the guilt of the arraigned should have induced him to make a proper use of it, but timidity prevented, and his veins were opened (Tac. Ann. ii. 34).

Urites, ium, m. a people in the south of Italy, either in Cālābria, or Brūtīus ager (Liv. xlii. 48).

Uritānus ager, appears to have been near Rāvēnna and Fāvēntia (Ap. Bel. Civ.).

C. Ursānīus, C. Ursāni, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who, with one of his colleagues, C. Atīnīus Lābēo, prevented the consuls, C. Cōrnēlius Cēthēgus and Q. Minūcius Rūfus, from putting in their claims together for a triumph in 199 B. C., for having defeated the Gauls in the north of Italy (Liv. xxxiii. 22).

Ursidīus Pōstūmus, Ursidī Pōstūmi, m. a man at whom Juvēnālīs laughs, for expecting chastity in his wife to be preserved by the Julian law, and advises him to prefer death to marriage (Sat. vi. 38).

Urus, i. m. a kind of wild ox, found in ancient times in Silva Hērēfīna q. v. According to Cæsar and Plīnius, the Urus was remarkable for strength and swiftness. The latter states, that this animal was called by the illiterate Būbālūs, a proof that it bore a considerable resemblance to an ox.

Uscāna, w. f. the greatest town on that part of Illyricum, called Pēnēstīana terra. It contained ten thousand inhabitants, and was garrisoned by Cretans, in 172 B. C. Inh. Uscānēses, ium, m. conquered by Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia, who sold them for slaves, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 10 seq.).

Uscūdāma, w. f. Statimaka, a town of the Bēssi, a people whose ferocity was said to surpass the rigour of their climate. It stood at some distance south of Philippōpōlis, and was the chief city of Bēssica (Eutrop. vi. 10). According to Ammānus Mārcēllīnus, it was afterwards Adriānōpōlis (xiv. 11 seq.).

Uslpētes, um, e. Uslpī, orum, m. the Usipians, a people of Gērmānia, Germany, on the right bank of Rhēnus, the Rhine (Cæs. B. G. iv. 1 seq.). Like the other people of that country, they had yellow hair (Mart. vi. 60).

Uspē, es, f. a town of the Sirāci. Inh. Uspēses, ium, m. (Tac. Ann. xii. 17).

Ūtēs, ēntis, m. the Montone, a river of Gallia Cisalpina, washes Rāvēnna on the north, and falls into the Gulf of Venice (Liv. v. 35).

Ūtīca, w. f. an ancient and celebrated city of Africa Prōpria, Tunis, near the mouth of the river Bāgrāda, the Mejerda, founded by a colony of Phenicians, about 287 years before Carthage (to which Silius Itālicus alludes, iii. 241), from which it was only about seven miles distant. In greatness and magnificence, Ūtīca was next to Carthage, and after the destruction of that city, was the capital of the country. It is famous for the death of Cāto (Cātōnis mōrtē nōbīlīe, Plin. i. 534), who, either on hearing of the defeat of Scīpio, or, on being shut up within its walls by Cæsar, put an end to his life there. Hence he was called Cāto Ūtīcēnsis, to distinguish him from Cāto the Censor. Aristōtēles dates the foundation of Ūtīca 287 years before that of Carthage, and the latter is generally supposed to be built at least fifty years before the Trojan war, others suppose much earlier. The site of it is much disputed, supposed by some to be Porto Fōrtis, and by others Bod-shatter, and Stewart places it on Bāgrāda, the Mejerda, about five miles from the coast. Clādes Ūtīcæ, alluding to the death of Cāto (Luc. Ūtīi, orum, m. an Asiatic nation, joined, by Hērōdōtus, with the Paricāni and Myci, who inhabited part of Mēdia (vii. 68).

Ūxāma, w. f. Osuma, a town in Old Castile, a province of Spain (Plin. i. 306. Sil. Ital. iii. 384).

Ūxīi, orum, m. a people on the frontiers of Pērsia, conquered by Alexander the Great, in 331 B. C. (Curt. v. 3).

Vaccæi, orum, m. a people of Spain, on whom Hannibal made war. M. Fulvius defeated the combined army of the Vaccæi, Vettōnes, and Cētibēri, in a regular engagement near Tolētum, Toledo, in 195 B. C. In 152 B. C., they were conquered by the consul L. Licinius Lucullus, together with the Cāntābri and other nations of Spain previously unknown. Fourteen years after, the Vaccæi completely defeated the Roman proconsul M. Aemilius Lepidus; but being reduced to the greatest extremity in 135 B. C., they slew themselves, not however, until they had put their wives and children to death (Liv. xxi. 5 seq.).

Vaccēra, æ, m. a man who despised living, and extolled the works of dead, poets (Mart. viii. 69). Martialis introduces to his reader a detestable character of this name (xi. 67). Perhaps he is also the man at whose poverty that poet sneers (xii. 32).

Vada, æ, f. a town of the Batavians, on Vāhālis, the Waal (Tac. Hist. v. 20).

Vādāvēro, ōnis, m. according to some authors one of the branches of Sālo, the Xalon, a river of Cētibēria. The reading in Martialis is doubtful, and nothing certain can be obtained (i. 50).

Vādīmōnis, is, f. (Lacus), Lago di Bassano, a lake of Etrūria, at which the Etrūsci were defeated in 310 B. C., by the Roman dictator Papirius Cūrsor. They had never appeared in greater force or spirit, than in that engagement (Liv. ix. 39).

Vāga, æ, f. (sometimes but improperly written Vaccæ), Vegga, a town of Africa Prōpria, on Rūbricātus, v. Tūscā, the Wad-el-Berber. Inh. Vāgēnses, lum, m. treacherously massacred the Roman garrison under T. Turpillius Silānus, for which the consul Q. Cæcilius Mētellus Nūmīdicus marched against them, retook their town, and gave it up to pillage (Sal. Jug. 69).

Vāgābānta, orum, n. a town of Mēsōpōtāmla (Amm. Mar. xxix. 1).

Vāgēnni, v. Vāgīēnni, orum, m. a people who inhabited part of the Alps on the Italian side, and the district bears from them the modern name of Viozenna (Sil. Ital. viii. 605). Their chief town, Augūsta Vāgīēnōrum, is now called Vico, a very inconsiderable place (Plin. i. 319).

Vāgēsus. See Bāgēsus.

Vagises, is, m. a chief of the Parthian embassy sent to M. Licinius Crassus (Ap. Bel. Par. 137).

Vāhālis, is, m. the Wahal, or, Waal, the left branch of Rhēnus, the Rhine, which runs by Nimeguen and Tiel, and joins Mōsa, the Meuse, at the island of Voorn, and falls into the German Sea below the Breil (Cæs. B. G. iv. 10).

Vālēns, ōtis, m. brother of the Roman emperor Vālētīnīānus, who made him master of the horse (Stabulo eum præfecit), and afterwards saluted him with the title of Augūstus, sharing with him the honours of the empire, and assigning him the east as his government. He appears to have been a prince of little mental resource, or of personal bravery. His brother's opinion regulated his conduct, and, to please him, he declared war on the Goths, not without just reason, since they had sent auxiliaries to Prōpria, exciting a civil war. He held his court at Byzāntium, Constantinople, from which he marched against that rebel, who had excited a great commotion, conquered him, and punished his adherents with severity. Vālēns then directed his arms against the nation just mentioned, crossed later, the Danube, by a bridge of boats, and found an enemy to attack, fear having compelled them to fly to the mountains. On learning their dispersion and timidity he returned to Constantinople. He discovered great severity of temper against pretenders to a knowledge of future events, and against inquirers respecting his successor in the government. Suspecting that his life might be endangered by these means, he naturally adopted plans of security, and can only be censured for indiscriminate condemnation. He made preparations for war against Sāpor, king of Armēnia and Ibēria, but a nearer enemy, the Goths, required his undivided attention, as they had invaded the Roman empire. He allowed them to settle in Thracia. They crossed the Danube on rafts, in ships, and in the hollow trunks of trees (cavatis arborum alvīs). He dreaded danger to the state from their immense multitudes, and, therefore, sent his generals against them to prevent them spreading, and these defeated them in battle; still the Goths continued equal, if not superior, to the Romans, by consequence of their numbers. Vālēns himself took the command of the army, for which purpose he had left Antīōchia, as he came to Constantinople, engaged the enemy in battle, and was never afterwards seen. Respecting his death different accounts have been given; nothing, however, is certainly known, except that his body was not found, and that he had not the honours of interment. According to Claudīānus, he was burnt to death (xxvi. 610). Ammīānus Mārcellinus draws a minute character of him, containing many excellent qualities blended with considerable vices (xxvi. 7 seq.).

C. Vālēns Hōstīlīānus Mēssīus Quintus C. Vālētīs Hōstīlīāni Mēssīi Quinti, was the second son of C. Mēssīus Quintus Trājānus Dēclūs, whose family name appears, from ancient coins, to have been Mīsius, and is likewise found on the medals of his sons. In history, the father is generally called Dēclūs, and his son, Hōstīlīānus. On the death of Dēclūs, which Gallus had accomplished, the latter assumed the purple and caused Hōstīlīānus, son of his predecessor, to be proclaimed Augūstus, with a view of securing the crown to himself, as of murdering the youth, to whom he pretended to act as guardian, only that he might have him more completely in his power. Gallus, dreading that the soldiery might contest the power, as well as the title of emperor, Hōstīlīānus, in consequence of his being the son of Dēclūs, resolved to destroy him.

a plague, at that time prevalent, concealed his guilt; hence we find one author maintaining, that he died by poison, and another, that he was cut off by the plague.

Välētia, æ. f. Valencia, a town of Spain, on Turia, the Guadalaviar, nearly opposite Pitūsa, Ivica. Dēcius Jūnius Brūtus, the Roman consul, gave it to the soldiers who had served under Viriāthus, in 140 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 55. Sal. Frag. 2).—2. Valence, a town of France, in Viennēnsis provincia.—3. A district of Britoin, between the walls of Antōnius and Sēvēr, possessed by the Maīatæ, Scottish tribes, five in number, viz., the Otadēni, the Gadēni, the Sēlgōvæ, the Nōvāntæ and Dānni (Amm. Mar. xxviii. 3).

Välēria, æ. f. a district of Pānnōnia, so called in honour of Välēria, daughter of Diōclētianus (Amm. Mar. xvi. 10 seq.).

Välēria Mēssālina, Välērie Mēssālina, f. daughter of Välērius Mēssāla Bārhatūs and Dōmītia Lēpida, whom the Roman emperor Claudius married, and afterwards put to death, both on account of her enormous lewdness, and her having married C. Silius. To the emperor she bare a son, at first called Gērmānicus, afterwards Britānnicus, and a daughter, Octāvia, whom her father married to his stepson, Nēro (Suet. Claud. 26 seq.). She is, in general, simply called Mēssālina.

Välērius Aslāticus, Välērii Aslātici, m. a native of Viēna, Vienna, was a man of great interest, and had powerful connexions in his native country. He twice held the office of consul at Rome, possessed enormous wealth, and lived in princely magnificence. Mēssālina coveted the beautiful gardens, once the pride of Lūcillus, which the taste of Aslāticus had improved to the highest pitch, on their falling into his hands. The wicked Mēssālina suborned Sūllius to commence a prosecution against him, and Sōsibius, who had the ear of the emperor, under the guise of friendship, stated unfounded aspersions against the character of Aslāticus, which he well knew would gratify the wishes of Mēssālina. Pretorian soldiers seized the unfortunate victim at Baie, and brought him in chains to Rome. Aslāticus was not allowed to appear before the senate. The emperor heard the trial, in his own chamber, in the presence of Mēssālina, when Aslāticus conducted his defence with such poetic eloquence, that Claudius felt strongly agitated, and Mēssālina could not refrain from tears. As an act of distinguished kindness, Claudius allowed him to choose his mode of dying, and he opened his veins and expired. First, however, he bathed and supped with cheerfulness, caused the funeral pile to be erected, surveyed the flames, and ordered it to be removed to a distance, lest the fire should injure the branches of the trees. Such was the tranquillity and composure with which this great man met his unmerited fate (Tac. Ann. xi. 1—3).—2. The son-in-law of Vitēllius. He was governor of Gāllia Belgica, and consul elect in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 59 seq.).

Välērius Cāpito, Välērii Cāpitōnis, m. a man of pretorian rank, banished by Agrippina, and recalled by her son Nēro, in the year 60 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 12).

Välērius Cāto, Välērii Cātōnis, m. a grammarian, said by some to have been born in slavery, an assertion which he indignantly repels, maintains that he was freeborn, but left under tutorage, from his father dying when he was very young. In the usurpation of Sūlla, he lost his patrimony, and had recourse to teaching, as a mode of subsistence. Of his success and celebrity, sufficient evidence has been transmitted. His merits have been celebrated in verses which show that he excelled particularly in reading and illustrating the poets, as well as in training the youthful mind to poetic composition. This grammarian lived to a great age, involved in the miseries of extreme indigence. He was a native of Gāllia, France (Suet. II. Gram. 11).

Välērius Cātūllus, Välērii Cātūlli, m. a youth of consular family, who charged the emperor Cālgūla with violating his person (Suet. Cal. 36).

Välērius Fābiānus, Välērii Fābiāni, m. a man of high rank, who forged the will of his relation Dōmītiūs Bālb, and drew two Roman knights, Vincius Rufinus, and Tērēntius Lēntinus into the plot. These acted in concert with other two, Antōnius Primus, and Asīnius Mārcellus. The fraud having been proved before the Roman senate, Välērius, Antōnius, Vincius, and Tērēntius, were condemned to suffer the penalties of the Cornelian law, in the year 62 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40).

Välērius Fēstus, Välērii Fēsti, m. a relation of Vitēllius, a young man of unbounded expense and immoderate ambition. He commanded a legion in Africa, under L. Cālpurnius Piso, whom he put to death, and obtained the government of that province. In the contest between Vitēllius and Vēspāsianus, Välērius publicly supported Vitēllius, and secretly favoured Vēspāsianus. By this duplicity, he expected to make his own terms with the conqueror (Tac. Hist. ii. 98).

Välērius Flāccus, Välērii Flācci, m. a military tribune of the third legion, who upbraided the Romans for allowing the honour of taking the camp of Hanno near Bēndēvētum, to a cohort of the Pēlignī, in the year 214 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 14).

Välērius Mārīnus, Välērii Mārīni, m. was put in nomination for the consulship by Gālba, but afterwards set aside on account of his mild temper, which disposed him to submit to injury without murmuring (Tac. Hist. ii. 71).

Välērius Mēssālīnus, Välērii Mēssālīni, m. son of the celebrated orator Cōrvīnus Mēssālīna, who, from his father, derived no inconsiderable powers of eloquence. In the senate he moved, that a golden statue of Mārs the avenger, might be erected, on the condemnation of Cn. Cālpurnius Piso, for the murder of Gērmānicus, in the year 20. Tācitus has recorded his speech against the motion of Cæcina Sēvēr, prohibiting the governors from taking their wives with them to their provinces (Ann. iii. 18 seq.).

Välērius Nāso, Välērii Nāsōnis, m. a man of pretorian rank, appointed coadjutor to M. Lēpidus, governor of Smȳrna, in the year 26 (Tac. Ann. iv. 56).

Välērius Paullīnus, Välērii Paullīni, m. an officer of distinguished merit in the Roman army, who declared for Vēspāsianus, in the year 69. He was a native of Vōcōgūllus, Fregus, and had then the command both of that colony, and the adjacent cities. The hope of future advantages, added to his present elevation, excited his countrymen to second his efforts with their utmost zeal, and his services contributed to the overthrow of Vitellius, and the advancement of Vespasianus (Tac. Hist. iii. 42).

Valerius Ponticus, Valerius Pontici, m. was banished both from Italy, and his native country, because he attempted to elude the jurisdiction of the praefect of Rome, by commencing a legal prosecution against certain delinquents, and afterwards abandoning it (Tac. Ann. xiv. 41).

Valerius Potitus, Valerius Potiti, m. the colleague of Aemilius Mamercus q. v. in the quaestorship. According to Tacitus, these quaestors were the first elected by the people, and the appointment took place in the sixty-third year after the expulsion of Tarquinus (Tac. Ann. xi. 22).

C. Valerius, C. Valerii, m. a military tribune with consular power, in 369 B. C. (Liv. vi. 36).—2. Flamen Dialis in 186 B. C., afterwards praetor, to whose lot the foreign jurisdiction fell (Liv. xxxix. 39—45).—3. An ambassador sent from Rome, with other four, in 175 B. C., to learn the state of matters in Macedonia, and thence to proceed to Alexandria, to renew the treaty of friendship with Ptolemaeus. To him L. Rammius discovered the design of poisoning all the Roman ambassadors and commanders, who should lodge in his house (Liv. xlii. 6 seq.). See L. Rammius.

C. Valerius Cäburus, C. Valerii Cäburi, m. a chief man among the Gauls in Provincia, Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné, whose original name appears to have been Cäburus. On being made a Roman citizen by C. Valerius Flaccus, he, as was usual, took the name of his patron (Ces. B. G. i. 47).

C. Valerius Cätüllus, C. Valerii Cätüllii, m. was born at Sirmio, Sermeone, a peninsula on Læus Benæus, Lago di Garda, in the territory of Veröna, hence he is called Verönensis, which may have given rise to the opinion, that he was born at Veröna. His parents probably possessed a considerable fortune and rank, since his father exchanged the rights of hospitality with C. Julius Caesar. His countrymen extolled the poetic merits of Cätüllus, although his works have not been read with that attention and frequency, which their excellence claims. Of his numerous writings, only one hundred and fifteen pieces, unquestionably his, have been transmitted; some of them display great elegance and tenderness, but, like other writers on amorous subjects, a pure mind occasionally regrets deviations from correct taste and virtuous feeling. He wrote before Latin had attained its full beauty, its enchanting harmony, and grateful variety, which delight the reader of the works of Virgilius. Ovidius has expressed his high opinion of Cätüllus, and this not without justice, since to him he has been indebted for more than hints. The epigrams of Cätüllus excel those of Martialis, and in the charm of his poetry, the latter, although he lived at a period more favourable for purity of style, cannot be compared with the former. To him Martialis alludes in the following lines, Veröna docet syllabas amat vatis (l. 62).

Among the best editions of this author is that of Doering. Adj. Cätüllianus, a. un. Cätülliana (bäsa) (Mart. xi. 7).

C. Valerius Dönötaurus, C. Valerii Dönötauri, m. a nobleman of the Helvii, whose father Cäburus was at the head of the clan. The Helvii, having engaged in war with their neighbours, came to an engagement, in which they were defeated, and C. Valerius Dönötaurus was left among the slain (Ces. B. G. vii. 65).

C. Valerius Flaccus, C. Valerii Flacci, m. a noble Roman, compelled against his will by P. Licinius, pontifex maximus, to be inaugurated Flamen Dialis, in 211 B. C. After discharging the office for some time, he claimed a privilege which had been for many years neglected, on account of the worthlessness of the Flamines, a seat in the senate. The praetor objected, but, on his appealing to the tribunes of the people, he attained his object. He maintained that his office entitled him to the Toga praetexta and Sella curulis. He afterwards obtained the curule edileship (Liv. xxvii. 8 seq.).—2. A noble Roman who conferred the freedom of the city on C. Valerius Cäburus.

C. Valerius Lævinus, C. Valerii Lævi, m. son of Lævinus, who made the first treaty of alliance with the Ætolii, was the maternal brother of M. Fulvius Nobilior, consul, by whom he was sent along with the ambassadors of that nation to Rome, in 191 B. C., to ratify the treaty into which he had entered (Liv. xxxviii. 9, 10).—2. Appointed praetor in 181 B. C., when Sardinia became his province. Having been substituted consul in room of Cn. Cornélius Scipio Hispanus, a war in Liguria gratified his inclination, and he set out immediately for that district. Of his measures little is known, as a great part of the chapter of Livius, which probably contained his military operations in Liguria, is lost, but that he was ultimately successful does not admit of doubt, since he triumphed over the Ligurians. His colleague, too, had been elected in room of another, on which account those skilled in religious rites and public law maintained, that these substitutes could not hold the Cömitia for the election of the magistrates. On a war breaking out in Ætolia, Lævinus, with other four ambassadors, was sent to that country, and the deputies of both parties debated the business at Delphi. He was an unsuccessful competitor for the censorship, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xl. 44 seq.).

C. Valerius Potitus, C. Valerii Potiti, m. after being a military tribune with consular authority, was raised to the consulship in 409 B. C. The soldiers had a great aversion to Valerius, yet, under him they retook the citadel, Cärvēnta, when he ordered the quaestors to sell by auction the spoil, and to deposit the produce in the public treasury, which added to the resentment of the army. The senate allowed him an ovation, in which the soldiers, in doggerel verse, reflected with severity on his conduct, and extolled Mamilius, a tribune of the people, who had opposed the levy. He was afterwards twice re-elected to the office of a military tribune, with consular authority (Liv. iv. 49—61).—2. Elected consul in 331 B. C. This year is distinguished in Roman history, by the discovery of one of the most infamous practices which ever disgraced a nation, cutting off the principal persons in the state by poison (Liv. viii. 18). Some make his surname Flaccus. See Cornelia.

C. Valerius Proculus, C. Valerius Proculus, m. the son of C. Valerius Căburs, was the chief man in Prövincia, Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné. Caesar, on account of his knowledge of the Gallic language, sent him and M. Metellus to hold an interview with Ariovistus, king of Germany. On the ambassadors arriving at the camp of that prince, he, in the hearing of his whole army, called out that they were spies, and, without allowing them to speak, put them both in chains. After the army of the German king was totally routed, in the pursuit, Caesar himself fell in with C. Valerius Proculus, who informed his general, that lots had been thrice drawn in his presence, whether he should be burned alive on the spot, or reserved for another time; and that he had been saved by the favour of the lots (Cæs. B. G. i. 19 seq.).

C. Valerius Tappus, C. Valerius Tappi, m. a tribune of the people, who obtained for the inhabitants of Förmia, Fündi, and Arpinum, the right of voting, in 190 B. C.; before that time, they had been members of the state without that privilege (Liv. xxxviii. 36).

L. Valerius, L. Valerius, m. a man left to guard the city Rome, in 464 B. C., during the campaign against the Æquans (Liv. iii. 5).—2. (Surnamed in con. cal. Publicola Pötitus) was questor in 485 B. C. In this office he joined Keso Făbius in prosecuting Sp. Căssius for treason. Two years after, he obtained the consulship, an honour which his countrymen again conferred on him, when he carried on war against the Æqui, who declined to give him battle, and a thunderstorm prevented him from taking their camp (Liv. ii. 41—62).—3. An intërrëx, in 396 B. C. Three years after, Valerius was sent with two other ambassadors to carry a golden bowl to Dëlpfi, Castri, as a gift to Apölo. See A. Măntius. A man of this name, probably the same, was master of the horse to M. Förlus Cămillus, in 389 B. C. (Liv. v. 17—48). Some historians, but without any good reason, attribute what is above stated, not to one person, but to three.—4. Was master of the horse to Cn. Quinctilius, in 330 B. C. (Liv. viii. 18).—5. A plebeian tribune, who carried a law for repealing Oppia lëx, in 197 B. C. Against the abrogation, M. Pörcius Căto made a powerful but unsuccessful speech (Liv. xxxiv. 1 seq.).

L. Valerius Antias, L. Valerius Antiatias, m. a Roman officer, who received five ships to convey to Rome the Macedonian and Carthaginian ambassadors, taken prisoners by P. Valerius Flaccus, in 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 34).

L. Valerius Flaccus, L. Valerius Flacci, m. master of the horse to M. Æmilius Păpus, in 321 B. C. (Liv. ix. 7).—2. Obtained the office of curule edile with L. Quinctius Flămīnius, in 203 B. C., and exhibited the games in an elegant manner, during two successive days. Next year he was elected prætor, and obtained Sicily, as his province. In 197 B. C., he and M. Pörcius Căto were created consuls, and Italy became his province. He fought a pitched battle with the Boii, and obtained a brilliant victory, killing eight thousand of the enemy, on which the remainder retired to their villages and lands. During the rest of the summer, he kept his army near Pădus, the Po, and repaired the buildings in Plăcëntia, Placenza, and Crēmōna, which had been destroyed in the war. In the following year, when procousul, a decisive victory over the Insübres Gălli and Boii, under the command of Dörülăcus, added to his military fame, when he left ten thousand slain on the field. Serving as a lieutenant-general under the consul M. Acilius Glăbrio, in Greece, he was present at Thërmöpyla, Therma, when Antiöchus received a complete defeat, which drove him out of Greece, in 193 B. C. By the interest of M. Pörcius Căto, who had been his colleague in the consulship, he obtained the office of censor, in 186 B. C., and, during his censorship, was made prince of the senate (Liv. xxxi. 4 seq.).—3. Chosen a pontiff in room of M. Cörnëlius Cëthëgus, in 198 B. C., and died in 182 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 42 seq.).—4. Consul in 102 B. C., with C. Mărius, in his sixth consulate, and, on his death, in 88 B. C., was substituted consul in his place. This appointment rendered him the colleague of L. Cörnëlius Cinna, procured him the command of the army under Sölla, and exposed him to the ambitious cruelty of C. Flăvius Fimbria q. v., by whom he was killed. Avarice had rendered Valerius odious to the troops, and emboldened Flăvius to murder his superior officer (Liv. Ep. 82). He carried a law, by which creditors were obliged to receive a fourth, or 25 per cent., as full payment. Vëllëus Pătërcölus calls it Türpissima lëx (ii. 23).—5. A noble Roman, was an excellent soldier, and a man of great abilities. He traced his descent from P. Valerius Publicola, who was consul with M. Jünius Brütus. After holding the office of tribune of the soldiers in Cilicia, and being questor in Hispănia, Spain, he obtained the office of prætor, during the consulship of M. Tüllius Cicëro, and, at that memorable period, his activity and talents contributed greatly to the crushing of the conspiracy formed by L. Sërgius Cătılina. After the expiry of his prætorship, he succeeded to the government of Asia, and, on his return, was arraigned for extortion, but acquitted through the powerful eloquence of Cicëro, who, with Hörtënsius, pleaded his cause (Sal. Cat. 45). Adj. Valërianus, a, um. Valëriana tēgionës (Sal. Frag. 5).

L. Valerius Pötitus, L. Valerius Pötdi, m. a Roman patriot, who occasioned a great ferment in the senate, in 449 B. C., on that body being assembled by the dëcëmviri, when the Sabines and Æquans had commenced hostilities. He resolutely insisted, that he should be allowed to speak on the state of the commonwealth, which it was the wish, as well as the interest, of the dëcëmviri to prevent. At last, even Applius Claudius q. v., was obliged to permit him to say whatever he chose. His accurate statement had no effect in recovering Roman liberty, for the dëcëmviri carried their point, in consequence of many patricians hating the tribunician power, and wishing rather that the dëcëmviri should resign, from choice than from compulsion. With the assistance of M. Nē-vinces. Valerius, he drove Appius Claudius from the forum, who had refused their arrears for L. Julius, the betrothed spouse of Virginia p. c., at the time that unprincipled dictator had ordered her to be given up to her fictitious claimant M. Claudius. The senate afterwards appointed Valerius and Horatius to treat with the commons, when the Roman armies revolted and retired, first to Minus Idutinus, and then to Minus Siler. On their obtaining the consulship, in 449 B. C., they enacted several laws, which increased the power of the commons; first, that whatever was ordered by the commons, collectively, should bind the whole nation; second, another regulation granted the right of appeal, with others of a similar tendency. The commons gained a decisive victory over the Equi and Volsci, took their camp, and obtained great booty. They were the first who triumphed by order of the people, without the approbation of the senate. They afterwards refused to be re-elected to the consulship, because they considered it contrary to law (Liv. iii. 38-64).

—2. A Roman commander, of very great ability, who held the office of a military tribune with consular authority, in 397 B. C., when he performed no memorable exploit, but carried off a vast quantity of spoil from Falerii, leaving nothing unharmed which sword or fire could destroy. This was the fifth time he had been chosen to the same appointment (Liv. iv. 48 seq.).—3. Consul with M. Mincius Cipitōnius, in 391 B. C. The consuls marched against the Æqui, and because Valerius continued the pursuit and slaughter with greater earnestness, the senate decreed to him a triumph, and to his colleague only an ovation (Liv. v. 51). In this chapter, an intērrex of this name is mentioned, probably the same person, although some are of a different opinion. Only four years after, Livius mentions another of this name, as intērrex, who has nothing to distinguish him from the person already mentioned (Liv. vi. 5).

L. Valerius Præconinus, L. Valerius Præconini, m. a Roman lieutenant-general, whose army was defeated and himself killed in Aquitania, before the invasion of Gallia, France, by Cæsar (Cæs. B. G. iii. 20).

L. Valerius Publicola, L. Valerius Publicola, m. chosen a military tribune with consular power, in 393 B. C., and was four times re-elected to the same office (Liv. v. 26 seq.).

L. Valerius Tappo, L. Valerius Tappōis, m. was elected praetor in 195 B. C., when Sicilia, Sicily, fell to his lot as his province, in which he performed nothing memorable (Liv. xxxv. 10 seq.).—2. Son of C. Valerius Tappo, appointed a triumvir, for settling six thousand families at Placentia and Crēmōna (Liv. xxxvii. 46).

Mānlius Valerius, Mānli Valerius, m. son of Mārcus and grandson of Volsus; according to some the first dictator, an opinion which Livius controverts (ii. 18).—2. The son of Volsus, created dictator in 494 B. C., triumphed over the Sabines, and resigned the dictatorship, because the senate refused to take the case of debtors into consideration (Liv. ii. 30 seq.).

Mānlius Valerius Māximus, Mānli Valerius Māximi, m. censor with P. Semprontus Sōphus, in 253 B. C., when they expelled thirteen senators, led a Latrocinium, and the number of citizens to 62,571 (Liv. xxv.).

M. Valerius, M. Valerius, a m. (Scipio), who on the part of Carthage concluded a treaty with the Romans, the Carthage previously to the conclusion of the Second and Third, in the Tiber. Valerius (Liv. v. 40-42) brother of Publius, who was consul in 355 B. C., triumphed over the Carthage and was killed in the charge which he assumed against Timarchus, at Alia (Liv. v. 46-47).—3. A senator who was a presidential Curia, in the year 461 (Liv. vi. 7).—4. A pontif who died Quintus Mincius what was intended for the Roman legions, in 38 B. C. (Liv. viii. 9).—5. A lieutenant-general.

Quintus Valerius presented in 147 B. C. (Liv. xl. 27).

M. Valerius, M. Valerius, m. (son of Quintus Valerius, c. Quintus), which name of the soldiers, engaged in battle a Gladius of extraordinary size, in this was assisted by a triumph, pushing back even Belmont, and afterwards attacked its head and talons, the first triumph of antiquity, so that he killed his own difficulty. In this Mānlius distinguished

(i. 700). From this victory, Quintus surname of Corvus, and the triumph him with ten acres and a golden triumph senate appointed L. Mānlius Tricipitator, on purpose to hold the dictatorship named M. Valerius Corvus, though absent, and only twenty years of age, in 347 B. C. M. Tricipitator was his colleague. On his death that office for the third time with Quintus Corvus, in 345 B. C., he transferred the army into Campania, to the Samnites, whom he completely defeated and returned to Rome in triumph. Part of the Roman army, both male and female, were marching against the Carthage, Valerius appointed dictator, when Livius only to M. Valerius Māximus, and L. Valerius Mānlicinus master of the horse. By prudent conduct, the triumph was gained without bloodshed. He had the honor of being appointed consul a fourth time, in 339 B. C., and M. Attilius Régulus was elected his colleague. They took Carthage, Carthage carried off a great quantity of plunder, and the success of Valerius was rewarded with a triumph. From the beginning of the triumph, he was the fifteenth who held the office of intērrex, when A. Cornellius and Calpurnius were chosen consuls, in 332 B. C. which he had held eight years before. The high opinion of his merits which his countrymen entertained, may be inferred, from his again holding the office of intērrex, of dictator, and of consul for the fifth time. Valerius still followed his march, and the Romans again expressed their approbation, by giving him another triumph. He passed a law respecting a stricter observance of the law of appeal. This was the third time, from the expulsion of the kings, that the same family introduced this law. On the death of L. Mānlius Torquātus, Valerius obtained again the consulship, but performed nothing memorable (Liv. vii. 26 seq.). To him Thales refers, when speaking of the number of times that Augustus had held the consulship (Ann. 1. 9). Augustus caused a statue of Cōrvinus to be set up in the forum, and, in allusion to his surname, the figure of a crow was placed on his head (Gel. ix. 11). Adj. Vālērĭus, a, um. Vālērĭa lēx, prohibited a person who had appealed, to be beaten with rods, and beheaded. It added, that whosoever acted contrary to it, should be deemed guilty of a wicked deed (Liv. x. 9).

M. Vālērĭus Fālto, M. Vālērĭi Fāltonis, m. a Roman of quæstorian rank, sent ambassador to Attālus, in 207 B. C., to bring the mother of the gods to Rome. Two years after, he was curule edile, and, on obtaining the prætorship, Brūtĭus ager fell to his lot. This office was continued to him next year, that he might cross over into Sardinia (Liv. xxix. 11 seq.).

M. Vālērĭus Lævĭnus, M. Vālērĭi Lævĭni, m. was elected prætor in 218 B. C., obtained the jurisdiction with respect to foreigners, and received the command of the army brought home from Sicilia, Sicily, with which he retook three towns from the Hirpini. The ambassadors of Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnia, to Hännibal, fell in with the out-posts of Vālērĭus, and on being brought before him, Xēnōphānes q. v., who was at the head of the embassy, overreached him, pretending that he had despatches for the senate and Roman people, with whom he had come to conclude a treaty of peace. The deception did not continue long, for the senate, suspecting the hostility of Philippus, sent Vālērĭus to command the seacoast near Brūndĭsĭum, Brindisi, and to watch the motions of that monarch. In this commission, he both prevented the towns of Itālia, Italy, from revolting to Hännibal, and retook some on the Grecian coast from Philippus. From the carelessness of the Macedonians during the night, Vālērĭus had nearly made the king prisoner, only failing from the ferocity of his men, who began the carnage, as soon as they entered the enemy's camp. For his activity and success against Philippus, his countrymen elected Vālērĭus consul in his absence in 212 B. C., with M. Claudĭus Mærcēllus (4), an office which he had held for part of the year 222 B. C. On the continent of Greece, Vālērĭus took several towns of great strength, and prevailed on some states, by his art and address, to join the Romans. In the command, he was succeeded by P. Sūlpĭcius, whom bad health prevented from returning home for some time, according to the order of the senate. The Cāmpāni, as he passed through Cāpŭa, begged permission to accompany him to Rome, on purpose to supplicate the senate to forbid Q. Fūlvĭus Flāccus to extirpate their race. Vālērĭus commanded them to follow him, and, having been met by some Siciliāns, who preferred charges of cruelty against his colleague, he entered Rome, with a train of accusers of two of the most celebrated men in the state, who had taken by storm Cāpŭa and Sŷrācŭse, during the preceding year. Vālērĭus obtained for his province Itāly, which he exchanged with his colleague for Sicilia, Sicily, because the natives of that island contemplated with horror the government of Mærcēllus. In order to man the fleet, the consuls published an edict ordering private persons, in proportion to their wealth, to supply rowers, who appear to have been slaves, and this order having excited general discontent, they convened the senate, in which it was proposed, that the senators should next day lodge in the treasury all their gold, silver, and coined brass, retaining only a small quantity of each, either for use or ornament. This measure met with universal approbation, and for it the consuls had the thanks of the senate. On his arrival in Sicilia, Sicily, he first settled the affairs of Sŷrācŭse, then marched against Agrĭgēntum, Girgenti, which Mutĭnes betrayed into his hands, when he scourged and beheaded all who had any management in the affairs of the town, sold the rest for slaves, and remitted the money to Rome. This act of cruelty produced a revolution in favour of the Romans over the island. About four thousand exiles, bankrupts, and criminals, who had subsisted by robbery, he sent across the Strait of Messina, to ravage the territory of the Brūtĭi, judging it unsafe to leave them in Sicilia, Sicily, and then went to Rome to hold the elections. Before that business was finished, a report had reached Rome, that the Carthaginians were to make a powerful descent, with the view to recover Sicilia, Sicily, on which the senate ordered him to name a dictator, and immediately to return. M. Lŭcĕrĭus, a tribune of the people, instead of allowing the consul a free choice, proposed, that he should name the person recommended by the people, which he refused to do, and quitted the city privately for Sicilia, Sicily. The senate then applied to his colleague, who named Q. Fūlvĭus Flāccus, agreeably to the order of the people, and Fūlvĭus, in compliance with the same order, named P. Licĭnius Crāssus, pōntĭfex māxĭmus, master of the horse. At the head of a powerful army, he kept Sicilia, Sicily, in complete subjection, made descents on Africa, and came back to Lilybæum, loaded with booty. At sea he defeated the Carthaginian fleet, and, having been victorious over the enemy whenever he had an opportunity of giving battle, he returned to Rome in 209 B. C., with the character of a great warrior. He was one of the five ambassadors sent to Attālus, king of Asia, to procure the statue of Idæa mater. In fulfilment of his promise when consul, he demanded, that the senate should pay the money received from private persons. The justice of the claim having been acknowledged, the creditors immediately received an instalment, and the time was fixed, at which the remainder should be paid. He appears to have been an inveterate enemy of the Carthaginians, and to national prejudice some consideration must be allowed. His valour, by which he obtained numerous victories, added to the martial character of his countrymen, depressed the spirits of the enemies of Rome, both in Greece and Africa. At his death, which happened in 202 B. C., his sons, Pūblius and Mærcus, gave a show of gladiators, when twenty-five pairs of these unhappy beings fought, for the entertainment of the Roman people (Liv. xxiii. 24 seq.).

—2. Elected prætor in 184 B. C., when the foreign jurisdiction fell to him (Liv. xxxix. 56 seq.).

M. Vālērĭus Mārĭāllis, M. Vālērĭi Mārĭāllis, m. was a native of Bŷbŷllis, Baulia, a town in Cēlĭbēria, on Sālo, the Xalon, was of the southern branches of Ibērus, the Ebro. Of his parents, ancient authors have left no account. Some have supposed, that Mārtiālis has given their names in v. 35, an idea which could never have been adopted, unless by the careless readers of that epigram. From his coming to Rome, to study law, at an early period of life, it may be inferred, that his parents were in easy, if not in affluent, circumstances. A degree of knowledge sufficient to qualify him for appearing with advantage at the bar, could not be obtained in a short time, or at little expense. In regard to the length of time during which he prosecuted this study, his writings supply no information, nor has any ancient author mentioned this circumstance. The bent of his inclination carried him to poetical composition, and he obeyed the dictates of nature rather than of prudence, or ambition. The sprightly humour and sportive gaiety which appear in his writings, he probably displayed in conversation, hence it can excite no surprise, to see C. Silius Italicus, Stella, and the younger Plinius, among his most intimate friends. For a period of thirty-five years, he continued at Rome, under the government of six successive emperors, Gālba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasianus, Titus, and Domitianus. The last raised him to the tribuneship, and enrolled him among the knights, besides conferring on him all the privileges of a Roman citizen, who had three children. From his epigrams, as well as from the writings of contemporary authors, he appears to have been in good society, and to have been much esteemed. His success as an epigrammatist naturally excited against him a host of snarling critics, and malignant opponents, who fretted at his celebrity, and the honours bestowed on him by the noble and wealthy. In the pointed epigram he certainly excelled, and many of the moderns have copied from his pages without acknowledgment. Instances, however, of false wit, bad taste, and silly conceit, too often occur. His style is easy, simple, and elegant, and the force of his genius needed not the foreign aid of puns and quibbles, much less of obscenity; but the licentious age in which he lived, relished nothing that was simply pure, chaste, elegant, or sublime. That he pandered to the corrupted taste of the degenerate Romans, must ever be lamented by the lovers of splendid abilities, since the powers of Mārtiālis, unassisted by such meretricious aid, might have transmitted his name to the admiration of the latest ages. The frequency, and seeming eagerness, with which he introduces the grossest ideas in the grossest language, show that he indulged a lewdness of thought utterly repugnant to every principle of purity and virtue. His obscenity is so abominable, that much of his works ought not to be either read or known by the young, of which a great part should be held up to the detestation of all, who have any regard for mental purity, or common decency. At the age of fifty-five, Mārtiālis quitted Rome, and returned to his native place. Of this journey, of no great length, he had not funds sufficient to defray the expense, and must have encountered at Rome all the evils resulting from old age and poverty, had not the liberality of Plinius interposed. Some have supposed he was twice married, although the name of his first wife has not been transmitted. His wife at Bilbilis had a considerable property which she transferred to him, and, in consequence of this union, he passed the remainder of his days in tranquillity and comfort. Here he wrote the twelfth book of his Epigrams, and the thirteenth and fourteen likewise, if they came from his pen, which has been much doubted, and died at the age of seventy-five.

M. Valerius Maximus, M. Valerius Maximus, m. a noble Roman, grandson of Vallus was appointed quaestor in 458 B. C., at two years after, was raised to the consulship (Liv. iii. 25, 31).—2. Elected a military tribune with consular authority, for the second time, in 394 B. C., when he and Q. Servilius Fidenas commanded against the Campens did not attack their town, but desolated the territory, carrying off every kind of produce besides destroying every fruit tree, and every sort of useful vegetable (Liv. v. 14, 24).—Chosen consul in 312 B. C. He spent some time in Samnium, carrying on war, until his colleague, P. Decius Mus q. c., nominated dictator, to whom Valerius was a lieutenant general. After being four times praetor, obtained the censorship, in 307 B. C., when in conjunction with his colleague, he made roads through the fields, at the public expense (Liv. ix. 28—43).

M. Valerius Maximus Messala, M. Valerius Maximus Messala, m. consul with M. Otacilius Crassus, took Messana, Messina, a town in Sicily, in 265 B. C., for which he received the surname of Messala, which the vulgar by degrees changed to Messala (Seneca de Vita. 13). He likewise made himself master of Catina, Catania, another town of Sicily, from which he carried a sand to the first that was brought to Rome. In him descended the famous family of the Messala (Plin. ii. 109). To him Persius alludes (Sat. ii. 72). It appears from Eutropius that the success of the Roman arms in that island was uncommonly great, fifty islands submitted, and almost the whole of the island soon after acknowledged the dominion of the Romans. This author calls Valerius by mistake, Valerius Marcus. Eutropius frequently errs, both in the names of the consuls, and also in the years during which they were in office (li. 19). In some authors, the praenomen is Manius.

M. Valerius Messala, M. Valerius Messala, m. with a fleet of fifty ships arrived on the coast of Africa, in 212 B. C., made an expected descent on the lands of Utica, where he desolated to a great extent; and, on the thirteenth day after he had left Libybum, turned to it with many prisoners, and he of every kind. The consul, M. Valerius Laevinus, wished to nominate M. Valerius Messala dictator, but was prevented by the senate (Liv. xxvii. 5). See Consul.—2. Praetor in 195 B. C., when the foreign jurisdiction fell to his lot. Five years after, was created consul, and he obtained Liguria by lot, as his province, where he performed nothing deserving the notice of the historians. In 176 B. C., the senate sent him and S. Titus Digittus ambassadors to Persius, king of Macedonia. Valerius was afterwards chosen a decemvir of religious rites, in place of L. Aemilius Paullus (Liv. xxxiv. 54 seq.).—3. Held the office of consul with M. d.

rilius Cotta, in the year 20. These magistrates, the whole senate, and a numerous body of citizens, went out to meet Agrippina returning with the urn containing the ashes of her husband, Germanicus, in her hand (Tac. Ann. iii. 2).

M. Valerius Messala Corvinus, M. Valerius Messala Corvini, m. a noble Roman, who, to the bravery of a distinguished soldier, added the eloquence of an accomplished orator. Both Cicero and Tacitus highly extol his merits, and the latter prefers him, in some respects, to the former, as a speaker. Quintilianus, too, bears honourable testimony to his talents, but gives the preference to Cicero, assigning the second place to Corvinus, which the Romans would consider the highest possible commendation, with only one exception (x. l. 113). Messala espoused the cause of the republic, for which M. Antonius proscribed him; but he escaped to Brutus and Cassius, under whom he commanded a fleet, which, after the fall of these patriots, he surrendered, not however unconditionally, and to this circumstance, he most probably owed the preservation of his life. He was second in command under Brutus at Philippi. At the time the battle of Actium was fought, he held, with Augustus, the office of consul, in place of M. Antonius, whom the former had superseded, and thus enjoyed the situation of his enemy, who had set a price on his head. He appears to have lived on terms of intimacy not only with the nobles, but also with the learned, and, therefore, it is not surprising, that the poets have sung his praises, that Horatius has immortalized his name for eloquence, and a knowledge of law, and Tibullus, for his kindness and patronage. For his victory over the Aquitani, he had the honour of a triumph, and was the first praefect of Rome, under Augustus, an office which he, from incapacity, only held for a few days. On his proposal, the senate conferred on Augustus the title of "Father of his country." To him Martialis alludes (viii. 3 seq.). Tacitus calls him Messala Corvinus (Ann. vi. 11 seq.).

M. Valerius Messalinus, M. Valerius Messalini, m. son of M. Valerius Messala Corvinus. Having obtained the command of the troops in Pannonia and Dalmatia, he defeated the barbarians with prodigious slaughter, for which he obtained triumphal honours. His brother had the surname of Cotta (Vel. Pat. ii. 112).

M. Valerius Orca, M. Valerius Orca, m. a Roman, on whose appointment to the command of Sardinia, Sardinia, the Caralitani expelled from their city Cotta, the governor, who fled to Africa (Ces. B. C. i. 30). He was the person to whom Cicero addressed the thirteenth book of his Letters.

M. Valerius Probus, M. Valerius Probi, m. a Latin grammarian of great knowledge, born at Berytus, whose opinions with respect to the quantity of certain Carthaginian names, Gellius has recorded (iv. 7).

M. Valerius Publicola, M. Valerius Publicola, m. a noble Roman, who was master of the horse to C. Sulpicius Peticius, in 357 B. C., when he routed the left wing of the Gallic army, compelling them to flee to the mountains and woods, where a number was killed after the battle. Three years after, he was elected consul, and entered on his office the same day. During his first consulship, for he was re-elected to that office, he and his colleague made war on the Tarquinenses and Tiburtes (Liv. vii. 12—19).

P. Valerius, P. Valerius, m. a lieutenant-general in the Roman army, in the year 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 40).

P. Valerius Flaccus, P. Valerius Flaccus, m. an ambassador despatched by the Romans, with Q. Baebius Tamphilus, to Hannibal, in 220 B. C., in consequence of the complaint of the Saguntini, and, afterwards, they proceeded to Carthage (Liv. xxi. 6).—2. A lieutenant-general under M. Claudius Marcellus, in 218 B. C., at Nola, where he acted with great bravery, and Hannibal was repulsed, according to some historians, with great loss. Livius seems to have considered this action, one of the most important during the whole war, as it was the first check which Hannibal received after the battle of Cannae. Valerius displayed the same activity and courage in the command of the fleet off the coast of Calabria, when he took the ship which had on board the ambassadors of Philippos, king of Macedonia, to Hannibal, then in Italy, and the Carthaginian ambassadors to that monarch, Gisgo, Bostar, and Mago. After his fleet was increased to twenty-five ships, he cruized along the coast of Italia, Italy, which he protected, and exerted himself to procure intelligence of the hostile designs of the Macedonian king. In the motion which he made to the senate, at the time Hannibal failed to raise the siege of Capua, and began to march against Rome, he displayed his judgment. The senate adopted his plan, in preference to those of P. Cornélius Asina and Q. Fabius Maximus q. v. (Liv. xxiii. 16 seq.).

P. Valerius Laevinus, P. Valerius Laevini, m. was the colleague of T. Coruncanius in the consulship, in 282 B. C. The senate sent Valerius against Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who had come to the aid of the Tarentini, and having taken his scouts, ordered them to be led round the camp, that they might see the whole army, and report to their master, whatever they had observed. The hostile armies soon came to an engagement, and, when Roman bravery had nearly obtained a decisive victory, Pyrrhus brought up his fifty elephants, furnished him by Ptolemaeus, king of Egypt, which struck terror into the legions, and turned the scale in favour of the combined army. Valerius escaped in the night. Pyrrhus treated with respect the eighteen hundred Romans, whom he had made prisoners; and buried their killed as well as his own. In going among the slain, and observing their determined look, and the wounds in the front, by which they had all fallen, Pyrrhus exclaimed with hands uplifted to heaven, "that with such soldiers he could conquer the whole world" (Eutrop. ii. 11).—2. Held the office of praetor in 179 B. C., when the one half of Gallia became his province (Liv. xli. 8).—3. A descendant of P. Valerius Publicola, who assisted in the expulsion of the Tarquins, but had so little of the merit of his ancestors, that he lost all the reputation and advantage derived from his birth. Horatius cites him as an example, proving that distinction and respectability proceed from merit, and not from ancestry (Sat. i. 6. 42).

P. Valerius Potitus, P. Valerius Potitius, m. elected a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, in 385 B. C., when M. Furius Camillus made him his associate both in command and counsel, marching with him at the head of the legions, against the enemy at Antium. He was five times re-elected to that office, in which he displayed his martial abilities to advantage, by routing the Volsci and Latini (Liv. vi. 6—42).

P. Valerius Publicola, P. Valerius Publicola, m. son of Volesus q. v., was of Sabine descent, and accompanied Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus when he went from Rome to Collatia, whither he had been sent for by his daughter Lucretia, in consequence of her having been violated by Sextus Tarquinius. Valerius was chosen consul in 509 B. C., in place of L. Tarquinius Collatinus, the husband of Lucretia, after the Romans had banished from their state all who bore the name of Tarquinius. He celebrated the funeral of his colleague L. Junius Brutus, with great pomp, and passed several laws to render himself popular, on which account he received the surname of Publicola. The commons must have been delighted at the statute which made an appeal competent from a decision of the magistrates to the people. A more unjust, or injurious enactment can scarcely be imagined. The people thus became the law, which excited numerous disturbances in the state, and rendered, in many instances, the statute-book no better than blank paper. His house, which stood on the top of Velia, gave offence to the community, and, in consequence of the suspicion thereby excited, he erected with the materials of it another at the foot of the hill, where, says Livius, the temple of Vica Potia now stands, and carried a law devoting both the life and property of the man who should form a design of assuming regal power. After he had been four times consul, he died in 503 B. C., universally considered as excelling his countrymen both in the arts of war and peace; but in so great poverty, that he did not leave property sufficient to defray his funeral charges, on which account he was buried at the expense of the public. The matrons mourned for him a whole year, as they had done for his colleague L. Junius Brutus (Liv. i. 58 seq. Eutrop. i. 9—11).—2. Was raised to the consulship in 475 B. C. (Liv. ii. 52).—3. After being interrex, was elected consul in 460 B. C. Livius does not add his cognomen. In that year, violent contests between the plebeian tribunes and the senate, threw the state into great agitation, of which the enemies of Rome did not fail to take the advantage. Valerius displayed great spirit and activity, both against the turbulent tribunes, and the people who had taken possession of the capitol, against whom when leading on the attack at the head of his men, he was slain (Liv. iii. 15 seq.). See Appian Hædönus.—4. Elected consul in 351 B. C. His colleague was a plebeian. Both exerted themselves in behalf of debtors, a measure which they successfully accomplished, by the agency of five commissioners, whose merits, says Livius, entitled them to have their names recorded with honour, in every history of the times. Two years after, Valerius held the office of prætor, and at a future period, that of dictator (Liv. vi. 23).—5. Master of the horse in 332 B. C. M. Papirius Crassus (Liv. viii. 17).

Q. Valerius Antias, Q. Valerius Antias, m. a Roman historian, of whom Livius speaks if not in contempt, at least in very qualified terms. In particular, he blames him for excessive exaggeration in numbers (Liv. xiii. 10). None of his writings now remain.

Q. Valerius Soranus, Q. Valerius Soranus, m. maintained that the ancient Latins use the word favissa, originally flavissa, in the sense of thesauri (Gel. ii. 10). See Capitolium.

Valerius, i. m. a man in the army of Titus who overthrew Agis (Virg. Æn. x. 722). Valerianus, i. m. a nobleman of the name of the Ædii, who, after having enjoyed the supreme magistracy among his countrymen, appointed his brother, Cötus, to succeed him in that office. But both the nomination and succession were contrary to the laws and practice of the state (Cæs. B. G. vii. 32 seq.). See Cötus.

T. Valgius Rufus, T. Valgius Rufus, m. poet of great merit, whom Horace mentions along with Virgil and Varius (Sat. i. 10. 82). To him that poet inscribed a ode, and expresses their intimacy by addressing him Amicæ Valgi (ii. 9). Valgius wrote epigrams, elegies, pastorals, and epic poetry. In the last, Tibullus considers him next to Homerus (iv. l. 180).

Vändäla, or, f. a country of Germany which appears to have been watered by the Oder. Inh. Vändäli, v. Vändäli, orum, the Vandals, a numerous, barbarous, and powerful nation, who, from similarity of language, appearance, manners, and religion seem to have been originally the same with the Goths. Plinius makes the Vändäli (which he writes Vindili) one of the five different kinds of people who inhabited Germany. With this author, Vändäli include the Bürgündiones, Cärini, and Gütiön v. Göthi (i. 477). Roman authors do not mention the Vändäli, until Germany had become the place of their residence, and, therefore, their origin cannot be accurately ascertained by any information which these writers convey. A doubt can scarcely be entertained, that the Goths anciently settled near the Sea of Azoph, whence, probably, necessity compelled them to migrate to the north of the Baltic Sea. Here they multiplied greatly, and want of territory, added a desire for a more fertile country, and more genial climate, would induce them to seek for new settlements to the south of the present country. Tradition and history unite in referring the Goths to Scandinavia, and the only doubt which remains is, whether the Vandals were a tribe of the same people, before their taking possession of the northeast part of Germany. From thence that they began to make incursions on the Romans, their history is more correctly recorded, and their conquests of France, Spain, Italy, &c., in conjunction with the Goths cannot be traced without the deepest regret. Desolation, cruelty, barbarity, and ignorance, who ruined many beautiful cities, destroyed many of the finest specimens of art, and almost annihilated the literature of the preceding ages. See Göthi.

Vānglo, ōnis, m. sister's son of Vānnius, who, with his brother Sido, received the kingdom of their uncle, on his being deposed (Tac. Ann. xii. 30).

Vānglōnes, um, m. a people of Gāllia Belgica, on the west bank of Rhēnus, the Rhine. They were originally from Gērmānia, Germany, and, at one time, had probably lands on both sides of that river. Their chief town was Borbetōmāgus, afterwards Vānglōnes, now Worms (Cæs. B. G. i. 51). Lūcānus mentions, that they imitated the Sārmātes in wearing wide breeches (Phar. i. 431).

Vānnius, i, m. one of the Quādi, whom the Roman emperor, Tiberius, made king of the colony settled between the rivers Mārus, the Morava, and Cusus, the Vag. At first, Vānnius governed with mildness, but pride, joined with arrogance, afterwards marked his deportment, the result of which was domestic faction, and the hostility of neighbouring nations. In a general engagement, his inferiority in numbers gave a decisive victory to his enemies, who could not withhold from him the praise of great personal valour. Covered with wounds, he escaped to his fleet, which lay in the Danube. Vānglo and Sido, his sister's sons, fought against him, and the kingdom, from which he had been expelled, was divided between them. Lands in Pānnōnia were then given to him and his adherents (Tac. Ann. xii. 29).

Vārdai, orum, m. a people of Illyricum, subdued by the Roman consul, Ser. Fulvius Flācus, in 137 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 56).

Vārdānes, is, m. son of Vōlōgēsēs, king of Pārthia, who aspired at the crown in opposition to his father, in the year 55 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 7).

Vārdānus, i, m. a river of the Sārmātes. In Ammianus Marcellinus, it is corruptly written Totōrdānes (xxii. 8).

Vārēnius, i, m. a native of Mēvānia, Beagna, killed by Hannibal in Italy, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. i. 543).

L. Vārēnus, L. Vārēni, m. a centurion in the legion, which was stationed among the Edui, commanded by Q. Cicero. He disputed pre-eminence in courage with T. Pūllio without the camp, when that legion was, at the instigation of Ariovistus, attacked by the Ebūrōnes, Atuatūci, Nerviī, and their allies and dependants. Both, in that combat, displayed uncommon intrepidity, slew a number of the enemy, and returned unhurt within the entrenchments. But the merit of the two rivals was so very equal, that it could not be decided to whom the palm of victory was due (Cæs. B. G. v. 44).

L. Vārgūntēus Sēnātor, L. Vārgūntēi Sēnātoris, m. a Roman of senatorian rank, one of the accomplices of L. Sērgius Cātullina. He and C. Cōrnēlius, a knight, undertook to murder the consul, M. Tullius Cicero, in his own house, on the 4th of November, 65 B. C. As both were in the habit of visiting Cicero, he would probably have fallen a victim to their cruelty, had not Q. Cūrius, through Fūlvīa, apprised him that his life was in danger, so that on their arrival they found his house guarded, and admittance denied (Sal. Cat. 17, 28). Cicero says, they were both knights, on which account Sēnātor must be a part of the name of Vārgūntēus, and although Sāllūstius makes him of senatorian rank, the authority of the latter must not be set in opposition to that of the former. Perhaps he had been by birth a knight, which may reconcile the statements of the Orator and the Historian. In whatever rank he be regarded as a citizen of Rome, as a man he can only be classed with assassins.

Q. Vārgūntēus, Q. Vārgūntēi, m. a grammarian, mentioned by Suetōnius (Il. Gram. 2).

Vāria, e. Vālēria, æ, f. Vico Varo, a town on the right bank of Anio, the Tevere. Here are some ancient inscriptions, and the wall of huge square stones, which surrounded the town (Hor. Epist. i. 14. 3).

Varini, orum, m. the Varinians, a German nation, supposed to have been in possession of what is now called the Duchy of Mecklenbourg (Tac. Mor. Ger. 40).

P. Varinius Glāber, P. Varinī Glābri, m. a Roman prætor, who, with Appius Claudius Pūlcher, a lieutenant-general, was defeated by the gladiators under Crīxus and Spārtæus, in 75 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 95).

Vārius Crispinus, Vārii Crispini, m. a tribune of the prætorian bands, appointed to furnish the seventeenth cohort then at Ostia, which he attempted to do secretly, and this exciting suspicion occasioned an uproar, in which he lost his life, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. i. 80).

Vārius Līgur, Vārii Līguris, m. for adultery with whom Aquilla was banished, in the year 24. He bribed Sērvilius and Cōrnēlius, who had commenced a prosecution against him, to fall from the accusation, and the crime having been proved, they were both banished to islands (Tac. Ann. iv. 42—vi. 30).

L. Vārius, L. Vārii, m. a Roman poet, of great celebrity among his countrymen, the contemporary and friend of Virgilius and Hōrātius, whose writings are all lost. Until the publication of the Æneid, he was considered the first epic poet of that age, which was the opinion of Hōrātius; Acer Vārius dūcit fortē epos ut nemo, spirited Vārius composes the manly epic, in a style that no one can equal (Sat. i. 10. 44). Even the titles of his works have perished, with the single exception of the tragedy of Thēstes, mentioned by Quintiliānus, which that critic considers equal to any tragedy in the Greek language (x. 1. 98). He was one of the learned party, whose journey to Brūndisium, Hōrātius has described with uncommon spirit and elegance (would, the truth allowed to add purity of idea and expression!), which have tempted many to imitate it, and their compositions have various degrees of merit, but all fall greatly short of the original. That poet regrets the departure of Vārius at Cānūgium, Canosa (Sat. i. 5. 93). Virgilius appointed him one of his heirs, and he was one of those intrusted with the correction and publication of the Æneid. Hōrātius calls him Alex Mæoni carminis, bird of Mæonian, i. e. Homeric song, by which the poet meant that his flight was as lofty as that of Hōmērus; that he equalled the grandeur and sublimity of the father of Epic poetry (Od. i. 6. 2). To him Mārtiālis refers (viii. 18), and Tācitus (Orat. 12).—2. A man of consular rank, who, after having been degraded for avarice, had his seat in the senate restored, in the year 58 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 32).

Q. Vārius, Q. Vāri, m. a Spaniard, born at Sūcro, and called by Cicero, hybridus, from an uncertainty respecting his civil rights. In character and appearance he was an object of contempt, but excelled as an orator. His eminence in this art has obtained him considerable distinction in the pages of Cicero, whilst his vices have consigned his name to infamy (Cic. de Orat. i. 25 §c. Val. Max. iii. 7 seq.).

Vārōnilla, v. f. a vestal, who had violated her vow, to whom the emperor Dōmītiānus gave the liberty of choosing the mode of death, which she preferred, departing from the severity of the ancient law for that crime, because the offence had been committed during the reign of his father, or brother (Suet. Dom. 8).

Vārō, ōnis, m. a tragic and lyric poet, celebrated by Mārtiālls, who wishes him to read his epigrams (v. 31).

Vārōnīānus, i, m. son of the Roman emperor Jōvīānus, whom his father placed on the curule chair in his infancy, bestowed on him the title of Nōbīllissīmus, and invested him with the ensigns of the consulship. Jōvīānus only lived six weeks after this foolish decoration, and of the life of his son, history has only transmitted one particular, that sixteen years after, he was still in life (Eutrop. x. 18).

Vārus, i, m. a Hyrcanian prophet of great age, who commanded his countrymen, in the war between the Scythians and Colchians, who were joined by the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 115).—2. A Roman, whom Virgīllius celebrates in his sixth and ninth pastorals. He appears to have distinguished himself as a soldier, but nothing certain respecting him has been established. There were several families at Rome, who had this surname, hence the numerous conjectures and gratuitous assumptions respecting this person. It does not appear, that ancient history furnishes any criterion by which he can be certainly identified. It has been supposed, that he lost his life in Germany with three legions which he commanded, and that to him Mānīllius alludes; Cum fēra dūctōrem rūpūt Gērmānia Vārum (i. 897).—2. A man who entertained Mārtiālls. The poet complains that the table was loaded with gold not with food (lv. 78).

Vārus, i, m. the Var, a rapid river of Itālia, Italy, which takes its rise in the Alps, runs south, and falls into the Mediterranean, a little to the west of Nicea, Nice. It divided Ligūria from Prōvincia, afterwards Gāllia Nārbōnēnsis (Flor. iii. 2).

Vāsāces, is, m. commanded the cavalry of Vōlogēsēs, in the year 63 (Tac. Ann. xv. 14).

Vāsātē, arum, f. Bazas, a town of Nōvēm-pōpūli, the capital of Bazadois, about thirty miles south of Bourdeaux (Ann. Mar. xv. 11). Lsh. Vāsātē, arum, v. Vāsātes, ium. Adj. Vāsātēus, a, um. Vāsātēa rhēda (Auson. cccxcvi. 19).

Vāscōnia, v. f. a country in the north of Spain, at the foot of Mōntēs Pŷrēnēl, the Pyrenees, near the western extremity of these mountains. Lsh. Vāscōnēs, um (Sing. Vāscō, ōnis, m. Their chief town was Cālāgūrris, Calahorra, which, for having taken part with Q. Sērtōrius, was besieged by Cn. Pōmpēius, and, during the famine, the inhabitants subsisted for some time, eating the flesh of those who had fallen by the sword, or died of hunger (Jur. Nat. xi. 8). Vālērius Māxīmus makes them eat the flesh of their wives and children, and seems to understand, that they killed them for that purpose, after they had devoured every kind of animal which was within their city (6. 6). The descendants of the Vāscōnēs had possession of part of Gāllia Aquitānia, called from them Vāscōnia, non Gāmpē. Adj. Vāscōnēus, a, um.

Vāstītānī, orum, m. a people of Spain, perhaps the same with the Bāstītānī, Bāstītānī from Bāsta, Baza (Liv. xiii. 46).

Vāticānus, a, um. Vāticānus mōs, i. collis, Monte Vaticano, a mountain on the west side of Tiber, the Tenore, included within the walls of Rome. Near the Foro, it is still inhabited to a considerable extent, but much of it is garden-ground. Rome derives the name from the ager of the prophets (Vātūm rēspōnsio), which induced the Roman people to take possession of it on expelling the Etruscī. Vāro gives a different derivation, that the god who presided over the human voice was called Vācānus, because the first sound uttered by children is the first syllable of this word, and hence vāgīrē, to cry like an infant, is expressive of the sound. The etymology of the word given by A. Gēllius is not materially different from that of Fēstus. He derives it from the predictions (a vāticināte) which were delivered on that ground by the god under whose protection that district (Vācānus ager) was (xvi. 17). L. Pōstūlus Mēgēllus had a standing camp in Vāticānus ager, in 297 B. C., to protect Rome, as danger was apprehended from the war in Etruria (Liv. x. 26). Vāticinūm vīnum, Vāticūm vine, which, according to Mārtiālls, was very bad (x. 45 seq.). Vāticinā bībia, bībi vīnēnum (Mart. vi. 92). Vāticinā vāllis, a valley at the foot of that mountain. Here Cālīgūla began a circus, which Nēro finished. On the site of it now stands the church of St. Peter. Stagnant water covered the land around it, which rendered the air unwholesome (Tac. Ann. xiv. 14).

Vātīnīus, i, m. a shoemaker, who obtained the favour of the emperor, Nēro, by excessive flattery, and, perhaps also, by his enormous wickedness. His personal deformity and gross wit appear first to have procured him admission to the imperial court, as a butt for the raillery and contempt of the monster, and his associates; but by his accusations of the virtuous, in interest, money and power of mischief, he surpassed the worthless who were in the intimacy of Nēro. From him, cups, with four ears or handles, were called calices Vātīnīi, either from the length of his nose, or in allusion to his sarcasms, or his notorious character, as an informer (Tac. Ann. xv. 34). To this Mārtiālls alludes (xiv. 96). Of all the detestable characters which disgraced the Roman court at that period, Vātīnīus was the most pernicious. He was native of Bēnēvēntum, hence Jūvēnālīs call him Bēnēvēntānus sātōr (Sat. v. 46). Ad Vātīnīus, a, um. Vātīnīi (calices) frēs (Mart. x. 8).

To it Cincinnatus prevented an emigration, after Rome had been burned by the Gauls, and he had nearly annihilated the army of the invaders (Liv. iv. 61 seq.). Inh. Veientes, ium (Sing. Veiens, entis), seldom Veientani, orum, m. created a king in 403 B. C., when their city was blockaded by the Romans, which gave great offence to all the other states of Etruria. The Capenates and Falisci seem to have been their only allies in that memorable siege. They had previously been often defeated by the Romans, who had deprived them of part of their territory. A war against this nation was undertaken by the Fabii. See Fabii gens. Adj. Veiens, ens, ens; entis, Veientanus, et, Velus, a, um. Veiens, et, Veientanus ager, the territory of the Veientes (Liv. v. 30), which Statius calls Veiens solum (Syl. iv. 5. 55). Veientana praeda, the plunder of Veii, of which Cincinnatus vowed the tenth part to Apollo, a gift which the commons strongly opposed, and which gave rise to the prosecution that ended in the banishment of this illustrious commander (Liv. v. 25). Veientanum (vinum), bad, vapid wine (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 143), which Persius calls ribellum (Sat. v. 147). Vetus dux, Tullius (Prop. iv. 10. 31).

Velabrum, i, n. a ward, or region of Rome (Tac. Hist. i. 27). Adj. Velabrensis, is, e. Velabrensis caseus (Mart. xiii. 32), cheese which appears to have been smoked at Velabrum, and to have been held in high esteem by the Romans.

Q. Velantius, Q. Velantius, m. sent by Caesar with Silius to procure corn from the Veneti, who detained them, in order to recover the hostages whom they had given to that general (Cæs. B. G. iii. 7).

Velanti, e. Velanti, orum, m. a small tribe in Gallia Celtica, on the sources of Ligoris, the Loire (Cæs. B. G. vii. 75). Their chief city was Revessio, afterwards Velavi, Saint Paulien. They were neighbours to the Gabali q. v.

Velada, e, f. a German woman, one of the Bructeri, of great distinction, whom Tacitus describes as young, of extensive dominion, and believed by her countrymen to possess the gift of prophecy. This conviction of her foreknowledge, not only secured a ready compliance with all her measures, while she lived, but also divine honours after her death. From Statius, she appears to have been made prisoner by the Romans (Syl. i. 4. 90), which may perhaps be a poetical exaggeration, since Tacitus, in whose pages her name frequently occurs, has not recorded it, and he would scarcely have altogether passed by such an important fact (Hist. iv. 61 seq.: Mor. Ger. 8).

Velia, e, f. (anciently called Hyela), Pisciotta, a maritime town of Lucania, built by a colony of Phocians, according to Servius, upwards of six hundred years after the arrival of Aeneas in Italy. The founders of this town called it Hyela, Ellä, and afterwards Eläa. Authors give other variations of these Greek names, which the Latins changed into Sellä, and afterwards into Velia. Inh. Velientes, ium (Sing. Vellōcātus, i. m. the armourbearer of Venūtius, husband of Cārtismāndia, queen of the Brigāntes. She banished Venūtius, and raised Vellōcātus to her throne and bed. The honours which Vellōcātus acquired by this criminal act, he did not long enjoy, for the sceptre was soon wrested from her hands by her discarded husband (Tac. Hist. iii. 45).

Vellus (Aurēum), Aurēi Vellēris, n. the Golden Fleece, the fleece of the ram which Mercūrius, at the command of Jūpter, brought to Phryxus q. v., to carry him and his sister, Hellē, from Greece to Colchis. The gods, pitying the unmerited suffering of these children of Athamas and Nephelē, to which they had been subjected by the cruelty of their stepmother, Inō, and having resolved to protect them against their father's murderous intention, had recourse to this expedient, by which they accomplished the deliverance of Phryxus and Hellē. The commencement of their flight on the back of the ram promised ultimate success; but Hellē, both from the great height to which the ram ascended in the atmosphere, and from the rapidity of its motion, fell from behind her brother, into the strait, which, from her, was called Hellēspōntus, the Dardanelles. Phryxus continued his journey, and reached Colchis in safety. Æetes, king of that country, received him kindly, and gave him in marriage his daughter Chalciope. Afterwards the ram was sacrificed, and the fleece hung up on a tree, in the grove of Mars, where it was guarded by two bulls, which had brazen horns and hoofs, and by a serpent which never slept. At a future period, Iason, for the reason given in his life, resolved to attempt the recovery of the golden fleece. With that view, he built the Argō, which poets make the first ship, and, having announced the intended voyage, he soon found himself joined by a sufficient number of distinguished Greeks, who had voluntarily offered to accompany the intrepid hero. After a long and perilous voyage, these brave warriors reached Colchis, and, by great address, as well as personal intrepidity, obtained the object of the expedition, on which they immediately set sail for Greece. These resolute adventurers were, from the ship and expedition, called Argonauts q. v., that is, the sailors of the Argō. That the story of the golden fleece is fiction, need scarcely be remarked. Modern ingenuity has been frequently exerted to discover a satisfactory solution of this part of fabulous history. Hitherto, however, no explanation approaching to certainty, has yet been communicated to the public. Some have maintained that the Argō had the figure of a golden ram on the prow, and this they consider sufficient to account for the fiction, although the conjecture is by no means very probable. Others maintain that the Colchians collected the gold dust which the rivers descending from Mount Caucasus brought down, by spreading fleeces at the bottom of the rivers near their mouths, in which the particles of gold remained, and thus they acquired great quantities of that precious metal. Granting that this was a practice of the Colchians, it does not solve the difficulty; besides, that manner of collecting gold was not confined to Asia, but also practised in Europe. In the region of fiction, the investigation of truth seldom attains any satisfactory result. There is often no certain fact to guide the inquirer, or to ascertain in what way he can distinguish truth from fiction. With respect to the legend of the golden fleece, it may perhaps be inferred from the character and customs of the Greeks, that in the expedition to Colchis, Iason and his companions undertook the perilous voyage, more with a view to trade and colonization, than to romantic enterprise, or extensive conquests. The many Grecian settlements on the shores of the Black Sea at least favour, if not confirm, this supposition. Adj. Argonauticus, a. um. Argonautica, orum, n. poems written on the Argonautic expedition, of which three have been transmitted to modern times: two in Greek, and one in Latin. That which bears the name of Orpheus, who was one of the Argonauts, may be considered the first in point of time. It is by no means a work of great merit, and this may perhaps be referred to the imperfect state in which the manuscript has been preserved. Vallērius Flaccus has copied the Greek, in many parts so closely, that his verses may be considered rather as translation, than original composition. Still it must not be inferred, that these remarks apply to the whole poem, since he has greatly excelled his prototype, and produced a very interesting narrative of the Argonautic expedition. This author is less read, consequently less known and valued, than his excellence as a poet deserves. Vallērius writes in Latin hexameters. Apollōnius Rhōdius, the other writer on that chivalrous adventure, like Orpheus, writes in Greek, and, for minuteness of detail, completeness of information, is more satisfactory than either of the other two, certainly greatly before his countryman Orpheus. It cannot be denied, that the pleasure arising from the perusal of these poems is greatly diminished, by their differing so widely from each other, and from the inaccuracy of the authors with respect to geographical statements.

Vēnēdi, orum, m. the Venedians, a people whom Tacitus appears doubtful whether to rank among Germans or Venetians. They led a wandering life, supporting themselves by robberies amidst the woods and mountains which separate the Peucinians and Fennians (Tac. Mor. Ger. 46). At a later period, when the German nations overran France, Spain and Italy, the Vēnēdi, called also Wēnēdi, took possession of unoccupied lands between the Elbe and Vistula, and, soon after, migrating southward, they settled near Alpes Noricum, speaking the Slavonian language which still subsists in that district.

Vēnētia, m. f. a tract of land at the top of Mare Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice. Ital. Vēnēti, orum (Sing. Vēnētus, i, m. the Venetians, whom some have supposed to have been of Paphlagonian descent, originally called Hēnēti, and, having settled in Italy with some Trojans under Antenor, took the general name of Vēnēti. This is the opinion of Livius (i. 1), Q. Curtius (iii. 1), and Cornēlius Nepos, as mentioned by Plinius (i. 650). In this case, Antenor showed the same political sagacity with Ænēas, by causing the Trojans and Henetians who accompanied him, to take the name of the natives with whom they incorporated. Others maintain that the Vēnēti possessed that district before the arrival of the Hēnēti and Trōjāni, and that they were originally descended from the Vēnēti in Gallia, France; perhaps a more plausible conjecture, which receives considerable support from Strābo (299), and Pōlybius, who mentions that their manners and dress bore a very close resemblance to those of the Gauls, but that they spoke a different language. Some modern antiquarians of considerable note, have adopted this opinion, which they have attempted to establish at least with probable, if not with conclusive, arguments.

Adj. Vēnētus, et Vēnēticus, a, um. Vēnētus Eridānus (Prop. i. 12. 4). Vēnētus cucullus, a Venetian hood or cowl, which was made of coarse wool, hence Juvēnalis calls it dūrus (Sat. iii. 170).

Vēnēti, orum (Sing. Vēnētus, i, m. Luc. C. Jūlius Cæsar defeated them in a naval engagement, in 58 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 104). Adj. Vēnēticus, a, um.

Vēnētus Paullus, Vēnēti Paulli, m. a centurion in the Roman army, who entered into the conspiracy against Nēro, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xv. 56).

Vēnētia, m. f. daughter of Pilumnus, was the wife of Daunus, king of the Rūtūli, and mother of Turnus and Jūtūrna. Her only sister, Amātū, was married to Lātīnus, king of Lātīnum, by whom she had Lāvīniā, to whom Turnus was betrothed before Ænēas

Vēnus, ēris, f. the g

ty, was the mother of Cupid, and mistress of the Graces. Her origin is variously related. She is said to have sprung from the foam of the sea near Cýthēra, Cerigo, an island on the coast of Lácōnia (Hes. Th. 195 seq.), hence called Cýthēra, and Pōntōgēnē; to have been the daughter of Jūpiter and Dīonē, and of Cōlus and Dīs, according to others. She was represented as a very beautiful girl, naked, swimming in the sea, and holding a sea-shell in her right hand. On her head she wore a chaplet of white and red roses, and was attended by pigeons which flew around her. The three Graces stood before her naked, two with their faces towards her, and the third with her back. Near her was her son Cupid, blind and winged, holding a bow and arrows. This goddess was known under a variety of names taken chiefly from the places where she had temples; but her character forbids giving a detailed account of her history. By the Assyrians she was called Mylitta, by the Arabians Alitta, by the Persians Mitra, and by the Scythians Artimpasa (Herod. ii. 131 seq.). Adj. Vēnēreus, a. Vēnēreus, a. um.

Vēnūsia, a. f. Venosa, a city of Apūlia, ennobled by being the birthplace of Q. Hōrātius Flāccus. It stood on the confines of Lūcānia and Apūlia, hence Hōrātius says he is doubtful whether he is a Lucanian or Apulian (Sat. ii. 1:34). To it M. Tērentius Vāro, consul, fled, after the battle of Cānna, in 218 B. C., and about four thousand horse and foot, who had scatteredly escaped from that battle, joined him there (Liv. xxii. 49 seq.). The modern town is small and nearly deserted. Sub. Vēnūsini, orum (Sing. Vēnūsinus, i.), m. praised by Livius for their fidelity to the Romans, and for their kindness to the troops who took shelter in their town, on their defeat at Cānna (xxvii. 10). Adj. Vēnūsinus, a. um. Vēnūsina silva plectantur, may the woods of Venosa suffer; a. may the storm spend its force on the woods of Venosa, not on the sea (Hor. Sat. vi. 166). The quantity of the a in this line ought not to be imitated.

Vēnūtius, v. Vēnūsus, i. m. husband of Cārtismāndū, queen of the Brigāntes. He was born in the city of the Jugāntes; from the death of Cārtiācūs, had the character of being the first in celebrity for military knowledge. After the queen had driven him from the throne, he became the avowed enemy of the Romans, to whom he had long maintained the most inviolate fidelity. Cārtismāndū contrived to secure, by stratagem, the brother of Vēnūtius, with the rest of his relations, and this act of treachery fired the British youth with indignation, who flew to arms, despising a female government, and resolving to attack her on her own territories. Vēnūtius headed the discontents, and soon found himself possessed of a powerful army, with which he wrested the sceptre from the hands of Cārtismāndū, although she had the protection of the Romans. Her allies saved her from impending danger, but could not prevent the discarded husband from seizing her kingdom (Tac. Ann. xii. 40 seq.).

Ver Slerum, a sacred spring, denoted amongst the Romans a vow, that they would sacrifice all the animals which would be born next spring, i. e. from the kalends of March to the kalends of May. The sacrifice of innocent children appeared cruel, and, on that account, they brought them up to maturity secretly, and then expelled them from their territories. It need scarcely be stated, that it was only in terrible exigencies, that recourse was had to such a sacrifice. This is the definition of Fēstus, which differs considerably from that of Livius, who mentions only the young of swine, goats, sheep, and cattle. This vow could not be made without consulting the people (Liv. xxii. 9, 10). Hence, when parents, from an overgrown population, were obliged to send their children to form a new colony, it was called ver slerum.

Vērāgri, orum, m. a people who lived in that part of Prōvīncia, now called Dauphiné, on the south bank of Rhōdānus, the Rhône, and Lacus Lēmānus, the Lake of Geneva (Ces. B. G. iii. 1).

Vērānia, a. f. the wife of Piso Licinīanus (Tac. Hist. i. 47. Plin. Epis. ii. 20).

Vērānius, i. m. an officer in the Roman army, who succeeded A. Didius, as governor of Britain, in the year 61 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 29). Vērānius v. Vērrius Flāccus, Vērānil Flāccus, m. a grammarian, whose style was commended by Augustus (Suet. Aug. 86). His name also occurs in the writings of Macrobius (iii. 2).

Q. Vērānius, Q. Vērānil, was appointed governor of Cāppadōciā, on its being reduced into the form of a province, in the year 18. His first act of legislation gave the Cappadocians a favourable idea of Roman moderation, from his remitting part of the taxes, which they had formerly paid to their kings. The part which he acted with regard to Piso, shows his character in a less amiable point of view. The senate, on the motion of Tibērius, granted the priesthood to Vērānius, in the year 20, and at the distance of twenty-nine years, he obtained the consulship with C. Pōmpōnius Lōnginus Gāllus. He was appointed to the government of Britain, in which he made no extension of territory, only a few inroads into the country of the Silūres, and died before the completion of the year. His last will undecieved the public, with respect to his real character, showing him to have been a servile flatterer of Nēro, even in the end of life boasting, that, in two years, he would make the whole island obedient to the authority of the emperor (Tac. Ann. ii. 56).

Vērānniōlus, i. m. a man whose name occurs in the writings of the poet Cātullus (xlvii. 3).

Vērāmius, i. m. a friend of Cātullus, to whom he addresses two of his poems (ix: xxviii).

Vērāx, acis, m. a sister's son of Claudius Civilis q. v. (Tac. Hist. v. 20).

Vērbigēnus, i. (sc. pāgus), v. Urbigēnus, i. m. one of the four divisions of Hēlvētiā, Switzerland, including the cantons of Fribourg and Bern, with the districts of Neuchâtel and Vallengin. It was so called from the principal city, Urba, Orbe, which stood on a river of the same name, which falls into the Lake of Yverdon, or, Neuchâtel (Ces. B. G. i. 27).

Vercellæ, arum, f. Vercellæ, a town of Gallia Cisalpina, on Sessites, the Sesia, a northern branch of Pâdas, the Po (Sil. Ital. viii. 597).

Vercellus, i. m. an Italian, who, along with Vercellius and Sicellius q. v., excited the Hirpini to revolt from the Romans, and, on the taking of three of their towns by M. Valerius, prator, they were beheaded, in 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 37).

Vercingetorix, igis, m. the son of Celtillus, chief among the Arverni, was an inveterate enemy of the Romans. To expel the invaders and to secure the independence of his country, he formed a number of the states of Gallia, France, into a confederacy, in 54 B. C., although, in that patriotic measure, his father's brother Gobanitis, and the other nobles of the Arverni, opposed him. His valour and generous disregard of personal safety and advantages, demand approbation; but after a very brave and vigorous resistance at Alésia, Alise, he was obliged to submit to Caesar, who, according to Dio, led him in triumph through the streets of Rome, and then barbarously caused him to be put to death.

Vergis, arum, f. a town of the Bruttii, which revolted from the Carthaginians to the Romans, in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 19).

Vergasillanus, i. m. one of the Arverni, and a relation of Vercingetorix. He was one of the four generals chosen by the Gauls, at the time they entered into a confederacy to maintain their independence, and free themselves from the slavery of the Romans; but was made prisoner in the flight of his countrymen after the taking of Alésia, Alise, by Caesar's troops (Ces. B. G. vii. 76 seq.).

Vergellus, i. m. a torrent in the neighbourhood of Cænne, over which Hannibal made a bridge with the bodies of the slain (Flor. ii. 6).

Vergillus. See Plutarch.

Verginius Capito; Verginii Capitonis, m. a man mentioned by Tacitus, merely on account of the treachery of his slave (Hist. iii. 77).

Verginius Flaccus, Verginii Flacci, m. a rhetorician, and the preceptor of the Satirist Persius, banished from the celebrity of his name. He trained, says Tacitus, the Roman youth to eloquence (Ann. xv. 71). The common reading is Verginius Rufus.

Vergilum, i. m. a castle in Hispania Tarraconensis, which had become a nest of robbers, and which M. Porcius Cato, the Roman consul, took, putting the robbers to death, granting to them who had taken the fort at his suggestion, both their liberty and property, and selling the rest. Inh. Vergestani, arum (Sing. Vergestanus, i. m.) (Liv. xxxiv. 21). Adj. Vergestanus, a, um (ib.).

Vergobretus, i. m. the title of the supreme magistrate among the Aedui, who was created yearly, and had the power of life and death over his countrymen. During his office, he could not go beyond the boundaries of the state (Ces. B. G. i. 16).

Vermina, a, m. a son of Syphax q. v., who held a command in his father's army, in the battle against Masinissa, and his valour contributed to the defeat of that able soldier. The activity and ingenuity of Masinissa baffled every effort of Vermina to overtake him. After the battle of Zama, a detachment of the Roman army met him advancing to the assistance of the Carthaginians, killed fifteen thousand of his men, made fourteen hundred prisoners, with fifteen hundred Numidian horse, and took seventy-two military standards. He effected his escape, accompanied only a few attendants. In 202 B. C., he sent ambassadors to Rome, soliciting an alliance to which a haughty answer was returned, charging him with having acted deceitfully, and ordering him to sue for peace, otherwise he could not be acknowledged as king, ally, and friend, as he had requested. Besides, he was ordered to present a petition to the ambassadors, who would soon be in Africa to settle the terms of peace. In token of his submission, he met them at the very extremity of his kingdom, and readily acquiesced in the terms which they dictated (Liv. iii. 40 seq.).

Vermändii, arum, m. a people of Gallia Belgica, between the Nervii and Segni. Their chief town was Augusta Vermandiorum, St. Quentin, on the right bank of the Somme. Like most of the other nations of Gallia Belgica, they were originally from Germania, Germany (Ces. B. G. ii. 4). C. Julius Caesar conquered them in 59 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 104).

Vérona, a, f. a town in the north of Italy, beautifully situated on the Adige, by which it is divided into two unequal parts. The site of it is partly on the skirts of an immense plain, extending from the Alps to the Apennines; and partly on the first swell of the former, on the southern side. The Adige broad and rapid, sweeps through it in a bold curve, forming a peninsula, on which all the old town and the greater part of the new stands. The modern is much larger than the ancient town, about five miles in circumference, the amphitheatre contained twenty-two thousand spectators, and has long been deprived of almost all its ornaments. The situation of Veróna exposed it to the northern invaders, being placed at the opening of the defile which formed the most ancient and regular communication between Italy and Germany. In the mountainous parts of the territory of Veróna, Scotch fir grows; it has four bridges over the Adige, and one of the arches of Ponte del Castel Vecchio, is a hundred and fifty-seven English feet in span. Veróna was said to have been built by the Gauls under Brennus, from whom it was at first called Brennonia. The emperor Gallienus called it Gallieniana. Vérona Athēsi circumflua (Sil. Ital. viii. 58). Inh. Véronenses, ium (Sing. Véronensis, is, a. Adj. Véronensis, is, a. Véronensis poeta, the poet of Veróna, i. e. Catullus (Auson. cccclxxi. 2). Véronensis ager, the territory of Veróna (Plin. ii. 313).

Vërritus, i. m. a chief, or rather sovereign prince, of the Frisians, who, with Mallorix headed the emigration, which took possession of a tract of land on the Rhine, in the year 58. These chiefs went to Rome, on purpose to obtain the emperor's permission to retain the lands, which they then occupied. Nér refused their request, but made themselves Roman citizens. Tacitus has given a graphic description of their conduct at Rome (Ann. xiii. 54).

Vērius Flācus, Vērii Flāci, m. a freedman, who attained to great eminence as a teacher of grammar. To excite the youth to emulation, he prescribed a subject, and offered a reward which the conqueror should receive. Augustus chose him for the instructor of his grandsons, and received his whole school into the palace, on condition, that he should not admit another new scholar. He died of old age, in the reign of Tiberius, when a statue was erected to his memory (Suet. 11. Gram. 17 seq.).

Verrūgo, inis, f. a town of the Volsi, on the confines of the Equi, which the Romans fortified, notwithstanding of which, it afterwards revolted, and was retaken, in 408 B. C. From that period, it appears to have been subject to Rome (Liv. iv. 1 seq.).

Versus, i, m. a clerk of Q. Sertorius (Sal. Frag. 3).

Vērtē, arum, m. an eastern nation, who assisted the Persians in besieging Amida (Ann. Mar. xix. 2 seq.).

Vērtio, ōnis, m. a nobleman of the Nervi, who was in Cicero's camp, when attacked by the Eburones, and prevailed on a slave to carry a letter to Caesar, communicating information of that event (Cæs. B. G. v. 45).

Vērtūmnus, i, m. the god of the seasons, who had this name, according to some authors, from their change (vērtēdo), and, according to others, from his turning himself into any shape. Near his temple at Rome, were book-sellers' shops, on which account various allusions respecting authors and their works have a reference to this deity, and he is frequently mentioned, when it is insinuated that any one is inconstant or envious; hence Horatius, Vērtūmnis, quotquot iuris, nātus iniquis (Sat. ii. 7. 14). According to Ovidius, he married Pomona (Met. xiv. 642 seq.).

Vērūdoctus, i, m. one of the Helvetii. He and Namēus were at the head of the embassy sent to Caesar, requesting permission to march through Provincia, afterwards called Narbonensis, Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné (Cæs. B. G. i. 7).

Vērūlā, arum, f. Veroli, a town of the Hernici, in Lātium. Inh. Vērūlāni, orum, m. did not join their countrymen against the Romans, in 307 B. C., on which account, after the defeat of the Hernici, their own laws were restored to them, which they preferred to being made citizens of Rome. Of all the Hernici, only the Vērūlāni, Alatriātes and Ferentinātes were allowed to intermarry with each other (Liv. ix. 43). Adj. Vērūlānus, a, um (ib.).

Vērūlānium, i, n. Verulam, in Hertfordshire. Tacitus calls it a free town (Ann. xiv. 33).

Vērūlāna Græcilla, e. Grātilla, Vērūlāne Græcilla, f. a woman of great courage, who shut herself up in the capitol of Rome, with Flāvius Sabinus, a small party of soldiers, and some Roman senators and knights, who had taken refuge there, after being worsted by the Vitellians, in the year 70. This retreat proved the destruction of that noble building (Tac. Hist. iii. 69).

Vērūlānus Sēverus, Vērūlāni Sēvēri, m. sent by Cōrbūlo against Tiridātes, who retreated from Armēnia. In this commission, Vērūlānus proceeded with great severity against the disaffected, and then took upon himself the government of the country. Two years after, we find the same commander ordering Vērūlānus and Vētus Bōlānus with two legions to support Tiridātes (Tac. Ann. xiv. 26 seq.).

Vescella, e, f. a town of Spain, taken by M. Fulvius Nobilior, the Roman proconsul, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 22).

Vescellus, i, m. who, with Vercellus and Sicilius, excited the Hirpini to revolt from the Romans, and on the taking of three of their towns by M. Vallerius, prætor, they were beheaded, in 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 37).

Vescia, e, f. a city of Lātium, where the scattered forces of the Latins assembled, after they had been defeated at Cápua by T. Manlius Torquātus, in 339 B. C. (Liv. viii. 11). Inh. Vescini, orum, m. whom the Romans put to the sword, on the town being betrayed into their hands, in 314 B. C. (Liv. ix. 25 seq.). Adj. Vescinus, a, um. Vescinus saltus, the forest of Vescia, in which a colony was settled in 298 B. C., as a barrier against the Sāmmites. Vescinus ager (Liv. x. 21).

Vesculārius Flāccus, Vesculārii Flāci, m. a Roman knight in the confidence of Tiberius, a mere tool of power, who dishonoured by his dishonourable station, until his master became weary of him, or had no further need of his services, and then ordered him to be put to death. He had attended Tiberius in the island Rhodus, and remained with him in Cápree, Capri (Tac. Ann. ii. 28).

Vesēris, is, m. a river of Cāmpānia, according to Aurélius Victor. Although Vesēris occurs in Livius, Cicero, and Valerius Maximus, it is introduced in such a manner, that it is impossible precisely to determine what idea was conveyed by this appellation. Cluverius maintains, that there never was a river in Italy of this name, and concludes, that it was either a fort, or town at the bottom of Mount Vesuvius (Liv. viii. 8. Cic. de Fin. i. 7. Val. Max. vi. 4).

Vesēvus, et, Vesblus, i, m. See Vesūlvus. Vesūntio, ōnis, f. Besancón, the chief town of the Sequani, on the east bank of the river Dūbis, the Doue, which Cesar says, "nearly surrounds the whole town, as if described by a pair of compasses; a mountain of great height occupies the remaining space, which is not more than 600 feet, where the river ceases, so that the foot of the mountain on each side reaches the river. A wall draws round this forms the citadel, and joins it to the town" (B. G. i. 37). Besancón is divided by the Doue, or, Doubs, into the Upper and Lower town. Of the former little remains but the castle. Population said to be about 2,500.

Vespāsia Pōlla, Vespātie Pōllæ, f. daughter of Vespāsianus Pōllio, was born at Nursia. To her husband T. Flāvius Petro, she had two sons, the elder, Sabinus, became præfect of the city, and her younger son, T. Flāvius Vespāsianus, obtained the purple (Suet. Vesp. 1).

Vespāsianus. See Flāvus. Vespāsianus Pōllio, Vespāsii Pōllionis, m. a man of good family, was thrice a tribune of the soldiers, and afterwards a præfect of the camp. His son enjoyed the office of senator of prætorian dignity, and his daughter Vesta, w. f. the wife of Urānus, and mother of Sātūrnus, Titan, &c. But the term is frequently used so very indefinitely by the poets, that it is difficult to determine which goddess they meant to denote. Hence she is confounded not only with Tellūs and Cēlēstē, but also with Cēres and Prōsērpina, or, Hecātē. Strictly speaking, Vesta, among the Romans, was the daughter of Sātūrnus and Rhēa, and worshipped as the goddess of fire. Her temple was round, and the sacred fire kept perpetually burning on the altar, which showed that they blended the worship of the goddess of the earth, and the goddess of fire. Enēas introduced her sacred rites into Italy, and Nūma Pōmilius, the second king of Rome, built her a temple, into which males were not allowed to enter. A sudden and dreadful calamity was supposed to threaten the state, if the sacred fire were allowed to go out, and the negligence of the offender was severely punished. It was not rekindled by common fire, but by the rays of the sun, which might be done in different ways. When her temple was on fire, in 243 B. C., Caeilius Mētellus saved the sacred utensils (Liv. Ep. 19). Vesta was most commonly represented in a long flowing robe, with a veil over her face, holding in one hand a palladium, sometimes a javelin, and in the other a lamp. On a few ancient medals, a drum appears in one hand, and a small figure of victory in the other. Cum sacērdōtē Vestae, with a priestess of Vesta (Sal. Cat. 15). See Fābia Tērentia. Adj. Vestālis, is, e, of, or belonging to, the priestesses of Vesta, who were bound by a vow to chastity; hence denominated Virgines vestāles, vestal virgins. The number appointed by Nūma Pōmilius was four, to which Tārquinius Priscus, the fifth Roman king, or his successor, Sērvius Tullius, added two. The kings at first nominated the vestal virgins, and, after the establishment of the commonwealth, the Pōntifex Māximus. The monarchs probably acted arbitrarily in the choice of a vestal, but the procedure of the high priest was regulated by the Papian law. He selected twenty girls without deformity or blemish in any part of their body, whose father and mother were free-born and both alive, and she, on whom the lot fell, was compelled to take the oath, and become a priestess. But recourse was only had to this method of election, when none offered voluntarily, which was not often the case. They continued in office thirty years. During the first ten, they learned the sacred rites; the second ten were employed in performing them; and the last ten were spent in teaching them to those who had lately entered. Their employment was to keep the sacred fire continually burning, to take care of the secret pledges of the empire, supposed to be the Palladium brought from Troy by Enēas, and concealed in the inmost part of the temple, and to perform the rites of the goddess. The punishment, for allowing the sacred fire to be extinguished, was scourging, and, for violation of vow, burying alive. This does not appear to have been the ancient punishment, for Rhēa Silvia was thrown into prison, loaded with chains, and their weight occasioned her death (Liv. i. 4.

coast of the Gulf of Venice, to the east of the district possessed by the Sabines. They associated themselves with the Sannites in 324 B. C., on which account the Roman senate declared war against them. The Marsi, Peligni, and Marrucini were their allies, if not their relations. Junius Brutus Scaeva, the consul, marched an army against them, wasted their lands, burned their houses and grain, compelled them against their will to fight, and, in one battle, so reduced their strength, that they durst not trust to their camp, but sought security in their cities. He took by scalade Citina and Cingilia, and rewarded the bravery of his soldiers by the plunder of both. A treaty was granted to them, in 303 B. C., after which their name scarcely occurs in Roman history (Liv. viii. 29 seq.). Adj. Vēstinus, a, um. Vēstina cōhōrs (Liv. xlv. 40). Vēstina aqua (Luc. Phar. ii. 423).

Vēstinus, i, m., a man whose liberality towards his friends Mārtialis praises (iv. 78). Li. Vēstinus, Li. Vēstini, m. a native of Vēstne, who, in dignity of character, equalled the first men in Rome, although of no higher than equestrian rank. He collected the soothsayers respecting the rebuilding of the capitol, in the year 70, and the care of seeing the edifice erected was intrusted to him (Tac. Hist. iv. 53).

M. Vēstinus Atticus, M. Vēstini Attici, m. obtained the consulship with P. Silius Nerva, in the year 65. His genius and ardent spirit commanded respect, and rendered him an object of suspicion to the conspirators against Nēro, whose cruelty had excited universal abhorrence. Vēstinus took no part in that plot, yet Nēro doomed him to death, as an accomplice. The freedom with which he spoke his mind to the emperor, the sarcastic raillery with which he had treated him, and his marrying Stātilia Mēssalina, admired by the emperor, rendered him hateful to that monster, and he put him suddenly to death, in circumstances of sportive cruelty, without the shadow of a trial (Tac. Ann. xv. 48 seq.).

Vēstricius Spūrinna, Vēstricii Spūrinne, m. an officer who commanded a considerable force in the interest of Otho, marched from Rome to Placentia, of which town he obtained possession, and afterwards left a moderate garrison at it, and joined the main body with the troops under his command (Tac. Hist. ii. 11—30). Sēneca, in some of his epistles, speaks in terms of high commendation of Vēstricius.

Vēsūlus, i, m. a native of Tāder, who, with his father, Crista, and four brothers, fell by the hand of Hannibal, at the battle of Cānna (Sil. Ital. x. 145).

Vēsūlus, i, m. Viso, a very high mountain in Alpes Mārtimæ, which contains the sources of Pādus, the Po. Pinifer Vēsūlus (Virg. Æn. x. 708).

Vēsūvius, v. Vēsēvus, et, Vēsblus, i, m. Vesuvio, a volcano, about eight miles east of Nēapōlis, Naples. It has two summits, and its altitude may be taken at 3,908 feet. The scenery from its top surpasses that displayed, perhaps, from the summit of any other mountain. Its base is covered with towns on all sides, the second part with villages and villas, so that the lowest parts of this mountain are fertile, beautiful, and populous, and the highest part is a tract of perfect desolation, furrowed on all sides with rivers of lava, extending in wide black lines over the surface. Vines flourish round its base, and an excellent wine is produced from a particular kind of grape, known among the natives by a name which is at least impious, if not blasphemous, and therefore omitted. Virgilius has celebrated the rich soil in the vicinity of this mountain, in which he probably intended the lower region of the mountain to be included. Dānna insāni Vēsēvi (Stat. Syl. iv. 8. 5). Vēsblus egērit fractas iras (Stat. Syl. iv. 4. 79). Adj. Vēsūvius, Vēsūvius, et, Vēsēvus, a, um. Vēsūviana incēndia, the burnings of Vēsūvius (Stat. Syl. ii. 6. 62). Vēsūvianus āpex (Stat. Syl. iii. 5. 72). Vēsūvina jūga (Sil. Ital. xii. 152). Vēsūvian jūgum (Virg. G. ii. 224). Vētēra, um (Castrā), n. Santen, a fortified station in the duchy of Clèves. From Tacitus it appears to have been a place of some note (Hist. iv. 18 seq.).

M. Vētilius, M. Vētilii, m. a Roman prætor, taken prisoner by Viriāthus, in Spain, and his army routed, in 147 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 52). Flōrus calls him Claudius Unimānus (ii. 17), where there are other errors, with respect to names, against which the reader should be on his guard.

Vētōnissa, a, f. a small town of Cētibēria (Mart. iv. 55).

Vētrānio, ōnis, m. a native of Mēssia, was born of obscure parents, from whom he did not even receive the rudiments of education; for, after he had assumed the purple, he began to study the alphabet, although then of a very advanced age. His merits as a soldier had raised him to the highest command in the army, and he had long held the government of the countries to the north of Greece, before the death of Cōnstantinus. To the only surviving son of his benefactor, he promised inflexible fidelity; but when the princess Cōnstantina, to whom her father had given the title of Augusta, had placed the crown on his head, he showed a want either of resolution or sincerity, and entered into an alliance with Magnēntius, the usurper, in Gallia. Although respected for his military talents, and beloved for the gentleness of his manners, Vētrānio possessed none of those bold and intrepid qualities, requisite to successful usurpation, whilst his frankness and simplicity exposed him to the more artful schemes of Cōnstantius, who bribed his troops, and, with their concurrence, forced him to resign. The humanity of Cōnstantius deserves commendation, for, instead of putting to death his rival, who, taking the diadem from his head, prostrated himself at the feet of the conqueror, assigned the city of Prusa for his residence, where the abdicated monarch lived in security and affluence for six years, and as an expression of his gratitude, with his natural and guileless simplicity, advised the emperor to resign the sceptre, that he might enjoy comfort and tranquillity, where pleasure only could be found, in private life. Vētrānio died in the year 359 (Eutrop. x. 11). Aurēlius Viētr gives a much more unfavourable character of Vētrānio, with respect to mental abilities than Eutrōpius (de Cas. 41 seq.).

Vēttili, orui, m. a warlike Macedonian (Liv. xiv. 389).

C. Vettienus, C. Vettieni, m. a Roman, who cut off the fingers of his left hand, that he might not serve in the Italian war. For this act of cowardice, the senate confiscated his property, and condemned him to perpetual imprisonment (Val. Max. vi. 3).

Vettius Bolanus, Vettii Bolani, m. a noble Roman, whom Tacitus mentions as holding commissions, or invested with high authority, in different wars. He succeeded Trebellius Maximus, as governor of Britain. The historian considers him as too lenient in the government of his province, an offence which may be easily excused, since it was not the common error of his countrymen (Hist. ii. 65 seq.).

L. Vettius, L. Vettii, m. a despicable character mentioned by Cæcilius (liv. 2).—2. An informer, who charged C. Julius Caesar, with being one of the conspirators along with Cætilina (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 17). Some editions read not index, but Judex, making the name L. Vettius Jūdēx, which changes the meaning.

T. Vettius, T. Vettii, m. one of the four generals of the Picentes and Marsi, who took up arms against the Romans, in 91 B. C., when L. Porcius Cato, and Cn. Pompeius Strabo, father of Cn. Pompeius Magnus, were consuls. The narrative of Eutropius, from inaccuracy, may induce the reader to suppose, that L. Porcius Cato was the colleague of P. Rutilius, who was consul in the preceding year with L. Julius Caesar (v. 3).

Vettiones, v. Vectones, um, m. a nation of Hispania, Spain. The Lusitani were between them and Mare Atlanticum, the Atlantic Ocean. Their country included Estremadura and part of Leon (Cæs. B. C. i. 38). They were routed by M. Fulvius, a Roman prætor, in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 7). They had a famous breed of mares, which the ancients believed to be impregnated by the west wind. This fiction is beautifully sung by Virgilius, and Silius Italicus (iii. 378 seq.). According to the latter poet, their age seldom exceeded seven years. Justinus explains the fiction, by their swiftness and fecundity (xlv. 3). Lives Vettiones, swift Vettiones (Luc. Phæ. iv. 9).

Vetulonia, v. f. v. Vetulonii, orum, m. Vetulia, according to some authors, but others say, that its site is unknown, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, now in ruins (Sil. Ital. viii. 483). Inh. Vetulonienſes, ium, m. In the judgment of Silius Italicus, the Romans adopted from the Vetulonienſes, the lictors with the fasces and secures, the sella curulis, and the toga prætexta (viii. 484 seq.).

Veturia, v. f. the mother of C. Marcus Coriolanus, who, at the request of the Roman matrons, went with her daughter-in-law Volturnia, to intercede with her son, then encamped with the army of the Volsci, at Fossæ Cluiliæ, that he would not destroy his native city. Her speech, which was indignant and authoritative, rather than mild and conciliatory, aided by the bitter lamentations of the women who accompanied her, had a powerful effect on the mind of Coriolanus, and induced him to withdraw his troops from the territory of his fellow-citizens, in 488 B. C. The Roman men, whose arms were unable to protect the city, acknowledged their obligations to the women, by erecting and dedicating a temple to female fortune, Fortuna mulierum, since, by their tears and entreaties, they had prevented the destruction of the city (Liv. ii. 40).

Veturius, v. um. Veturia, prænitens, was divided into two centuries, the elder and the younger (Liv. xxvi. 22).

Veturius, i. m. (Veturius, Greek), the assistant, or Optio, of Barbilius Philo (Tac. Hist. i. 25).

C. Veturius, C. Veturii, m. (sursum in con. cal. Cicurius), enjoyed the consulship in 455 B. C. From the emptiness of the treasury, the consuls sold the vast booty which they had obtained from the defeat of the Æqui, and for this act of patriotism, the plebeian tribunes brought them to trial, because no part of it had been given to the soldiers, when Veturius was fined fifteen thousand asses. He was chosen augur in room of C. Horatius Pulvillus, by the college of these priests, who had satisfaction in raising him to that honour, because he had been condemned by the people (Liv. iii. 39 seq.).—2. A military tribune with consular authority, elected first in 376 B. C., and a second time eight years after (Liv. vi. 25 seq.).

L. Veturius, L. Veturii, m. one of the decemviri elected in 451 B. C., for framing a new code of laws, or, in other words, giving a new constitution to the Romans (Liv. ii. 33).—2. A tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, in 367 B. C. (Liv. ii. 38).

L. Veturius Philo, L. Veturii Philensis, m. created dictator on purpose to hold the comitia, but an informality obliged him to abdicate his office in fourteen days. In 212 B. C., Veturius was elected censor; soon after, he died, on which his colleague resigned, before they had either chosen a sumus, or transacted any public business (Liv. xxii. 33 seq.).—2. A lieutenant-general under Q. Fulvius Flaccus, at the time he besieged and took Capua (Liv. xxvi. 33).—3. After holding the office of curule edile, he was elected prætor peregrinus, with the government of the north of Italy, in 212 B. C., and the senate continued him another year in office, assigning him the command of two legions. To the ability with which he discharged the duty of a lieutenant-general, and the high approbation of his countrymen, may be attributed the honour of the consulship, to which he was raised, in 208 B. C. The territory of the Bruttii, and the conduct of the war against Hannibal, were decreed to both consuls, but nothing memorable occurred under their consulship. In Africa, he served under Scipio Africanus, who deputed him to carry the account of the victory at Zama, to Rome (Liv. xxvii. 6 seq.). Eutropius by mistake calls him L. Valerius (iii. 19).

M. Veturius, M. Veturii, m. a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority in 328 B. C., and the only patrician who obtained the honour that year, the other five being plebeians (Liv. v. 13).

T. Veturius Barrus, T. Veturii Barri, m. a young man vain of his beauty, of extravagant habits, much addicted to raillery and sarcasm. He violated a vestal virgin, for which he suffered punishment. His name occurs frequently in the writings of Hōrātius (Sat. i. 4. 110 seq.).

T. Vētūrius Cālvinus, T. Vētūrii Cālvini, m. was elected consul in 333 B. C., with Sp. Pōstūmius Albinus q. v., and afterwards with the same colleague, in 321 B. C. (Liv. viii. 16 seq.).—2. Son of the former, who, on account of his father's debt, was given up bound to C. Plōdus, by whom he was severely beaten, because he would not submit to personal abuse (Val. Max. vi. 1).

T. Vētūrius (c. Vētūsius) Gēmīnus, T. Vētūrii Gēmīni, m. held the consulship in 462 B. C., with L. Lūcētius Triclitipitius. Vētūrius was sent against the Vōlsci, whom he routed and put to flight in the first engagement, for which he had the honour of an ovation; but was unattended by the troops (Liv. iii. 8—10).

T. Vētūrius Grāchus Sēmprōniānus, T. Vētūrii Grāchī Sēmprōniāni, m. appointed augur, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xli. 21).

Tib. Vētūrius Philo, Tib. Vētūrii Philōnis, m. elected Flāmen of Mars, in room of M. Aemilius Rēgillus, in 206 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 38).

C. Vētūsius Gēmīnus, C. Vētūsi Gēmīni, m. elected consul in 499 B. C., with T. Aebūtius, surnamed Elva. The war with the Latins induced the Romans to have recourse to a dictator, when A. Pōstūmius was created (Liv. ii. 19).

T. Vētūsius, T. Vētūsi, m. (surnamed Gēmīnus Cīcūrius in con. cal.), was raised to the consulship in 494 B. C., when he marched an army against the Aequi, because they had invaded the territories of the Latins (Liv. ii. 28—30).

Vēxoris, is, m. rectius Sesostris q. v.

Via Lāctea, the milky way, or galaxy, is that long, white, luminous track, which appears to encompass the heavens like a girdle. It was formed, according to the ancients, by the milk which fell on that part of the sky, when Jūpiter applied Hercules to Juno's breast whilst asleep. It is now found, that the brightness is occasioned by an infinite number of stars, so very small that they are not visible to the naked eye. Ovidius makes it the path along which the celestial gods went to the palace of Jūpiter.

Vibēnūius, l, m. a man whom Cātūllus holds up to ridicule as a thief, and his son as guilty of a more horrible crime (xxxiii).

Vibidia, m, f. a vestal virgin, who petitioned the emperor Claudius in behalf of Messalina, after she had married C. Silius (Tac. Ann. xi. 32—34).

Vibidius, l, m. a man mentioned by Hōrātius, of whose history nothing is known. He and Servilius Bāllātro, seem to have been taken to the feast of Nāsidiēnus by Maccenas, on which account they are called Umbra, the common appellation of one who is uninvited, but went along with one of the guests. Both of these men displayed great activity and keenness in ridiculing their entertainer, and it is probable Maccenas, since he did not check them, enjoyed their humour and sarcasm played off at the expense of the host (Sat. ii. 8. 22).

Vibidius Vāro, Vibidii Vārrōnis, m. a spendthrift, ruined by his own extravagance, who was either expelled from the Roman senate, or allowed to vacate his seat, in the year 17 (Tac. Ann. ii. 48).

Vibilius, c. Vibillius, l, m. the first centurion of a legion under Cn. Dōmītius Cālvinus. For having shamefully fled from the field of battle, his commander caused him to be beaten to death with rods (Vel. Pat. ii. 78).—2. The chief, or king, of the Herman-durians, who expelled Cātūlda from his throne, in the year 19. He joined Vānglōt and Sido (Tac. Ann. ii. 63 seq.).

Vibius, l, m. a distinguished Bruttian, the brother of Pāctius q. v., whom he accompanied at the time he went to solicit terms of capitulation for his countrymen (Liv. xxvii. 15).

Vibius Accūaeus, Vibii Accūei, m. a native of Accūa, and prefect of a cohort of the Peligni, who, after Q. Fūlvius Flācū had ordered a retreat from the camp of Hannō, three miles from Bēnēvēntum, snatched the standard, and threw it within the enemy's rampart, wishing curses on himself and his cohort, if they left it in the hands of the enemy. Vibius was the first, who forced himself into the camp across the ditch and rampart. After the camp was taken, he received an honorary reward, in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 14).

Vibius Crispus, Vibii Crispi, m. a celebrated orator, frequently mentioned by Quintiliānus. To his eloquence he added much pleasantry, and appears to have been a cheerful, humorous, and lively man. Jūcūda sēnētus Crispi, the pleasant old age of Vibius Crispus, i. e. pleasant old Vibius Crispus (Juv. Sat. iv. 81). Suetōnius has recorded a humorous remark of his against the emperor Dōmītiānus (Dom. 3). Martialis has written an epigram on a vow of his, for the safe return of Dōmītiānus, from his expedition against the Sarmatians (ix. 32).—2. A man of great wealth, power, and talents, reckoned among the eminent, rather than among the virtuous. Stimulated by revenge, he exerted all his influence to ruin Annulus Faustus, a notorious informer, who had persecuted the brother of Vibius Crispus. See Vibius Sēcūndus. Violence of procedure thwarted, in some measure, the design of Vibius, and his own conduct, in receiving the profits of prosecution, contributed to his mortification. Tācītus has recorded other traits of his character, which hold him up to the contempt of posterity (Hist. ii. 10 seq.).

Vibius Frōnto, Vibii Frōntōnis, m. a prefect of the cavalry, who seized Vōnōne q. v., in the year 19 (Tac. Ann. ii. 68).

Vibius Mārsus, Vibii Mārsi, m. a noble birth, and of great literary accomplishments, who contested the government Syria with Cn. Sēntius, but, after a struggle, yielded to Sēntius, who was an officer. He was arraigned as a gallant of Albūcilla, in the year 17, when governor of checked Bārdānes, who intended Armēnia (Tac. Ann. vi. 47 seq.).

Vibius Pōstūmus, Vibii Pōstūmi, m. a Roman of consular rank, on whom honours were conferred, for which he had governed Dalmātia (ii. 116).

Vibius Sēcūndus, Vibii Sēcūni, m. a man knight, whom the Moet extortion, for which he was banished Italy, and would have been executed.

populace, who threatened the penalties of parricide against this unnatural youth, so intimidated him, that he fled from Rome, and would have effected his escape, had not the hatred of Tiberius at his father, obliged him to return to finish the prosecution. The majority voted for a capital punishment, which the emperor, to mitigate popular prejudice, at that period alarming, opposed, as he did also his banishment to Gyarus, Joura, and Donusa, Donussa, on which account, the old man was remanded to Amorgus. This trial proved, that the emperor had been meditating revenge for eight years; because Vibius had complained by letter, framed in a strain of free and bold remonstrance, that his services in the condemnation of Libo Drusus had not been duly rewarded, written immediately after these iniquitous proceedings. To gratify his malignant cruelty, Vibius was now dragged from his retreat, deformed with filth and loaded with irons, a striking contrast to the elegant dress, easy mean, and cheerful countenance of his nefarious son, his accuser (Tac. Ann. iv. 13—36).

Vibius Virrius, Vibii Virrii, m. one of the ambassadors of the Campāni, sent to C. Terentius Varro, after the battle of Cannæ, who, on hearing the consul's speech, proposed to the rest, that they should now join Hannibal, which would not only free them from the power of the Romans, but, after Hannibal had conquered the whole of the country, and returned to Carthage, that they would be left in possession of the sovereignty of all Italy. His opinion was generally adopted, and the same ambassadors who had been with Terentius, were sent to Hannibal. On the affairs of Cápua becoming desperate, he advised the senators to accomplish their own death, which he and twenty-seven of them carried into effect, by swallowing poison

Goths, agreeing to give him a share of the booty, a great number of the Goths, besides promising him a tribute in gold, the second son of D. Augustus, altho' he was the murderer of his own son to the same fate were killed, in the year 107, at Terni, in Umbria, a reign of near 50 years.

Vibo, ðnis, f. a city of the Locrians, who the Romans took it the name of Vibo, Bivona. It is a beautiful meadow, the poet says, Prætorius Vibonenses, ium, built by Agathæ, Sinus Vibonensis, Vibonensis ager, (Tac. Ann. xxi. 51).

Vibulenus, i, m. a noble Roman family. See Fabius.

Vibulenus, i, m. in the revolt of 121, was an active and eloquent orator, and a great speaker. On the 12th of August, Drusus called him to account, and censured with severity. Vibulenus was ordered to be put to death, almost as soon as he was taken (Tac. Ann. xxi. 29).

Vibulenus Agrinensis, m. a noble Roman

ing twice granted him his liberty, thought that, in consequence of these acts of kindness, and of his standing high in Pompey's esteem, he was a proper person to negotiate between them. It is probable that neither party was sincere in desiring peace, and the result corresponded with the wishes of these ambitious rivals, who were anxious to decide the contest by the sword (Cæs. B. C. i. 15 seq.).

Vica pōta, Vicē pōta, f. a name of victory, a vincendo et potundo. A temple to this goddess was built on the site of the house of P. Valērius, at the foot of Vēlla (Liv. ii. 7).

Vicēsīmus, v. Vicēsīmārius, a. um. Vicēsīma pārs, and Vicēsīmārium aurum, have the same meaning, denoting the twentieth part of the price which a slave would bring at the time of his manumission, or at which he was bought (Roman authors do not say which of these two was the rule), was always paid in gold into the treasury, called Sānetius arārium q. v. In 211 B. C., there was drawn out of this fund, four thousand pounds' weight of that metal (Liv. xxvii. 10).

Vicētia, rar. Vicētia, æ. f. Vicenza, a town of Gallia Cisalpina, of little consequence in itself; but, from being the birthplace of Cæcina, esteemed an acquisition by the opposite party (Tac. Hist. iii. 8). According to Jūstinus, it was built by the Gauls (xx. 5).

Victōāli, orum, m. a people who, with the Thaisphāli and Thērūngi, inhabited the new province on the north of the Danube, and Mæsia Superior (Eutrop. viii. 2).

Victōria, æ. f. the goddess of victory, to whom L. Pōstūmus Mægellus, consul, dedicated a temple, in 296 B. C. Hiēro, king of Syracūse, sent, in a present, a golden statue of victory to Rome, in 218 B. C., which the Romans accepted, and placed in the temple of Jūpiter (Liv. x. 33 seq.). M. Pōrcius Cato vowed a temple to Victōria virgo, in 197 B. C., and two years after dedicated it (Liv. xxxv. 9).

Victōrius. See Aurēlius.

Q. Victōrius, Q. Victōrii, m. the first centurion of the second legion, who snatched the standard from the bearer of it, and threw it in amongst the Gauls, rushing forward, in such numbers, as prevented the Romans from going out of the camp. By a powerful effort to recover the standard, the second legion first forced a passage out of the gate, in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 46).

Victūmūle, arum, f. a place at which Hānibal had his camp, in 220 B. C., when P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, consul, crossed the Po, with an intention to give him battle (Liv. xxi. 45). This name is variously written; Victūmvlæ, &c.

Victūmvlæ, arum, f. a city in the north of Italy, fortified for a magazine by the Romans, in the time of the Gallic war, taken by Hānibal, and every cruelty was exercised on the surrendered (Liv. xxi. 57).

Viēna, æ. f. Vienne in Dauphiné, the capital of the Allōbrōges, on the east bank of Rhodānus, the Rhone, and Jere, about thirteen miles south of Lūgdūnum, Lyons. It was in ancient times a seat of learning, and called by Mārtiālis Pulchra Viēna (vil. 87). The wine of Viēna probably wanted strength, as Mārtiālis calls it pitchy, which would give it a very unpleasant flavour (xlii. 107). The walls of Vienne are said to be four English miles in extent. Inh. Viēnēnses, ium (Sing. Viēnēnsis, is), m. (Tac. Hist. i. 65). Adj. Viēnēnsis, is, e. (Amm. Mar. xv. 9).

Vīgīlia, æ. f. a watch, the time a Roman soldier remained on guard during the night. The first watch (prima vigilia) commenced with the setting of the sun, and continued till half the time between sunset and midnight had elapsed; the second watch (secunda vigilia), till midnight; the third watch (tertia vigilia), from that period till half the time to sunrise had passed; and the fourth watch (quarta vigilia), till the sun began to appear above the horizon. The watches were announced by a centurion, and each contained three Roman hours; but these corresponded with British hours only at the two Equinoxes. See Hōra. Minuter portions of the night were Vespēra, the evening, i. e. from sunset to Crēpusculum, twilight; prima tēnēbra, v. prima fax, the beginning, or commencement of darkness; Concūbitum, v. Concūbia nox, bedtime; Intēpēsta nox, late at night, or far on in the night; the dead of night; Ad mēdiam noctem, towards midnight; Mēdia nox, midnight; De mēdiā nocte, after midnight; the turn of the night; Sub galli cantum, v. galli cantu, at cock-crowing; Gāllicinium, does not occur in any classical author; Cānticinium, end of cock-crowing; and Diluculum, the dawn. Other words and phrases, nearly synonymous with some of these, are frequently met with: Sub noctem, at, or, near night; primā nocte, at the beginning of night; multā nocte, or, de multā nocte, when much of the night is past; ad, v. in multam noctem, till late at night; until night was far advanced, &c.

Vīgintivirātus, ūs, m. a magistracy at Rome, consisting of twenty men, who superintended the police of the city. Three sat in judgment, three directed the coinage, four inspected the public ways, and ten presided in such cases as were tried by the cēntūviri. It became a previous step to the higher magistracies. The senate, by a decree, established it, after the conquest of Augustus, before his return to Rome, and it continued under his reign (Tac. Ann. iii. 29).

Villa pūblica, Villæ pūblicæ, f. the court house in Cāmpus Mārtius at Rome, finished on the first cēnsus performed there, in 434 B. C., by the censors C. Fōrtius Pācillus, and M. Gēgānius Mācērius (Liv. iv. 22).

L. Villius, L. Villi, m. a tribune of the Roman people, proposed a law for ascertaining the ages at which men might sue for, and hold, the different offices of the state, whence his family were surnamed Annāles, 181 B. C. This was the first time that a law to that purpose was proposed. He afterwards obtained the office of foreign prætor (Liv. xl. 44 seq.).

L. Villius Annālis, L. Villi Annālis, m. a noble Roman, who learned, as he was going to attend the Cōmītia, to vote for the election of his son as questor, that he was proscribed. By the direction of his son, the soldiers followed his footsteps as he fled for protection to a client, and he stood to see his assassination (Val. Max. ix. 11). Valērius Māximus calls the conduct of the son a double parricide, first by his counsel having advised, and then witnessed, the assassination (ix. 11).

L. Villius Tāppulus, L. Villi Tāppuli, m.

was elected plebeian edile in 215 B. C., when he accused a number of matrons of incontinency, several of whom were convicted and banished (Liv. xxv. 2).—2. A praetor, to whose lot Sardinia fell, in 201 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 1).

P. Villius, P. Villii, m. a plebeian tribune in 448 B. C.; elected, says Livius, rather from hope of his future conduct, than from his previous deserts (iii. 54).

P. Villius Tappulus, P. Villii Tappuli, m. a Roman, who, after being a plebeian tribune, and holding the government of Sicily, as a praetor, was chosen consul, in 202 B. C., when he obtained Macedonia for his province, where he performed nothing of any consequence. A violent mutiny had broken out in the army, which he checked, by promising to write the senate, in order to procure redress of the grievances, of which they complained. Two thousand claimed their discharge, from having completed their period of service; if their statement was true, they had cause of complaint, but not of insubordination. Afterwards he served as a lieutenant-general under T. Quinctius Flamininus, and as an ambassador, had different interviews with Antiochus, king of Syria, and this gave him an opportunity of meeting with Hannibal, with whom he had frequent conversations, on purpose to learn his plans. These meetings exposed Hannibal to the suspicion of Antiochus. Failing in the objects of his mission, as well as in his attempt to secure the alliance of the Magnètes, he and the other ambassadors returned to Rome. It is probable, that Hannibal surpassed the Roman ambassadors in political intrigue, and that the plans of Antiochus were too firmly settled, to be changed by any thing, which the Roman deputies could propose (Liv. xxix. 38 seq.).

Viminālis, is, e, of, or belonging to, Vimen, an osier. Viminālis collis, one of the seven hills on which Rome stood, added to the city by Servius Tullius (Liv. i. 44), and had this name, according to Festus, from being covered with osiers. Varro states, that it was so called from altars on it dedicated to Jupiter Viminēus, or from Viminēum, an osier. This derivation does not materially differ from that of Festus.

Vimināsium, i, n. a city of Moesia Superior, which was the metropolis of one of the provinces. It stood on the southern bank of Ister, the Danube, near Margus, Kastolatz. The editors of Eutropius spell this word differently (ix. 20). The orthography of Ptolémæus is here adopted.

Vincius Rūfius, Vincii Rūfii, m. a Roman knight, drawn into a dishonourable plot by Valerius Fabianus q. v. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40).

Vindāhum, i, n. a town of Gallia Narbonensis, at which Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, the Roman proconsul, defeated the Allobroges, in 123 B. C. This was the first engagement fought with that nation, mentioned by Livius (Ep. 61).

Vindēlicia, ae, f. a considerable extent of country in Europe, bounded on the north by Danubius, the Danube, on the west by Helvetia, Switzerland, on the south by Rhetia, and on the east by Noricum. Ind. Vindēlici, orum, m. were a brave and warlike people (Hor. Od. iv. 4. 18). Adj. Vindēlicus, a, um. Vindēlici silvā, the forests of Vindēlicia (Claud. xxvi. 385). Vindēlica is, the country of the Vindēlici (Mart. ix. 85).

Vindēlicus, i, m. a river of Gallia Narbonensis (Flor. iii. 2). Other writers call his fountain, not a river.

Vindēx, icis, m. the surname of a Roman clan (Stat. Syl. iv. 6. 4).

Vindēcius, i, m. a slave, who discovered the conspiracy into which the sons of Brutus, and other young noblemen, had entered, to restore the Tarquins, for which he was rewarded with a sum of money, his freedom, and the privileges of the state. To his name some refer the word vindicta. From the privileges conferred on him, it became a rule at Rome, that whosoever became free in this manner, should be accounted a citizen (Liv. ii. 4, 5).

Vindōbōna, ae, f. Vienna, a town of Pannonia, on the south bank of Danubius, the Danube, at the junction of two small rivers, the Wien and the Alser. It was a place of little consequence before the twelfth century, during which it became the residence of the Dukes of Austria, and was enclosed by a wall, according to the manner of fortification peculiar to that period. For many years past, it has been the metropolis of the Austrian empire, and is considered one of the most beautiful cities in Europe. Here the Danube is of great breadth, and beautified with several woody islands, which enliven and diversify the scenery. In modern times, the population of Vienna is about 254,000.

Vindonissa, ae, f. Windisch, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Bern, on the Aar (Tac. Hist. iv. 61).

Vinēae, arum, f. a mantelet or shed, used by the Romans for protecting the soldiers besieging towns. It consisted of four upright posts, upon which was fixed a row of hurdle or wickerwork. Above the hurdles were spread raw hides, a little earth, &c., to protect it from fire. It is probable that strong beams would support the roof, otherwise stones and other heavy materials thrust from the walls would have destroyed the hurdles, and rendered it no protection to the soldiers at work under its cover. The size of the Vinēae would differ according to circumstances. In general, they were 16 feet long, 8 feet broad, and 7 feet high. The whole rested upon wheels, so that it might be easily moved. Plutarch did not materially differ in form from Vinēae, and was used for the same purpose.

Viniolus Rūfius. See Vincius Rūfius.

Viniolus. See Ummidius.

L. Viniolus, L. Vinioli, m. a young man of elegant appearance, and good family, whom Augustus reproved by letter for visiting his daughter at Baiae (Suet. Aug. 64).

M. Viniolus, M. Vinioli, m. a native of Cales, Calvi, whose father and grandfather were of consular rank. They were the first of the family who had risen above the equestrian order. To him the Roman emperor, Tiberius, gave his grand-daughter, Julia, in marriage, in the year 32 (Tac. Ann. vi. 13).

Adj. Viniolānus, a, um. Viniolānus cōspicūm (Suet. Ner. 36).

T. Viniolus, T. Vinioli, m. one of the five chosen by Cn. Calpurnius Piso, to defend his cause, in the year 20. Like the rest, he declined (Tac. Ann. iii. 11).

T. Vitiſus Philſopemen, T. Vinli Philſopemēnis, m. a freedman who concealed his patron from the fury of the proſcription. For this generous act, Auguſtus advanced him to the equeſtrian rank (Suet. Aug. 27).

T. Vinli Rufinus, T. Vinli Rufini, m. obtained the conſulſhip with Sērvius Sulpicius Gālba, in the year 69. Tācitus makes him one of the moſt profligate of men, and has recorded ſome of the actions of his life, which juſtify his opinion. He was killed at the ſame time with the emperor Gālba, and his enormous wealth, which he obtained by plunder, rendered his laſt will null and void (Hiſt. i. 1—48).

Vinnius, i. m. Santillanos, a mountain, or rather a range of mountains, in the north of Spain (Flor. iv. 12).

Viſolantilla, æ. f. a widow of Nēpōlis, Naples, whoſe marriage with Stēlla, Stātilius has ſung in an Epithālāmum (Syl. i. 2).

Vipſānia Agrippina, Vipſāniæ Agrippinæ, f. daughter of Vipſānius Agrippa and Pōmponia, was the firſt wife of the Roman emperor, Tiberius, who divorced her when pregnant, that he might marry Jūlia, the daughter of Auguſtus. After the divorce, ſhe became the wife of Aſinius Gāllus, and had, by her firſt husband, Drūſus Cæſar. Tācitus calls her ſimply Vipſānia (Ann. i. 12).

Vipſānius Gāllus, Vipſāni Gālli, m. died during his prætorſhip, and Hātērius Agrippa ſucceeded to his office, in the year 17 (Tac. Ann. ii. 51).

Vipſānius Lænas, Vipſāni Lænātis, m. a Roman governor, convicted of rapacity, in the iſland of Sardinia, in the year 56 (Tac. Ann. xlii. 30).

L. Vipſānius Pōplicōla, L. Vipſāni Pōplicōlæ, m. obtained the conſulſhip at Rome, with A. Vitēllius, afterwards emperor, in the year 48 (Tac. Ann. xi. 23).

M. Vipſānius Agrippa, M. Vipſāni Agrippæ, m. a man of low deſcent, but of uncommon talents and perſonal worth. To his military accompliſhments, Auguſtus owed his victory over Sēxtus Pōmpeius, and afterwards over M. Antōnius. Both Virgilius and Hōrātius have celebrated his merits, and Auguſtus lamented his death, although he cenſured with ſeverity, the overthrow of the republic, and the eſtabliſhment of monarchy. The emperor beſtowed upon him a naval crown, an honour not before conferred on any one, for his victory over Sēxtus Pōmpeius, in 37 B. C. He married firſt Pōmpōnia, daughter of T. Pōmpōnius Aticus, next Mārcella, daughter of Octāvia, and afterwards Jūlia, the daughter of Auguſtus. He obtained many proofs of the emperor's regard and confidence, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by numerous victories. The Parthenon of Rome ſtill remains a ſtriking proof of his great wealth, and taſte for embellishing the capital of the empire. At his death, in 12 B. C., he left three ſons, Caius, Lūcius, and Agrippa. Pōſtūmus; and two daughters, Vipſānia Agrippina, and Jūlia. Their grandfather, Auguſtus, adopted Caius and Lūcius, hence Suetonius calls them his ſons. They both died young, the former in Lycia, and the latter in Marseilles (Suet. Aug. 26 ſeq.). His name frequently occurs in the writings of Tācitus, generally written M. Agrippa, or ſimply Agrippa. Gēllius makes Agrippa a compound of agritudo and pes, as agre parti, i. e. born with the feet firſt. Adj. Vipſānus, a. um. Vipſāne laurus (Mart. i. 109).

Vipſānus Mēſſala, Vipſāni Mēſſalæ, m. a young man of illuſtrious birth and great merit, deſcribed by Tācitus as pious and eloquent. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his hiſtorical writings, and on his authority this hiſtorian narrates the death of Jūlius Mānuſuetus, killed by his own ſon, unconſcious of their relationship. Tācitus relates the incident with great feeling and tenderness. Vipſānus had the command of a legion, at the head of which he joined the party in favour of Vēſpāſianus, and againſt Vitēllius. The hiſtorian makes him the only man who engaged in that war, from virtuous motives. What other honourable appointments he may have obtained, hiſtory does not record. In the dialogue on oratory, he expreſſed a very decided opinion in favour of the ancients. His eloquence in the cauſe of his worthleſs brother, Rēgūlus, an infamous informer, gained him great diſtinction, and gives the converſation a new turn, after he becomes one of the ſpeakers (Tac. Hiſt. iii. 9 ſeq.; Orat. 14 ſeq.).

C. Vipſānus Aprōnīanus, C. Vipſāni Aprōnīani, m. was præconſul, or governor, of Africa, in the year 70, ten years after he had held the conſulſhip with L. Fōntēius Cāpito (Tac. Hiſt. i. 76).

Virbius, i. m. (i. e. Vir bis), a name of Hippolytus q. v.—2. A ſon of Hippolytus by Aricia, who was brought up in the grove of Egēria, and joined Tūrnus in the war with Jēnās (Virg. Æn. vii. 762 ſeq.).

Virbius, i. m. a ſtreet in Rome (Liv. i. 48).

Virgilius Gēmīnus, Virgili Gēmīni, m. an officer of great experience, appointed by Vēſpāſianus to attack the pirates, who infeſted the Black Sea, whom he completely ſubdued, and put an end to the war, in the year 69 (Tac. Hiſt. iii. 48).

Viridomārus, v. Viridomārus, i. m. a king of the Gauls, who, according to Prōpērtius, hoſted that he was the ſon of Rhēnus, the Rhine. M. Claudius Mārcellus, the Roman general, ſlew him with his own hand, and conſequently obtained the third Spōlia Optima, in 224 B. C. If the poet juſt mentioned be correct, the Gauls, at that time, fought from chariots, which were robed, or covered above.—2. One of the Ædūi, more diſtinguiſhed by political influence, than by noble birth. Cæſar, at the requeſt of Divitiācus, raiſed him to the higheſt dignity in the ſtate. He and Epōrēdōrix were rivals for the ſupreme authority, and on that account the one ſupported the intereſt of Cōtus, the other of Convictōlitānis (Cæſ. B. G. vii. 39).

Virgāntia, æ. f. Briançon, rather Brīgāntium q. v. (Amm. Mar. xv. 10).

Virgilius, i. m. a man in the army of Scipio Africānus, who killed Caudinus, in the battle at Zāma (Sil. Ital. xvii. 441).

P. Virgilius Māro, P. Virgili Mārōnis, m. was a native of Andes, a village in the vicinity of Māntua, and born in October, 68 B. C. It is probable, that his parents were in the loweſt rank of ſociety, but neither their names nor condition in life have been recorded. The early years of the poet ſeem the ferocity of the soldier. The authority on which this statement depends, does not seem entitled to implicit credit, and it stands opposed to the cautious prudence, and solid judgment of the poet. When Augustus, in fulfilment of his promise, had allotted the lands on the north of the Po, to his veteran troops, Virgilius could not fail to see, that resistance would have been vain, even although the whole peasantry had united to oppose the iniquitous mandate of the emperor. Besides, history affords no grounds for believing, that the unfortunate natives, either as individuals or a body, made the slightest resistance. Soon after this expulsion, Virgilius went to Rome, where he was introduced to Augustus, but by whom is uncertain. It has been stated, that Mæcenas recommended him to the emperor, which appears questionable, since he does not mention that patron of literature in any of his pastorals, and we have sufficient evidence that they were not all written, when he was compelled to quit his native place. The emperor restored him his lands, most probably from the excellence of his poetry, and it has been alleged, that he has shown his gratitude in the first eclogue, where part of his own history is recorded under the character of Tityrus. The refined excellence of the pastorals of Virgilius, proves that they were not his first attempts at poetic composition. Both the language and the ideas rise greatly above the ordinary strain of pastoral, and may be considered as a foretaste of the more laboured and finished strains of the Georgics, the most perfect didactic poem, which the world has ever seen. Antiquity presented no model which Virgilius could adopt, and modern genius has produced no poem which can bear to be set in opposition to that of Virgilius. A general report prevails in modern, as it did also in ancient times, that he spent seven years in the composition and very perfect model. This advantage in this advantage is he has availed himself of the Iliad or Hômêrus sings in the latter, the conception of the and national into traces the descent Trojan hero, and trious families from him to It the Fates conducted him the founder future ages, was t At this height the when Virgilius a poem. In the in poet enumerates a few his hero, who, like led on the African coast are not characters rank. The characters of the Æneid, or the persons who form, as it were, the machinery of the poem, are Æneas, Turnus, Dido, Anna, Ascanius, Lavinia, Amata, Juturna, Camilla, Evander, Pallas, Mecænatius, Ufens, Messapus, and some others of less consequence. Nor should Simon, the perjured Greek, be omitted. Of the celestial, Venus and Juno are the two, who take the greatest interest in the success of the two heroes. The agency of these goddesses gives great interest to the narrative, and upon it turn many of the principal occurrences, by which the poem is diversified and embellished. Both appeal to Jupiter, and nowhere does the sovereign of Olympus appear in such majesty, as in the Æneid. He wields the sceptre of the universe, subject to the decrees of Fate, with exalted dignity, taking no part with either of these rival goddesses. To delineate these characters, and to point out the particular features by which they are characterized, would far exceed our limits. We must therefore refer to the brief notice taken of each under their own names. During the time that Virgilius wrote this astonishing poem, he is said to have lived chiefly at Naples. He went to Greece, with an intention of putting his last hand to this immortal work at Athens, but, falling into bad health, he changed his design, and meeting with Augustus, returning from his eastern conquests, he accompanied him to Italy, and died at Brundisium, Brindisi, in the fifty-second year of his age. He ordered the Æneid to be burned, because he had not put his last hand to it, and the world must acknowledge obligations to the emperor, for not complying with this request. That patron of literature intrusted the revision of it to Varius and Plotius Tucca, with instructions not to add a single line, but to cancel whatever they thought defective. This accounts for the number of broken lines in the Æneid. Martialis insinuates, that the Romans preferred the writings of Ennius to those of Virgilius during his lifetime; Ennius est lectus sileo tibi Roma Mārōnē (v. 10). Altissimus Māro, lofty, or sublime Virgilius (*Juv. Virgīnia, æ. f. a daughter of L. Virgīnius and Nūmītōria, possessed uncommon beauty, and was in the bloom of youth when Applius Claudius, one of the dēcēmvīri, attempted to effect her ruin. Finding he could neither overcome the fidelity of her nurse, nor her own modesty, he instructed M. Claudius, one of his dependents, to claim her as his slave, and to bring the case before him as judge. After various proceedings, it appeared manifest to Virgīnia herself, to her father, and to the crowd, which the injustice of the case had collected round the tribunal of Applius, that the innocent victim would be sacrificed to the brutal lust of her judge; but her father prevented the violation, by depriving her of life, and, according to Aurēlius Victor, carried her dead body on his shoulders to the army, whom he easily prevailed upon to enter into a conspiracy against the dēcēmvīri (Vir. Il. 21). This act of atrocity on the part of Applius, eventually freed the state from the tyranny of the dēcēmvīri, who were forthwith compelled to resign (Liv. iii. 44—58).—2. Daughter of A. Virgīnius, a patrician, but married to L. Völūmnus, consul, a plebeian, on which account the patrician matrons excluded her from the temple and sacred rites of patrician chastity. Of this act of injustice, as she considered it, she complained in the language of a high minded woman, conscious of her own purity, and proud of her husband's respectability and military fame. Part of her own house she enclosed for a chapel, in which she erected an altar, and in the presence of plebeian matrons, dedicated it, to plebeian chastity, in 298 B. C. It was requisite, that every worshipper should be of approved chastity, and only the wife of one husband. This institution, afterwards polluted by the admission of vicious characters, at last sunk into oblivion (Liv. x. 23).

A. Virgīnius, A. Virgīnī, m. (surnamed in con. cal. Tricostus Cælimōntānus), held the office of consul with T. Vētūlus, in 494 B. C., the year in which tribunes of the people were first appointed. He commanded against the Völsci, whom he defeated (Liv. ii. 28—30).—2. (Surnamed in con. cal. Tricostus Rūtilus), enjoyed the honour of the consulship, in 476 B. C., and had for his colleague Sp. Sērvilius. By an act of temerity, fortunate for the Romans, but injurious to themselves, the Vēientes were overpowered, and the war with that nation terminated (Liv. ii. 51).—3. Held the consulship in 469 B. C. On marching against the Æqui, the soldiers owed their escape from an ambuscade, not to the activity of the consul, but to their own bravery (Liv. ii. 63).—4. A trībūm vir for distributing lands among the colonists, who were to be established at Antium, in 467 B. C. (Liv. iii. 1).—5. A tribune of the people, who brought a criminal prosecution against Kæso Quinctius q. v., a procedure which excited excessive contention and violence, to which Virgīnius contributed greatly by his abuse of the accused (Liv. iii. 11—13).—6. A tribune of the people, who supported the patricians, in which he was joined by Q. Pōmpōnius, but opposed by all the rest of his colleagues. They held the office for two years, and at the end of that time were prosecuted, for protesting against the law proposed by the other tribunes, without being charged with any other offence, either with respect to office, or private life, and, convicted of no crime, they were condemned to pay a fine of ten thousand asses; a sentence, says Livius, of most pernicious example (v. 29).

L. Virgīnius, L. Virgīnī, m. a man of good conduct, both as a citizen and as a soldier; held an honourable rank among the centurions in the army at Algidum, Aglio, in 449 B. C. The behaviour of his wife Nūmītōria, and the education of his children, had been regulated by the same virtuous principles. To accomplish the ruin of his daughter Virgīnia, Applius Claudius, a dēcēmvir, having formed a plan of which Virgīnius obtained information, quitted the camp and went to Rome. Finding it beyond his power to rescue his daughter from tive remained but death or violation, he stabbed her to the heart, near the tribunal of that infamous Roman. Having raised a commotion in the city, Virgilius then returned to the camp, and excited the soldiers to revolt, who instantly marched to Rome, and posted themselves on Monte Aventino. As the military were without a head, Virgilius advised them to elect ten persons, with the title of tribunes of the soldiers, to manage their affairs. The soldiers approved of his suggestion, and named himself one of the tribunes, an office which he prudently declined. The commons afterwards elected him one of their tribunes, when he fixed a day for the trial of Appius Claudius, and committed him to prison; but the latter, precluded from all hope, escaped the disgrace both of the trial and of a public execution, by a voluntary death. To M. Claudius, who had claimed Virgilia as his slave, for which he had been brought to trial and condemned, Virgilius remitted the punishment of death, in 449 B. C. (Liv. iii. 44—58).—2. (Surnamed in con. cal. Tricostus), held the consulship, in 435 B. C., and was continued in office the following year. Livius questions the accuracy of the latter statement, as some ancient authors mention other consuls for the second year, and others maintain that there were military tribunes. The consular calendar supports their re-election (Liv. iv. 21—23).—3. Elected a military tribune, in 401 B. C. With one of his colleagues, M. Sergus Fidēnas, he was at variance, and their hatred appears to have been mutual. To Sergus he did not offer the assistance which he did not ask, and the consequence was the defeat of the army at Veii. For this failure in duty, they were compelled to resign their office before the usual time, i. e. the Ides of December. Against both Virgilius and Sergus, the tribunes of the people raised a prosecution, and they were condemned to pay ten thousand asses (Liv. v. 8—12).—4. A tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, in 388 B. C. In consequence of the Volsi taking up arms, and the defection of the Lātini and Hērūci, M. Furius Cāmillus was created dictator (Liv. vi. 1).—5. A military tribune, who was sent with four Gallic horsemen, and two Numidians, the bearers of a letter from Hāsdrūbal to Hānnibal, to the consul C. Claudius Nēro, in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 43).

Opiter Virgilius, Opiteris Virgili, m. was elected consul in 502 B. C. He and his colleague Sp. Cāssius carried, by storm, Pōmētia, which they destroyed, set the lands to sale, and executed the chiefs of the Aurūnci. The common people were sold for slaves. This cruelty, to the disgrace of the Romans, could be attributed to nothing, but the bravery of the enemy, who had repulsed their first assault with great loss. For this revenge, by which the people's resentment was gratified, not for finishing so inconsiderable a war, the consuls had the honour of a triumph (Liv. ii. 17).—2. Elected consul in 479 B. C. Livius says, that instead of Virgilius some annals make Vopiscus Jūlius consul, and the uncertainty is not removed by the consular calendar. The most remarkable circumstance, this year, was the with Viriāthus on equal terms. This brave Spaniard, after repelling the valour of the Roman armies for fourteen years, fell by the hand of a traitor employed by Sērvilius Cāpio. The army of Viriāthus lamented his death, and honoured his memory by a splendid funeral (Liv. Ep. 52—54). This act reflects disgrace on the Roman character and principles, by condescending to employ a ruffian to assassinate an eminent man and an excellent general, whom their arms could not subdue. Adj. Viriāthicus, et, Viriāthicus, a, um. Viriāthicum bellum. Viriāthium bellum (Suet. Galb. 3).

Viridāsius, i, m, a skilful warrior both on sea and land. He commanded a thousand men in the battle at Trāsimēnus, the Lake of Perugia, and fell by the hand of Hānnibal (Sil. Ital. v. 551 seq.).

Viridōvix, icis, m, the leading man among the Unelli, who headed a powerful army in an attack on Sābinus, one of Cæsar's lieutenant-generals then stationed among them; who defeated Viridōvix by an artful stratagem (Cæs. B. G. iii. 17).

Viriplāca, æ, f, a goddess, who had a temple on Pālātium, one of the hills on which Rome stood, to which, when a husband and wife happened to disagree, they went together, and the parties stated their own account of the matter, after which the difference ceased, and they returned home in good humour. From the name of the goddess it appears, that the blame lay most frequently with the husband (Val. Max. ii. 1).

Viriū, i, m, the chief of the embassy sent by Pācūvius from Cāpua to the Roman senate. He was a man of great bravery. Having joined Hānnibal against the Romans, he said, that he had occasioned the destruction of his native city, on which account he erected a funeral pile, stretched himself upon it, and was reduced to ashes (Sil. Ital. xi. 65 seq.).

Virro, ōnis, m, a man held up by Cātūllus to the disgust of the reader (lxxi).—2. The fictitious name of a rich entertainer, mentioned by Juvēnalis, whom he censures for vanity, folly, and extravagance (Sat. v. 39).

Virta, æ, f, Tekrit, called by Ptolēmaeus Bīrtha, a town of Mēsōpōtāmīa, said to have been built by Alexander the Great (Amm. Mar. xx. 7).

C. Visēllius Vārro, C. Visēllii Vārrōnis, m, a Roman of great wealth, who left a sum to Otācilla, with whom he had lived in impurity, but C. Aquillius, being appointed judge, decided against her (Val. Max. viii. 2).

L. Visēllius Vārro, L. Visēllii Vārrōnis, m, a lieutenant-general in Lower Germany, who quelled an insurrection in the territory of Tours, in the year 21. Three years after, he obtained the consulship with Ser. Cōrnēlius Cēthēgus. During the time he held that high office, he undertook the despicable part of a public prosecutor, and arraigned C. Silius q. r. (Tac. Ann. iii. 41 seq.).

Vistilia, æ, f, the wife of Titūlius Lābēo, a woman of the most profligate manners, and of avowed debauchery. Although descended from a family of prætorian rank, she presented herself before the ediles in form, made a public profession of lewdness according to ancient usage, when women registered in this manner before the magistrates had the privilege of leading a life of gross licentiousness. For this scandalous behaviour, she was banished to the island Sēriplius, Serpho, and the senate passed a decree, that in future no woman whose grandfather, father, or husband, was a Roman knight, should be permitted to live by prostitution (Tac. Ann. ii. 85).

Visūrgis, is, m, the Weser, a river of Gērmānia, Germany, which rises in Hesse, and running northward passes Snul-cald, enters the duchy of Broweswick, afterwards runs between the circles of Westphalia, and Lower Saxony, receives the Aller, and, after a course of 400 miles, falls into the German Sea below Carlstadt, opposite to Actānia, Heligoland (Flor. iv. 12).

Vitēllia, æ, f, the mother-in-law of P. Pētrōnius, in whose house the poet, C. Lūtōrius Prīscus, read an elegy written on Drūsus during an illness. For this poem Lūtōrius was brought to trial, and all present admitted the fact except Vitēllia, who declared that she had heard nothing (Tac. Ann. iii. 49).

Vitēllia, æ, f, a town of the Æqui, taken by Cōrōlōnus, when he commanded the Volscian army, in 491 B. C. In 392 B. C., it was retaken by the Æqui (Liv. ii. 39 seq.).

Vitēlli, orum, m, the brothers of the wife of L. Jūnius Brūtus, suffered the punishment of traitors, for having been engaged in a conspiracy for the restoration of the Tārqūnii to the throne of Rome, in 509 B. C. (Liv. ii. 4).

Vitēllus Sātūrnīnus, Vitēllii Sātūrnīni, m, a præfect of the legion, who, with Jūlius Mārtiālis, attempted to check the fury of the soldiers, at the time they broke out in open rebellion, demanding a sight of the emperor Otho. By his eloquence he reduced the troops to subordination, and only punished two of the mutineers. In this fray, neither of these two officers escaped without wounds (Tac. Hist. i. 82).

A. Vitēllius, A. Vitēllii, m, the paternal uncle of A. Vitēllius, the Roman emperor, carried on a successful war against the Gēte. At the time of his death, he was consul with Dōmītiūs, the father of Nēro (Suet. Vit. 2). According to some authors, he is the person mentioned by Ovidius (Ep. Pont. iv. 7. 27).

—2. Son of L. Vitēllius, a Roman knight, was born on the 23d of September, in the year 15. Among the worthless attendants of Tiberius at Cāpræ, Capri, he spent his youth in crime, and continued, through life, conspicuous for licentiousness and depravity. The agreeableness of his manners, liveliness of conversation, and disregard of moral principle, appear to have procured him distinguished favour at court. This interest raised him to the great offices of the state, and to the highest order of the priesthood. In the procuratorship of Africa, he governed with integrity, but, in the superintendence of public works, he pillaged the temples. By his wife Petrōnia, whose father was of consular rank, he had a son, Petrōniānus, whom he murdered, pretending that he had drunk the poison which he had prepared for his father. Soon after this event, he married Gālēria Fūndāna, by whom he had both sons and daughters. When Gālba sent him to Lower Germany, his poverty obliged him to leave his wife and children at Rome, in a garret, and the price of a pearl, which he got from his mother, defrayed the expenses of the journey. Here the army soon saluted him emperor, on which he assumed the surname Germānicus. The death of Otho, at whose instigation Gālbā had been killed, left him without a rival, and, after punishing some of the murderers of the late emperor, he proceeded to Rome, where he violated all laws, human and divine. The offerings which he presented to the shade of Nēro, were considered by the citizens, an alarming presage of his future cruelty, in which he gratified his savage disposition to such a degree, that the recital would only shock the reader. In the eighth month of his reign, the armies in Mesia, Pānnōnia, Jūdēa, and Syria, revolted, and he soon found it necessary to agree with Flāvius Sābīnus, brother of Vespāsianus, to abdicate, on condition of having his life and a certain sum of money. Prevailed on by the soldiers near him, who remonstrated against these conditions, he retained the government, until his enemies dragged him from his concealment, half naked, into the Fōrum, with his hands tied behind him, and a rope round his neck. To prolong his suffering, they put him to death by gentle strokes, at Gemoniæ, in the fifty-seventh year of his age. Instead of burial, they dragged, with a hook, his body into Tiber, the Tevere. His son and brother perished at the same time. Adj. Vitēllianus, a. um. Vitēllianum bellum (Suet. Dom. 1). Vitēllianus miles (Tac. Hist. iii. 78).

L. Vitēllius, L. Vitēllii, m. son of P. Vitēllius, of which name he had also a brother, and father of the emperor A. Vitēllius. Tibērius appointed him governor of Syria, and he threatened to invade Mēsōpōtāmia, Jezirah, and place Tiridātes on the throne of Pērsia. With Artābānus, king of Pārthia, he had an interview, on which occasion a bridge was built over Euphrātes, the El-Frat, and the haughty prince, besides burning incense before the Roman eagles, and the statues of Augustus and Cālgūla, gave one of his sons, a child, named Dārius, as a hostage. Vitēllius deposed Pōntius Pilātus, at the request of the Jews and Samaritans, in the year 37. The favour of Cālgūla he procured by the meanest flattery, and he degraded himself by the same adulation, not only of Mēssālina, but also of her freedmen. His servility, added to some knowledge of business, obtained for him the consulship three times, and the administration of the empire, during the absence of Claudius in Britain. His conduct to Valērius Asiaticus has been recorded by Tacitus, and his treachery exposed to merited abhorrence. In the case of Mēssālina, Agrippina, and in other instances, he acted the part of a subtle courtier, giving ambiguous answers, susceptible of any meaning, which the event of things might require, and others followed his artful dissimulation. In the end of life, enjoying the highest favour, Jūlius Lūpus accused him of high treason, to which Claudius would willingly have lent an ear, but Agrippina forced him to banish Jūlius, which not only saved Vitēllius, but gratified his revenge. Suetonius states, that his morals were as depraved as his flattery was abject, yet the senate decreed him a public funeral, and a statue with this inscription, "Pietis immobilis erga principem" (Tac. Ann. vi. 56 seq.). — 2. Son of the former, who, on his brother, A. Vitēllius, being appointed emperor, attended the meeting of the senate, and willingly received the flattering address of the fathers. After a speech of studied eloquence, in which he enlarged on the prosperous state of affairs, he moved, that the senate should pronounce sentence against Aliēnus Cæcina, and the fathers, in a strain of flattery unbecoming their dignity, complied with his request. He likewise managed the accusation against Jūnius Blaesus &c. The party of Vespāsianus overthrew the army of Vitēllius at Crēmōna, which roused him from his stupor, and, having made preparations for opposing the enemy, he put the cohorts for the defence of the city, under the command of his brother, L. Vitēllius, who afterwards marched into Cāmpānia, to check the revolters in that district. By the treachery of a slave, he obtained possession of Terrācina, and Trālaria, his wife, and said to have rejoiced at the carnage which laid waste the city. L. Vitēllius sent a laurelled letter to his brother, the emperor, desiring to know whether he should advance to Rome, or complete the subjection of Cāmpānia. This delay not only benefited the cause of Vespāsianus, but perhaps saved the very state. Had his ferocious troops, in the moment of victory, entered the city, a fearful slaughter, and, perhaps, the destruction of Rome, had been the consequence. Altho' infamous, L. Vitēllius did not want activity, and he accomplished, by his vices, what good men obtained by their virtues. Soon after, he and his cohorts tamely surrendered at discretion, and entered Rome, not as conquerors, but as prisoners, guarded on each side by the victorious troops, retaining however the same ferocity of appearance, and, in silent contempt, heard the taunts of the vulgar. L. Vitēllius was put to death, and the soldiers secured in prison. In vict, sen Tacitus, he was equal to his brother; in the administration, of greater activity; having little share in his prosperity, yet falling in his ruin (Hist. i. 88 seq.).

P. Vitēllius, P. Vitēllii, m. was born at Nūcēria, held the office of a procurator to Augustus, and had the honour of being a Roman knight. At his death, he left four sons, Aulus, Lūcius, Pūblius and Quintus. — 2. Son of P. Vitēllius, and uncle of A. Vitēllius, the emperor, was an officer under Germānicus, and in great danger of being drowned, in the year 15, with two legions under his command, as he marched along the coast of Germany, near the mouth of the river Ussingis, the Hunsing, from being unacquainted with the tide on that shore. Germānicus sent him and C. Aufus to receive the taxes of the Gallic states, at the time he meditated a termination of the war by some decisive blow. He, Vērāulus, and others, collected materials for commencing a prosecution against Cn. Cālpurnius Piso &c. as the supposed murderer of Germānicus, in consequence of their having attended that noble Roman into Asia, and were to appear as witnesses rather than accusers. At a future period, he and Pōmpōnius Sēcundus, having been intrusted with the public treasury, and the military chest, were charged with the design of giving up both to the conspirators, who intended to overturn the government. Worn out by delay, and weary of alternate hopes and fears, Vitellius opened his veins, but so slightly, that he continued to live for some time, but at last died of a broken heart, in the year 31 (Tac. Ann. i. 70 seq.).

Q. Vitellius, Q. Vitellii, m. son of P. Vitellius, and uncle of A. Vitellius, the emperor. On account of his extravagance and prodigality, he was either expelled the senate, or allowed to vacate his seat, in the year 17 (Tac. Ann. ii. 48). To him Q. Eulogius inscribed his book, on the origin of the Vitellian family.

Vitia, a, f. the mother of Fufius Gennius, put to death, because she bewailed the fate of her son, in the year 32 (Tac. Ann. vi. 10).

Vitrūvius Vācus, Vitrūvii Vāci, m. a native of Fündi, a man of considerable distinction, who commanded the inhabitants of that town against the Romans, in 329 B. C. L. Papirius Crassus, consul, easily compelled him to flee, since he had incautiously engaged an army superior in strength, without either discovering judgment in the formation, or courage in the execution, of his plan. Livius mentions, that he came into the hands of the Romans, according to some historians, by being made prisoner, according to others, was delivered up by his countrymen. After being beaten with rods, he was put to death by order of the senate; his house, on Mons Palatinus, was razed to the ground, and was afterwards called Vāci prāta, his effects consecrated to Semo, or Sancus, and two brazen globes were formed from the money produced by the sale, and placed in the chapel of that god (viii. 19 seq.).

Vivianus Annulus, Viviani Annuli, m. the son-in-law of Domitius Corbulo, who was given as a hostage to Tiridates, both to remove suspicion from the mind of that monarch, and to do him honour before his interview with Domitius Corbulo, in the year 64 (Tac. Ann. xv. 28).

Vöbēta, v. Vöbēna, v. f. a town of Celtiberia (Mart. i. 50).

Vöcānus, a, um. Vöcānus ager, a tract of land in Africa, which appears to have been not far from Thāpsus, of which little is certainly known (Liv. xxxiii. 48).

Vöcātes, lum, m. a people of Aquitania, supposed, by some, to be the same with Vasātes, whose territories lay on the south bank of Gärūmna, the Garonne, about ninety miles from the mouth of that river (Ces. B. G. iii. 23 seq.).

Vöcētus, i, m. Basberg, or, Batzberg, a mountain of the Helvetii, the most rugged part of mount Jura. The word is differently written, and considerable uncertainty prevails respecting this mountain (Tac. Hist. i. 68).

Vöclo, ōnis, m. a king of the Nörici, whose sister Ariövisus had married (Ces. B. G. i. 53).

Q. Vöcōntus Sāxa, Q. Vöcōnti Sāxus, m. a tribune of the people, who passed a law, regulating the sum to be left to a daughter, about 100 B. C. Adj. Vöcōntus, a, um. Vöcōntia lex (Gel. vii. 13).

Vöcōntii, orum, m. the Vocontians, a nation of Gālha, France, on the banks of a small stream called Drūna, the Drome, which falls into Rhödānus, the Rhone, about a hundred miles from the mouth of that river (Ces. B. G. i. 10). Trögus Pömpēius, whose history Jüstinus has abridged, was a Vocontian, whose grandfather received the privileges of Rome from Cn. Pömpēius, whose name he assumed. Dia, Die, appears to have been their chief town, which is not very great, but the See of a bishop, under the archbishop of Vienna, Vienne, and contains 3,000 inhabitants. Others make Vāso, v. Vāso, Vāsson, their capital. It was destroyed by the Saracens, in the sixth century. The present town stands on a hill, is watered by the Quene, and overlooks the plain, on which the ruins of the old city are still visible. Adj. Vöcōntius, a, um. Vöcōntia rūra (Sil. Ital. iii. 467).

Vögēsus, i, m. a Gaul, who cut off the head of Quirinius, in the first battle fought between the Romans and Hannibal in Italy (Sil. Ital. iv. 213).

Vögēsus (also written Vöcēsus, Vöcēsus, v. Vögētus), i, m. Vange, or, Vanges, is a branch of mount Jura, stretching in a northern direction, in which are the sources of Arar, the Saone, Mösa, the Meuse, and Möscella, the Moselle. Its greatest height, Donnou, is about 400 toises above the level of the sea, and its length 50 leagues (Ces. B. G. iv. 10). Curva rūpes Vögēti (Luc. Phars. i. 397).

Völāe. See Böla.

Völāginus, i, m. a common soldier, who murdered M. Furius Camillus Scribonianus q. v., for which he received the highest post in the army (Tac. Hist. ii. 75).

Völāndum, i, n. a castle in Armēnia, and the strongest fort in that country (Tac. Ann. xlii. 39).

Völānērius, i, m. a buffoon and a gambler, who, from his excessive and continued vices, seems to have obtained complete mental tranquillity. So near, in this respect, does consummate profligacy, in its effect upon the mind, approach to moral excellence (Hor. Sat. ii. 7. 15). This extreme degree of wickedness is the most hopeless and alarming. When vice has once destroyed all mental sensibility, there is nothing but an awful looking for of judgment.

Völēia, arum, m. a numerous and powerful nation of Gālha, between Gärūmna, the Garonne, and Rhödānus, the Rhone, divided into the Arēcōmici and Tectōsāges q. v. (Ces. B. G. vi. 24 seq.).

Völātērre, arum, f. Volterra, a town of Etruria, at which a doubtful battle was fought with the Etrusci, by L. Cornēlius Scipio, the Roman consul, in 300 B. C. This town was besieged and taken by L. Cornēlius Sūlla, in 81 B. C. (Liv. x. 12; Ep. 89). In. Völātērri, arum, m. promised grain and tackling for the ships, to P. Cornēlius Scipio Africānus, when he was allowed to enlist volunteers, in 207 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 45).

Völēntius Tūllus, Völēnti Tūlli, m. an officer, who, according to Caesar, sustained, at Dyrrachium, Durazzo, with three cohorts, the charge of a whole legion (Ces. B. C. iii. 52).

C. Völēntius Tūllus, C. Völēnti Tūlli, m. an officer in Caesar's army, in the Gallic believed that his appointment would have been the subversion of the constitution. Cicero frequently mentions him in his writings

 (Sal. Cat. 18).
 Völcentēs, ium, m. a people of Lūcānia, who, with the Lūcāni and Hirpīni, revolted from Hānūbal, and surrendered themselves, together with the garrisons in their towns, to Q. Fūlvius Flācūs, the Roman consul, in 211 B. C. He treated them kindly, and only gave them a gentle verbal reproof for their past errors (Liv. xxvii. 15).
 Völclāni, orum, m. a people of Spain, whom the Roman ambassadors, after they had declared war at Carthage, endeavoured to gain over to their interest, and whose celebrated answer deterred the other states from becoming the allies of Rome (Liv. xxi. 19).
 Völēsus, i, m. a man of Spartan descent, but settled in Italy, whose name, among his descendants, the Romans changed first into Völēsū, and afterwards into Völērū, which continued without alteration, during the existence of the Roman state (Sil. Ital.
 ii. 8).
 A man in the Roman army, who killed Asclnū, after he had joined Hānū-bal in Italy (Sil. Ital. xlii. 244).
 Völēsus Mēssāla, Völēsī Mēssālē, m. held the office of proconsul of Asia, in the reign of Augustus, and exercised it with great cruelty, three hundred men having been beheaded by his order in one day. He strutted with haughty countenance amidst the dead bodies, as if he had done something splendid, and remarkable; exclaiming, in Greek, "O king! rest" (Sen. Ir. ii. 5). The senate passed sentence against him, but Tacitus has not recorded the punishment to which he was subjected (Ann. iii. 68).
 Vōla, ōnis, m. a slave who voluntarily enlisted into the Roman army, and who had this name from each individual in the first body of that kind, which was raised in 218
 B. C. immediately after the battle of Cēnē.

nearly extirpated the Volsi, by killing thirteen thousand four hundred and seventy, making fourteen hundred and fifty prisoners, and taking twenty-seven military standards. Notwithstanding repeated defeats and great losses, they continued steady, obstinate, and determined enemies of the Romans, who successfully repelled their incursions, and treated them, on being vanquished, with great severity, until repeated overthrows taught them the vanity of further resistance. Camillus brought them to submission in 388 B. C., and in 340 B. C., they yielded to the superiority of the Romans, from which period they may be considered as forming part of the Roman state (Liv. i. 53 seq.). Volsi volsi, the Volsi, armed with darts (Virg. G. ii. 168). The iron of the volsi was round, and that of the pilum flat, like a modern spear. Adj. Volsens, a. um. Volsens ager, the territory of the Volsi (Liv. x. 1). Volsicum nomen, the Volscan name, i. e. the whole nation of the Volsi (Liv. iii. 8).

M. Volscius Fictor, M. Volsii Fictoris, m. a tribune of the people, who was arraigned for giving false evidence against Kæso Quinctius, condemned and sentenced to banishment, in 458 B. C. (Liv. iii. 13—29).

Volsinium, i. n. v. Volsini, orum, m. Bolsena, or, Bolsina, a municipal town of Etruria, Tuscany, anciently reckoned the capital, situated among woody hills (Juv. Sat. iii. 191).

Ælius Scipianus, the favourite of the emperor Tiberius, was a native of this town (Tac. Ann. vi. 8). Inh. Volsinenses, ium (Sing. Volsinensis, is), v. Volsini, orum (Sing. Volsinus, i), m.

Supported by the Sāpnates, they first made incursions on the Roman territory, in 391 B. C., when war was declared against them, upon which L. Læcælius Flāvus and C. Æmilius marched next year against these new enemies, and, having routed them with great slaughter at the first onset, they afterwards met with no opposition, in plundering their whole country. Conscious of their inferiority, they sued for peace, which was granted them, on condition that they made restitution to the Roman people, and paid the army for that year. Q. Fabius Māximus Gurgēs, in his third consulship, conquered the Volsini, in 267 B. C., to which Florus alludes (i. 21).

This historian calls them the richest of all the Etrurians. The Tuscan goddess Nōrtia, had a temple in their town, into which they drove a nail annually, to mark the number of the year (Liv. v. 31—73).

Adj. Volsinensis, is, e, et, Volsinus, a. um. Volsinensis lacus, the Lake of Bolsena (Plin. v. 334).

Volsini foci (Prop. iv. 2. 4). The reading here is doubtful.

Volsi, ōis, m. one of the six sons of Crisus, killed by Hannibal at the battle of Cānne (Sil. Ital. x. 143).

Voltūma, a. f. a town, or place, supposed to have been near the modern Fiterbo, where there was a temple, at which the twelve states of Etruria frequently met, to deliberate on matters connected with their general interest and safety (Liv. iv. 23 seq.).

Some think that Voltūma was a Tuscan goddess, and that her temple was in Viterbium, Fiterbo.

Voltūrcius, T. Voltūrcii, m. a native of Crōto, Cotrone, and one of the conspirators with L. Sērgius Cātīlina, whom P. Cōrnēlius Lēntulus Sūra intrusted with a letter to Cātīlina, to procure an interview between the Allobrogian deputies and that traitor, before they quitted Italy. The consul, M. Tullius Cicerō, seized these deputies, and their attendants, among whom was T. Voltūrcius, who, on being brought before the senate, pleaded entire ignorance of the conspiracy; but, on being assured of his safety, he made a full discovery of all that he knew. His information proved the guilt of the other conspirators, who were seized at the same time, and the disclosure of their plans showed the greatness of the danger, from which the activity, vigilance, and judgment of the consul had delivered the state. The Allobrogian deputies corroborated his evidence, and convicted the traitors, with whom they were confronted in presence of the senate (Sal. Cat. 44—48).

Voltūmnia, a. f. the wife of C. Mārcius Cōrōlānus, who, with her children, formed a prominent part in the company of Roman matrons, that went to the camp of Cōrōlānus, and, by their tears and supplications, prevailed on him to withdraw his troops from the territory of Rome. His affection for his mother, his wife and children, overcame his resentment at the conduct of the plebeians, and his granting their request, is said to have cost him his life (Liv. ii. 40).

L. Voltūmnius, L. Voltūmii, m. (surnamed in con. cal. Flāmnia Violensis), was one of the Roman consuls, in 308 B. C. This year, he commanded with success against the Sālentinī, and ten years after, he was re-elected to the same office. After defeating the Sāmnites, and quelling an insurrection among the Lūcāni, he joined his colleague, Appius Claudius, in Etruria, Tuscany, in consequence of a letter from him, requesting his assistance. On his arrival, Appius pretended ignorance of the letter, appeared offended at his coming to his province, and acted towards him with insolence. In the altercation which ensued, from Livius, who leaves the subject of the letter undetermined, Voltūmnius, both in strength of argument and propriety of conduct, surpassed Claudius, and had not the officers of the two armies interfered, and effected a partial reconciliation, he would immediately have returned to Sāmnium. Voltūmnius having remained, the two consular armies defeated the combined forces of the Etrusci and Sāmnites, and took their camp. In his absence, the latter had plundered Cāmpānia, but on his return he crushed them, retook the spoil, and gave whatever part was not claimed by the owners to his troops. He presided at the next elections, enlarged on the importance of the war in Etruria, and recommended the choice of able commanders. A decree of the senate, and also an order of the people, continued him in command next year, and the same success in arms enfeebled the enemy, and added to his military reputation (Liv. ix. 42 seq.).

He was the husband of Virgīnia q. v. Adj. Voltūmnius, a. um. Voltūmnius exercitus (Liv. x. 21).

P. Voltūmnius, P. Voltūmii, m. (surnamed in con. cal. Amintinus Gallus), was raised to the consulship, in 461 B. C., a year of great turbulence, during which the consuls acted with prudence, on purpose to avoid exposing both themselves and their office to insult. Voltūmnius was one of the three ambassadors sent to Græchus Clællus, the commander of the Equi, who treated them with contempt (Liv. iii. 10, 25).

P. Völümilius Euträpeli, P. Völümili Euträpeli, m. who had that surname from the keenness of his wit and raillery, conjoined with politeness of manner. He enjoyed the friendship of M. Antönius, under whom he was præfectus fabrurum, and seems also to have been intimate with Cicero, to whom the orator addresses two letters (Fam. vii. 32, 33), and with whom he seems to have been on visiting terms (Fam. ix. 26). Like other wits, he indulged in severity and sarcasm; his knowledge of mankind was more to be commended than the purity of his motives, or propriety of his conduct (Hor. Epis. i. 18. 31). According to Cornélius Nepos, he owed great obligations to T. Pömpönus Atticus during the civil wars. This writer calls him simply P. Völümilius (Cor. Nep. Att. 9).

T. Völümilius, T. Völümili, m. the intimate friend of M. Licinius Lucillus, whom M. Antönius put to death, because he had joined the republican army. From grief at the loss of his friend, he employed his sword against his own life, in 43 B. C. (Val. Max. iv. 7).

Völünx, Völünx, m. a Moor, possessed of a great extent of land, and also of rich treasures, killed by Rüllus in the battle at Träsmönus, the Lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 261).

C. Völüsönus, C. Völüsön, m. an officer whom Caesar sent with a galley to survey the coast of Britain, opposite Gallia, and to acquire as correct information as he could, respecting the harbours and landing places, previously to his sailing against that island (Cæs. B. G. iii. 5 seq.).

Völüsänus, I. m. son of the Roman emperor Gallus, who lost his life with his father. See C. Vibius Trëbönianus Gallus.

Völüsüs, I. m. a bad poet, whose annals Cätüllus ridicules (xxxvi).—2. A native of Bithynia, and friend of Jüvenälis, to whom he addresses his 15th Satire.

Völüsüs Pröcülus, Völüsii Pröcili, m. an officer who commanded a thousand marines, and who had been employed to destroy Nero's mother. His reward bore no proportion, in his opinion, to the enormity of his crime; and his other atrocities in the service of the prince had, he considered, been ill requited, on which account he meditated revenge, whenever an opportunity offered. The secrets of his heart he disclosed to Epichäris, who plotted the destruction of the emperor; and, in place of executing her schemes, he became informer, and betrayed the whole to Nero, in the year 66. On his evidence, the emperor caused this magnanimous woman not only to be imprisoned, but to be examined by torture; but the rack did not extort a single word from her (Tac. Ann. xv. 51—57).

C. Völüsüs, C. Völüsii, m. a common soldier of the third Roman legion, was the first who gained the summit of the rampart, and, being followed by the legion, took the camp of the Vitellians at Crémöna, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. iii. 29).

L. Völüsüs, L. Völüsii, m. a Roman of ancient family, but only of pretorian rank. He was the first of his house who rose to the consulship, and, afterwards, he attained the dignity of censor, having been appointed to the latter office, on purpose to regulate the classes of the equestrian order. He died in the year 20. (Tac. Ann. iii. 20).—2. A man of great wealth, which he acquired under a succession of despotic emperors, by liberal arts, yet unexposed to danger. He died in the consulship of his son, Q. Völüsüs Sätürninus, in the year 57. From Tacitus it appears, that he raised his immense fortune by a long life of parsimony (Ann. xiii. 46 seq.). Plinius calls him L. Völüsüs Sätürninus (ii. 29).

Q. Völüsüs Sätürninus, Q. Völüsii Sätürnini, m. obtained the office of consul with P. Cornélius Scipio, in the year 57. Proud of his family, he endeavoured to thwart Sextus Africanus, with whom he continued for the pre-eminence, when they and Tribüllius Mäximus were appointed to hold the census in Gallie, in the year 62. Their mutual animosities disgraced themselves, and gave the superiority to Tribüllius; to whom they both looked down with contempt (Tac. Ann. xiii. 25 seq.).

Völüstäna, orum, n. the ridge of Cimälii möntes, Volatza (Liv. xlv. 2).

Völüsüs, I. m. an officer in the army of Tärnus, whom he instructed to command the Völsci to arm (Virg. Æn. ix. 468).

Völüs, Völüs, m. son of Böechus, king of Mauritänia, Morocco and Fez, sent by his father at the head of a thousand horse to meet L. Cornélius Sülla, quaestor under C. Marius, to show him the way to the royal residence, and to act as a guard to his person. Jügürtha, king of Nümidiä, with whom the Romans were then at war, gained intelligence of Sülla's journey, watched his movements, and approached so near as to convince the quaestor that Völüs, acting treacherously, intended to draw him into an ambush. A short time, however, vindicated his innocence, and Sülla, after passing through the very camp of Jügürtha, arrived at the court of Böechus, without meeting either accident or danger (Sal. Jug. 105—107).

Vömänu, I. m. the Vomano, a river in the south of Picënum, a district of Itälia, Italy, on Adria, the Gulf of Venice (Sil. Ital. viii. 437).

Vönönes, is, m. I., son of Phräates IV., sent by his father as a hostage, to the Roman emperor Augustus. After the death of Phräates, and the expulsion of Phräates' and Orödes II., at the request of the Parthians, Augustus sent Vönönes to assume the reins of government, about the year 13. But they soon repented of their choice, considered him an alien, and regretted the disgrace brought on their country, by receiving a prince from a foreigner. His manners inflamed their indignation; he departed from the customs of his countrymen, and kept a train of Greek attendants around him. His subjects offered the crown to Artäbänus, who drove him from his kingdom, and he fled to Armënia, of which the throne was then vacant, and he was appointed sovereign of that country, in the year 16. Two years after, the Armenians expelled him, and, in consequence of an agreement between Gërmänicus and Artäbänus, he was removed to Pömpöipölis, Meath. Requested with this confinement, he bribed the guards, Volatuz that he might penetrate into Syria, and obtain protection from the reigning monarch, who was his near relation. With this intention, he went out on a hunting party, watched his opportunity, and endeavoured, by flight, to effect his escape. On the alarm being given, he was soon apprehended, wandering on the banks of Pyramus, the Gihon, and again put under confinement. He did not long survive, for Rémus, a resumed veteran, who had the charge of his person, in a fit of passion, ran him through with his sword, in the year 19 (Tac. Ann. ii. 1-68). In Suetonius, Tiberius seems charged with the murder of this monarch (Tib. 49).—2. Governor of Média, who ascended the throne of Parthia, on the death of Götirzes. Nothing respecting this prince, says Tacitus, merits a place in history. After a short inglorious reign, he died, leaving his kingdom to his son Völögēsēs, in the year 30 (Tac. Ann. xii. 14).

Vöräptus, i. m. the father of Gēsāder, a Seythian commander, in the war between that nation and the combined forces of the Argonauts and Colchians (Val. Flacc. vi. 288).

Vörtūmus. See Vértūmus.

Vörtēnus Mōntānus, Vörtēni Mōntāni, m. a distinguished orator, and also a poet, mentioned by Ovidius. In oratory, copiousness and redundancy constituted his principal defects. Not satisfied with a thought well expressed, he repeated and retouched the same thing, till he injured the whole. On this account, Scævus called him the Ovidius of orators. Tiberius brought him to trial, for using words injurious to the emperor, and the senate banished him, according to Eusebius, to the Bālāres Insula, in the year 25. This author makes Vörtēnus a native of Gallia Nārbōnēnsis, as does also Martialis (viii. 72. Tac. Ann. iv. 42). Sēneca mentions him as a man of a very uncommon, but not of a very cultivated, genius (Sen. Cont. iv. 38).

Vulcānus, i. m. the god of fire, and the patron of all artists who wrought in iron and metals. Of this name, several occur in ancient authors. Cicerō mentions four; the first was the son of Colus, who had by Minerva that Apōllo whom historians make the Protector of Athens; the second, the son of the Nile, whom the Egyptians called Opas, and considered as their tutelary god; the third, the son of the third Jupiter and of Jūno; and the fourth, the son of Mēnālius, who possessed Insula Vulcānia, the Lipari, or the Liparean islands, which lie between Sicily and Italy. The third appears to have been the Vulcan worshipped by the Romans, whom some asserted to be the son of Jūno only; hence called Jūnōngēna. He was uncommonly deformed, on which account his father (Pausanias says, Jūno) threw him down from heaven (Val. Flacc. ii. 87 seq.). The injury which he received from his fall on the island Lēmnos, Lemno, an island in Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, sacred to him, is said to have rendered him lame ever after. The portion of ground which he first touched, is remarkable, according to popular belief, for producing a particular kind of earth, Lēmnia Terra, or, Terra sigillata, which was supposed to cure the bite of serpents, and poisoned wounds. On this island he had a cave, of which Vālerius Flaccus has given a description (ii. 335 seq.). The Cyclopes were his workmen, whose forges were in Mount Ætna, where they made thunderbolts for Jūpiter, and arms for the other gods. Apōllōdōrus calls the Cyclopes Hārpes, Brōntes, and Stērōpes; Hōmērus and Hēsiodus, Arges, Brōntes, and Stērōpes; and Virgilius, Brōntes, Stērōpes, and Pýracmon. Vulcānus is often used by the poets as synonymous with ignis. His appearance, as depicted by the ancients, was generally that of a blacksmith when working at the anvil. From Mount Ætna, this god is called Ætneus; from Lēmnos, Lēmnus, or, Lēmnus pater; from being lame, Tardipes; and from presiding over fires and metals, Hephaistos, Chrysor, Callipodion, and, Mulciber, or, Mulcifer. Dōmus Vulcāni, the house of Vulcānus, i. e. Ætna (Virg. Æn. viii. 422), which Jūvenālis calls antrum Vulcāni (Sat. i. 8). Vulcānia, i. m. festivals in honour of Vulcan. Adj. Vulcānius, a, um, et, Vulcānialis, is, e. Vulcānia tellūs, the land of Vulcānus, i. e. Sicily (Virg. Æn. viii. 422). Vulcānius annis, a torrent of flame or fire (Claud. xxxiii. 170). Vulcānia munera, the gift of Vulcānus, i. e. the chariot of the sun, which was his workmanship (Ov. Met. ii. 166).

Vulcānius Arāricus, Vulcāni Arārici, m. a Roman knight, who entered into the conspiracy against Nēro, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xv. 50).

Vulcānius Mōschus, Vulcāni Mōschi, m. a man banished by the laws of Rome, and admitted into the freedom of the state by the inhabitants of Marsilles. To their state he bequeathed the whole of his property, as to his native country. The senators confirmed his will on a petition from the Massilians, in the year 25 (Tac. Ann. iv. 43).

Vulcānius Tērtullinus, Vulcāni Tērtullini, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who interposed his authority, and prevented the senate from making a new law in the absence of the emperor, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. iv. 9).

Vulcānius Tūllinus, Vulcāni Tūllini, m. a Roman of senatorian rank, involved with others in a prosecution against Lēpida; but they prevented a final sentence, by appealing to the emperor, in the year 66. They ultimately escaped from this trial without injury (Tac. Ann. xvi. 8).

Vulfennius, i. m. a centurion of great size, whom Pērsius introduces laughing at the Grecian philosophers (Sat. v. 190).

Vultēus, i. m. an officer of C. Jūlius Cæsar, and zealously attached to the interest of his general. C. Antōnius, who commanded for Cæsar at Sālōne, having been shut up by Octāvius, who adopted the interest of Cn. Pōmpēius, and, distressed for want of provisions, attempted to send some vessels through the fleet of the latter, two of which effected their escape, but a boom below water intercepted the third, commanded by Vultēus, on which he encouraged his crew, consisting of a thousand Optatēni, to put an end to their lives, rather than fall into the hands of the enemy. He set them the example, which they, despairing of escape, followed, and died by their own act (Luc. Phar. iv. 465).

Vultēus Mēns, Vultēi Mēns, m. a common crier, of a small property and respectable parentage, whom L. Mucius Philippus, in a frolic, prevailed on, with some difficulty, to accept of an invitation from him, to whom he gave a considerable sum of money, and promised to lend more. By his advice, he bought a farm. From that period, he spoke of nothing but furrows, vines, and trees. To his new employment he applied with uncommon keenness, but his sheep were stolen, his goats died, his crops failed, and his oxen were killed by ploughing, on which he requested his patron to restore him to his former estate. Hörätius probably meant this narrative to apply to himself. Fatigued with the splendour and company he met in the house of Mæcenas, as well as from his delicate state of health and advanced age, he wished to enjoy the undisturbed tranquillity of a country life (Epis. i. 7. 55 seq.).

Völtur, fris, m. a mountain of Apulia, on the confines of Lucania, part of which extended into the latter district, which explains the passage in Hörätius, where the poet says he fell asleep on Völtur, an Apulian mountain, where he was beyond the boundary of Xanthias Phœceus, Xanthia Phœceus, m. a man to whom Hörätius addresses one of his odes. He had fallen in love with a slave, which the Romans considered a great disgrace in a man of family. The poet encourages him in that attachment, by examples from antiquity (Od. ii. 4).

Xanthippus, es, or Xanthippa, w, f. the wife of Socrates, represented as exceedingly peevish, fretful, and discontented. Her name has become a common appellation for a scold (Gel. i. 17).

Xanthippus, i, m. a native of Thèræpne, a brave soldier and an able general. He went to the assistance of the Carthaginians against the Romans, during the first Punic war, took the command of their forces, defeated the enemy in a pitched battle, and made their general, M. Atilius Regulus, prisoner (Liv. Ep. 18). Respecting his return to his native country, and the conduct of the Carthaginians towards him after that signal victory, different accounts have been transmitted. Some maintain, that the jealousy of the Carthaginians obliged him to quit Africa, and go back to Greece; others, that the Carthaginians murdered him on his passage home, and threw his lifeless body into the sea. It has likewise been asserted, that they put him on board a ship leaky and unfit for service, with the intention of his perishing in the Mediterranean, a stratagem which, some maintain, he artfully eluded. According to Silius Italicus, he had, by Bæcæ, three sons, Eumachus, Critias, and Xanthippus, all men of great bravery (iv. 357 seq.).—2. Son of the former, killed by Virbius in Italy (Sil. Ital. iv. 392).—3. Son of Arifbron, and father of Pèricle. He preferred an accusation against Miltiades, for his returning from Páros without having taken the island, alleging that he had acted treasonably. At Mýcæ, Xanthippus commanded the Athenian forces, afterwards he besieged Sestos, his native Apulia, i. e. on that part of mountain which was in Lucania (Od. ii. 9 seq.).

Völturum, i, n. Castello di Voltur town and fort at the mouth of Völtur the Volturino.—2. The ancient name of pua g. v.

Völturnus, v. Völturnus, i, m. the turno, anciently called Athurnus, a river Cämpāna, considerably to the south Liris, the Garigliano. Virgilius calls annis vādōsus (Æn. vii. 728), which shews that he considered it shallow, and it is also to have been the idea of Stālus, tūmus impeditus (quondā) crucem militum (Syl. iv. 3. 68); whereas Ovidius represents it as rapid, and of considerable depth (i. xv. 715). Claudianus agrees with Ovid (i. 256). Adj. Völturnus, a, um. Fa na vāda (Sil. Ital. xii. 521).

Völturnus, i, m. the southwest wind, contributed greatly to defeat the Romans the battle of Cannæ, in 218 B. C., blowing violently in their faces (Syl. ix. 514. Liv. xxii. 46). From Lavin name seems to have been provincial.

Xanthus, i, m. a river of Ionia, in the province of Lydia, in Asia Minor, which flows into the sea near the city of Smyrna. It was called Xanthus, because it was said to have been the blood of the Cyclops Polyphemus, who was killed by Ulysses.

and nailed Artayetes, the governor of town, to a cross (Herod. vi. 131 seq.). Xanthō, ūs, f. a sea nymph, one of the train of Cyrenæ (Virg. G. iv. 336).

Xanthus, i, m. a son of Phenops, twin-brother of Thōas, killed by Diōa (Hom. Il. v. 152).

Xanthus, i, m. the Mender, a large rapid river of the Troad, which has its source in almost the highest range of mount Hōmērus says, it was called Scāmānde men, and Xanthus by the gods. Ptolemy copying Aristotēles, mentions that this had the name of Xanthus, because it red the wool of the sheep which drank red, and that it was navigable (i. 610). The plain of Troy lay between the rivers Scāmānde, and Scāmānder, the Meander, but there are great uncertainty and respecting these streams. The Scāmānde was burned during the Trojan war; Ovidius has Arasque iterum Xan and Xanthus about the Trojan war; a time, viz., when Phæthōn was setting world on fire (Met. ii. 245). The names, subjoined to these classical rivers, been taken from a late traveller, to whose ment considerable deference is due, would, however, be rash to assert, that thing approaching to certainty respecting the locality of the scenery of the Iliad been yet laid before the public. Nor is it wonderful; for, upwards of 1700 years no person pretended to know the site ancient Troy. Of late, chiefly since Ch. Herberichs fancied that he had discovered the site of that city, much has been written on an interesting subject. Almost every traveller who has, for these twenty years past, visited the eastern shore of the Archipelago and Dardanelles, has advanced a new theory, though his own may have failed to prove conviction, has had the merit of proving that those of his predecessors were wrong.

and at variance with the truth of geography and history, or with the Iliad, or with both. Of the two rivers, Simöis and Schmänder, which occur so frequently in the poems of Homer, it is but justice to both to state, that they have been no bar to any conjecture or hypothesis. Since Chevalier's publication appeared, these streams have shown a ductility truly surprising, have changed from right to left, or from left to right, run into each other on either bank, of course flowed in different directions, or crept along an artificial canal, as best suited to the idea of the author! If Homer's two promontories were Sigeum and Rhetium, Agamemnon's skill in encampment could not claim high commendation; since the extremities of the Grecian camp would, in that case, have been three miles distant, with the additional disadvantage of being separated in the middle by a considerable river and morass, almost, if not wholly, impassable. Every slight inequality in the surface of the adjoining plain has been imagined the tomb of some "mighty chief untimely slain," and every stone, once used in a building, has been supposed a fragment of Troy. The site of that city itself has been discovered near the sea, on the plain, and so close to the foot of Ida, that the rocks of this precipitous range of mountains formed its northern wall. According to the last supposition, Troy must have stood ten miles from the coast, and consequently ten miles from the Grecian camp. Nay further, the ruins of the city, Troy, which Homer seems to place on a plain, have travelled up the hill, an assumption which may be allowed to stagger a mind not immediately addicted to scepticism! These remarks respecting the site of Troy, &c., have been added, that the young scholar may be prepared, when maturer years have strengthened his mind, and longer study familiarized him with the elegant writings of the Greeks and Romans, not to expect uniformity of opinion on this subject; and not to think the less favourably of that most admirable poem, the Iliad, if it shall, at last, be found, that for the scenery, as well as for the machinery, of that unrivalled epic, we are indebted solely to the imagination of the poet. Adj. Schmänderius, a, um. Schmänderia civitas, a small town of the Troad (Plin. i. 610).—2. A river of Lycia, on which was a cognominal town. Inh. Xanthii, orum, m. opposed Brutus, who carried their town, not, however, without much opposition (Ap. Bel. Civ. 635). Adj. Xanthius, a, um. Xanthius cāmpus (Herod. i. 176).

Xanthus, i, m. one of Hector's horses. The other three were Pödärgus, Æthon, and Lämpus. Andrömächē fed them with sweet wheat, and mixed wine with their drink (Hom. II. viii. 185).—2. A horse of Achilles, which had the gift of prophecy, at least uttered a prediction (Hom. II. xvi. 149 seq.).

Xenarchus, i, m. prætor of the Achaë, in 176 B. C., who wished to ingratiate himself with Pérsēs, king of Macedonia, in which all who had recovered lost slaves seem to have agreed with him; but Cállierēs and the Roman party opposed them (Liv. xli. 23).

Xenippa, orum, a. place in Sogdiana (Curt. viii. 2).

Xéno, ónis, m. a Grecian in the family of the Roman emperor Tibérius, by whom he was banished to the island Cinária, for giving an answer which his master considered uncivil (Suet. Tib. 56).

Xénoclides, is, m. a nobleman of Chalcis, Egripi, who, with Mictio, governed the city, after Euthymidas had been driven out, in 194 B. C. They were both in the interest of the Romans (Liv. xxxv. 38 seq.).

Xénócrates, is, m. a native of Chalcodon, and scholar of Plato, under whom he made great progress in philosophy. His talents and merits procured him the friendship of his instructor, and the distinction which that honour necessarily conferred. To his school none were admitted without a knowledge of mathematics, which he called the key of philosophy. To the purity and integrity of his own life, may be attributed the correct morals of his students, rather than to the sternness of his precepts. Such was his regard for truth, that when others were one day required before the judges to make oath, on Xénócrates presenting himself as ready to comply with the custom, the whole bench rose up, declared his oath to be unnecessary, as his word was enough. Neither Philippus, nor his son Alexander, could prevail on him to accept of a bribe. Through life he enjoyed the highest respect of the Athenians, but disregarding money he died poor, after he had taught many years in the Academia, in which he succeeded Speusippus. His notions were particular, as he considered the sun and seven planets as the only divinity. Of the numerous treatises, which he wrote on a variety of topics, not one has been transmitted (Val. Max. ii. 10).

Xénophānes, is, m. one of the ambassadors sent by Philippus, king of Macedonia, in 217 B. C., to Hannibal, after the battle of Cænna, with the view of forming an alliance with the Carthaginians, that, by their united efforts, they might crush the power of Rome. By art and dissimulation, he overreached the Romans, into whose hands he had fallen, he was allowed to proceed to Rome unguarded; but, in place of approaching that city, he went straight to Hannibal, with whom he concluded a treaty, on conditions which Livius has recorded. The whole transaction became minutely known to the Romans, as both the treaty and the despatches for Philippus came into their possession, when they took both the ambassadors of the Macedonian king, and those sent to him by Hannibal. On their being seized, the deception of Xénophānes did not benefit him a second time; for he was sent to Rome by order of the consul, and the whole letters, after being read and sealed up, were forwarded to the senate, who commanded the ambassadors to be kept in close confinement, and their attendants exposed to public sale (Liv. xxiii. 30—38).

Xénophilus, i, m. a native of Chalcis, Egripi, adopted the opinions of Pýthagoras, was a man of great knowledge, and lived a hundred and five years. He died about 227 B. C. (Val. Max. viii. 13).—2. An officer of Alexander the Great, to whom that conqueror gave the command of the fort, or citadel of Susa (Curt. v. 2).

Xénophon, óntis, m. an Athenian, son of Grillus. The year of his birth is uncertain, but Diogenes Laërtius says, that he lived ished chiefly about 396 B. C. At what period of life he became the scholar of Socrates, and how long he continued under the tuition of that eminent philosopher, history gives no certain information. Of the advantages which the powers of his mind received from their early culture, his own writings furnish abundant evidence. Considering him as a historian, philosopher, and general, we must allow he surpassed all the scholars, who listened to the instructions of Socrates. Proxenus, a Boeotian, who resided with Cyrus at Sardes, Sart, introduced him to that prince, of whose favour he soon acquired as great a share as the friend by whom he became known at court. He was one of the commanders in the army of ten thousand Greeks, who marched with Cyrus into Persia against his brother Artaxerxes, and his bravery, added to the prudence of his conduct and his skill of military affairs, raised him to the highest distinction among his countrymen. After the death of Cyrus, and the fall of his superior officers, he became the sole commander of the Greeks, whose retreat he conducted, through mountainous countries, and barbarous nations, in safety to Asia Minor. This is one of the most famous expeditions recorded in history, and generally known by the name of the Retreat of the ten thousand Greeks. Their route has lately been traced with great geographical ability in a memoir written by Major Rennel, and accompanied with a valuable map. Xenophon himself has given an interesting account of the corps of mercenary Greeks, from their joining Cyrus at Sardes, till their arrival in Pontus, in his expedition of Cyrus. Although their number at first consisted of ten thousand, it must not be supposed that, after fighting so many battles, traversing such a rugged country of so great extent, that they reached the shores of the Black Sea with undiminished numbers. Their conduct, after attaining a place of safety, tarnishes their military reputation, and exposes their commander to censure, although, perhaps, he had not power sufficient to enforce more soldierlike behaviour. Circumstances compelled him to court the favour of Agésilæus, king of Sparta, and this act excited the odium of the Athenians, who banished him from Attica, but it secured him the protection of the Lacedæmonian monarch. After accompanying Agésilæus to Thèbe, Theba, he retired, with Philistia and his two sons Gryllus and Diôdorus, to Sallus, a town of Elis, where he passed the remainder of his days in writing, and in hunting. Some affirm, that the inhabitants of that province compelled him to quit the country, and he went to Corinthus, where he continued to live, and died in old age. In the life of Xenophon, written by Diôgènes Laërtius, we find that Socrates met him in a narrow lane, across which he stretched his staff to prevent his passing, and asked him, "What was necessary for human life?" On Xenophon's answering, Socrates asked, "Where good and virtuous men resided?" and Xenophon having hesitated, the philosopher said, "Follow and learn." From that period, he became the scholar of that great man. From the same author, it appears, that Xenophon was the first philosopher who wrote history, and that Philistia, the mother of his sons Gryllus and Diôdorus, did not stand to him in the honourable relation of a wife. When the Athenians had resolved to support the Lacedæmonians, he sent his sons, who had been educated among the Spartans, to war, from which Diôdorus returned, without being distinguished by any act of remarkable bravery; and Gryllus fell in the battle in Mantineæ, Milias, fighting with great bravery among the cavalry. Some relate, that Xenophon was then sacrificing with a crown on his head, and that, hearing of his son's death, he laid it aside, but on being informed that he had died with honour, he resumed it. Others state, that he did not even shed a tear, and unconcernedly remarked, "I know that I begot him a mortal." Socrates, among others, celebrated the virtues and excellences of this youth. 2. A nobleman of the Achæi, who, with Aristonius, attended the interview at Nicæa, held between T. Quinctius Flamininus, attended by the Roman allies, and Philippus, king of Maccœdonia, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 32). 3. The physician of the Roman emperor Claudius, seduced by Agrippina to her interest. This wretch cut off the emperor by poison (Tac. Ann. xii. 61-67). 4. Xerxes is, a second son of Darius, king of Persia, who succeeded to the crown, in prejudice of his elder brother, Artabanus, because the latter was born when Darius was in a private station, and Xerxes afterwards had obtained the monarchy. His father had formed a design of invading Greece, which he carried into execution, to the destruction of his army, and of his own reputation as a soldier. Dêmāratus, king of Lacedæmon, who, being banished from his country, lived at the Persian court, and neither the ingratitude of his fellow-citizens, nor the favours of the Persian monarch, diminishing his patriotism, sent notice of the formidable preparations making for the invasion of Greece. Ancient authors differ respecting the number of the army under Xerxes; Justinus makes it consist of seven hundred thousand native troops, and three hundred thousand auxiliaries, adding, that it had not been improperly recorded, that rivers had been drunk up by his armies, and that his fleet consisted of fourteen hundred ships. That historian says, "His army wanted a commander, that in considering the king, you may praise his wealth, but not him as a general, that he was first in flight, last in war, timid in perils, and puffed up when not in personal danger. Before he made trial of the war, from confidence of his strength he seemed the lord of nature itself, levelled mountains; filled up valleys; covered certain seas with bridges; and contributed to the advantage of navigation by the invention of shorter methods." His entrance into Greece was as terrible as his retreat was dishonourable. He crossed Helliopontus, the Dardanelles, by a bridge of boats, to which Propercius alludes, Xerxis et imperio linae coisse rivas, and by the order of Xerxes two shores met (Il. i. 22), traversed Thræcia, and cut a canal across the isthmus of Athos, Monte Siveo, which Mânilius calls a sea (v. 49). He afterwards came down upon Greece, when Léônidas, with four thousand men, guarded the Straits of Thermopylæ, for three days.

against his whole army, and would probably have successfully repelled the invaders, had not the enemy, by the treachery of a Grecian, been conducted to the top of a hill which overhangs the pass. The obstinate bravery of Leōgidas and his men, had nearly proved fatal to the king himself, who, after their fall, advanced into Attica, burned Athens, which was deserted, and listening to the artful insinuations of Themistocles, was entirely defeated in a naval engagement at Salamis, Colonus. The cowardly monarch then retraced his steps, found his bridge of boats over Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, destroyed, crossed that strait in a fishing boat, and returned to Persia, traversing a space in thirty days, over which he took six months to march with his army. Such mortality prevailed among the troops who accompanied him, that the birds of prey marked his track, and feasted on the bodies of the Persians. To his disaster Mānilius alludes (iv. 65). In Greece, he left Mārdōnius, whose success did not exceed that of his royal master, and he escaped only with a few troops. Before the naval engagement, Xērxes sent four thousand armed men to plunder Dēlphi, who fell by showers and lightning. After his return to his own country, Pausānias entered into a treasonable transaction with him, on which he made war a second time, on Greece, and was defeated by Cimon, son of Miltiades, who compelled him, after gaining victories both by land and sea, to retreat into his own kingdom. These unsuccessful attacks on Greece rendered him contemptible in the eyes of his own subjects; and Artabānus, his prefect, put him to death, in order to procure the crown for himself (Just. ii. 10 seq.).

Zōllā, m. f. a town of Africa, mentioned in several old authors. Zōllus, i. m. See Hyllus.

Zabatus, i. m. the Greater Zab, one of the eastern branches of the Tigris. Zābdiēni, orum, m. a people who lived on both banks of Tigris, the Dejiluh, around the town Bēzābde q. r. (Amm. Mar. xx. 7). Zābdiēna, m. f. the district inhabited by the Zābdiēni (Amm. Mar. xx. 7 seq.).

Zācōrus, i. m. a Scythian, who held a command in the war between his countrymen and the Colchians, supported by the Argonauts. Argus deprived him of life (Val. Flacc. vi. 554).

Zācra, n. f. a mountain in Mēdia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Zācynthus, i. f. Zante, or, Zakintho, an island in the Ionian Sea, about seventy (according to Dodwell only forty) miles in circumference. Its greatest length is twenty-one miles, and its greatest breadth eighteen. The soil is not unfertile, and the climate not unhealthy. Zēh. Zācynthū, orum, m. may be estimated, in modern times, at forty by Apollonius, between Lēptis and Utica (Bel. Pan. 56).

Xōrus, i. m. a Phœnician, who, with Cārchedon, founded Carthage, according to Apollonius (Bel. Pan. 1).

Xūthus, i. m. father of Ion, from whom the Iōnes, in the judgment of some ancient authors, derived their name. Herodotus states this derivation of Iōnes as an indubitable fact, consequently it was the generally received opinion among his countrymen, at the time he wrote (Herod. vii. 94).

Xēchus, i. m. one of the conspirators against Dēmētrius, son of Philippos, whom dread of torture induced to declare the whole stratagem, and the iniquitous measures which had been adopted, to procure the death of that excellent prince. The discovery made by Xēchus, added greatly to the grief of Philippos, and he sought for the means of revenge, by putting Pērseus to death; because, at his instigation, he had deprived the innocent Dēmētrius of life (Liv. xl. 55).

Xēlinē Cōmē, Xēlines Cōmes, f. (i. e. wood-town), a village of Pisidia, at which the consul, Cn. Mānilius Vūlso, encamped, in 191 B. C., when he was going against the Gallōgræci (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Xēnē, arum, f. Daouli, a town of Thessaly, deserted by the inhabitants from fear, in 200 B. C., and plundered by the Aetoli. Philippos maintained, in 187 B. C., that it unquestionably belonged to the Aetoli, and that it had been seized on by the Thessali and Perrhebi (Liv. xxxii. 18 seq.). Xēnias, ādis, f. Xison.

Xēstus, i. m. (i. e. shaved, cleared) a place from which Hērēcles removed the thorns that grew on it, that he might, by daily exercise, strengthen and habituate himself to the endurance of labour (Paus. vi. 23).

Z thousand, of whom at least seventeen thousand live in the capital, and the remainder are scattered through forty-eight villages. Zācynthus, a, um. Zācynthium hiēmum (Plin. v. 252).

Zaitha, m. f. a town in Mēsopotāmia, at which a tomb was erected to the memory of the emperor Gōrdiānus (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 5). Zālātes, n. Zēlātes, is, m. an Armenian youth, who appears to have been at Rome, as a hostage (Juv. Sat. ii. 164).

Zālēicus, i. m. a fellow-student with L. Jēirgus, under the philosopher Thales. To the Locrēuses, under the name of Minērvā, he is said to have framed a body of laws. This fiction he probably invented, to give the greater weight to his opinions, nor did his project fail of success. The crime of adultery was to be punished with the loss of both eyes. On his own son being condemned for that crime, he put out one of his own eyes and one of his son's, thus exhibiting strong parental affection, whilst he maintained inviolate, the authority of his enactment, by holding out no hope of forgiveness to any subsequent offender. From his great knowledge, that people may have called him Minerva (Val. Max. i. 2. vii. 5. Cic. Leg. i. 22 gr.).

Zāma, ae. f. Zamora, or Zowaren, a town of Numidia, Algiers, five days' journey south of Carthage, near which P. Cornēlius Scipio Africanus obtained a decisive victory over the Carthaginian army, under the command of Hannibal, in 204 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 29—35). After the death of Juba, the Romans levelled it with the ground. Plinius mentions a fountain at Zāma, which emitted melodious sounds (iv. 782). Inh. Zāmēnses, ium, m. Adj. Zāmēnsis, is, e. Zāmēnsē oppidum (Plin. i. 540).—2. An island doubtful, or unknown, which appears to have been not far from Cōrēyra (Liv. xxxii. 16). Perhaps the true reading is Sāmē q. v., which occurs in xxxvi. 42.

Zāncle, es, f. Messina, in modern times the chief town of Sicily, situated on Frētum Siculum, the Strait of Messina. Of the date and founders of this city, we have various and contradictory accounts in ancient authors. The most probable opinion seems to be, that the Siculi built it, and gave it that name from the curved nature of the coast. The derivations from Zānclos, its first king, and a native of the soil; from Zāncle, a fountain; and from Zāpānē, a scythe, with which Sātūrnus mutilated his father, require only to be mentioned. Pirates from Cūma expelled the original inhabitants, and, in turn, Chalcidenses from Euboea, Negropont, expelled them, and took possession of the town. These afterwards yielded to the Messinians, whom the Lacedaemonians had conquered in war, and, on their obtaining possession in conjunction with Anaxilaus from Sīmos, they called the town Mēssēnē, which the Latins afterwards wrote Mēssāna. Hērōdotus states, but without good authority, that it was afterwards called Māmērtina, from the Māmērtini having been admitted into an equal participation, both of the city and lands. After that period, the inhabitants were frequently called Māmērtini q. v. Inh. Zāncleis, orum (Strab. Zāncleus, i), m. Adj. Zāncleus, et, Zāncleus, a, um. Zānclea ōrēna, the bay of Messina (Ov. Met. xiii. 729). Zāncleia silva (Ov. Met. xiv. 47).

Zāpāōrtēnōn, i, n. a mountain in Hērēnāia (Just. xli. 5). Its district was called Zāpāōrtēnē, es, f.

Zārāspēs, is, m. a Persian nobleman, who, with Ozānēs, attempted a revolt from Alexander the Great, in 326 B. C. Crātērus crushed the attempt, and put both in chains (Curt. ix. 10).

Zārāspēs, is, m. a river of Bactria (Amm. Mar. xxii. 6).

Zātēs, is, m. a Colchian, killed by Dārās, in the war between the Scythians and his countrymen, who were joined by the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 572).

Zēbōim, ae. m. son of Prōtārchus, a merchant, an Egyptian youth whom Ptolēmaeus Phycōn prevailed on to assume that character, and to oppose Dēmētrius. After obtaining the throne of Syria, Ptolēmaeus compelled him to flee, on which his men deserted him, and he lost his life, in 122 B. C. To him Justinus refers (xxxix. 1, 2).

Zelastūm, i, n. a promontory of Isthia beyond Dēmētrias. L. Apollonius and Alus, king of Asia, sent a fleet to cruise this promontory, whilst they attacked On to keep in check Heracles, who commanded the fleet of Philippos, king of Macedonia 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 46).

Zelēia, ae. f. a city of Lycia, governed Pandāros, a vassal of Prīamus (Hom. iv. 121).

Zēlys, is, m. a native of Cēricus, who left half-dead by Iāson, on the Argos being driven back by a storm to that place from which they had lately sailed. A contest was in consequence of neither recognising each other (Val. Flacc. iii. 1).

Zēno, ōnis, m. a native of Elea, a town of Eōlis, whence, to distinguish him from others of this name, he is frequently called Zēno Eleātis, and the philosophers who adopted his opinions were called the Eleatic. To him some ascribe the invention of logic, which others deny; but all agree, his ingenuity and shrewdness displayed the art of reasoning, improved, and extended by his followers, furnished the matter which Aristōtēles and others reduced to a system and formed into a system. None of his writings have been transmitted, and, therefore, his opinions are only found in the works of other philosophers, and expressed in such terms as they understood them. Hence it is difficult to form a precise idea of the doctrines of Zēno. When we have the very words of an author, we can be certain we have his ideas, because many instances different writers affix different meanings to the same expressions, each records not the precise notions of the author, but what he himself supposed to be the author's meaning. In how unlike to do Plāto and Xenōphōn make Sōcrates speak? The character of Zēno, as a citizen and friend of liberty, it is impossible to decate, with precision, from the vague accents of the several authors, who have mentioned him. He was put to death by torture at his native city (Cic. Nat. D. iii. 23).—2. A founder of the sect of Stoic philosophers, born at Citium, Larnac, or, Larnaca, a town of Cēprus, about 300 B. C. His parents being of Phœnician descent, some have called him a Phœnician. In early life, he assisted his father as a merchant, and to the purchase at Athens by his parents, he traded to that city, Zēno most probably indebted for his love of knowledge, and mental improvement. Some say, that was wrecked off the coast of Attica, with valuable cargo, which he had intended to dispose of in the port at Athens. Hence that may be, we have undoubted information, that he settled in Athens, attended schools of the different philosophers, having selected from each what he considered best, founded the sect called from the port where they met, the Stoics. He lived to an advanced age of ninety-eight, and having broken one of his fingers in a fall, put end to his life, considering that mark of weakness a proof he was no longer fit for life (Juv. Sat. xv. 107). The account Ammianus Marcellinus, is different from what is above stated.—3. An Epicurean philosopher of great distinction, under whose name, and his friend Pōmpilius studied. He wrote against mathematics. Philo called him the chief of the Epicureans (Cic. Nat. D. i. 21).—4. Son of Pölēmon, king of Pontus, and Pŷthōdōris, whom Germānicus made king of Armēnia, in the year 18. From earliest youth, he preferred the Armenian manners, delighted in the chase, and rejoiced in all the amusements of savage life. From being crowned at Artāxāta, the Armenians called him Artāxias (Tac. Ann. ii. 56).—5. A chief man amongst the Māgnētes, who, by the propriety of his conduct, and respectability of his character, prevailed on T. Quinctius, to pardon the misconduct of his countrymen, and not to punish the state for the crime of an individual (Liv. xxxv. 31). See Eurghōchus.—6. A governor of Sārdes, Sart, under Antiochus, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 44).—7. A commander under Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia, whom the Athamanians defeated, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 1 seq.).

Zēnōbia, zē, f. wife of Odēnāthus, king of Pālmyra, whom she succeeded in the throne, and not only retained the territories, of which her husband had left her in possession at his death; but, by her conquests, extended the limits of her kingdom, and assumed the title of Queen of the East. She first put to death the murderers of her husband, formed plans for the education of her sons, and then trusting to her powerful resources, and the direction of a vigorous mind, she concerted measures for establishing an independent government, subject neither to the Persians nor the Romans. The Roman emperor, Claudius, perceiving the prudence of her administration, and the success of her arms, allowed her to enjoy the dignity of the empire in the East. The neighbouring states, from dread of her vengeance, solicited her alliance. To the popularity of Roman manners, she added the stately pomp of Asiatic sovereigns, and received from her subjects the adoration paid to crowned heads in Asia. Pālmyra, from its situation, naturally gave birth to ideas of independence, and the confidence, which Zēnōbia entertained at home, did not desert her abroad. When the emperor Aurēlianus passed into Asia, to recover the cities and countries which had submitted on the approach of Zēnōbia, the undaunted princess quitted her capital, joined the army, and animated the troops by her presence. In two successive engagements, which were long and obstinately contended, the Palmyrians at last yielded to the bravery of the Roman legions, and Zēnōbia, finding it impossible to collect a third army, retired within the walls of Pālmyra, made every preparation for a determined resistance, and declared that the last moment of her reign, should also be that of her life. The hope that famine would compel the Roman army to raise the siege, supported the firmness of the queen, who refused with disdain, the proposals of an honourable retreat, which Aurēlianus offered to her, and both parties exerted themselves with increased vigour, the one to take, and the other to defend, the city. The princes of the neighbouring kingdoms, in place of aiding the queen, whose alliance they had most humbly solicited, deserted her, and attached themselves to her enemy. Even the Persians, whose duty and interest it was to support their natural ally, in opposition to foreign aggression, did not lift a single weapon in her defence, and the death of Sāpor, at this time, proved advantageous to Aurēlianus. The feeble auxiliaries advancing to support the Queen of the East, Aurēlianus easily overcame, either by arms or bribery, whilst Prōbus sent regular supplies from every part of Sŷria to the camp. Perceiving that dependence on famine was now vain, and that the perseverance of the emperor would ultimately prevail, timidity overpowered her resolution, and Zēnōbia mounted one of her swiftest dromedaries and attempted to escape to the Parthians; but was overtaken by the Roman light horse, who brought her back to the emperor. To his asking with sternness, how she had the audacity to lift up arms against the emperor of Rome, she replied with respect and firmness, that she acknowledged him as her conqueror and sovereign, but disdained submission to such men as Aurēlius and Gāllienus. At this period, her resolution entirely failed her, and instead of that magnanimity which she had formerly displayed, she timorously and ungratefully ascribed the obstinacy of her resistance to the counsel of her friends. This declaration sentenced to death, Lōnginus, one of the best critics of antiquity, who yielded to his fate without one single complaint, and followed the executioner with a calmness and serenity which astonished the spectators. He spent his last moments in expressions of pity for his unfortunate queen, and in comforting his afflicted friends. Her other ministers shared the same fate. Aurēlianus spared her life, according to some historians, because she had preserved the provinces of the East from being attacked by the Persians, and, according to others, that he might gratify his vanity, by leading this illustrious queen in triumph. Her son Vaballath had likewise his life granted him; as to her other two sons, Hērēmiānus, and Timōlianus, it is uncertain whether they died a natural death, or lost their lives by order of Aurēlianus. After the triumphal procession, the emperor assigned Zēnōbia, a pleasant residence in the territory of Tibur, Tivoli, where she spent the rest of her days. The emperor married her daughters to illustrious citizens of Rome. The ancients have commended her literary acquirements, as not inferior to her military talents. In this agreeable retreat, she composed a history of the eastern nations, and of Egypt, which appears to have been the place of her birth, and she traced her descent from the kings of that country. Amongst other qualities for which she has been praised, her personal purity and constancy entitle her to high respect, on this account she stands in direct opposition to Clēopātra, to whom several traits in her character bear a strong resemblance. The resolution of the Egyptian queen greatly surpasses that of Zēnōbia, for she preferred a voluntary death to the disgrace of being led captive through the streets of Rome.

Zēnōbius, i, m. an officer under Mithridātes, not of the strictest moral principles, first thrust into prison, and afterwards killed by the Ephesians (Ap. Bel. Mith. 200 seq.).

Zēnōdōtia, zē, f. a town of Sŷria, taken by M. Licinius Crassus, who plundered it, and sold the inhabitants for slaves (Ap. Bel. Par. 136).

Zephyrus, i. m. the west wind, the same with Favonius, was the son of Astræus and Aurōra. Pennatus Zephyrus (Lucret. v. 737).

Zephyrus, i. m. the husband of Arsinoë, from whom she was called Zephyritis, Idis, f. Others derive the name from Zephyrium promontorium, on which she had a temple, and was worshipped under the name of Chloris by the Egyptians (Catul. lxi. 57). In ancient history, two promontories of this name occur, now Cape Brassano, in the south of Italy, and Cape Lissan in Cilicia, near the mouth of the river Calycadnus, the Glaük.

Zerynthus, i. f. a town and cave in Thræcia, sacred to Hecate, in which dogs were offered to her. The scholiast on Aristophanes, places both in Samothracia, Samothraki. From Ovidius, it is evident, that these places were either on the island or continent, and this having been left doubtful, made some fix on the one position, and others on the other, and to reconcile these different statements, probably induced some commentator to suppose there were two towns of this name, situated, one on the island, and the other on the continent. Adj. Zerynthius, a. um. ¹¹ Zerynthia litorea (Ov. Trist. i. 9, 19). ¹² Zerynthium templum, the temple of Apollo at Zerynthus, which Livius certainly understood, was in Thræcia, not in Samothracia (xxxviii. 41).

Zetes, v. Zethes, is, m. a son of Boreas and Orithyia. Zetes and his brother Calais accompanied the Argonauts to Colchis, in quest of the golden fleece. They delivered Phineus, king of Thræcia, from the Harpies, which Jupiter or Juno had sent to torment him (Ov. Met. vi. 716).

Zethus, i. m. son of Jupiter and Antiope, assisted his brother Amphion in building Thebes (Hom. Od. xi. 261).

Zeugma, ætis, n. Zegmé, or, Bir, a city of Syria, on Euphrates, the El-Frat, at which was an iron bridge, constructed by Alexander the Great, which gave celebrity to the road, hence Lucanus, Pellæum Zeugma (Phar. viii. 237). Part of this remained when Plinius wrote, who mentions that the original rings which formed the bridge, were not injured by rust, but that those which had been put in the place of the broken, were corroded by oxidation (i. 582 seq.).

Zeusis, is, m. a descendant of Lacedæmonian Phalantus, killed by Cærmelus, in Italy, during the second Punic war. His mother was a Phœnician (Sil. Ital. vii. 665).

Zeuxidas, æ, m. a pretor of the Acarnanians, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 16).

Zeuxippus, i. m. a Bœotian prince, who recommended a treaty with the Romans, on which account his countrymen did not appoint him Bœotarcha, or chief magistrate. From being accessory to the death of Brachyllas, he fled first to Tanagra, and afterwards to Athens, on purpose to escape being brought to trial for that crime, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 27).

Zëuxis, Idis, m. a commander under Anti-ochus, king of Syria. In the engagement with the Romans at Thapsus, he commanded the centre. After the defeat of the Syrians, his sovereign sent him to L. Cælius Scipio, and Livius has recorded in speech for peace, in 192 B. C. (xxxvii. 4-45).

Ziata, æ, f. a fort in Mesopotamia, taken in the year 359 (Amm. Mar. xix. 6).

Zioberis, is, m. a river of Hyrcania, which Curtius gives a remarkable description, but it does not occur in any other author (vi. 4).

Zodiacus, i. m. the Zodiac, called by Apollonius Balæus (i. 677). The Zodiac is space in the heavens, extending 8° on each side of the Ecliptic, in which the orbits of the planets are contained. The Ecliptic, that great circle in the heavens, which the sun appears to describe in the course of year, and which astronomers have divided into twelve equal parts, called signs, are Aries ♈, Taurus ♉, Gemini ♊, Cancer ♋, Leo ♌, Virgo ♍, Libra ♎, Scorpio ♏, Sagittarius ♐, Capricornus ♑, Aquarius ♒, and Pisces ♓. The sun enters Aries at the vernal equinox, Cancer at the summer solstice, Libra at the autumnal equinox, and Capricornus at the winter solstice. The first six signs are called northern, because they lie on the north side of the Equator; and the last six signs are called southern, because they lie to the south of the Equator. The signs ♈, ♉, ♊, ♋, ♌, ♍, are called ascending signs, because when the sun passes through them, it is approaching our (i. e. the North) pole; and ♎, ♏, ♐, ♑, ♒, ♓, are called descending signs, because whilst the sun passes through them it recedes from our pole.

Zöllus, i. m. a commander under Alexander the Great, who brought five hundred horse to Greece to that warrior, after he has been some time in Asia (Curt. vi. 6).—A man ridiculed by Martialis for feigning sickness, in order to show the splendour of his bed (ii. 16). That poet, in other epigrams, derides the vanity of Zöllus, who he displayed in an ostentatious parade of his wealth and grandeur.

Zoippus, i. m. son-in-law of Hiero, king of Syracuse, and tutor of Hieronymus, who sent him ambassador to Ptolæmus, and remained in voluntary exile. The Syracusans put his wife Hieraclea and his daughter to death, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 4-26).

Zombis, is, f. a town of Media (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Zona, æ, f. a girdle or belt, is a name given to those natural divisions of the earth's surface, with respect to the different degrees of heat, and of the length of days, occasioned by the obliquity of the Ecliptic. The Zone are five in number, one TORRID, two TEMPERATE, and two FRIGID or FROZEN. The first, which is in the middle, has its name from being very hot. The ancients erroneously supposed that it could not be inhabited from the violence of its heat; "Quarum quæ media est, non est habitabilis æstu." It extends from the Equator on each side to the Tropics, a distance of 23° 28', consequently the TORRID ZONE is 3,282 miles in breadth. Here the sun is vertical twice a year, the days and nights nearly equal, and the twilight very short. The two TEMPERATE Arz Zones are situated on each side of the Torrid Zone, which Ovid has accurately and minutely described; "Temperiemque dedit mistâ cum frigore flammâ." They lie between the Tropics and the Polar Circles, viz., between 36°, 28', and 66°, 32', so that each is 2,982 miles broad. To the inhabitants of the Northern Temperate Zone, the sun is always south at noon, and to those in the Southern Temperate Zone, he is always north at that time. In both, the twilight increases, and the day varies in length, in proportion to the distance from the Equator. The two Frozen Zones lie beyond the Temperate, round the poles, at which there is only one day and one night in the year. The idea which the ancients formed respecting them, was not much more correct than that which they conceived respecting the Torrid Zone. They supposed these zones were perpetually covered with snow (Nix tegit alla duas, Ov. Met. l. 50), and therefore uninhabitable. But modern discoveries have proved the fallacy of that opinion. It must, however, be acknowledged, that from the long absence of the sun, and from the severity of the cold, added to the sterility of these countries lying within the Northern, or, Arctic Polar Circle, they are rendered a very dreary and uncomfortable place of residence. No land has yet been discovered within the Southern, or, Antarctic Polar Circle.

Zōna, z, f. a town of Sāmōthrācia (Herod. vii. 59).

Zōpýrio, v. Zōpýrion, ōnis, m. a general of Alexander the Great, killed, and his whole army cut in pieces, by the Scythians (Just.

ii. 5). Cūrtyus makes him governor of Thracia, and attributes the destruction of his army to a violent tempest (x. 1).

Zōpýrus, i, m. one of the conspirators against Orōpasta, who artfully formed and executed a plan by which he placed Bābylon under the power of Dārius (Just. i. 10).—3. A grandson of the former, who deserted from the Persians to the Athenians (Herod. iii. 160).

Zōrōāstres, is, m. an ancient king of the Bactriāni, said to have been the inventor of magic, to have examined into the first principles of things, and the motions of the stars. Ninus made war on this prince, whom he conquered and killed, about 2148 B. C. (Just. i. 1). Adj. Zōrōāstrēus, a, um.

Zōrāines, is, m. a king of the Sīrāci g. 9. He commenced hostilities which alarmed Cōtya and Jūlius Aquila, in the year 48; Mithridātes, at that time, seized the dominion of the king of the Dāndārīdes (Tac. Ann. xii. 15).

Zōster, ēris, m. a promontory of Attica, (Herod. viii. 107).

Zybēta, z, m. held possession of part of Bithynia, against Nicōmēdes, who called to his assistance the Gauls, defeated his opponent, and the whole of Bithynia then fell under his dominion, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 16).

Zygāctes, z, m. a river of Thracia, near which Prōserpina was carried off by Plūtō, according to Apollonius. In crossing the stream, he broke the yoke of his chariot, hence the name (Bel. Civ. 650).
